The enemy, in fact, guessing the English more or less demobilised by the gale, were slipping across in the gloom in three groups by three routes, to rendezvous in the latitude of Hornsea: thence to effect a landing wherever coast-defence was least effective, the moment the condition of the sea should permit.

Then, after the landing, to fight for a clear sea — for the Mauretania lesson had been rapidly analysed and learned in Germany: and now their hope was mutual destruction in one great struggle after invasion, thus to secure to the invading troops communication with their base.

As for the British third and fourth lines of defence round the coasts — old battleships, destroyers, submarines, coast-guns — these, alert, but scattered, would hardly be formidable to such a mass of metal.

However, at eleven that night the Asahel spied two of the three groups just effecting a junction 90 miles E. by N. of Hornsea.

She knew where she was now and could just wireless the Blunderbus to come, though the apparatus had been put out of gear by the gale. The Blunderbus answered, but only one of the Asahel's other messages was answered — by a scout, and the sound of the dope told that it came from far.

She lay now nine miles from the outermost details of the converging Germans, forging slow, and, herself hidden, could see them fairly well, for although something of a gale still gunned its gusts, the sea had quieted, and the sky, wild that night with flying vapours, was alight with constellations which sailed like a navy gliding, gliding, the half-moon their flag-ship guiding them.

The Prince thought: "They are waiting for others."

And he thought: "To-morrow! Will God make the sun rise bright for England?"

All that night his eyes did not shut. He watched that host as a famished wolf watches food which is just beyond his jaw.

Meantime, the Asahel's three lights were out, and thrice in the night, shy as a fowl, she was in flight from scouts of the enemy, coming in or out.

It had happened so that all the world-burden had fallen upon his one back, and he had to handle it: but to tackle a navy! He knew that one half-a-shell would finish the Asahel; and he knew that she was a nearly useless thing if much mist was on the sea.

The gale seemed to have cleared the sea of craft — not a tramp, not a smack, to be seen; and even when day broke he did not know what to do. To await the Blunderbus? To seek the fleet? To venture to lose touch with the armada in order to warn the shore? No wireless! His aching head sweated with the care and weight of it; and though Brockweir boys never “prayed,” thinking that irreligious, he, oppressed to passion as day began to break, dropped down in his cabin, crying out: “Guidance!”

After this he watched the sun come, watched fifteen ships join the armada, seven of them warships with quite a battered aspect, like ships after a battle, looked at the saluting of the colours, breakfasted, attended “prayers,” ordered a ration of grog for the ratings: and now, though pale, pale, an uplifting spirit was in his feet, a pride in his eyes, and in his blood a sense which his mother blent in him that the sea was his dominion.

The day had come quite bright and clear I the wind no longer particularly strong! the Asahel rolling through less than three degrees! and the band brabbling “Ride Britannia!”

She watched the Germans roll themselves in smoke, form into column of divisions — two endless lines ahead, sixteen cables apart — and set out at the speed of their slowest detail for England.

And she stood still, and watched.

But she was busy — her guns cast loose, their crews raising shells by dredger-hoists from magazines, her chief engineer down in the deeps seeing to his steam-power, his air-compressor for quick reversing, the Prince and his little staff up in their control seeing to their range-clock, their long-based 18-ft. range-finder: and suddenly the Asahel, which could be at her top speed within six seconds, sprang and ran the sea.

The smokes stooped at her funnels like the ears of the deer which he lowers, shying, as his feet fly into fleetness (her central shaft was oil-driven — a Diessel 2-cycle — her wing-shafts turbine-driven, with oil-fuel); and like the galloping stag she was gone.

Hope at this hour was high in the heart of Grand-Admiral von Grad as to the outcome of the expedition, no scout of his in sight, no scout of the British, for he had sunk or dodged all the “whiskers” of the maid British body; and he was looking over the brightness of the sea that played blue-and-white in the aisle between the two processions of ships steaming gallantly beneath their flags that streamed on the breeze — captain’s pennant, rear-admiral’s flag, vice-admiral’s, and astern the German ensign, the Eagle screaming with greed, his talons sharp.

This was “the Event!” — Invasion — so often toasted with hochs I in officers’ mess or Service-club; and it was to be like this — something like a holiday! a gala of flags on a glad morning after storm — almost too good to be true, yet true.

True — till the Kaiser burst into turbulence beneath the Grand-Admiral’s heels, he in a whirligig hurtling thirty yards toward the firmament in the midst of a midnight of smoke, his dark and tragic chariot.

For a shot (weighing 1988 lbs.) had entered her from 18,000 yards to northward, where nothing of the Asahel was visible to the glass but a misty thing that might be a smack’s mast; and to the Asahel herself nothing but the upper works of the battleships was visible.

Hence for fifteen seconds the enemy could only think that the Kaiser had exploded spontaneously; until the Blucher, too, broke into smoking before their stare: and then their conscience smote them.

Think of a bell tolling once every fifteen seconds — four doleful times a minute — a passing-bell that tolls for you before you are gone, and, as it tolls, you go: so did the Asahel's two guns go, one every thirty seconds in turn and turn — like scurrility and banter bandied betwixt Jove and Jehovah, and before the tremblement of merriment could finish in her ribs at the ribaldry of Jove, Jehovah joked and shook her.

She had, in fact, a special type of breech-block and obturator which made her guns capable of very rapid handling, the opening of the breech-mechanism by hand occupying less than five seconds through the power of toggle-levers; her shells and cordite, moreover, were separately raised; her gun-layers cooler than men in the fury of a fight — for she was not a fighter, but an executioner; their ears were deeply protected; and as the gun-sights were adjusted from the control-position by a little electric motor that drove the hydraulic-engine valve (transmitting both range and deflection), the gun-layer had merely to keep the gun on the target, and fire it.

Also, the error of her range-finder was only 89 yards in 18,000, so that four out of five shells struck. And some that fell short still struck: for they had caps with little slots in them all round, through which slots bits of tinsplate dropped down (by their own gravity), and these acted as planes, as the shell flew, so that, if it struck the sea, it neither ricocheted, nor was refracted by the water density. These little planes — a Chinnery contrivance — were said, moreover, to lessen wind-influence and to affect that “pendulum motion” of shells.

Now, the wind had been too gusty for aeroplane scouting; none of the armada's scouting ships had so far reported the Asahel; and, as her structure had been kept quite dark from the spies, her sudden shells so whelmed the armada with wonderment, that three German ships had been death-struck, and that pea-soup hull of the Cesarewitch was flumedly sinking, before ever the Admiral Second-in-Command could signal order-of-battle, and a battle-squadron of eight started northward after a swarm of destroyers to silence those two disastrous wraths.

At the same moment the air began to grow populous with aeroplanes popping aloft, and guns had begun to growl in crowds.

The Asahel did not fly: went on her westward way following the main body of the enemy, steadily sending it bales of cordite, while her three hydro-planes bounded down her bow-rails, and went mounting in spirals as narrow as aeroplanes may, climbing to protect her from the flying flock.

During which, mortality and arson were so actively harvesting among the armada, that soon another squadron was starting northward; and within three minutes practically the whole force was evolving northward — forming, as they evolved, such a throng, that it was almost impossible for the Asahel's bombs not to tumble upon something; so that, in the press, an 11-inch shell of the manoeuvring Elsass smashed up one of the 3-gun turrets of the Dante Alighieri near: for an Asahel shell had entered the Elsass under-water, at which she coughed consumptively a cough which rent her frame, and red was her haemorrhage, her armoured deck tearing lengthways like cardboard which one tears, several of her bulkheads riddled, flame breaking out in two places on her gun-deck, whereat she, like a distracted creature, who, starting from dreams, fires out right - and left with fist and foot at friend and foe alike, fired her loaded guns among the crowd round her.

What was the rationale of those “armoured decks” and “bulkheads” in those ships it is at this date impossible to say. They were very heavy, and death to the ship's speed — the deck some 3 inches thick, the bulkheads some 10 — but much too thin to resist gun-fire, just offering sufficient resistance to explode shells to the best advantage, so that they would have been better made of tin, wood, or compressed paper. The Asahel's packages that she posted made light of them.

Packages like trunks — deferred action shells, with adapted fuses to explode after penetration, thick-walled like the obus alourdi, and cased in aluminium to lessen erosion, so that the “life” of the two guns was as high as 180 rounds: she had only to keep out of harm’s way, and keep on firing, to make that day a date for ages.

Gossip has said that one of those shells made a hole eight feet across right through the cruiser — and, coming out on the other side with a downward deflection, struck the big Helgoland, which, smartly smacked on her bottom, clamoured flammivomitant.

But now the Asahel is in flight northward: for at the second of two spent shells which crashed upon her deck without bursting, but smashing five limbs by their mass, she, shy as a bird, turns tail, and now is hurling only end-on fire from her stern-gun.

“But we are going right for the Blunderbus, if God send her,” the Prince called out, though none of his party caught it, for now the air of the North Sea was in such a state of wave-agitation at the guttural going-off of guns, as if the globe had been tumbled into some boiling pot that bustlingly boiled with bubblings and bumpings, boxing with hubbub the squealing car; and as he stood looking abroad with his palms on his ribs, the wind caught a laugh out of his mouth: for now all the south heaven was already red as with the fires of ten thousand pyres rising, as dreadfully red as the death-day of Nature, and the ocean’s floor a cemetery of flames.

“And surely,” he thought, “this firing must be audible over all the North Sea, over all the coast! Help must come!”

At that moment, looking over the spiked rim of the control, he saw a man who had dropped from the clouds stab his bowels upon the bow ensign-staff, while an aeroplane rained down with bombs and another man some yards to starboard; and aloft he saw a swarm, and war in the air, and bombs falling here and there, and his balloon-gun potting at the planes in vain.

But the Asahel was (theoretically) in no danger from aeroplanes, not only because her own three, climbing direct from her, had the higher position, but because, with her speed and theirs, there was as little likelihood of their striking her as of her striking them. Her balloon-gun, in fact, proved a useless tool in practice.

But, beside aeroplanes, there came tearing in her wake a navy of destroyers, high stems trailing low trains of hull through furrows of froth; and although she easily distanced them, even as, one by one, she sank them, they kept her “on the run,” and from dealing so effectively as previously with the Dreadnoughts.

She was, in fact, made to co-operate with the Blunderbus; and the Blunderbus was away.

But she had not been nine minutes in flight when a wild cheer reached to the men in the skies from the men on her deck: yonder, hardly seven hundred yards off on her starboard bow was the Blunderbus ploughing.

The glasses had not seen her until now! she was so low in the water, foamless owing to her slowness — and painted sea-blue.

Moreover, there were only two objects on her deck, both sea-blue — a low conning-tower, and a low column which carried some searchlights, with a little stick on it for flagstaff. She had no funnels (oil-driven), no mast, no superstructure, no deck-guns, even her boats being between decks at the sea-level.

As they dashed past each other, the Asahel dipped ensign, and signalled to the Blunderbus: “England.”

And the Blunderbus signalled back: "England."

And each went her way, the Asahel flying, firing, the Blunderbus silent, advancing.

Until, in ten minutes, she was amid the throng of destroyers, almost before they had marked her: and harshly with a snarl she sank them, and passed on.

In three minutes more all between her and her horizon were battleships battering at her, she at them.

Now, their biggest guns were considerably the bigger, hers being all Woolwich-type 9'2-inchers near the sea-level: so it was only a question of time which "sank first, she or they.

But her armour was not only so thick that no shell in existence could pierce it at 2000 yards, if it had been smooth armour, but it was not smooth armour, she had the appearance of a hedgehog, horrid all over with spears and nipples, like a cavern of stalactites, so that instead of being pierced by a shell, she pierced the shell; and only protracted smashing at some one square yard of her could hole her.

And, though but little bigger than an ordinary superDreadnought, her displacement was 48,000 tons, so great was her draught: she being equally thick all over, even her upper deck being one bulk of rough Krupp 19'5 inches thick, like a district of spikey ice in Iceland, and her conning-tower a box 76 inches thick.

She was instantly deluged under shells.

Three of the huge Thüringens, and two of the Nassaus (18,000), were all at one moment within 2000 yards of her, and these together sent forty shells from forward and aft turrets, and from two of their central turrets placed at the four corners of citadels.

But, even so near, she was not very distinguishable from the sea; and her own fire-delivery was pretty rapid — three rounds per gun per minute-guns that were protected by traps that dropped automatically after explosion, and then rose a moment for the shot to pass, and dropped, like quick-winking lids, the guns themselves having little range of movement, her rudder playing a part in their aiming. She was, in fact, fought wholly from the conning-tower, from which also she was steered, her steering-gear all under armour, and her rudder of such a tonnage that three Schneider torpedoes with charges of 331 lb., could not shatter it all.

Also, since she was made for a mêlée and hand-to-hand hell-play, a steady stream of torpedoes went speeding out from her numerous tubes.

And it was quick work, and stern work, and showery work, all Germany shouting, all England grinning in the grimness of a three-minutes' struggle for the government of a globe.

Like razors the rain of shells shaved her of her spikes and nipples, and it was next a question of picking a way through her thickness inch by inch, for she was impregnable else everywhere, except in her propellers.

And while they made her white, soaping her with foam to razor her whiskers, she razored their flesh, and made them red.

Half a salvo of her port guns transformed the starboard side of the Nassau into scrap-iron cracked and rent from end to end; in five minutes a conflagration was raging within the great Ostfriesland, aspiring high like a spire out of her chart-house top; yonder limped the Thüringen like one knee-sick; and the Moltke with solitary oratory away yonder to the north was prophesying dolorously of her death, with one Asahel and several Blunderbus poison-pills rumbling in her belly; so that after six minutes it was quite a fresh bunch of the enemy which the Blunderbus was bludgeoning to the sea-bottom.

Even when a hole was bored into her starboard quarter she did not sink, as the shot chanced not to smash the walls of the compartment into which the water washed, though her bulkheads were only one-eighth inch thick; and six minutes afterwards, when at last a wave swept over her desert esplanade of deck, and she lurched and gurgled like a world, and was gone, it was at an Asahel portmanteau of cordite which had come and crashed through and through her.

For the Asahel's two guns, grown hoarse in the throat, were throwing now less effectively; and the Asahel herself, slowly sinking, was being kept afloat by her pumps — a boxful of aeroplane bombs, by very bad luck, having tumbled about and hulled her, blowing down her mast among other things, injuring all the control-party, killing three gun-layers.

But she had still most of her speed, and was now following northward a flock of troopships which, a long way inland, were stealing north before turning east for Germany: for, out of sight to the south, two British squadrons which had come up were now engaging the relics of the enemy.

And in the latitude of Flamboro' Head, at ten past eleven o'clock, the Prince, who had afresh broken his broken arm in the crash of the mast, suddenly recommenced the attack, the land-troops being convoyed now only by the cruisers Furst Bismarck, Yor de, and Boon.

Soon after eleven-thirty the Fiirst Bismarck sank, the Yorck stood motionless, and the little Boon struck her flag.

The Asahel, on which a pole-mast had now been rigged, then signalled the crowd of troopships and liners southward, and, shepherding the 82 of them, was not permitted to sink until she had come up with the British.

It was only when taken into the Lion flag-ship, that the Prince heard of the Blunderbus's fate, and shook the hand of her captain and of some of her 680 (seven had been wounded).

He then heard also of a terrible brief battle between the two fleets, disastrous to both, the enemy seeking to break away and escape eastward, with a success of probably seven capital ships only.

The business of putting prize crews into the liners, into three captured ships-of-war, and three mine-sweepers with trawls, now went forward, the sea lying fairly quiet, though a stiff sea-wind still swept it, and the sun sunny above.

At three in the afternoon the crowd started southward for the Thames-mouth.

And during the next two days London saw that spectacle which she had so dreaded, Prussian troops pouring through London: but prisoners.

Troop after troop, regiment on regiment, all day long, streaming through the teeming streets to the stations for the prisons, all London on its pavements, at its windows, patiently seeing it through, in wonderful weather like spring.

There seemed no end to them! — grand gallants some of them, regiments of giants, shining helmets of the 17th and 3rd (West Prussia and Brandenburg), Bismarck cuirassiers, uhlans — Prussian, Russian — curious uniforms of troops in ruby robes flowing loose (Turkomans), with sapper battalions, and specimens of Terek cavalry, and horse-grenadiers garbed in laces and epaulettes, the rainbow variegations of Russian regiments.

And since there are hours in which our country bounds to the very plane of greatness, never a bravo from all those crowds of spectators was raised to break their hearts, as they silently passed, unfortunate but haughty, through silently haughty lines. Only the bells of Britain could not be kept from breaking into melody, telling one to the other of it; and the name of God was in many mouths.

When the Crown-Prince, a prisoner from the Furst Bismarck, had the taste to say in our Prince's car on the way from Limehouse that the victory had been won by the weather, our Prince is said to have made the answer: "Nothing more fickle than weather, Your Imperial Highness; but you may rely upon it for being always on the side of this island."

Even at the Prince's passage the streets hardly cheered; a few flowers struck him; men bent their heads, and stood dumb.

When a king, a prince, a duke even, is not absolutely beneath humanity the people tend to consider him a man of ability; if he is that, they consider him a great man; if great, they regard him as godlike. And so now.

On first learning the news of the Battle of the North Sea, the Queen had run into a room of the King at Windsor, and dropping her forehead upon him, had called out "Oh!" and broken down into sobbings, as who should say, "Here is the money which long since you lent me, which I now pay back in full, with interest."

Those were her lordly days, in which she stalked exalted on air, her eyes alight. To hear these bells she had lived and endeavoured.

But all in her bliss was one bitter bit: and an uglier tone of malignity now envenomed her against the girl who mingled alegar in her glass of gladness, and rendered imperfect her crowning hour.

From thoughts of that girl she would turn to lavish pettings upon the Princess Elizabeth; who, however, was in no pretty mood just now.

Wildly in love with the Prince, the Princess had always disliked him in a sort of patriotic spite and jealousy; and, never letting him out of her thoughts, she was always either dreaming amorously of him, or speaking slightly of his alleged admirableness.

Seeing him now bring her brother a prisoner, a venom of tenfold love and of tenfold enmity poisoned all her nature to a nest of snakes.

Nor was she solitary in this morbid and, in fact, mad passion for the Prince of Wales, considering the singular epidemic of love-sickness which suddenly broke out among girls shortly after the North Sea event, infecting high society and low alike, débutantes, milliners, resulting within one month in four suicides. One poor Margaret, a Norfolk farmer's daughter, after going haggard with her love-hunger, drugged herself with hedge hemlock, and was discovered dead and at rest in a bed of bay, with her "Teddy's" photograph under her face — and there were others.

Meantime, the nation named him "saviour," called him both darling and father of his country, and, demanding the waiving of ceremony, clamoured for his elevation to flag-rank.

He was also at once appointed a member of the Permanent Committee of National Safety.

"But," said the then Duke of Norfolk, an unkempt little gentleman with a beard teeming with microorganisms, to the then Marquess of Tullibardine in a Pall Mall club that night of the Prince's coming, "it might have been better for our lot if the Germans had come."

Whereat the Marquess — a young man who stood every inch a lord, tall, left arm akimbo, right leg cocked, lifted his finger to utter something prophetic, but checked himself.

In truth, the aristocracy, as a caste, had long distrusted the Prince, did not quite like all this idolisation of him, and looked forward with dismay to the day when a King who was a scientist and a thinker should come to the Throne.

CHAPTER XII

THE PRINCESS

MEANTIME, THE QUEEN could not rest — for her happiness and her wretchedness.

For to one highly happy a mote in the eye is a calamity! and a mouse in one's soup as huge as a mountain.

“But for that — that one thing,” she sighed, “ah! how well would it be with me to-day!”

The spot of drab looked black as soot; she hated; and on the day that the Princess Elizabeth said to her: “Ah, Your Majesty, you have seen yourself — there is a life between Teddy and me,” the Queen hurried to the Newmarket Parlour, and scribbled in an agitation: “I must speak with you. To-night at nine I will be at your house.” But in order to “speak with” Sir Robert Barrington, it might have been a possible thing to summon him to the palace, perhaps? The weathers and well-springs of even a Queen's inwards can be very queer.

Now, it happened that Sir Robert Barrington was at the Admiralty when that note was handed in at his door; thence he drove to a club; and it was only when dining there at seven-forty that the note caught him.

The Vice-Admiral was profoundly moved — filled with a thousand wonderments: and after ten minutes deliberation in a brain of no little strength and judgment, he rose, sharply, wrote a note, and despatched it post-haste to Marlborough House.

“I deeply regret to have to beg Your Royal Highness not to go to my house to-night before ten. Your Royal Highness will rightly surmise that only the very gravest reasons, etc.”

But the Prince of Wales, after an afternoon spent in inspecting “Immediate Reserves,” was dining that night en fils de famille at Buckingham Palace; and it was not until twenty minutes past eight that Sir Robert’s note came to his hand.

Whereupon he, for his part, despatched a note to St George’s Hospital, saying: “Do not go to Barrington’s at nine: I shall be in a brougham awaiting you opposite Crewe House at 9.80.”

But Eulalia had already then left the hospital, and was chatting in her sister’s house in Wardour Street. So she duly made her way through drizzle and misty streets to the rendezvous at Sir Robert Barrington’s at nine.

And at one minute to nine a cloaked and hooded Queen passed alone through the palace park-gate on foot; and at once was in Grosvenor Place, walking fast.

Both she and Eulalia were punctual.

And the engineer, posted just inside his door, was listening like a thief to the rolling of wheels, bidding his soul be still and bold, when the two ladies met on his porch-steps.

Her Majesty, a step the higher, turned to look down at the other, on whose face a lamplight shone, and she recognised, realised... This was why the Prince had been hurried and restive....

Strong indignation now agitated Her Majesty’s lip; and with a brushing-away movement of her hand, she muttered: “Miserable Utile woman! — go.”

Whereat Eulalia’s lips fell agape, as she gazed up, like a sylph gazing in awe at a goddess, till it was suddenly suggested to her consciousness that this was no one else than the Queen herself; and in some moments more she found herself walking away in a new universe made all of wounds and awe and mute amazement.

At the same time Sir Robert Barrington was profoundly bowed, with a murmur of “Your Majesty,” and silently he led the Queen to a desert of drawing-room with two hearths, and a file of drawn blinds, and gift, and moulding, and discreet chandeliers.

The Queen, for her part, was pretty short and haughty, and rather pinched in her wind, and suspicious of shadows and corners, sitting by a table on which was wine, the Vice Admiral standing with firelight on his square face of the village blacksmith, all clumps of muscle, a thin spot showing now on his top; and his eyes smiled: for now that she was actually there before him, he felt warmer, calmer, master of himself; so that, in the reaction, the frolicsome thought crossed his mind: “How much did her cloak cost the country?”

But her chin! its uplifted pitch. She was very resentful; and be, as she spoke, very taken aback, and pained, and embarrassed.

What she had seen with her eyes she could even now hardly believe — that he — Sir Robert Barrington — could lend himself — to countenance — to abet — in his own house — the baneful influence over a young prince of a creature who wore the livery of an honourable profession —

“Permit me, Ma’am,” the Vice-Admiral interrupted with some curtness, “I have to say that the relations between the Prince of Wales and that lady are — innocent.”

A little bent, he eyed the fire, while her eyes and eyebrows played incessantly upward upon him.

“Well! — you say that. Innocent. I confess that I have wondered what you would discover to say, Sir Robert Barrington; but that you might say this did not occur to me. Let me tell you, if you do not know — His Royal Highness has known this person since he was a boy at Brockweir: I knew; I found out her address and family circumstances; I have followed her career from a distance; I have known that he has seen her, and have been uneasy — without ever conceiving — he has been brought up a Nazarene, and no razor had come near his dear head” — here the Queen’s tones lowered and broke a little in her throat, and Barrington rapidly, quietly, poured wine, of which she drank a sip at the pretty lip below the shadow’s tip that shadowed her nose.

He, in a muteness of sympathy too deep for speech, uttered nothing at the moment, for there was a unison of emotional movement betwixt their souls, afflicting him in her afflictions, and when her body danced, his cut a caper; so she went on to say: “But the circumstances of his entry here — the cab — a caress in it! — the key — no footman opened to them, Sir Robert Barrington ! — the creature’s ease—”

“That lady, Ma’am—” Sir Robert began to say.

“Oh, the days are past,” the Queen said testily, “when a light o’ love is to have the title of a lady, just because she is the amourette of a Prince: it is an injustice to Sally in the alley. But I quite fail to understand you I am here to seek an explanation, and this is it—’ lady,’ ‘innocent’! Of course, you are sincere, since you say it, but I am amazed. Pray say something, Sir Robert Barrington, to abate my amazement.”

And she waited, her lids hanging on his profile, perpendicular like a plumb-line, which he bent toward the blaze; and since his lips were deeply sealed, like steel in pain the muscles of his face convulsed a moment, and his teeth met.

“It is my belief,” he said at last, “that what I have stated is the truth. And I think that the characters of the pair in question justify that belief. This is my answer to the Queen.”

Now, the Queen, always, had a pretty free and formidable tongue: and she said off-handedly: “Oh, well, then, I must confess myself disappointed in either the acumen or the candour of Sir Robert Barrington.”

Sir Robert bowed, turned a little, looked at her, and their eyes met and communed; until hers suddenly dropped to her lap.

“At any rate,” she said — with the half of the half of a laugh!—” I cannot share in your ideal view of things. I wish I was so beatified and unworldly! So, this being so, I have next to consult you, since you are said to be the closest friend of the young Prince, and are, apparently, a friend of his friend” — she laughed!—” how are these two people to be separated? There must be some way of getting the young woman out of the country.”

Sharply on which Sir Robert Barrington was masterful, his finger lifting. “I have to warn Your Majesty that there is no such way!” And now the Queen stood up, muttering to herself: “We’ll see about that”; and aloud: “I’ll go”: and that ended it.

The rest of that night Sir Robert spent alone by the fire of that room over an old diary and an old shirt-cuff, reading and rereading some leaves that had old rose-leaves between them.

“After this third dance on that third night after her eighteenth birthday we were together fifty minutes in the orangery.... I then said to her, ‘Yes, this in me is love. It was during the night of Friday the ‘th of June, while designing a dynamo for a mine, that it struck me that it was so with me.’

“She then said to me: ‘Was the dynamo a success?’ to which I answered: ‘A perfect success.’

“She then said to me: ‘What is this thing, this love? What is its place and source in Nature?’

“My reply was: ‘You define me a pound, and I’ll define you love.’

“‘A pound’ she answered, ‘is the force of the earth’s attraction for the mass in a certain bar of platinum deposited at the B.O.T. in Gwydyr House.’

“‘But you speak of “force,”’ I said to her: ‘what is a force?’

“Her reply to this was: ‘Oh, but that’s not a fair question: force is the Holy of Holies, the Real Presence, the THING Itself: no life in any height of heaven can ever arrive at any notion what a force is; but if you want the definition current among crickets and cricketers, then “a force is THAT WHICH tends to alter a body’s state of rest or of uniform motion in a straight line.”’

“I now said to her: ‘Quite so: and now we have the required definition: Love is THAT WHICH alters a mortal body’s state of rest or of uniform motion; and a horsepower-hour of it is that energy contained in a standard mass deposited in the breast of one Robert Barrington, impelling him toward one Minna Simmons.’

“She was pleased to laugh, as it were to herself, when I had said this; and she next said to me: ‘Is Love a god, or is it a devil?’ —

“‘Every force,’ was my reply, ‘is (necessarily) Divine.’

“‘Nevertheless,’ said she, ‘I think I will call Love a devil.’

“‘And why will you do this?’ I asked her.

“‘Because,’ said she — not without some hesitation, I think—’ it seems to be frequently tempting.’

“Promptly as a hammer’s stroke I was on her, saying: ‘If, now, you had said is, and not seems, I should have felt myself a made man!’

“Upon which she became specially grave, gazing downward at her fingers. I heard her say, ‘Rob Roy’; and she then said: ‘Robert, your will of steel is scheming against my career, and means to wring its little neck, I think.’

“At those words I inwardly exulted; but made haste to say, to console her: ‘Well, love does alter a state of uniform motion, but is not altogether incompatible with a girl’s career.’

“To this she made me no answer, but laughed strangely, as to herself, and now with her programme-pencil wrote something on my left cuff. As the moon was bright beyond the tree, I tried to rise to read, but she restrained me, and then attempted to smudge out with her glove what she had written. However, after we had parted, I contrived to decipher the wildly written letters which I found to spell: ‘I always go the whole hog.’ Her being electrifies mine like live wire....

“The stable clock was striking eleven when she said to me, ‘I expect it will be like that,’ but that her definite answer would be on that day eight months....”

The Engineer Vice-Admiral clicked the diary’s clasp, wrapped up the old cuff, and sighed in asking himself: “Has she forgotten it all? Or does memory straying in her head on her bed in the dead of night ever remember, and make her sigh?”

“Anyway,” he added, with sudden energy, “I’m not going to permit her shrewish tongue to touch the fair name of so fair a lady as the Princess of Wales in my presence” — and he went off to bed.

At that hour that “Princess of Wales” herself lay on no bed of roses.

After “going” at Her Majesty’s command, she had wandered, pondering upon “miserable little woman — go.” The mystery! — unless she had been mistaken for someone? for that it was the Queen who had spoken she had no doubt. And the fact that Her Majesty was at that house at all caused to be born in her heart’s heart all a swarm of formless doubts, awed questionings, too shadowy as yet to shape themselves into consciousness.

She only got back to her hospital at half-past nine, so only then got the note: "Await you opposite Crewe House..." and she was off, late, covering the distance fleetly, love the motor in her feet.

Twenty yards off she could see the standing carriage through the thick of Piccadilly traffic and mist; but all at once eagerness failed in her legs, and she stopped agape to gaze. There at the carriage-door, as it seemed to her, was a girl.

And she would have known that girl under many veils — that "Mademoiselle Oyone," in whose charming arms she had caught her Teddy dancing at Chinnery's....

In fact, though, Oyone was not at the carriage-door, but behind it: and she was there because, since the North Sea Battle, instructions had afresh come to her from Peking as to the Prince, and had found her willing now. In those days, therefore, she was hovering upon the Prince's steps, patient as a shadow, watching for her perfect chance.

She waved to her chauffeur; and it looked to Eulalia like a wave of farewell to the brougham.

Night-shades touched that smile of anticipation on Eulalia's face; and a thought was in her, "something must be against me to-night," as she paced on with graver steps.

Her Teddy sprang out to her with, "I am glad! Was getting afraid — You didn't go to Barrington's? He wrote to say — Never mind, here are the old eyes that shock me afresh each time? — So what did I do? — Scott, I was thrown on my beams' ends — I hired a little hotel in Knightsbridge — But, I say, what's up? Not glad to see one?"

It suddenly struck him that those eyes that surprised him each time were even wider this night: there was awe in them, there was also a something of horror, and a lost distracted something, as of one who asks himself: "In which one of God's worlds am I now?"

For his left arm was in a sling, as had been the Prince of Wales's when she had seen him passing through the street northward to the battle; across his forehead a scar hooked over the eye, precisely like the Prince's.

From that sight her eyes could not move themselves one moment; and as she stood musing on it, the thought passed through her heart: "Mother doesn't know what I am."

Now all was clear! now it flashed upon her why Her Majesty had said: "Miserable little woman!" The Queen was not aware what she, Eulalia, was.

After the shock of awe, of horrid elevation in airy spaces, and wild, white light at the height of the sun, her next sensation was pride! for, if she was the Princess of Wales, was not this because she was born like that? of that quality and quintessence? the equal of Queens by inbred heredity? and in another moment her soul was moving to an emotion of love and motherliness, and her moan was, "My poor boy."

"Teddy," in his headlong way with swaying shoulders, had hustled her into wedlock at their fourth meeting, a year before he had left Brockweir! Lately she had begun to think that that was scarcely a fair thing to consider a man bound by such a marriage...

When he said again, "But what's up? The cut? The arm? that's nothing!" at last she found the power to utter something; but he could not recognise her voice, those strained tones in which she spoke as to a stranger. "I have to tell you — I cannot come to-night — I am sorry He had felt certain that her first words would be a question as to the cut! and stood amazed. "Not come?"

"No — I beg — time — you must give me — I have to go—"

"Well?"

In a secret and begging way she said, for some reason: “To Shepherd’s Bush.”

“Shepherd’s bosh, Eu! So what is to become of poor me, meanwhile? Why didn’t you write? I’ll come to Shepherd’s Bush, too, of course.”

“I have to go alone,” she said beggingly in confidence, bending to him.

“In that case — But, Eu, ought one to be sudden and mysterious? Let me come!”

“I beg — you go to the hotel, and perhaps — I am sorry — I can’t exactly promise, but perhaps — I may come. Please call me a cab.”

He frowned now, did her bidding, handed her into the cab, tossed in a box of bon-bons — for she had a passion for jawing chocolates in bed, and had taught him also to sit and nibble; and he gave her the hotel’s name, without again begging her to come, and just touched her fingers with his ups, and turned from her, but then again half turned to say curtly with an offended chin: “What’s your name?”

She in a strained voice straining against tears answered: “My name’s Eulalia.”

“Whose girl are you?”

“I am Teddy Reeks’ girl.”

“All of you?”

“Yes, all.”

“Good-night...” the cab drove off — to Shepherd’s Bush!

She could not have believed, if told an hour before, that she would drive that night to Shepherd’s Bush! and at Shepherd’s Bush she cried: “Drive on!” and the cab drove over the Uxbridge Road to Colney Hatch, and back to the Docks, and back to Shepherd’s Bush, during all which she was in the throes of the question — to go to him only once more — not to go to him even this once.

Though it wasn't her fault that she had not known what he was! but his. When she had asked him about the Prince at their second meeting at Brockweir, he had said: "If you see me, you see him — many of the fellows take me for him" — prevarication falsely true, truly false. Yet when he had constantly evaded telling her the name of his ship, and details about his family, she should have guessed things, she saw now — many evidences should have opened her eyes to the truth that he was no duke's son or country squire: but her wits had been hypnotised by his initial fib.

"But he did it to get me!" she moaned with tears near the Marble Arch, rolling west, and suddenly ordered the cab to the hotel, saying to herself, "he is my husband": for she liked his hand, that had in it an electric battery, and little workshop cuts and stains on it, to hold hot and long, feeling the bones, till it was as near to her as her own hand, and as much her hand as his, and his fleece of curls, and a certain fleet glance of his eye sideward, as gallant and imperial as Cæsar, and the tissue of his skin like silk, and there was a smell about him as of the sea and ships, mixed with benzoline, naphtha, shellac, mastic, which ever made something in her soul faint with emotion.

Why, though, had he never told her who he was? What did that mean? That she was a toy sharing in a royal escapade? not a wife, but a kind of wife? She commanded the taxicab back westward. Her grandfather's grandfather had fought at Trafalgar in the very Victory, and, though only a gunner, laying his gun with tackle, handspike, and quoin, if England was grand, that was because he had been grand....

She would not be a miserable little woman; if she was a Princess, she would be Princess-like....

And yet — he loved her well: there was no doubt: she knew what she knew. How often had he worried her to surround herself with town-house and country-house, and crowds of flunkeys, and crowns about her brows, till he should get a “really good chance,” as he always said, to announce her. But she had preferred to work, hardly caring to face the inquiring eye of her dad. He was a Puritan — a Methodist local preacher ever since his retirement — proud — Irish blood. She knew that only Irishmen know pride — that attar-of-pride, supremely élite, that is haughtier jar in its heart’s heart than Hanover, or Hapsburg, or Hohenzollem, and will spurn the lightning’s eye with a superber lightning. Her dad was like that: he called kings and kings’ dogs “hogwash.” And her (English) mother had caught it from him, and she herself, perhaps, had it: so had refused, and gone her own way — had refused to tell him her birthday, and never had had a present from him, save boxes of bon-bons and the weddingring, which she took out from her bosom where it hung, and wet, kissing it, and thought of him waiting for her, fretting his restive heart out, and ordered the cab again to the hotel.

However, it entered her head on the way that that was hardly very honest to pretend to herself that it was for him that she was going, when perhaps it was for herself, that she might have his hand. For “she was really going to give him up, to-night was the time, since, if she broke down once, then it would be a case of breaking down always. It would be best to be able to say to herself that she had never once been, after knowing: and now was her chance to be strong.

But why give him up at all? Even that point was not properly argued out! Was she not acting on impulse, driven on every wind? It was something to be the Princess of Wales, since many girls would die eight times, if they had nine lives, to be that: and she was it by right, and he her own, after all, her flesh and blood, nearer to her than to the Queen, and dearer; and though her intellect might not be cultivated to a quite high degree like the Queen's, what then? did that make her a miserable little woman? Her soul might be as pure and golden; and she certainly thought more highly of her own people than of the Queen's: so why should she stab herself so very deep to the heart, and with her own butcher hands wrench out both her eyes? That did not seem very reasonable to expect of one.

But, then, after all, it was no good arguing, since there was he to be considered. She knew very well that the fact of his father having married "a commoner" would make it monstrous for the next Queen to be a commoner: so, if she kept him to his boy's marriage, she would be bringing him into infinite hot-water and embarrassment: his mother, who was prouder than other crowned heads, would perish in hysterics. And there was the Princess Elizabeth: everyone knew that for three years the Queen and the Liberal Party had set their hearts on her marriage with him, in a hope of Anglo-German rapprochement. She would be a miserable little woman, in truth, if she stood in the way.

And she had been dreaded, and known, and spied upon! — she understood that now. Once, three years previously, a man had appeared in Holmend, the hamlet near her home, and had made secret inquiries as to her people and her whereabouts: her dad had heard, and not liked it! She had been dreaded, and eyed at! But she would no longer be a danger, and a horror, and a bugbear to those above her.

She would disappear: before long he would begin to think her dead; and then might begin to look at that outlandish Japanese popinjay in her pageantries.

But if she stayed anywhere in England, he would surely scent her out, and be after her again.... Where, then, to go?

There was the war: a shortage of nurses was being felt at the front since the last big battle, and volunteers were being asked for. She had been enrolled in Queen Alexandra's Royal Naval Nursing Service Reserve, and would be eagerly received in the emergency. That night she would apply.

Only, she would indulge her soul with one more night at his side; in which one night she would live fifty years; and would tell him that he would never find another wife to love him as well as Eulalia.

But the cab was within some yards of the hotel when she said to herself, "Oh no, really, I am not going to," and all in a flurry, with shivering lips, called "turn back!"

She drove to the hospital prostrate, her mouth stretched back in a tension of self-pity, horrified now at the hollowness of the chasm of loss in which she felt herself falling.

It was now past midnight: nevertheless, she sat and wrote to Pall Mall.

Her offer was accepted: and three days later a harrowing ordeal awaited her at St James's Palace, where she was amid twenty-seven others of the Volunteer Corps and a committee of ladies. They were expecting the Princess Kitty, the King's second sister, who was said to be coming to wish them well, when all at once, tall and formidable as a wall falling upon one, in walks the Queen in heliotrope, followed by a throng of satellites. Eulalia's heart failed her.

Her Majesty had come to say "it is good of you to go," and to pin some red-cross ribbons on their uniforms; so they stood in a row, while the smile moved along the line, picking out of the casket, pinning, Eulalia waiting through a century of strain and distress, pining to fly, to sink into the floor, to become invisible.

The Queen seems not to have seen her until they were actually face to face; in fact, she was in the act of bringing the ribbon to the other's breast, when...! But her nerves were so perfectly cultured, that she hardly started at all: only her hands leapt one inch up, and, letting the ribbon drop, she stepped on to the next, still mightily and mildly smiling.

The thing, of course, was seen — with no little wonder: and then Eulalia knew confusion of face, and pain, and did not know where to look or put herself; but one of the ladies, eyeing her askew, considered that she looked gracefuller writhing there in the grip of her pretty distress, like a sylph in a picture ashamed of nakedness, than Her Majesty reigning in her high-tower.

With this gash in her, she dashed down that night to say good-bye, climbing the long hill from Holmend just as the sunset's flush went utterly grey, and the moon stood full-faced over the covert up there before her, growing every moment more glorious as the daylight died.

She had disclosed to no one yet that she was going away, and went smiling in anticipation of the old folks surprise and disquiet. Here, indeed, she could not but smile; this little circle of the earth's surface was so well loved, affecting her with such sensations of intimacy, of rest, of religion, that while she smiled dewdrops of piety suffused her eyes: for that brook, those rough furrows, were not only her very own, but they were Eulalia, and Eulalia they, though some foreigner was permitted to call them "his."

She pushed back a garden-gate, and passed between two old yews to a white home buried in red-berried briony, stepping silent, to surprise them; and quietly opened the door; and was in.

But no glad start! no fuss of welcome! and, instantly chilled, she stood still.

Near a green-covered table, reading Deuteronomy out of a great Bible, sat her dad, who gazed at her steadily over his glasses; and her mother, sitting in grey silk and a cap, reading a Sunday Companion serial, did not (apparently) cease to read through her magnifying glass.

Eulalia, suspended, scared, bag in hand, said: “What’s the matter, dad?”

Her father smiled, eyeing steadily at her as at a specimen of seed; didn’t say anything for a minute; but then quietly: “You go.”

Whereupon, immediately, a scream, a horrid outcry of the drowning: “Almighty God, John Bayley, I can’t stand this!” — from the mother, who, casting her arms aloft, had fallen forward upon her knees.

And upon this an eruption of the most pallid and passionate rapture transacted itself during two minutes in that room, each of the three battling for breath as if in the passion of death, shouts of “Woman, learn to command yourself!” mingling with “I am not going to see mother killed by anyone!” and with “Don’t dare touch your mother with your shameful low hand!” and with “God Almighty be her father!” like people stricken with ranting in an atmosphere all oxygen. It ended with Eulalia finding herself outside in a kind of ecstasy, having been pushed by the shoulders; and it was all in a tremble from top to toe like a motor-bus that she got down the mountain with her bag.

This was work of the Princess Elizabeth, who was considered a distinctly “clever” young lady! — something of a blue-stockings! — a student of Kant! — a solver of problems! — whose suggestions had weight with friends and relatives. She it was who had suggested that, if the girl was to be made submissive to proposals, all her props should first be knocked away, and her improper course of conduct communicated to her honest home. Hence an ambassadress of known tact and discretion had come down, and had dropped in at Yew Cottage for a chat.

And the next night when Eulalia presented herself at her sister’s door in Soho, a maid delivered her the message that it might be as well if she kept away. She leant her head then on the door some moments before she moved slowly thence....

CHAPTER XIII

THE REDLIKE BAY

THE NEXT MORNING she had a letter: "Since I am very perplexed, please, dear, relieve me. I must see you to-morrow night at nine for five minutes... the Piccadilly Fountain..."

But she did not go. As he waited there at nine, an unknown nurse came, asked "Mr Reeks?", handed him an envelope.

"From his sweetheart," thought Oyone in her motorcar by Swan and Edgar.

And, "Love affair" muttered one of two detectives under the Monico — for ever since the mystery of the air-boats' destruction, the Chief Commissioner had had the Prince's every step shadowed for his protection.

"Dear," she had written, "I cannot meet you, not ever, I'm afraid. I think I see you wince, dear, in reading this, but it is not that I am really cruel, but that I cannot in all cases trust myself; and I seem to see that it is better for me to go from England, not to come back. Always remember that our marriage was entirely my fault, for you were only a boy, but a girl should know better; and now that I abandon you, it will not be very binding on you. But you will not altogether forget Eulalia, ever? I will keep the ring where I have always kept it, in the warm."

It took the Prince minutes to peruse this, and no muscle of his face moved, though he stood so long motionless, that Oyone thought: "Something has stunned him.” However, he lifted his hand quite coolly to a cab, got in in his long cloak, and started eastward, this being his monthly doss-house night; and behind him the detectives; and behind them Oyone, who said to herself: “That cab is following his: they are detectives.”

When his cab passed Aldgate, one of the detectives exclaimed, “God’s name, where he going?” and their eyes widened in alarm when he alighted at an alley marked at the corner “Duval, late Dorset Street,” for the name “Dorset” had become so associated with filth and infamy and one “Jack-the-Ripper,” that an attempt had been made to change its name — in vain.

Whoever entered it was suspect — ipso facto. In the glances that ogled you out of the glooms was the question: “What’s his little game?”

Half-way down it, on a lamp, was marked “Noted House for Single Men”; and in, though married, stepped the Prince.

Having now thrown off his cloak, he got at a wicket a 4d. ticket, passed in his marine-garb into a “kitchen,” where some singing was going on, and there sat out of the way in shadow behind a corner of the fireplace, bent down with heaviness.

This den was essentially black somehow, dingy, dismal, though two gas-jets struggled against its blackness — spacious enough, but low, stuffy, windowless, filled with men, many naked to the waist (shirts drying!), and occupied with blackened benches and blackened blocks meant for tables, and tobacco smells, fishy stench, fumes of cooking.

Some of the group round the great blaze, habitués, the Prince knew — little Tim, the Jew, and “Alexis the Sexton,” and Burrows, the tramp-poet in his velveteen jacket and knickerbockers, whose booklet of poems “the press” had praised. He, especially, was now in a state of exaltation over the North Sea Battle, ever and afresh singing a snatch of the Alhambra battle-ballad that within three days was being sold by millions in the streets, and sung by every ragamuffin through England; and when the fire-group left, off, away yonder at the wash-basins the thing might begin again in the voice of a saw in labour-pains.

One Tookey remarked: “Aye, ’e knows ’ow to give it ’em ‘ot all right, thank God for that” — a man sodden to flabbiness, who lived by day before the doors of the Duke of Beaufort — year after year — dull in a universe no huger than two streets.

And “Beer?” suggested Burrows, who had a quart-bottle, to “Alexis the Sexton,” a big and fiercely bearded being; but Alexis, brooding over the blaze, brushed the bottle away without answer.

Whereat Burrows drank himself, and now let out of his lungs:

“They breathed, ‘We are near!’
And they leered, with a ‘Hush!
We are near!’ But just here
Did the Asahel gush Live
As-id to germs on the Germans,
On the Russians like hel to a rush.”

But now stamped “Alexis the Sexton,” his hands quivering near his ears, as he shouted: “Shut up that blasted howling!” — the utterance all the more foreign for the idiomatic correctness: for he knew every language.

“Moy loife,” said little Tim, the Jew, who was proud of being English, “can’t anybody sing? Go back to Odessa and throw bombs, if London don’t suit you.”

Alexis deigned no answer; and Burrows irrelevantly put forth both arm and voice, some others joining at the third word:

“For her skipper was Ted,
And Teddy’s a bear,
When he’s sore on the head,
And is out on the tear:
And a bear that is likewise a lion
The Muscovy Bear couldn’t bear.”

The Prince, brooding in his obscurity, was thinking: “They love England, these men.... But why? the singular beings! It’s no privilege to be an Englishman — just the opposite, since they’d be much happier in Samoa, where there’s no aristocracy, or in France, where the aristocracy’s heads have been cut off. But they do, they choose to, in their great patience: I put that to their credit.”

But now afresh upon his reflections crashed the caterwaul of all the cats:

“And the Eagle he blinked.
And ‘Blitzwetter!’ he cried,
And ‘Al-Ass!’ as she kicked,
And ‘Ah-Hell!’ as he died:
‘Though her bray is the bray of the donkey,
There’s more Hel than As in her side.’”

After which Burrows, smacking his lips with an “Ah!” rose to stroll a little, his fists expanding the pockets of his opulent knickerbockers, and, having sauntered toward the Prince, brought a paw down upon the bowed back, calling out: “What, Jack, down on your luck again? And what’s wrong with the arm?”

“No, go to hell.”

“Asahel, perhaps, friend.?”

No answer, Burrows looked down on the back a little, then, spinning, stamped with the outcry: “Now put some lungs into it!” and started to chortle:

““Her forward-gun’s stern

As vit’rol!’ they yell;

‘And her stern-gun in turn

Is forward as well:

The forwarder’s name must be Asid,

And the sterner one’s name must be Hel!’”

At this “Alexis the Sexton” leapt upright, colossal, confronting the crowd of choristers with clenched fists and scowling frown, afresh interrupted in his profound reflections. But no one took any notice, and on drawled the wawling in every tone of rawness;

“Then, with bluster and buzz,

The Blunderbus bowed,

‘Are you come, Max, Coz?

Of your visit I’m proud:

Forgive, if in kissing you welcome,

I blunder in bussing too loud.’”

Now that thick lip of Alexis, who still stood scowling, bent downward, and he stopped the song with the bellow: “You crowd of fowls! Sitting here singing of your masters — yes? You see not, then, that now is your chance while they are busy! But you not even think of it! You serfs by birth! You timid mice! If you were to make to them a millionth piece of the wrong that they make to you, they would ravage Britain to one mass of ashes — if they could. And you can, but will not—”

“Which only shows that we are the better men of the two!” called out Tookey, the loafer.

“You?” said Alexis the Sexton with a lip of bitterness:

“you better than somebody — yes? Never, never, a dog was born of she-dog that was not a better being than things like you! I tell you—”

“Oh, stow it,” somebody put in, “we don’t want no shindy here.”

“No, you tame—”

“Howl it, boys!” howled Burrows, bringing down the bottle from his mouth, and out anew broke the row:

“He has saved us from harm
With his dreadful flails,
With his stretched-out arm
He has saved us from bales:
Let’s leap to our feet as we scream it:
‘God bless the Prince of Wales!’”

And they did leap, nearly everyone, whereupon Alexis the Sexton, finding himself standing in the throng of standers, suddenly sat down.

The gabbling of the two gloomy gas-lights, hanging on a thin T-tubing from a beam in the ceiling, filled some moments’ stillness, while the Prince said to himself: “All right, you are not asked for any love, but you choose to give it; and I choose to give you mine. Only wait till I get a good chance to show it, and then I will — without mercy to your merciless enemies.”

A moment more, and with a pang, new and sharp, he was thinking: “Gone!”

And he set to peruse anew that letter of Eulalia — he could in his obscurity, since already he knew it by heart: but in the midst started! his ear cocked — to listen to Alexis the Sexton.

Alexis was now saying to those round him: “They have it their own way for the moment, the rich — yes? but they have one horrible enemy, who no will fail to overthrow them. Who is their enemy? A few poor heroes throwing some bombs, yes? They are nothing. But their enemy is a still little man in an apartment prying into a microscope — Edison and Diessel were their enemies, Chinnery was their enemy, Darwin and Watt and Faraday were their enemies, God’s light is their enemy. How will they feel if you go and tell to them, ‘Somewhere I have a little box that will strike blind ten thousand of you every twenty seconds’? They will feel a little bit chilly — yes? Maybe it is invented already — who knows?”

It was at this that the Prince hurried Eulalia’s letter into his pocket. “A little box” — the name “Chinnery” — this made him ask himself: “Can it be “possible that this man has the Redlike Ray?” The jeopardy to civilisation of such a thing for even one day more was clear enough.

He bent his ear to hear more with an intense interest; but just then the plaguey Asahel song started again, whereat Alexis the Sexton with an “Ach Gott!” cast his arms aloft, got up, and walked out. Swift and still the Prince slipped out alter him.

The Russian sauntered out of Dorset Street into Commercial Street northward, his hands in the pockets of clothes that hung loose on his huge bulk, the Prince, meanwhile, all eyes for a policeman, not dreaming that those two men near the Dorset Street corner were detectives (though Alexis knew), while yonder in shadow eight hundred yards northward stood Oyone’s motor-brougham, she standing before its door. She had not been able to see the Prince enter that noted house for single men, because of the detectives' presence, and had been wondering; till now she saw him far off, coming.

As for the Russian, accustomed to be shadowed, he had the circumspection of Argus — eyes in the back of his head! — and knew that he was being tracked by the marine. Why? “What’s his game?” he asked himself in some language. Had not he, Alexis, been mouthy to blab about the “striking blind”? His heart smote him.

Now, that big body could be pretty nimble; so with a quick twist he doubled back, landed a sudden blow, envenomed and heavy as a club, upon the Prince’s breast, and was gone with all his long legs northward.

Seeing which thing, the two detectives flew, shrilling whistles, Alexis flew, and fleetlier than the three flew the Prince’s twinkling feet, wrestling with space. But he had been knocked spinning, so that the Russian had had quite a longish start, and while the Prince was still two hundred yards from him, and the detectives perhaps four hundred, the Japanese, who had seen everything, rushed a little way toward the Russian, as he approached, to hiss at him: “Jump into my motor, and you’ll escape.”

Alexis, ever shy of traps and “the rich,” did not stop; but he had instantly realised that she was non-English, saw that the Prince was winning upon him, so in an impulse, when he had run some steps past the car, resolving to risk it, he doubled back, darted into the car; Oyone was in before him; and before ever its number could be noted, the motor was shooting away, booming music of the jews’- harp.

It spurted round the first corner, so by the time the two detectives could get into their taxicab and give chase, the car was nowhere; and a third detective who had come from the further end of Dorset Street, groaned to himself: “God! I’ve lost track of Alexis the Sexton, and to-morrow is the ceremony at St Paul’s.”

Meantime, the Russian and the Japanese within the motor-car stared at each other, mutually startled and alarmed to find themselves there face to face: for in moments of rush and pressure something that is not exactly we acts instead of us, and her invitation had been as much an impulse as his acceptance — in her sub-consciousness no doubt being a sense that he could give her information as to the Prince, and that since he was the Prince's enemy, he must be her friend.

So there was embarrassment, until the Russian bowed to say: "Well, I am much obliged! — supposing that your intention is friendly."

"What else can it be?" asked that light hard voice, without inflections, as if a bird should speak.

"What, madam, may I demand, was your motif!?"

"I saw you pursued — I am good-hearted — those two behind were detectives!"

"Ah," he thought at once, "she's no ingénue — knows things — some game in hand."

"Why," Oyono asked, "did you — strike him?"

"May I demand, madam, what is your motiff for demanding it?"

"Curiosity. You are very cautious! What are you?"

"Well, you demand that of a man? What he is? What answer expect you a man could make to such a demand?"

Her eyes dwelt on him, she saying to herself: "Accustomed to skulking — a life under the eye of the police." She said aloud: "There is no need — since I do not care.

I should say you are a Russian—"

He started! "I may be! And you, madam?"

"My nation? I am Irish."

"I doubt it," meditated Alexis: "more likely Magyar or Slovene."

“And you are also very likely an Anarchist,” said Oyone.

Violently started Alexis off his seat! and with grinding teeth, glaring at her with his great eyes that ever had the exaggerated expressiveness of eyes in pantomime or the cinematograph, he hissed at her: “I am an Anarchist! I am p-r-r-oud of it!”

“Well, you need not eat me” — her eyes dwelling, dwelling, on him, while a whole web suddenly wove itself in her subtle Oriental brain, that doomed this man to death on the next day, unless he did her bidding. She added: “I am an Anarchist, too.”

“You! a rich?”

“In principle, that is.”

“Word of honour, madam?”

“Since I was a child.”

Out popped the Russian’s confraternal paw, on which the girl deposited her glove with a chuckle in her shoulder.

“Besides,” she said, “you are a handsome fellow, and I not such an ugly girl that you should wish to gobble me up.”

“That is even the reason!” he gallantly answered, ogling now, asking himself: “she an ingénue? and I in luck’s way?”

The car was passing beneath the shadow of Holborn Viaduct, whence it drove north to Regent’s Park, and there round and round the Outer Circle, deserted now, under a moon that illumined thick mist.

“But the man you struck, why did he follow you?” the girl asked.

“Believe me, I know nothing of his motiff,” Alexis answered.

“‘Jack’ one has called him in the doss-house.”

“Why does he go there?” she wondered; and aloud: “Jack is not his name. I am going to tell you his name, just to see you start up.”

“She is no ingénue!” Alexis reflected afresh—” has special knowledge, special motifs!”

“That man was — no, why should I tell? — yes, I will — the Prince of Wales. Ha I ha! You needn’t—”

His great eyes glared like eyes goggled in concave mirrors! Then suddenly: “It is the truth — I was stooped not to see it!” And now, to her astonishment, he caught off his cap to mutter with bent head: “Now, God bless him!”

“Well!” she went on in her light way—” an Anarchist.”

“But yes! For what can his motif be but to see himself the condition of the people whom he must some time! govern’ — as they say. I say again, God bless the man!”

“He is really an honest fool whom they hunt as a criminal,” the Japanese thought; adding aloud: “But principles: principles are no respecter of persons.”

“It is true,” said he.

“When he goes to this doss-house, how long does he stay?” she asked.

“He sleeps there! And you know not what that signifies, I think! Those vermin — who hate an open window, fester fifteen, twenty — I call it herolike! grandiose! No, I regret at the actual moment to have struck this man.”

“But principles,” said she.

“It is true,” said he: “you are a true Anarchist, or else,” he added to himself, “a Government spy.”

“You could stab him there in his sleep; no one would know,” she said low; but a grumble answered her: “One does not do that, madam”; and she then thought: “I could disguise myself as a man, and sleep there, if necessary.” She said aloud: “But the Royal Family pass through the Strand to St Paul's to-morrow to 'return thanks' for the victory: are you going to let such a chance pass?"

On which he afresh had the thought: "She is very likely a spy set to pump me."

"Forgive me, madam," he said to her, "but you speak with the inexperience of a child. It could not be done. In the first place, have I not struck the Prince of Wales? Is it not probable that I shall be arrested to-night the moment I return to my lodgings?"

And, quite apart from that, will not every step of mine be known till the ceremony of to-morrow is over?"

"Then, do not return: sleep in my house: no one will know."

The Russian, looking down upon her upturned smile, suddenly cried out: "Most charmed! The thing itself that suits me! But as for the procession to-morrow — no, not for me: it could scarce be done; and I have a far vaster work to make for the world."

Oyone bent to smell the roses at her breast, meditating; then said: "You know best. But I am glad I met you — we think so exactly the same things! The house is over there in those trees; I will give you some supper, and treat you well; and to-morrow you may come with me to see the procession."

"Charmed!" cried Alexis the Sexton, "if only I may leave my revolver at your dwelling: for I must not be in the crowd armed."

"Of course," said she.

"Well, you are very amiable!" he cried, with a new start: "I seem to be in luck's way! It is an adventure!"

"I am like that," she said lightly. "I have a good heart while I can, and when I cannot I can be very cruel." She cried in Chinese: "Drive home!"

And so it was that the next morning there was consternation all in the police-force at the question which had arisen: "Where is Alexis the Sexton?"

— a poignant question on any day of a royal procession, but on this day its anxiety was wildly heightened by the Prince's statement that this man probably had in his possession that dreadful Redlike Ray, for which the police had been seeking for weeks.

Hence every ten minutes telephone messages were passing between Scotland Yard, the City, and the Embankment; and at ten o'clock the postponement of the ceremony was suggested, every den in London having then been ransacked, the Russian's lodgings, all his haunts, his associates' haunts — no trace of him or of the ray.

But postponement was now found to be too difficult, so the route was more than usually betrooped; and all were warned to keep quick and seeing peepers.

Yet at eleven in the forenoon Alexis was there in the Strand crowd, big and brown, but as undistinguished as one grain amid the myriads of the seashore.

He had come up Essex Street from the Embankment with the Japanese, and just there, at the corner, they stood, a little east of St Clement Danes, she pressed against the door-rail of The Freeman's Journal, a little behind, and left of him. Pale, weak in the knees she stood there, in her muff (unknown to him) his revolver.

When some closed wagonettes passed, taking members of the Palace Staff to St Paul's, she almost jumped upon the Russian's back, to see; and now she was seen: for a little away on one of the rows of seats reared round St Clement Danes sat Eulalia, who had to leave England at two o'clock, so had got a ticket for a last glimpse of her lad; and her eyes, straying down upon the crowd opposite, chanced to rest upon the Japanese face.

She started, asking herself: "Is that she?" — peeped and peered — but it was hard to tell definitely; and just then the ocean's roar arose, approached, the procession coming.

The tongues of London bells were telling that it was a day of gladness, and flags, arches, a profusion of festoons, strewed the route with hues.

Yonder by the Griffin the Lord Mayor in scarlet and ermine waited with his Pearl Sword to present to the King, surrounded with Councilmen in their mazarine gowns, Aldermen in scarlet, Sword-Bearer, Mace-Bearer, Marshal; a band started the National Anthem; at word-of-command the soldiers in their great-coats sprang to attention, presented.

Eulalia could not see westward, but knew pretty well the position of the Prince from the quality of the wave of roaring that rose and rolled as he rolled — something of suddenness in it, a yell that leapt, he in the second carriage, separated from King and Queen by a body of aides-de-camp, equerries, Silver Stick, adjutants, and the second division of escort: and he was said to look sullen or dull.

Nor did the Queen look herself to those who knew — a boding in her that day. There behind four bays she sat with King's sister and King, who lifted hand to a hat of plumes that drooped, Red Indian in suggestion, and in her rear a train of state-postilion landaus — some Ministers, Agents-general, Mistress of the Robes, Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; and when the first division of escort had dashed past St Clement, it halted beyond the Griffin; and now the King is there, and the Prince in sight behind the King's Riders and escort; and now all the procession has halted, because of the Lord Mayor and his Civic Sword.

The instant it halted, while each eye was tied to the gaud, through the storm of cheering a gun-shot was, as it were, felt, rather than heard; and it was instantly followed by another.

The first passed through the Prince of Wales' neck, the second through the heart of Alexis the Sexton.

The Japanese had, so to say, clambered up the Russian's back, to shoot: and there is this to be said to her credit, that she had no practice in handling fire-arms, that she was excessively agitated, that she aimed within one tick, and that the Prince's carriage on that side was protected by a squadron commander: so that virtue was in her. And in the very act of dropping from the Anarchist's back the cat put a bullet into him, and dropped his revolver at his feet.

Some of the people near declared afterwards that they never heard any shot at all!

But they felt, they saw, they screamed; and fiercelier than they stood Eulalia screaming.

The Prince, quite near under her feet, was aware of that poignant voice, as he failed and fainted.

CHAPTER XIV

THE SIX MILLIONS

BUT THE WOUND proved “not dangerous,” though “grave,” and though accompanied in its “history” by some delirium; and meantime the most detested of men was the dead Alexis, since it never entered any head to question that it was he who had shot, and then shot himself — though a divisional surgeon took his oath that the course of that bullet was the oddest which he had ever beheld in any suicide.

“But why a bullet, and not the Redlike Ray?” the Prince wondered on that morning four weeks later when he began to get well again: “and where is the ray now? And Chinnery — where’s he? And the Six Millions? There’s a something somewhere at work....”

From these musings he turned to a heap of newspapers by his bed; and all that forenoon was reading, reading, feasting his interest....

For during those weeks of his weakness the wheeling of the top had come to the humming mood, and the humdrum old world was whirling in a vertigo of the giddiest delirium toward the gulf’s rim. He saw headlines like “All the World at War, save China,” and even as he wondered of what vertiginous vintage the children of men had drunk, he himself was drunken with it.

Austria, it appeared, was no longer in the Triple Alliance! Austria had broken loose from it in order to fly at the throat of Russia; and already Russian troops of the Reserve Category were being raised, and levées en masse of her voiskos.

Whereat let Roumania, suspecting that Russia is aiming at nothing but her destruction, rush thundering round her frontiers; and quick now let Servia, with her back on Knuzevatz, mass two corps d'armée upon Nisch and Vranja, to spring upon her Bulgarian victors and allies of old, and have a bitter draught of sour milk and the bacillus Bulgaricus.

It was as when one planet of a system slips on her course, and two collide, why, then, the whole thing's upset, and they all decide to collide for luck, and it is a case of baking days then, yes, and of break-neck days, Monday fleeing from the wrath to come through the middle of Sunday, vast arcs of moons that loom from Arctic to Antarctic, with scarlet laughter of all the gods and dogs of war.

For the European clock had struck the hour, and it was now or never for placing on the stage a thousand schemes of greed, aggression, and revenge.

Therefore let Sweden quickly throw two infantry divisions into Bjômeborg, with Helsingfors for their objectif, to drag her Finns from that rigorous grip of Russia, and Sweden is an ally of England — Sweden and Norway, Denmark and America, Spain, Portugal.

Denmark, the long-suffering, long docked and hedged-in, saw the day of vengeance dawn, and at the alarm of the first mortar, had darted to arms, to start for Flensburg; while American squadrons, in a drama of warfare in the Hwang Hai off Chefoo, had fought in French and English lines of battle: a drama in which 286,000 had sunk 108,000 tons of Russo-German metal, with only eight ships remaining to the victors: upon which injured ships a Japanese squadron had fallen the same afternoon, and sunk or captured them.

On that same day bombarding battleships of Japan were barking from afar at San Francisco; and a Japanese squadron was sighted on the horizon by the Cockatoo Island coastguard (Sydney).

All yonder, too, in Texas, is America crackling, hordes of goat-footed Mexicans in coloured rags attacking “the Gringos” in guerilla brigade-sections, sniping from behind hedge and ditch, peeping along their Lee Metfords’ sights with a piercing eye. And not far from that crackling is all the area of Ecuador crackling, ravaged by troops of Peruvian sharpshooters.

Everywhere the same frenzy of revelry. Mobilmachung! The agitated hand snatches the rifle, the wild eye dashes for the ranks. Only where Li Ku Yu sits sipping buttermilk-tea among lotuses and marvels of marble serene peace breathes on the breezes.

He makes no sign; he waits; he brazenly smiles; he has a clear clean block of brain without one hair on it, a rock cut out without hands: he sits and stimulates it with tea.

And he revels in the revel and frenzy. Nothing escapes his eye, his meditation. Looking over the sea he can see that America has out hosts of converted merchant-cruisers furnished with box-batteries of four and six inchers, fighting, to the astonishment of men, with battleships — fighting, often conquering. A White Star liner of the San Francisco-Nagasaki trade-route, meeting two large Japanese cruisers in Mid-Pacific sank both before she sank; and the Lusitania, in an affray with a troop of sea-keeping sloops and torpedo gunboats, patrolling the Atlantic for tit-bits, sank half before they fled, and then kept afloat until within sight of Ireland.

Seeing which, Britain had begun late in the day to accumulate stores of fittings and armaments at home ports and naval stations for such ships; some of their crews were complemented from Colonial Naval Reserves; and they were spurting mirthfully over the oceans, having the highest and liveliest time.

Thanks in great part to them, our country had not yet begun to starve.

Rich still on paper, her consols still taken up, St Swithin's Lane and Wall Street her allies, half the owners of securities all over the globe hoping for her triumph, she was, nevertheless, in the grip of want, and already saw a skeleton grin at her from the air.

Protective tariffs in other countries had vanished like chaff two weeks after the going off of the first gun, so that England's free trade no longer made her a magnet for imports; and since supplies were dodging and fighting their way precariously from Canada, the Government granaries ran every day lower.

A Russian ukase had prohibited the exportation of wheat — a ridiculous thing, since no creature in Russia would now have dreamed of exporting wheat. That immense breadth of empire was already doddering horribly to its drop.

Hardly a week after the Mauretania battle, Austria, with a heart fond for Salonica, had flung across the Save a body of Uhlans, who had coolly occupied Belgrade; and the next morning sections of brigades bivouacking in the squares, and Austrian officers gossiping on the boulevards, had met the gaze of the amazed Belgradians.

Whereat the Great White Czar waxed whiter, and Young Turkey grew tough to the teeth of her eaters, massing regulars and redifs, green-bannered, class on class, calling "gather, gather, all ye birds of ravin" to her Berbers, Sanoussis. For see Macedonia broken in a roar of flame, the Vali of Saloniki assassinated on his doorstep, whereupon the Great Archimandrite, His Holiness the Patriarch of Jerusalem, was mutilated in a room of his palace, and that same evening telegraphic communication was broken between Odessa and Constantinople, and the Suez Canal blown up.

And now an anarchy of thunder and waltz of all the vortices in the Near East, thirty thousand Athenians surging across the Thessalian frontier, Crete bursting into binning with bands of bandits girt with the dirk and carbine of rapine marauding from end to end, upon all which the Turkish Turgut Reis is hurling shell-fire, quenching hell with hell; and at the same time a mob of Turkish gunboats is going northward through the Bosphorus to watch the (Russian) Black Sea Squadron (convoying two corps from Odessa), quietly occupy Bulgarian Bourgas — directly connected by rail with Stamboul.

And still faster spins the dance, like the sand-forms of the sand-storm that vastly, dantly waltz into conflict. The next day Austria declared against Russia a war which had begun before the declaration; and on the third day after the occupation of Bourgas the eastern limb of the British Mediterranean Fleet steamed through the Bosphorus to seek the Black Sea Fleet, and bombard Sevastopol.

Russia had enough to do: at the fourth week-end, if she looked south, south-west, north, west, east, or inward at her own bankruptcy, she everywhere saw handwriting on her walls. Sweden at Helsingfors was looking toward Cronstadt; twelve Swedish armoured ships at the Nevamouth. The Black Sea littoral was British. The Army of India, with the Teheran railway in its hands, had scattered at Merv the Army of Turkestan, and after a four days' carnival of carnage at Novo Tcherkask, had marched by road to Kharkov, to turn its face toward the Kremlin.

Another mixed army of Turks and English had thoroughly crushed the Russian corps that had advanced from Kars to invest Erzeroun.

Russia's 4th with her 8th to her 12th Southern Corps had, indeed, inflicted annihilation upon the Austrian army massed on the Dneister in Eastern Galicia; but Austria's second army on the San, its back on Przemsyl (the bulwark of Middle Galicia), and her third based on Cracow (the key of Western Galicia), had followed the Moltke maxim of marching apart and fighting together, and after a tug-of-war only surpassed for carnage by that drama of gore transacting itself over Northern France, had made Poland Austrian, and crossed the sources of the Niemen.

Add to this that Vladivostock was even now cracking and nodding under rollicking cataracts of Japanese thunder; and thundering multitudes of puny Japanese troops, amusing themselves with butchery, were intruding and intruding through Manchuria, reeling up as on a reel the Siberian railway.

And France, la belle, was unwell of her règles, and blanched; and Max had a malady and chancre from intercourse with her.

In Eastern Germany the Army of the Vistula was at grips with the gallantry and zeal of the Swedish levies, who with astonishing dash had advanced far through the great military dépôts of the north-east, and after capturing the Thom-Posen railway, had drawn a ring of earthworks and Schumann gun-turrets round Posen, in the teeth of the teeming legions of that Eastern region — Royal Saxon Corps, draughts from Thom, that Metz of the East, from Königsberg — who in vain had flung themselves in wave on wave upon these unexpected fairheads.

And northward, with a display of hardly less audacity and energy, Denmark was campaigning in Schleswig-Holstein, and had sat down before Kiel; while south-westward on the French frontier the two great branches of the Teutonic race had dashed together shockingly: so that eighteen of the twenty German corps were already in the field, her burghers and shopkeepers now girding on the bandolier, and now was the winter of her Bourse's discontent.

As for France, the Light of the world was like a candle flickering in a draught.

See Italy southward redeeming now her “unredeemed” territories, her Haute Savoy, Alpes Hautes, for now is the day, and Frenchmen and vermicelli never yet went well together.

Therefore what is left of the Italian navy (it had been smashed, and had smashed, in a battle off Cape Spartivento) shall bombard three days’ the Riviera batteries, while swarms of Bersaglieri, Alpini, Carabinieri shall clamber like chamois among the Alp passes under a shadow of aeroplane-wings, their cannons carried on active-footed mules, pushing their advance against troops of dragoons and mountain-chasseurs, swaggering black rascals of Spahis, Zouaves, garbed in gaudy cloths; and in the European hotchpotch some cynic camels shall sulk and snarl, and die with a repining eye.

And when the Italian 2nd, 4th and 6th have effected a landing near Nice, has broken bloodily through the French 7th, 14th and 15th, have crossed the Isère, then Paris knows panic and émeute.

And under the double tonnage of Russia and Germany France must already have suffocated, but for the rescuing strength of Britain.

Britain, with a slow but increasing heat, was becoming a recruiting dépôt, her Lancashire blackamoors, her Cockney bits of boys, her Scottish bodies, her Irish devils ever steadier, keener, streaming to see to it — nimbly! soldiers in a week, warriors in a fortnight, veterans in a month: for, as things now were, if France went down, Britain, too, foundered like a ship in the sea: and British men said “not yet.”

There, therefore, all along that north-eastern frontier of France backed by the charming land of Champagne, the fire was hell-fire, and the rigour of the game pretty grim — the men of England coming, pressing, checked, beaten back, defeated, hampered, badgered, butchered, fretted, pestered, but still coming, pressing, getting every day their dreadful pecker up, struggling like tunnel-diggers grinning at the ruggedness of granite, winning an inch, and still an inch, and an inch, until that momentous December midnight when the men of Mars must have marked the carmine of the fall of Metz, and have heard some murmur of that turmoil on earth.

Of it Eulalia wrote to her mother: “I should not care to live through such a thing again, though not for anything should I like to have lived without having once lived through it.”

And again nine days later: “I am not well, and even if I be everything that’s bad, daddy might let you write to say if you are alive, and wish one a happy Christmas. Perhaps some day twenty years hence you may hear more than whatever it is you have heard, and may think then of me more forgivingly.

“It is hard to say quite what is wrong, but I am pretty sickified. Yesterday Surgeon-Major Burke peeped under my eyelids, felt my pulse, and said: ‘It is the heart’ — wonderful discovery! Doctors amuse me.

“But some of the nursing-staff are beginning to look rather askance at me, I fancy, for the two company-waggons are pretty full of sick, one of the junior dressers died of typhoid three days ago, and one, of course, ought to be ‘all there.’ But I forget things, I am very remiss really — I can no more help it than be the bedmate of a Long Tom; all I want to do now is to lie alone in woods, and give myself up, and I dream such things, that I want to be always asleep. Of course, I make a good old struggle.

“Early on the morning of the 21st I started out from our sycamore-tree to go into Nurnfeld — I told you, did I, that the 2nd and 3rd companies have been billeted on Nurnfeld village after a good deal of hardship and marching to come up with our brigade? Well, our junior surgeon had got a permit from Captain Hardinge for one of the six stretcher-bearers of the 2nd to take the place of Davis, the dresser, who is dead, so I was going to get the man, when, just as I had passed the baggage-park sentries, something very strange came over me. 'mere lay the village before me, the lantern still burning before the senior officer's cottage-door, a few Tommies yawning in the dawn at doorways where they stood sentry over their squads: but I seemed to see it in a dream somehow. After passing the outlying sentry, I walked on to a cottage which they call the alarm-quarter, where an inlying picket of six have to keep awake all night, and I remember seeing the six fellows playing cards in a room, with their belts loose, round a lantern on a box; but there I seem to have stopped to lean on the window, and — they say that I fainted, though I don't think that I fainted.

“Anyway, I was there so long, that Sister Darling had to come to look for me, found me sitting in the alarm-quarter, and then — she is such an angel, always — would not let me go back to the field-hospital, but said I must wander about all day, and take a good rest.

“Well, I did; and it was a day of destiny to me: for at four in the afternoon the most marvellous thing that you ever could fancy happened to me.

“I took something to eat in my knapsack, and in passing beyond the canteen met a Lieutenant Pierce, who told me that there was a rumour that fighting was probable that day between our outpost garrison and an advanced detail of the enemy. Our brigade, you must understand, is said to be now diamond-shaped, the 2nd and 3rd forming the south corner of the diamond, we being in the far north wing of our army, which is now facing the enemy on a front of some seventy-five miles, by report; and everyone is saying that the two hosts are getting well into touch, so you can look out for more things happening before you lose your next tooth. Oh, it is a big business this. On the night of the 12th, the fourth night before the fall of Metz, my company was camped on an incline, and before I went to sleep I could see the fires of a whole division in the snows at my feet reaching far into the darkness, battalion after battalion, with their batteries and their sentries in greatcoats, seeming a scene in some great dream. And this mass of man, animal, cannon and baggage was but the advance-guard of a far vaster war-host which occupied the North; and hidden away in the dark was the still vaster war-host of the enemy.

“Well, after hearing that that advanced corner of our diamond might be fighting, I thought that I had had enough of bow-wow, and would keep clear of it. But I must have soon forgotten where I was going, and, as a matter of fact, put my little shoe into the thick of it, for near two o’clock, when I must have walked seven or eight miles, I twice heard band-music going, then a bugle somewhere calling form-company-columns, and presently I saw a train of artillery-horses straining uphill to my left, for the country just here is very broken.

“After this I came to a village as big as Holmend, in which I saw not one living thing but a dog that skedaddled on seeing me. There were bits of shell about, the houses in ruin, and in front of a school a little outside the village were two mountain gun-carriages with their guns and artillery waggons wrecked, and a gunner stretched on the ground under one of the waggons, with his dragoon-sword and revolvers still at his belt, poor boy. You wouldn’t think how lonely and consoling it was there, and I sat a long time on one of the scorched cottage-steps. The afternoon was quite warm, though there are patches of snow over the hillsides.

“Then a sound of big guns roused me, and, as it always does, drew me, for it’s in the creature’s breed, no doubt. So I set out eastward down some steep fields, and half-way down could see through trees a company of Greys in column of squads stepping with their swinging kilts, the gallant laddies, their marker gallivanting in advance with the flag like a man gone dancing and dotty with arrogance, a couple of field-guns and an échelon of baggage coming in their rear, and in front their screaming bagpipes that craze men's brains with bravery. Really, men are dear creatures, the good-hearted, simple, strong dears. I vow I'd rather a man than one of those angels that 'went in to the daughters of men.' Perhaps you will say, 'Yes, that's why your father has had to turn you from home.' Well, perhaps. You must think as you will, mother. God made us.

"So I went on making my way by fields and paths, the row growing, till I got in sight of a mountain, beyond the brow of which I saw a haze, for smokeless powder still makes a haze and a smell when lots of it are fired by troops in close order; and on the mountain's slope, near the top, my fieldglass soon spied a supply-store and headquarters signalling station, with gun-emplacements, and a dressing-station lower down, and at the bottom under cover of a crag a group of ammunition-carts and ambulance-waggons with flags on them.

"Lying down near the top was a line of Inniskillings, forming the reserve of the firing-line on the farther slope, and two hundred yards or so below stood the Greys on a road. I was astonished when I got on the upper ground that the Inniskillings were not touched, for it looked to me as if small pompom shrapnel was spattering all about the mountain-top, and the battle was going on with the din of an engine which roars, groans, whizzes and horridly rattles.

"I wanted to go up to the Inniskillings to see, for that might do me good to get some lead in me, but a lance-corporal of the Greys shook his finger furiously at me, so I walked aside till I got to a crag where I scrambled down with some skirt-dance adventures, for I seem to be quite strong and active, really, but 'it's the heart'; and! got in the end to a mounting meadow, like the Tump at home, a quarter of a mile or so to the left front of the mountain, and in it I found a waterworks reservoir in a mound, and on the reservoir two German girls lying quite silent with their chins on their fists.

"We were not very safe there, some of the enemy's shells dropping pretty near at the bottom of our meadow, but, then, we could see, though the smoke blown from four cottages and a wood burning on the slope bothered one's vision.

"Our men were in four shelter-pits with loopholes, or rather in three, for I could spy that one was full of nothing but forage-caps stuck on sticks to draw the enemy's fire; and there was a covered retreat in the rear of them out of which I saw three wounded carried up.

"At the moment when I lay down the enemy were pretty near the mountain: I could spy them like mice in a line darting out of one bit of cover into another bit, like one in a bitter wind winning one's way, their artillery from somewhere miles away still pounding our mountain with mortar and pompom, having the range exactly apparently, and ours mouthing back across heaven from the mountain-top.

"Then I could see the enemy's firing-line running from behind three houses, then jumping a stone hedge, and their cheer for the charge reached me faintly; the next minute they were on the lull-slope; and I pitied them, they looked so little running up there in comparison with the mountain and with the amount of sound around them that they were foundering in, for they had hardly advanced ten yards when they broke like thread before our thundering trenches, upon which our firing line leapt the trenches to chase them, the reserve Inniskillings ran down to help, and the signalling-station signalled the Greys, who ran up and then down to pelt pell-mell into the trenches.

“I think, though, that the enemy’s ranks soon rallied, though I could hardly tell what was happening for the hazes of smoke that smudged the valley in patches; moreover, a country house that had broken into smouldering rolled most of it in smoke.

In the midst of it a sound made me glance to my left — cavalry!

“The road that runs north and south along the bottom of the mountain winds eastward at the north end of the meadow where the reservoir is; and on that east part of it I saw a squadron in column of sixes ride out from behind a rise on tall white horses. At the same time I was startled by the two German girls, who sprang wildly up, clapping their hands and laughing, crying out “Cossacks! Cossacks!” — and no doubt they were Cossacks, but they were certainly captained by a German, for I soon heard his frantic howling — they howl ‘Charge! Double! Hurrah!’ at a charge — or they may have been a mixed body. Anyway, on they came straight toward me with their busbies, dark-green knickerbockers and top-boots, from slow to fast, the white horses fretting wildly neck to neck, with their wild captain waving his sabre some yards in front of all, calling them, while quicker and quicker the hundreds of their legs drummed the ground with a steady growth of passion from a hand-gallop to a field-gallop and from a field-gallop to an avalanche. It was frightful, but nice.

“Meantime, they were being knocked over, man and animal, by the Greys, and trampled, though I don’t think the Greys could see them yet for the trees: so no wonder they made haste.

“Their aim was to take the mountain while our main body was engaged away to the east with theirs, and I thought they were going to gallop and sabre our position; but when they got under the north end of my meadow, where they were in dead ground from the mountain, two-thirds of them sprang off, without stopping, every first and third man tossing their reins to every second man, as I could see by standing up and peering; and in a moment these two-thirds were jumping the stone hedge on the farther side of the road, leaving three dead there at the corner, and I lost sight of them for a minute, till I saw them again jumping the stone hedge, well spread out now, opposite the mountain: and they charged.

“There seemed to me to be precious little cover for them on the slope, for our men must have burnt off much of the bush before occupying it, so these poor cavalrymen got it hot enough on those lower slopes from the grim Greys, the row rolling without an instant’s interval for minutes together, like ten million motor-bicycles going bang-bang, strong stuff. I saw lots of them catch at imaginary balls, as they dodged up from point to point; but they did not break; on they struggled; and suddenly it struck me that the Greys’ fire was growing slack, and then I was sure, and then it stopped, and my heart sank. Why they had given in so soon I could not understand, and could have cried. The two German girls were standing, grinning, on the very brink of the reservoir, white as milk with excitement, and in another minute they were screaming, clapping, ‘Victory! The Cossacks! Hurrah!’ Really, Germans have very offensive manners, and nobody can possibly be more excitable.

“Well, what followed I would not see the end of, it was too painful. The Cossacks, or whatever they were, leapt clamouring upon our trenches, and even as they leapt, poor dears, they were perishing like sheep. I never saw such a thing — I would not see it. When they leapt upon the trenches it was to find them empty, since the Greys had retired secretly by covered retreats to other trenches hidden in some fold of the hillside, and from that second position, even as the hot Cossacks cheered in victory, came the withering shock of the Greys’ volley at horridly close quarters. Think of it, their tragic fix, the mantrap, the massacre. The Cossacks skedaddled like a flock of cats scattering from dogs, those Greys raining a purgatory of curses after them, and I scattered also, getting over a gate into the road where a third of the Cossacks were, holding the others' horses, and I walked along it some way, until I came to a wood, where I lay down....

“But no, I am not going to tell even you — not yet, anyway — what befell me there. I will send you this lot by our post to-night. It is already a long lot, and has taken me three afternoons, for I like, I suppose, to talk of it all to you. You might write once: you could, secretly, if you tried. Remember that I am sick, and even if I am a sinner, though I do not admit that I am particularly, suffering atones for things. I'll think of you all on Christmas Day, for I don't bear Alice any malice, tell her, if you will of me, and will write, for I love you more than any of you know. And will you send any news, and if you see any bits about the Prince of Wales, will you send, as Sister Darling is madly in love with him, poor girl, and I, too, I'm afraid. I wonder if any more girls have gone sillified for him, the sillies?

““For her skipper was Ted,

so don't forget this, and think kindly of your own, and good-bye, God bless you.

“EULALIA.”

As to “what befell” her in that wood where she “lay down,” it is soon told.

In the wood she spied a church ruin, which was like a solitude within a solitude, and, in love with solitude, she went into it, and lay within a mass of bramble and bracken at its west end, which was a solitude within a solitude within a solitude.

Indeed, her mind and body were now in a sicklier way than her letter quite exhibits, so sick now, so afflicted and down with love, that only a don of Cupid College could have shrewdly construed and doctored her. It was the air-disease, nameless! Her bosom seemed to yearn for the moon to nurse, and if this had been given her, she would have hungered for the sun to hug. As she lay there within the bush, her lids shut, her hands under her head, crushing her four-penny loaf of gold-hair, there were moments when the Prince's face appeared quite visibly to her, like a vision just over her nose, staring eye to eye at her stare; and she smiled then at peace, and then it was gone, and her body tossed for ease, all sighs and pining, pallor and languishment.

Though she had been so very nigh to his life — and few men are fairies to their wives — he was now quite a Fairy Prince in her brain, the shout of the world about him perhaps girding him in purple glammers for her; and since their married intimacy seemed not less than a hundred centuries ago, she was as fresh and flushed with love as if she had never had him: for it was necessary to her to look at the ring and reread his letters, in order to realise that her once nearness to him was not a dream. So with jealous shoots of pain she pictured him living and moving among Mohammedan heavens set immensely above her, forgetting her and her century-old caresses; and stodgy old Buckingham Palace, guarded by stodgy bobbies, became to her fantasy an aching enchanted fabric of romance.

And the thought that it was she herself who had cast it all from her with her own hand caused her to moan. But the notion of breaking down in her undertaking does not seem ever now to have entered her head even, stronger than all tugs and gusts in the gale of her nature being self-respect; and still her word was, "if I'm a Princess, I'll be Princess-like."

She was no longer conscious of the firing, which continued some twenty minutes more, nor of its stoppage; what shocked her into consciousness was a sense that someone else was there in the ruins: she raised her head; saw “Mademoiselle Oyone”; and in the very thick of her wonder sucked in her breath, with “How truly lovely she is!”

There stood Oyone in the nave, at the middle, with that lissom hint of her hips and waist, dressed as ever in reds and splendours, a bag in her hand, a swath of veil across her forehead, and she was moving her eyes warily round in such a way, that at once Eulalia was aware that her visit here was secret.

But before ever Eulalia could reveal herself, Oyone was moving swiftly into the chancel-part, and Eulalia was so astonished to see her move her eyes slowly round once more, and then rapidly lift a slab by a ring, and vanish down a hole, that she had sat hushed.

Now, however, she thought that she hardly ought to watch, so she gingerly got up to go slipping on tiptoe away; but chanced to step on some loose stones which rolled; stumbled: and Oyone heard it.

Oyone spurted like a bird to peer at the brink, but a little late to see Eulalia, who had that instant slipped out. She thought, though, that she could catch sounds out in the coppice, and made haste to follow, prepared to slay.

She had already in her bag what she had come for, a bar of gold: the fact being that the old woman, A-lu-te, was then dying, in consequence of which there had been some difficulty as to the signature on cheques, so the Chinese household was in straits for ready money, and Oyone had come and stolen a bar of Li Ku Yu’s hoard, to break up.

And the question was: had she been seen?

She had more sense of ownership in this hoard than labourers in their honest wage; she had more pride in it than scientists in their conquests; and the mere thought that any god, or man, or fiend, should ever dare to ferret it out and drag it from her grasp roused in her that same gasping, arrogant rancour with which aristocracies resent any attempt to wrest from their maw the rents of their atrocity and dishonour. “Have I not been seen?” she asked Heaven; and soft, soft, she dropped back the slab, and went peering through the forest, but she was now well weighted with the bar in the bag, and before she came to a sight of Eulalia, Eulalia was out on the road.

And now Oyone was left uncertain; but the mere suspicion that she might have been seen inflamed her to a hissing hate, and was quite sufficient to be fatal to Eulalia. She had both dagger and fire-arm; and she suddenly ran out to Eulalia, who was now moving westward toward a main-station which the Germans had just set up at the roadside; and she called to Eulalia: “What, Miss Bayley!”

“Think of our meeting!” she said, when Eulalia turned, bowed, and met her: “You are in the army, then? To what part do you belong?”

“And I have been with an old friend at St Pierre-les-Sapins, and now have lost my way in woods, looking for the station.”

Saying which, she kept her eyes on Eulalia’s face, and when Eulalia faintly blushed at the lie, this infuriated Oyone. Her next words were: “I can’t bear to see those men: will you walk a little this way with me?” — she pointed eastward, for a little westward were two tents with lanterns and flags at their doors, and operating-tables within, and before them a throng of ambulance-waggons and stretchers with gashed men on them, who gave out a sound of lamentation, and within the tents two sturgeons and their helps, as busily working, and as coolly, as butchers.

Before these witnesses nothing was to be done by Oyone; and by a blessed inspiration Eulalia replied to her invitation that she had to go back to her post.

At this refusal Oyone's eyes lightened with spite.

"But it is droll," she grossly said, looking Eulalia straight in the face, "that you, a Prince's honey, should be here slaving! Or has he tired of you? — you look a little ill. I hope I am not the cause, for His Royal Highness is always teasing me lately."

Up went the other's chin; and loftily she uttered a word and a letter: "My h — !" then turned and went on her way eastward, with a hotter wound in her than those wounded.

Oyone, for her part, glanced at her watch, and went eastward, past the wood of the ruin; but threw herself on a grass bank beyond a winding of the road, writhing, wringing her hands, thinking: "I think she did — I'll see her dead, I must! or I'll know no peace.... She said the 2nd Somersetshires...."

Meantime, Eulalia had turned back, to see what was under that slab with the ring: for now rancour was in her, too; and she thought: "I will."

So, after passing the scene of stretchers and shrieks westward, she passed it eastward again, saw no one on the road before her, ran into the wood, the ruin, raised the flag, and not without some ghostly tremors, for now it was growing dark, went down the steps.

Down there it was already black, but she struck a match from her knapsack: and there before her against a broken wall stood a great cube of gold bars glowing....

The weight of one that she lifted amazed her....

Now she sat on a step, considering it. And suddenly her hands started up. "This is the Six Millions...."

Yes! There was the “Reichskriegs-schatz” stamped in the bars — the Six Millions found — and by her.

She laughed a little sillily, all in Aladdin-land, dazzled. But after a time she laughed again not sillily, understanding much.

She saw now that she had long been sub-jealous of the half-caste; and now that pang was over for ever. “It was she who destroyed the air-boats, she and Chinnery,” Eulalia was soon saying; “and she was near to where he was shot in the Strand, for I saw her; it is she who is at the bottom of everything; and it is not love, but hatred that is between them!” Then she laughed.

But what now to do? She was there in the dark a long time meditating it. To tell? To keep it dark? It occurred to her that six million pounds might well buy her the right and title of Princess of Wales.

To whom, though, did this treasure rightfully belong? Not to Germany, surely: it had been taken in war-time. Not to England: it had been taken by private enterprise. Not, of course, to Oyone. It belonged to “Teddy”! and, if to “Teddy,” then, to “Teddy’s” wife: it was hers! And multimillionairesses can buy many things!

She would wait and see what she would do....

Meantime, Oyone had started to come back to the wood under an impulse of vague disquiet; but then had been pulled the other way by having to catch her train.

CHAFFER XV

THE HAUNTED SUBMARINE

IN THAT TRAIN she sat alone with that racking question:

Did she see?

Only an absolute necessity to be in London dragged Oyone from France that night.

But she would soon be back to that “2nd Somersetshires,” she said to herself.

If Eulalia had really seen, then, all was up — the hoard gone — the prison cell — the English scaffold. What hissing luck! Were there gods who saw, and maliciously managed chances to punish sin? Undoubtedly she had sinned; she seemed to be becoming rather deep-dyed and rank, a new creature from the Oyone she used to be. Should she now repent? and nourish friendly feelings to everyone? and wrench Li Ku Yu by the roots out of her flesh? and make a new will? Or was it not too late? There was a sweet thing in sinning, in being quite, quite untrammelled, in flying and dropping bombs upon humanity; and, as for gods, they were well when they gave success, but when they interfered with their hissing luck, one hissed and hated them. What was the girl doing there? — she, a Prince’s mignonne. Had they quarrelled? Yes, evidently: for her letter handed him at the Piccadilly Fountain had stunned him. And this was odd: that the girl had tossed up her chin, and said “My h — !” Could he be her husband — by chance? In that case he might be caught like a fish.

She resolved to try it, and did not delay: in the hour that she reached London she wrote to the Prince.

And three hours later she entered a back room, narrow and long, dim, windowless, with an alcove at one end — on the first floor. There was a prisoner in it, yet the door was not locked, for the prisoner never had any impulse to escape; and said she, as if addressing a child: “Look! I have brought you a bottle to-day, instead of a half, because—”

“My precious Oyone,” breathed Richard Chinnery, sitting in slippers and dressing-gown over a fire in a tiny grate in the south-east corner of the room, whose length ran north-and-south, the door being in the west wall; and he clutched at the bottle with trembling fingers.

“Because,” repeated Oyone, “I want you to be good, as I am going to move you—”

“Oh, Oyone, not the stairs! not the stairs!” he cried, with fright in his eyes.

“Yes,” said she, “the stairs. And if you make the least to-do, I will take the bottle back. It is a shame in you to be such a coward. And you should be glad, for I am going to put you to live now in the Garden-house out of this dark den, where you can walk on fine days, and see the sun and the trees. It is all ready for you. Come.”

“Come” — she took his hand, led him step by step, he silent, concentrating his noble soul to it, but at the stair-top failed and shrank, breathing with bated breath: “Oh, no, no, no....”

This irritated her, and pulling his arm round her neck, she hurried him cruelly down, he as wildly staring as a zebra with a lion riding its back; till they were down, and now he was eyeing piningly at her, panting “my precious... my precious....”

She now led him out into the tangled back-grounds, in which, when they were near the Garden-house, his eyes lighted up an instant, as he cried, "My air-boat!" — for there under an awning it lay.

"Yes, I brought it," she said, and his interest died out, as he disappeared with her into the Garden-house.

To her letter to the Prince, and her removal of Chinnery, add this: that three streets away was a house To Let, which she knew well, since some friends of hers had lived there, and in the late afternoon she went, veiled, to the letting-agents, got the keys to inspect the house, and before returning the keys jammed the front-door with a wedge of wood, leaving it so unlocked....

Her letter, marked "Urgent" and "Private," got through to the Prince by the hand of a workshop assistant, an engineer named Sturge, at eight-thirty that evening, the Prince being then in his workshop.

There he sat in his apron, not yet quite himself from his wound, the envelope hanging unopened in his fingers, at his feet a model of the Chinnery air-boat, or an attempt at a model, which had just failed to work.

But he was not thinking of the failure, but of Eulalia, and an upward glance of her eyes from the pillow at his side — a Divine glance — perfect God, perfect man — unfathomable sapphire, implying the whole bottomless world, eternity, infinity, Kashmir, Mars — a thing like treasure hid in a field, which when a man finds, he sells all, and buys that field.

It was lost: he could not find it. His ambassador sent to her home for inquiries had not even been heard by her father — had been turned out of the garden-gate, with a retriever's teeth at his heels! and she had so very cleverly covered up her traces from the moment of leaving the hospital, that his agents still had no suspicion that she was in the army. He was now thinking of breaking through everything, clamouring the fact of his marriage aloud, and demanding her from the whole world. It was Sir Robert Barrington who patted him on the arm, and bade him wait, be patient — for his mother's sake.

She, the Queen, knew where Eulalia was — and was full of wonderings as to the girl's motive for going! Eulalia, not waiting to be banished, had banished herself — luck! But the reason? The Queen conceived that the Prince, having turned over a new leaf, may have dismissed her. But still, the girl must be rich from him: why, then, did such a person, a paramour, and rich, rush into the hardships of war-nursing? This baffled Her Majesty.

She kept her eyes incessantly on the Prince's face in silent inquiry...

He himself had no more knowledge than his mother of Eulalia's motive! — unless she had discovered what he was? But he could not think how....

Anyway, after a month of her loss the face of death commenced to acquire a smile for him. It was being said that since the fall of Metz the combined enemy were making tremendous haste to muster the remainders of their naval strength, with the aim of making such a rip in Britain's metal, as to compel her in self-defence to withdraw her land-forces from France: in the face of which danger the British people were frankly eager that the Prince should be the British leader in that foreseen Armageddon of the sea; and he was now looking forward to it with thoughts and hopes more curious than any knew.

For he was aware that Eulalia was essentially wayward, wilful, headstrong, prideful under her smile, difficult to be flexed when once fixed; and the notion of really losing her both infuriated and made him a cry-cry baby. Four days before this he had almost quarrelled with Sir Robert Barrington, scenting that the baronet knew more of Eulalia than he told — and, in fact, Sir Robert knew where she was, for to him alone Eulalia had told it in a letter, but had sealed his lips; and the Prince had looked daggers, but then with water in his eyes had begged his friend's pardon.

Suddenly now he sighed, and remembered the letter in his hand....

And there she was! found! found!

He, pleased as Punch in each muscle of his meat, like a castaway suddenly drunken with luxury at a banquet, muttered: "I'll show her pride; I'll show her things."

"Your Royal Highness does not, I hope, take too seriously the moods and whims that actuate cats and women," Oyone wrote.... "My poor Eulalia, since her separation from Your Royal Highness, has been much with me, and I have been able to determine from the first that she is only suffering from her sex.... I have worked hard on her, and I think with some success, though I am not yet certain... Anyway, I am venturing to lay a trap for her: she is coming to my place to-night, and if Your Royal Highness were then to appear on the scene, I think the match would be laid to the bomb that will blow you both into heaven. I have to be at a house, No. 18 Seymour Street, N.W., at 8.45 P.M., and if Your Royal Highness desires to join me there at 9, I could then convey Your Royal Highness in my car to my place.... I shall be obliged if Your Royal Highness will bring this letter to return to me, since Eulalia can be resentful...."

The Prince noticed that no address was on the letter; and also, as he was being dressed, he thought, "Since when has Eulalia become intimate with Plum Blossom?" But he was not in a state for reflection; was soon away; and behind him, shadowing him, two detectives.

When he arrived at No. 18 Seymour Street, he noticed that there were lights in only two rooms, and at once had an impression of dirty and uncurtained windows, though the lighted windows had curtains — no blinds; and he did not observe, what the detectives observed, that "Let" was painted on a window, the “To” scraped off, the “Let” left — for lack of time probably!

After passing through a garden, he rapped to find the Japanese girl stooping through a curtsey before him; at the same time his brougham turned to return — to the detectives’ wonder, who ran to ask the chauffeur “Why?” The answer was “Orders.”

The girl, meantime, was leading towards the back through a long hall which had that afternoon been furnished, and yet gave a vague impression of strangeness — lighted by candles, and those two lighted rooms, if looked into, would have been seen to be empty, but for candles standing on boxes, and curtains.

“My car is just there by the back garden-gate,” she said, when they were on a verandah at the back, and she led down some steps to a shrubbery-path.

“I am very sensible of all your pains,” he then said in a low and heartfelt way.

“We are not yet out of the bush, Your Royal Highness” — her voice was very frail and quavery—” Heaven send that she may not take it resentfully. Has Your Royal Highness brought me my letter?”

“Here it is. Don’t fear — I can handle her, if I once get hold of her. Do you know, I have wished to see you, to speak with you of our friend, Chinnery: but the old woman — what was her name? — Monty! — did not know your address. Ah! Richard Chinnery! What became of him? Tell me that, and I will call you a sibyl. That was a high head, and a wise eye.” He cast his eyes to the stars of a dark sky.

“He may be still alive, I often think,” murmured the girl, as they passed by a little green gate across a lane into a narrow street, where her car was waiting; and they were away to the Chinese mansion.

There was something so curiously recluse about the mood of this house, that its gate was kept constantly locked, and no tradesman, save the coalman, ever entered its grounds. Oyono herself had to set a bell babbling to be admitted by an old pigtail bent down double, who eyed the ground sidelong, with mutterings.

Thence she led her captive along an avenue dark and mossy into a hall of lanterns, all hues, but subdued as moonlight, mute as the tomb, where the foot moved without the faintest sound.

“Up here,” she whispered, with a busy secrecy, a sexual fellowship, “I will leave you, and bring her from my guardian” — and up the stairs they stepped, along a passage, to the room whence Richard Chinnery had been removed that day.

“You wait in there!” — and, as he went, she locked the door quick, catching her hand off the key as if it scorched her, and remained glaring at it, grinning, some instants, then dropped against the opposite wall, gasping, relaxed, her eyes closed, worn out, dying, satisfied.

Meantime, the two detectives waited, watching the Seymour Street house, until, after two hours, one said: “But is the house on fire? — look there!” — for one or more candles standing in their own grease on boxes had probably collapsed, and before the fire-brigade could effect an entrance, the place was a conflagration.

Let the mental condition of England the next day be conceived — the Prince gone — no trace of any body in the gutted house.

The furniture store from which the curtains, etc., had been purchased could only say that the purchaser was a woman, veiled; Sturge, the workshop assistant, could only say that the Prince had sprung up on reading the letter at 8.30, and that the handwriting seemed feminine. Neither letter nor envelope could be found — no trace, no clue.

There was not one English heart which was not gashed now, nor perhaps one German not urged toward compassion. Western humanity, one may say, sat down in sorrow to ponder this problem.

All which world-turmoil concerning him the Prince knew in detail: for from the third day the girl took a habit of coming to sit on a stool outside his door, in the door being a hole, iron-lined, big enough to admit plates or a biscuit-box of coals; and she, sitting there for hours, mornings, afternoons, sewing silks, painting on ivory or satin, never for two minutes ceased to speak as to an old-established member of the household, telling him the world-news, her pettiest household cares, the daily history of A-lu-te's illness, the secrets of her heart as regards Li Ku Yu and others, the story of the destruction of the air-boats, the story of Alexis the Sexton, and how for a century his, the Prince's, bones would bear her marks, that scar in his neck, too, being from her hand, and how she had met Eulalia within the wood of the Six Millions, and suspected that Eulalia had noticed her, and meant to end Eulalia before many days. And mixed with all her facts were some falsehoods for falsehood's sake.

And never from within the dimness of that prison a syllable answered her — never, day after day, as it he had become mummy-dumb. He took his seat, indeed, near the hole, to hear and hear, till the seductive sculpture of her nose was old and dull to him, but uttered nothing; and although he more and more suspected that he was being slow-poisoned, he made no moan.

Of course, she is not to be judged by our standards: for if, just lately, a Divine Manifestation has enlarged our minds, and assuaged our hearts of the heinousness of Hottentots, she, like her race, belonged to the age of our grandfathers, nay, farther back to the blackness of Bloody Mary and Butcher Henry ages: for, not only had she no science, and the sun was to her nothing more, nor older, than he looked, but science was quite alien to the stage of development of the age in which, so to say, she lived, so that she had failed to acquire any, in spite of her birdlike briskness, her desire to learn, and her nighness to Chinnery.

Hence her mood was still that of gory old Queens of England, Italy, gross and gory Popes, grisly Empresses of the Chinese, whose names are like a sneeze, Tsu Hsi, and Wu of the Han Dynasty, and Lu, with their “off with his head!” and Blue-Beard cellars, and wells for throwing one down for fun; so that, as she sat there with her snakes and a parrot, relating in a sensuality of frankness the narrative of her depravities, there were seconds when her face had the nakedness of a drunken man’s, marred by fleeting expressions of feeling, when she was by no means pretty.

Frequently in the deep of night she would rise to creep to the peep-hole and try to spy him asleep on the petty iron bed in the north-west corner, and stay there in the night-silence till the night-cold, clutching her under her night-attire, drove her shuddering.

In all which she had an uneasy, yet sweet, sense of acting “on her own”: for Li Ku Yu, on hearing of the capture, had commanded immediate action, and the same day she had cabled him: “It is done” — so that he believed the Prince dead and buried, and dreamt at night of a Prince.

But she could no more kill him at once than the cat can its victim, he was so much her secret sweet, which all the world searched after, but Oyone alone owned. She could see the parabola of his shirt-front, he being in evening dress, turn gradually from dirty to drab — since he had to make his own bed, light his own fire, etc.; and though she told herself every day that she should be going back to France to see to the Six Millions and Eulalia, she could not tear herself from contemplating the monument she had accomplished, and resting on her laurels.

“You should like me better than her,” she said one day, a snip of thread resting on her lip, as she bent over her sewing: “she has a kind of little English grace, and nice eyes, but I could have whistled you from her, if I had wished. That day at Richard’s when you danced with me, do you think I could not see what was going on in you — married or not? Are you married, I wonder?”

But she had ceased to expect any answer from him. Once only a moan, smothered in the coming, had broken from his throat, when she told how she had dosed Chinnery before taking his air-boat, and he must have longed then to know if Chinnery was living, and where the boat now was — for she did not say — but had asked nothing.

And on she chattered, slattern this afternoon and loose in a sooty dressing-gown; and another day she was like a painting of a Parisienne; another day an Eastern Queen reeking of scents; each day a fresh creature, her hair changed, her whole impression, everything; and the more she changed the more she was the same thing, bewitching — like those working stars on magic-lantern curtains which dart into new hues and moods, and still are stars.

“Think of a Prince without a harem! Your ancestors had, so why not you? but they say it is your mother, and your school, that have made you like that — like Li Ku Yu. I see that she is ill, and is being ‘nursed by the Princess Elizabeth.’ What is a Princess doing in a country at war with her own? She must want you very badly! and would no doubt be glad to strangle your Eulalia for me. They say her father is always trying to get her back to Germany in vain — dreads the war-dangers of the voyage! What amuses is that there are references in the papers to her ‘efforts to unravel the mystery’ of you. That is laughable how the charlatanism and child’s play of people in high places is taken seriously! This Princess, it appears, is one of

‘the clever’: she draws diagrams to find you, wraps herself in abstraction, frowns profoundly, looks furiously acute, and the Queen and everyone at Court have a queer hope that she will yet discover her Teddy — so the society papers say. Courts are queer things.”

Her bird’s-tongue took some seconds rest, and went on: “What makes the English mad is that you will not be at the sea-fight — it is for their own skins they care, not for you. The Times says that the war cannot last another three weeks, for then every nation will be bankrupt and starving; so the sea-battle will be in a week, people believe, and America has too much to do to help England.

“The Italians, French, English and Russians have mostly sunk one another in the five Mediterranean and Black Sea fights; and the remaining Italians and Russians escaped through the Straits of Gibraltar three nights since, to join the Germans. The English have gathered all their Atlantic and Home ships; but if the two forces annihilate each other, the Continentals will be the victors, since there will then be nothing to prevent them from invading England again.

“England is already invaded — by aeroplanes. Last night a fourth town — Hull — was utterly destroyed, and there is a fine outcry about it. The Germans say it is only what you did to their Spandau, but one Sir Robert Barrington in to-day’s Times calls that ‘a lie,’ since you dropped your bombs upon military spots, not upon civilians. It is being suggested that the English should retaliate, but most of them are against it. That’s stupid — and yet — I don’t know. It is stupid, of course — and yet — no, I don’t know. The English are the best of the whites — but so gullible. Who could be more gullible than you and Richard? The night of your capture I groaned a hundred times to myself: ‘Will the man not think it odd that I should make him go first to a different house, with my car at the back — I had to, since detectives were always following you. But I might have spared myself all those torments — you came thinking that everyone is exactly like yourself — sleepy-headed! capable of seeing deeply, but not quickly, except when your minds are excited.”

She severed a thread with her teeth, and proceeded: “Look at what Li Ku Yu has done to Europe — only by a trick, and perhaps not a soul, except you, has seen his hand in it. Even you never can dream what he means, or you would never have troubled about fighting in the Asahel, or about your Eulalia, or anything. All is over with you whites, you have had your day, this is your midnight. You do not know the Chinese, they will fry you in pans like sprats, with onions. Li Ku Yu says it is ‘God’s Will,’ which is what he always says when he wants anything.

“I am glad, for the Easterns know how to enjoy themselves better, eat nicer things, are nicer clothed and housed, with more colours and charm, and enjoy life with more delight.

“You here are taught by your lamas and priests to be afraid of your god, who gets jealous if you enjoy pleasures; but that is an African fancy.

“The Orientals will paint out the European grey with greens and crimsons. And they have begun to come. A comet which appeared in the East some nights ago is growing you would not think how quickly — its face terrifies: and persons are asserting that this world will dive into it on a certain night, and that it is an omen of moanings to humans. I think it is the announcer sent out with the name of Li Ku Yu in its mouth, though no man can understand its language: for Li Ku Yu is great to heaven — swift and bright! a younger brother of the heavenly bodies.

“In China he has the titles of Long-lived, Orthodox, Prosperous, Quite Obvious, Perfect, Respectful, Glorified, Holy, and All-Nourishing; and as the Grand Lama has proclaimed him to be Confucius Reincarnate, he has lately passed through the Empire from Manchuria to Quang-si, and from Lhasa to Ningpo, to reveal to the people the face of the Saviour of their race.

“The Orient throws itself down before the throne he rolls on, without raising its eyes, lest his brightness strike them blind like that Ray of Richard’s, which, perhaps, you have — have you? Tell me where, and I will set you free — will you?

“But it is all lies, he is not Confucius, he is Li Ku Yu, and nobody else, swifter and brighter than two Confuciuses.

“And he is coming! Listen to what he says” — she read from a letter: “‘impossible to understand anything of air-boat from your account; therefore, either I send you a steamer for it, or meet you with it on the Belgian coast about the middle of April’ — soon! Then I will see him! and my veins will entwine his life with a vine of fire!

“Li Ku Yu? Like the bullet of a gun! And China is like a bicycle which he rides with his legs! He has so worked upon them, that now, he says, no power could hold them — they suppose that Europe is full of streams of diamond and anæmic creatures who sigh and make love, just waiting for Chinamen’s fingers to come and tear their limbs, as one’s thumb and finger tears mice and tender chicken-flesh.

“You do not know what is happening there, because the cables have been cut, the Legations sacked, the whites massacred at the concessions and treaty-ports, and since the Hwang Hai Battle all Hong Kong has been overrun and put to the sword. Li Ku Yu is the sheen of a sharp falchion unsheathed! They say that he dislikes tortures, but a life is no more to him than a kite that flies. Let it be blood: let’s dye our eyebrows, and clean our teeth, with blood. Glory! A thousand years! Let’s tread in red, and drown in red!

“There is nothing to stop it now. What is called the Army of India, after winning its way almost to Moscow, has been cut to atoms by a mixed German and Russian army, and India is already opening its arms to embrace the Chinese. From south to north all Asia is shouting a thousand years!’ over the fall of the fair faces. The Japanese have crossed Lake Baikal on the ice, and have the Siberian Railway. Russia has called out all her Reserves, and is asserted to be now exhausted. The Italian Regular Army is reduced to a few. France has out the Reserve of her Territorial Army, and her Southern Corps have vanished. It is being asserted that Germany will have to admit being bankrupt within two weeks, and England within four. Li Ku Yu says that there are twenty-nine millions of Mongolians already living in Europe — in Hungary, Turkey, Finland and Lapland — who will welcome the Chinese, and are to be left alive to be the nucleus of a new kind of civilisation which he has invented in his head for Europe. As for the Japanese, they appear to be penetrating everywhere like fleas ‘on the spree’! Now they have British Columbia, as well—”

But here her prisoner got up to go into the alcove at the north end.

When he was long she put in her head, and saw him sitting on the alcove floor, his face in his arms against his washstand leg, and she thought that she saw his body bob as if with sobs: no sound, however. And presently he rose, closed the alcove door, and she was conscious of a splash of water from his tap washing into his basin.

Afterwards he came back, threw coals upon his grate in the south-east corner, and sat again, his hair brushed, as always, his white-black tie and collar on.

“I think you have wept,” she said: “did I say anything to make you? I was speaking about the Japanese having British Columbia. Perhaps you are getting hungry. There will be swallow-nest soup to-day: it is Li, the eunuch, who fled with us from Peking, who cooks it for one to lick the lips, though he is such a dirty lazy pig.

“But as to the Japanese, it is not strange, they have a genius for war and butchery. In a battle at Nerchinsk they could not get past a certain trench, and at last the front rank dragged the Russian bayonets into their own breasts, so that the rest might rush the trench: for they butcher themselves as merrily as others, if once everything is red.

“They have only been frightened once, it seems — when taking Australia; and a very strange story is told of that in the papers. They were making a raid one midnight upon Williamstown, the naval dépôt near Melbourne, where those ships of the Australian Navy were which had not been destroyed in the Hwang Hai Battle, and they stole up the harbour in the dark in submarines.

“Now one of these submarines, called the E.3, had been British, but had been captured in the Hwang Hai, and it is said that she had once sunk, and her British crew had perished in her; but she had been raised.

“At any rate, the raid failed owing to the fact that this submarine, E.8, rose up prematurely, and stood still on the sea. When she was taken by the Australians, all her crew of Japanese were seen to be dead, and the matter cannot be understood.

“It is being said that the submarine may be haunted by her former crew, since the dead Japanese had stares of awe and horror, and had evidently intended to cast themselves pell-mell into the water, several having the aspect of strangled rats.

“The Australians had her two weeks, but in the second raid the Japanese got her back.... What was ever the good of the Australians struggling against Japan? It was foolish to think that a few Englishmen could keep all that continent to themselves. What is the good of any of you struggling? Look at this bit in Times to-day: 'From our own Correspondent. By Anglo-American Cable Co., New York. An Evening Post correspondent at Astrakhan wires viâ Odessa that a body of Turkestan Mongols, eight to twelve thousand strong, have captured the railway from Krasnovodsk to Khokand, and the Samarcand fort which the Indian Army dismantled, and have finally turned up on the Caspian shore. Their objects have not been ascertained.'... Do you think what this means? The wall that will fall upon all is drizzling a little dust.

“Good-bye. I will go to see A-lu-te, and will send your dinner. You will not speak to me, but do not tempt me too long. If a bird will not please the ear, let him please the teeth.”

She collected her things, and went laden, trailing them.

He saw her no more till eleven in the night when, he being then in bed, she called in at the hole: “A-lu-te is dying! I have summoned an English doctor in spite of Huang, and shall order a nurse. You will see little of me to-morrow, for I am going to France to see to my interests, so as to get that over before the death, the funeral troubles, and the invitation to ascend. Good-night! You are not asleep; you hear me; but will not speak....”

CHAPTER XVI

THE BURIED RAY

THE QUEEN LAY on a bed to which none had access save the Princess Elizabeth and one maid-of-honour — for Her Majesty would see no doctor. It was nine in the night, a reddish shine, remote from that tumbled bed, shedding through the room a mood of the moon in eclipse, and the Princess at the bedside had on hat and gloves, just come, her gloves grasped in the Queen's hands, who feverishly said: "Did you lay before him all your latest thoughts?"

"Everything!" — from the Princess.

"And he his to you?"

"Everything. Sir Robert does not think Teddy dead, Your Majesty—"

"Call me mama; say 'mama.'"

"And he thinks that if he and I only keep on collating and dove-tailing all our latest thoughts, we shall yet discover Teddy."

With the wild eyes of fever, her palms clasping her forehead, the Queen said: "Yes! and you — you two — you'll find him! He knows! He is strong!"

A furtive smile curved the Princess's thin lip, enjoyment in her at the sight of that royal mind which had dominated her now broken and in the dust.

"I told him I would see him to-morrow evening again—"

"That's it! And what does he say? Does he stoop? Does he look sad?"

“Yes, but Your Majesty should try to sleep” — she kissed the Queen’s hand—” I am doing wrong, I won’t stay another moment.”

“Elizabeth, you leave me?” the Queen called to her.

“Let Your Majesty consider that you have not slept for three days,” the Princess turned her chin to say, “and I, too, am sleepy. I will be with Your Majesty again at midnight.”

Her Majesty now dropped back upon her pillows, and was tossing there with distracted changes of attitude until, all at once, she sat up, stared, pondering, then urgently turned to touch a button, but checked herself, and then with clandestine haste was standing on the floor, staggering, yet grand, a ghost in laces.

In a fever of haste she proceeded to dress herself, delicately treading by an ante-room’s doors beyond which ladies waited, cautiously opening wardrobe doors, quickly selecting, steadily building herself into a state of dress, save when she paused at a mirror to hold up on her palm four grey hairs, at which she gazed with the greatest interest, amazed, gravely amused.

Soon after which she was in flight through a postern behind tapestry, hardly very exquisitely groomed, but careless, to make her way into the Park; and both an amazed Master of the Household and Inspector of the Palace, who chanced to catch the spurt of her escaping skirt at the turn of a stair, felt an impulse to address her, this apparition of her so suggested hectic and ecstasy of mind.

After making her way to the bottom of the Park, she flew from the little gate there, stumbling, to Sir Robert Barrington’s, a minute’s distance away.

Luckily, something in her rap inspired him to open the door himself, and, finding her leaning there, her eyes closed, powerless, like an outcast at his door, he moaned “Come” to her, took her bodily, supporting her to a couch spacious like a bed in a morning-room, he himself very breathlessly agitated at this happening — no longer so young as he had been!

And hand on heart, panting, he stood, saying: “I cannot think that Your Majesty — so ill — has done well—”

A lamentable protest broke from her buried throat, breaking his heart: “Oh, my soul is exceedingly sorrowful in me, Robert Barrington!”

At which his forehead dropped before her, his breath uttered: “God grant me strength.”

“I have had hope,” she said— “you promised—”

But now he was harshly sharp. “No! It is false! I say that it is abominable, that it is unpardonable, if any unfounded hopes are conveyed as from me to Your Majesty. I declare that I am utterly powerless, absolutely in the dark. The Princess Elizabeth may be an interesting, if somewhat fantastic, young woman, but I say—”

“You need not be angry,” the Queen wearily said, raising herself: “I come to you, and you get angry. Why did I come? I am sick of living, and I come to you.”

“Then, I will say now that you did well to come, Ma’am. But Your Majesty is aware, by training, that opinions have no value. My opinion is that Your Majesty’s boy is in the hands of Anarchists, is still living, may yet be discovered; but, then—”

“Then, that is how it is, if you think so! You will find him, and it is exceedingly dear of you to give—” Here her hands were going out to his, but she suddenly saw and snatched them back, with a breath of scare which she sucked in, which” sounded like “Ah, take care, don’t let me!”

Then, ten seconds, she sat lost in astonishment, not very sure what she had said, or how loudly; and suddenly, with “let me get away” was tearing angrily out in advance of her arm which he held; and he, too, when he had followed her steps to the Park gate, and was back, sat asking himself in a long reverie: “What, really, was it that she said?”

Then he was roaming the room with a brutal jaw, breathing between his teeth, “Man, eh? Impotent! Brainless! Vain! The petty pates of apes! A world to lift with a worm’s sinews!” In the midst of which, in an impulse, he sat down and penned a letter to Eulalia:

“I am impelled to express the hope that all is well with Your Royal Highness.... Ever since the Prince’s disappearance I have received not one line, though I have twice written.... A natural anxiety impels me to pray Your Royal Highness to send me a word at the first possible moment....”

Three evenings later when this came to Eulalia’s hand, that was the first she had heard of any “disappearance” of the Prince: for on the day after her discovery of the Six Millions she had had attacks of dizziness, which had caused her to be put to bed in cantonment upon a pair of peasants in Nürnfeld village; and not only had a surgeon-major forbidden any news or letter being given her, but the 2nd and 3rd, after the Battle of the Moselle, had taken up positions thirty miles further into German territory, and had left her; and since her German was not fluent, her conversations with her aged hosts had included no news but news of skirmishes within thirty kilometres of their door.

Then one noon one Sister Darling — a tall strip of uniform under the face of a saint in a painting — had pelted into Nürnfeld to pay the patient an angel’s visit, and Eulalia, seeing that face pale and careworn, had felt so ill at ease, that the next day she had found herself saying, “No, I am going to do my work — not so much Teddy.”

That day she had got up, had dizzied, fainted, gone back to bed; but three mornings after, gathering from rumour that her whole brigade was engaging a garrison of the enemy, she had procured a manure-cart, and, after travelling all day long, had come up with the brigade's field hospital in a field a league eastward of the Soar.

She found her coming eagerly welcomed, for the enemy that evening had suffered, not merely a defeat, but a rout, and of the crowd of captives left in the British hands sixteen were wounded: so that, with the host of British wounded, the hospital had enough to do.

Eulalia was in a waggon at the bottom of a steep field, the waggon standing beneath a bay-tree by the bank of a brook whose babble among stones, together with a garrulous soprano of grasshoppers, aggravated the silence of a night dark and starless, warm and calm. Outside — the brook, rough scrub, Oyone in an ulster seeking to peep between two waggon-flaps, some lanterns straying among waggons, waggon-shines thrown on the grass, a sound of horses' jaws which grossly ground and ground in the gloom, a tent, two heaps of stretchers under tarpaulins in corners of the field; and within — sighs, spring beds, splints, lint, a hospital scent of sickness and carbolic, scarlet spots on bandages, and eyes — eyes pining, dying, sightless.

Into which came Sister Darling to throw a busy look from bed to bed, and to breathe "How are you?" to Eulalia.

And Eulalia with a shrug: "I shall pull through."

"Brave! You are dropping, really, after that terrible journey. You shall have these now as a reward" — she gave three letters out of her pouch.

All from Sir Robert Barrington: and when Eulalia had managed to catch by snatches the sense of them, she called out lamentably to her maimed: "Oyone!"

At which outcry, Oyone, startled into fancying that she had been noticed, made a motion to run from between the waggon-shafts, but now saw coming a Tommy who led a horse by the mane, and she crouched under the waggon, till he should be gone. But the horse came to a stoppage, and the man also, resting his head on the horse's neck, like one dead-weary, or asleep.

After a little she hissed toward him: "Go away!"

She had been to the wood of the Six Millions, and, though the gold had not been touched, in the dust was a footprint which, she had determined, was not hers. Up to that moment she had more or less believed what she had fiercely hoped, that she had not really been seen; but now she was sure: Eulalia had been there.

At which thing a gang of assassins, of Richards III., of grinning aristocrats, were instantly grinning in her inwards, and she ran to kill as if to catch a ball; but it had taken her two hissing days to seek out the 2nd Somersetshires and then the field hospital — she, meantime, in a state of amazement that Eulalia had done nothing to the hoard, or to her, all these weeks! for surely, she thought, unless Eulalia was weak in the head, she must see now that it was Oyone who had destroyed the air-boats, had shot the Prince in the Strand, and — had the Prince a prisoner now! At this last thought she had felt faint, and had made haste.

When it was well dark she had walked to the hospital, had dodged from waggon to waggon to Eulalia's, and had been fingering her trigger — for there was little difficulty as to escaping in the dark — when Sister Darling's coming had checked her; and now she was waiting for the man and horse to pass and not pester her, for it was as if some pestering thing obstructed her.

Now, Eulalia, on getting the sense of her letters, had started to run — to abandon her sick, to be off somehow to London; but, as she started, a dying voice called to her in a key which she could not resist: "Mees," it groaned, and she moved back to the waggon-head to bow over a brow that had a bandage aslant about it, hiding the right eye, while already in his windpipe was the whistle of death: yet both Eulalia and Oyone, their ears within three feet of his lips, heard each word when he said: “A favour — service to humanity — my name Hartmann — Russian. Dig up a black box in the back yard of 11 Frith Street, Whitechapel — back yard, right-hand corner, dig it up. Send box to Taska — Bowery — New York — shoemaker — well known. Tell Taska someone who is lately dead — he will know — gave me secret to pass on. It is the Ray, say — just that — he will know — the Ray — and be careful of the cap, say. This is death — I am going—”

Eulalia hardly waited a few seconds to close his eyes when she flew, nor did Oyone know when she flew, so open-mouthed she sat there on her toes at this wondrous discovery of the Ray. It was in the yard of 11 Frith Street — how marvellous a talisman in those three words!

She had once kept Chinnery three days without drink to force him to make her a new black box like that lost box, and, what was strange for him, he had resisted, asking her “why do you want it?” but then had yielded, had got her to get together lots of objects, had commenced to make, but then had failed, or had pretended to fail.

But here it now was: and with the Ray all her terrors were at an end, all her ambitions realised. Chinnery could be forced to show her how to use it with her own hands....

She sprang up, careless now of the man and horse still there, measured her chances swiftly, resolved to act, peeped between flaps more boldly than before: a dresser was in there, but not Eulalia.

Her heart started at the question: “Does Eulalia know the preciousness of the Redlike Ray, of those three words just heard, and has rushed out already to go to clutch it?” She must have rushed very lightly, flyingly! ... Whither? Oyone moved to seek her, clambering the field from waggon to waggon, and, on being seen by a running hospital-orderly, who stopped to stare at her, asked him where Nurse Bayley was.

“I think at the staff-waggon,” he answered, pointed, and ran.

But Eulalia was not there, was nowhere in the meadow, and now Oyone moaned, “She has gone,” and flew down to the brook, and up to a pony-trap awaiting her beyond.

Eulalia had, in fact, to the amazement of the staff, gone off in a flutter with her bag, as she could without formality, being still on the sick-list; and after stumbling westward seven miles, she tumbled to slumber some hours with a cow in a hut by a covert.

A comet’s light in the morning sky caused her to start up, and she plodded on, anon conning her map by the shine of a match, anon conjecturing her way toward Nancy, for between Nancy and the front the railway had been destroyed, so that it was not till eleven the next night that she entered a train.

By that time Oyone was at Boulogne: but the Channel boats, requisitioned at intervals for war purposes, were not running regularly, and, having to wait, she lay in the railway restaurant, a desert now, lamenting, thinking of her air-boat, how well if she had it now, visited now by a panic as to the Prince, impeaching herself of dallying and self-pleasing, promising to be prompt as hammer-stroke, if he was not yet dead, telling heaven with accusing looks that Eulalia had taken another route, and already had the Redlike Ray safe....

It was not until the next afternoon that she could look back from the boat upon Boulogne as upon a hell escaped. At about the same hour Eulalia left Dieppe.

They arrived in London within a few minutes of each other, one alighting at London Bridge, one at Victoria, and now Oyone stood two seconds doubtful, still undecided whether to fly home and see things, or to make straight for the Redlike Ray. The latter drew her strongest: she flew and got a cab.

Soon after this Eulalia, too, was in a cab, making for the Horsferry Road, looking out with amaze at the changed air of London — hardly anyone in the streets, save a flock of jackals en queue before a soup-kitchen in Marsham Street, and a crowd round a coffee-stall; and though it was not yet nine in the night she was given a feeling of a London of three A.M.

Even the policemen appeared fewer, and looked as if all was up; she saw two rolling a dead woman on a hooded stretcher; and between Victoria and Marsham Street noticed three dead cats, two closed public-houses, and a coster selling red herrings to a drunken man in evening-dress.

At a paper shop she noticed an Evening News poster: “Let Them Come!” and a Star: “England Expects!” and a Pall Mall: “Sea-fight for To-morrow.”

Then before that darkling old home of Chinnery she alighted, for she remembered to have read that a neighbour’s maid knew “Monty’s” address, so she knocked there, hoping to find “Monty,” and so Oyone. But a woman told her that “Mrs Montgomery is dead.”

“Of hunger, I’m afraid” — she closed the door.

What now to do? Her plan had been to go to Oyone, to accuse Oyone suddenly of having killed the Prince, and if the Prince was dead, or if he was living, she would know the whole truth without fail from Oyone’s face, and would then measure strengths with her — a rash thing, for she had no weapon, nor had thought of such a thing, nor knew her Oyone.

However, she had had the prudence to write a statement of the grounds of her suspicions, and had posted it to Sir Robert Barrington, marked “Open After Four Days.”

But as to where Oyone lived she had no notion. The Chinese Embassy occurred to her; her cabman knew where it was; she drove to Portland Place.

Here she was received in a room to the right of the door, where a lean and a portly Chinaman, seated each in an opposite corner, solemnly, hands on knees, kept exchanging glances; and the interview, which should have lasted one minute, lasted twenty. Probably they were dull, and Eulalia an incident: anyway, she had never known anyone who, having once got her, was so reluctant to part from her.

“What person may she want?” Stout ventured to ask mildly, and Lean perused the floor with a weak and troubled brow.

“I only know her as Oyone,” Eulalia said: “but I thought you might know—”

“Is she a friend to you?” Lean thought of asking, to which she lusted to answer “Yes” (knowing now that they knew Oyone), but, dainty in that way (by training), she said: “Not a friend: a matter of business, but very pressing and momentous.”

It was now that one remarked that he thought now that he could guess who was meant, and might telephone, if the lady would mention her name.

This put Eulalia at her wits’ end: to say “Bayley” would be simply to prepare Oyone, and in the end, pushed to say something, she came out with “‘The Nurse’ — tell her that.”

Both went out; she heard them at a telephone; and they came back with some bustle, saying: “But you are late! Go if you like, but you will only be in time for the invitation.”

Eagerly she seized a piece of paper that gave the address, with a sob of relief, and was gone, her eyes bright for battle, careless of which “invitation” that was for which she would only just be in time, they urging their reluctant steps to chase and gaze wistfully after her to the last.

By which time Oyone, on her side, was driving home from Whitechapel. She had discovered Frith Street — an alley five houses long, joining two streets — decent little homes of retired seamen, say — No. 11 in darkness, apparently unoccupied, but for curtains at one window on the upper story.

Oyone pressed the latch of a side gate, peeped, went in: no one about: and there, leaning against the house-side, was the very thing which she was wondering how she could get — a spade.

With this she crept on to a strip of back yard planted with some stripling trees, making straight for the Ray “in the right-hand corner”; and the night was so dark, that she was quite in the corner before she became aware that there was a hole already there — square — of the same area as the Redlike Ray — three feet deep.

“She has beaten me” — her forehead dropped forward, and then her knees yielded, and, as if prostrate in prayer, she knelt over the hole, thinking, “she has it, she is more favoured than I, she seems to beat me, to escape me, to be born to molest, and balk, and waylay, and pester me, this woman: but wait: if I kill her, I will kill her twice, and thrice.”

She went back to her cab, and started in haste for home — down Leadenhall Street — by St Martin’s....

By this time Eulalia was there, ringing a bell under leafage at a green gate that had “Ning Shou Kung” painted in yellow letters across its concave top.

A very old Chinaman opened, dwelt upward on her with his eyes, led her inward through darkness to fight, to a hall where stood a small woman of fifty, gorgeously gowned, stout and chubby, but grim in some wrinkle about the mouth. She, on seeing Eulalia, crossed her hands and raised them, bending her head — Chinese, not Manchu; and she muttered with reproach: “But you come so late: the going-away (funeral) dress all done.”

Eulalia palely smiled, shrugged, and replied in a shamefaced mutter that she could not come before, discerning that she was being taken for some other nurse; so, to make sure of her entrance, she kept her face as little in evidence as possible — though this proved to be needless, for even if she had been unlike the other nurse in uniform and everything, that would not have mattered, when the Chinese woman was once preoccupied with the idea of identity: for just as to English eyes fresh in India all Indians are twins, so to Chinese eyes that live retired in England each English visage is a pea in a heap.

The light, besides, though abundant — Eulalia felt that some fête must be taking place — was very veiled and restrained, like the vague rainbow, and those soap-bubble veins of opal and mother-of-pearl; so the woman, whose name was Huang, said quite naturally: “No trouble, you come see,” and led Eulalia up to a landing, from which by three steps they entered a death-chamber.

Eulalia’s eyes, meantime, had been keen for any sign of Oyone, but, as she now moved into the room, the woman looked at her to moan with reproach and opening arms: “But no Oyone come! — too bad.”

And now, when Eulalia understood that Oyone was away, there welled in her a question that made her faint: “If he is alive! and here! and I can find out!” — Oyone away — and here, evidently, the head of the place dead, into so splendid a chamber had she been led, and never corpse more gorgeous than A-lu-te, stretched there in lantern-sheen in her phoenix hat, her robe and cloak of state, her badges of rank.

At once Huang led Eulalia to exhibit everything, Eulalia’s knees weak beneath her weight, meantime, at that question that was in her, at her fear of the real nurse turning up at any moment, of Oyone turning up, of something happening, at the consciousness of her precious seconds passing, passing, while she stood there foolishly watching the exhibition, the chemise of white silk, the jacket of grey silk over it, the wadded robe of blue satin, the belt of jade, the abounding outer robe of sable, the badges, the collar of amber, the hair one glow of gold, the astonishing coffin of lacquer, padded with crimson silk and straw.

But she could think of nothing to do, to say; any syllable might betray her; the moment was too pressing for her; she wished to be alone to sit and think; a gorgeous tall Gorgon at the corpse's feet appeared to keep his eyes tied to her face; and she felt her frame trembling in every limb, like the tongues of little bells that flutter.

Then two more came in, a man and a woman, then the old gateman came, and she helped to bear the body from the bed and lay its head on the red "cock-crow" pillow of satin in the coffin, and then they commenced some ceremony — inviting the dead to rise to heaven: during which she moved away to a window, anguished at the chance she was casting away, asking again and again of heaven, "Oh, my God, what can I do?"

In the midst of which she was touched on the shoulder, and Huang, with one rather cynical eyebrow on high, was saying to her: "You invite A-lu-te go up, may At which Eulalia shrank — from an instant train of ideas that sprang up in her — ideas that meant desecration of the dead, prevarication, pretence, in recompense for a politeness, for she divined that the request was made more out of politeness to her than for the benefit of A-lu-te, who probably had already gone up at the invitation of the others.

However, as to desecrating the dead, Eulalia had (naturally) much less respect for dead bodies than, say, her mother had, being accustomed to see young doctors throw dead men's arms at one another's heads across dissecting-rooms, and bodies cheap as cabbages on fields of battle; and before she knew that she had resolved, she was saying with a bashful and begging grace which she had: "But in the English way."

Huang shrugged and smiled.

"You must let me drive the devils first from all the corners."

Huang shrugged and smiled.

"Well, then...."

By this time there were only two in the room with her, Huang and the eunuch; and these strolled with a sluggish and indulgent disgust after her to the four corners, in which she stood with a booing to-do... boo-boo... boo-boo-boo....

Then it was out on the stair corners, boo-boo-boo, patiently, one by one, and up, they following, hardly any longer bothering to smile; but at the first stair-top, when she turned into a certain passage, Huang stopped her with "No trouble no more."

"Oh, I must now," she said bashfully, beggingly, with that grace which gains everything.

And thenceforth she booed at every door-cornice, managing in the jam of every boo to mix the pill, "Whose boy are you?" until she was there in the darksome corner of that passage a door of which had a hole in it, though she did not see any hole; and there, too, she booed a "boo-boo, whose boy are you? boo-boo-boo."

There was still no reply, and by this time despair was in her, the thing was so trying and vile, her two followers becoming obviously sick of it, and she without any faith now in its success. However, she moved on, away now from that door with the hole, and was now about to boo anew, when, fully half-a-minute after her last boo, a dreadful outcry, pressing, as of one roused in terror out of dreadful depths and dreams, screamed out of that black darkness of the cross-passage: "I am Eulalia's boy!"

The franticness of that cry in the silence, the chasm and extremity out of which it came, its crazy rage, its horrid suddenness, struck Eulalia colourless to the lips, though she just had the wit left to lift her hand with "Hark! a devil!"

"Poh," said Huang, cross now, "no devil — man-cook sick — you come — all devil gone now."

"If I must — though I have not finished."

"No trouble, you come" — and they descended to the death-chamber, where Eulalia, standing by the coffin, glad enough to hide her mottled face, raised her arm to say: "A-lu-te, I invite you to rise to the skies."

But at the same moment the gate-bell began gabbling outside the house, and Huang, crying to the eunuch, "Oyone!" flew out.

From which Eulalia well understood that Oyone was come; and now that she had found, and that the fire to find was extinguished in her, a chill and grisly realisation of peril gripped at her; for, if not killed, she could be imprisoned....

Some moments more and Oyone's voice was coming up the stair, Eulalia's escape cut off now, and all lost that had been won, if Oyone once saw her. And since Huang had told her that Oyone did not know that A-lu-te was dead, she felt certain that the death-chamber was the first which Oyone would enter, and now blamed herself bitterly for not bolting out at the bell-sound and stowing herself away somewhere. The only hope now was to look out of a window, and to one she flew....

In some moments Oyone was at the door....

But it was only to cast one flying glance into the room, and she was gone flying up, to dash along the passage to the door with a hole, eager before everything to relieve herself of the evil thing that was hot on her breath.

See her there! stooping at the hole, calling it to the dark, hot, envenomed: “Here I am back! A-lu-te is dead, and your Eulalia, too. Two nights ago — she was in a waggon in a field near Siebenberg — so I crept up — it was quite dark — and pried in through two flaps; and, as she was stooping over a wounded soldier, I gave it her right through the brain, the beast, and she bit a piece of her tongue right off, as she stiffened and kicked. She is well dead. She had been to the wood of the Six Millions, for I saw her footprint, and she had got the Redlike Ray from a dying Russian, but I have it safe now — I shall be sending it to Li Ku Yu tomorrow. I will come again—” she was gone.

Her prisoner, at her coming, had been seated on his bed’s brink, staring, quivering on the qui vive, in a craziness of hopes: if she could have seen, she would have seen him tumble back, done for, at her news.

It may be thought, indeed, that he could scarcely believe that Eulalia had been killed when he had lately heard Eulalia’s voice say: “whose boy!” but, on the contrary, he believed every word.

Much bane, in fact, had been mixed with his food on the day before Oyone had left him, and he was aware that his brain was not in a sane state.

All anight his head had been tossed in nightmare on the horns of the question, “which is the yellowest, momentum or energy?” and in the morning he had thought “I am done.”

Hence, on hearing “whose boy,” for some time he had not answered, not believing his ears. That was nothing odd now for him to hear something say “boo-boo, whose boy...”

However, the feet of his saviour were in haste. Eulalia was outside the gate before Oyone was again down, and, running till she found a cab-driver, she said to him between crying and laughing: "Grosvenor Place! The Prince of Wales! he is found."

He sprang upright.

"Fast, will you? He is found."

They were away.

But she was not wise to tell, since she wished to be quick, for the man thrice almost stopped to proclaim it, twice to policemen, once to a lady on a lone pavement, and as though his breath bore death and pestilence, the three instantly took to their heels.

And at Grosvenor Place Eulalia had to wring her hands — Sir Robert not at home!

"I mean that Sir Robert is really out," the man added, "and he may not see you at once when he comes, as another lady — a Princess — is awaiting him."

"No, he will see me first — you tell him—' Miss Bayley," Eulalia said, and he led her to that large drawing-room where Sir Robert had once interviewed Her Majesty.

This ran at right angles to the stair-head; and parallel to the stair ran a small drawing-room, which opened into the large; in which latter, pacing, was the Princess Elizabeth, fraught with her latest thoughts.

As one of the two sets of folding-doors between the two rooms was open, she could hear the other led in, and, on peeping — started! It was she, the bliss-licker! though the Queen had informed her that the minx was at the war. What, then, was she doing here? Her Imperial Highness condescended to the keyhole, peering with no little greed to get a view of that plebeian puss who had proved tastier bait than her own imperial being; nor did Eulalia's assumed mutiny and raid on dainties make Eulalia a less interesting object to her — on the contrary.

But she was amazed when Sir Robert hurried in first to Eulalia, though he must have known...! She saw Sir Robert bend to kiss Eulalia's hand like a sovereign's, or an idol's, with deference, with reverence; and then what followed was all a reeling dream to her, intensely immense. She was aware of Eulalia panting her passion of tidings, of wine shaking in the baronet's hand, of the fact that the Prince was found, found by another woman than she, of the words "Oyone,"

"Regent's Park,"

"Ning Shou Kung"; and the next thing was that she found herself down and out in her brougham bound for "Ning Shou Kung" — which means "Palace of Unperturbed Old Age," not of burning, and bursting, and turbulent youth.

At Ning Shou Kung gate she sent in her name, left her lady without as sentinel, and soon in a cosy room had that dark-brown eye of Oyone resting sideways on her, cold, darksome in meaning, mysterious, teeming with strategic and dangerous statecraft: for when at bay she was ever brave, ready, dexterous, self-protective; while the Princess's spectacles stared calmly like starlight, speculative, unblinking, noting the movement of Oyone's bosom, her beauty, her sinuousness, her nose pinched and blanched.

"Your Imperial Highness — honours me?"

"No talk is necessary: conduct me instantly to the Prince of Wales."

Oyone let slip one half-a-glance toward the gods, and hummed a little.

"Your Imperial Highness thinks that the Prince of Wales is here!"

"No talk is necessary: I know."

Oyone was up. "How?"

The Princess shrugged. "By deductions from clues."

"As I hoped! " — Oyone locked the door.

“Oh, that is nonsense to lock the door,” Elizabeth said, her nose, too, paler now, “when others know that I am here, and that the Prince is.”

“But do you suppose I do not see that I have beaten you by locking it?” Oyone looked down upon her with a bitter lip of contempt. “You come here, alone, hurried, after learning from a nurse that the Prince is here, your reason being that you want it to be thought that you have discovered him by your excessive cleverness; and I imprison you as an evidence of your cleverness.”

“That seems a little silly. Others are coming—”

“Precisely. You tell me everything which I wish to know. I will let those ‘others’ get the credit you crave for.”

“Why should you — care?”

“Oh, if you are not so clever as you pretend to the Queen, you are infinitely cleverer than you pretend to me. You see that my liberty is in danger, and your wedding bed. Let us be friends!”

“I have not said that I am unwilling,” said the Princess Elizabeth, up-looking.

Palely they smiled at each other.

“Shake hands!” said Oyone authoritatively.

“Now, how did you know?” she asked: “tell quick!”

“A girl named Bayley, his bonne amie, came here, was mistaken for another nurse, heard his voice—”

“It was she? Eulalia? She booed—” This made Oyone faint that such a thing should be; her arm searched blindly for a chair behind her; she sat.

“We have no time—” the Princess commenced to suggest, when the other struck her dumb: “She is not his bonne amie, I think she is his wife....”

At this Elizabeth blanched as from a slash, as there flashed across her memory Sir Robert Barrington's manner of kissing Eulalia's hand. But this was an idea that would take her brain days to receive and believe, and she said with a shuddering hauteur: "That is an impertinent suggestion — you speak of an impossibility."

"But if the Prince has admitted it to me?" Oyone said. "And you need not care. She will not like long, if I live." At which Elizabeth's eyes dropped, her lips letting out: "One should not be horrid."

"But you will be delighted if I am horrid? All women are the same! we care much for nothing, except some man. And since you can never get the Prince, not legally, while this girl is alive, then, you wish me to live. You agree? You see? Then, you will let me go first to him, to make him think for a minute that I am releasing him of my own will, on condition that he signs a promise to protect me from consequences; and you will help to protect!" She sprang up, and Elizabeth, too, rose, saying, "On condition that I come with you."

"Why not?" answered Oyone, eyeing her aside, "are we not allies? Kiss me."

Elizabeth's eyes dropped.

"Four men are said to have committed suicide for my lips," Oyone mentioned.

"You are — one admits—"

"Then, you may."

Elizabeth let slip a peep from beneath sheepish lids, but then shook her head, breathing "Not now."

Oyone now wrote some phrases in haste, and they ran out, a sense of no little surprise in the Princess to find herself "the ally" of the miscreant whom she had come to smite and quell with her mighty spectacles; and she stood beyond the lantern-shine that stood on the floor by the door with the hole, while Oyone spoke....

The difficulty, however, was to get a signature to the phrases that lay on the iron-lined hole, or any kind of reply from within — and every second so precious.

But when Oyone told her motive — that a naval battle impended, and that Li Ku Yu instructed her to set free, since he did not wish an invasion of England until he invaded, then in a rush a shuddering pen was spluttering, and the thing was done.

On which Oyone's lips brushed Elizabeth's cheek with the whisper, "I'll write — the key," and she flew, scattering gold over the hands of two whom she met, with "fly! fly! for a time: all lost!" then was wild-handed at a glass, disguising as a Cockney coster-girl, and within six minutes was out, raining sables and bags into the air-boat, which she ever kept in petrol, then was heaping a beseeching Chinnery in, then was wiping her brow, sighing, high behind brown clouds....

Meantime, the Princess was labouring under the Prince's weight, staining her rose-satin mantle, broderie anglaise and arum lilies with that shirt-front and dirty evening-dress — she eager, with "poor Teddy, try now," he slow with "It will be well — wait one tick," during fifteen minutes from prison door to brougham.

But it was ten minutes more before Sir Robert Barrington, who had been delayed by communications with Scotland Yard, arrived with a force of men — to find in "Ning Shou Kung" no one but A-lu-te.

London, meantime, had pricked the ear, and was up, so that as the Prince drove from street to street, his forehead on the Princess's shoulder, he was conscious of commotion each moment increasing, newsboys who flew hooting the rumour, ten o'clock editions, populous windows, footsteps of runners that sent echoes of running, as when there is a fire in the night, and London sends out runners and echoes.

And from Hamilton Place there was some trouble: the carriage doors were opened, many pressing to shake hands, the police failing to reach him, and the Princess preaching continuously that he was ill, so that she was in a condition of exhaustion before they could get to the Park gate.

Just there, at that end of Constitution Hill, some man, seeing Eulalia straining and fainting to see, snatched her up, and she saw a nose beyond the Princess's shoulder, to console her during her night-ride to the coast. As to how the Princess came to be with him, and not Sir Robert, was beyond her comprehension.

But if she could have waited, she would have seen him better, for later the Queen would have him be seen by the people, and he was supported to the balcony by the King and Elizabeth.

It was now first that the Palace was wrapt in a rapture of sound; and crowds were still coming to eye its windows almost all the night long.

And the wings of the wind bruited that thing through Britain that night: the dead was alive again, and somehow through the wonderful wit of that wonderful Princess Elizabeth, when all the tees had long despaired. The heart of England softened toward Germany.

But none the less, England with all its heart longed that the next day's battle should be lost by Germany, and with its whole heart wrote its hope that night, its demand — in nine million letters that drove crazy the Circulation Office of the London Postal Department — that none but the Prince should be the British strategist in that battle.

But of this the Queen would not hear, for seeing him on a bed strangely before her sight, she meant to keep him, sharing her eyes, meantime, between him and Elizabeth.

Elizabeth had calmly led him to her, saying: “Your Majesty, I have brought you your son.”

Willy nilly, she had now to be a charlatan, and it was willy, for by heredity and nature this German girl was a greater charlatan and farçeur than Cagliostro or Casanova: so, having some genuine dexterity, she entertained Her Majesty half the morning in showing how due on clue had finally led her to the gate of “Ning Shou Kung”; nor had the Queen’s feverish happiness the time to spy shaky spots in the chain.

Also Elizabeth related how, having gone to share with Sir Robert her final thoughts, she would not wait, as he had been engaged with some lady; an untruth which Sir Robert, on hearing of it, knew to be an untruth, though now, of course, he was discreetly mum; so that the Queen, and the Prince, remained unconscious that, not one, but two, rescue parties had gone to “Ning Shou Kung” that night.

What the Queen, or no one, could definitely gather was why the Prince ever went to “Ning Shou Kung,” or its inmates’ motive for imprisoning him! for the Prince, under contract to Oyone, refused-details — the motive was “political”; and though a mob sacked some of the rooms of “Ning Shou Kung” the next day, its inmates were soon back in it unpunished — to the wonder of public and police. Only Oyone lived no more there, having no confidence in the Prince’s promise; and with her were Gunnery and the air-boat.

But to the Queen’s fever details were of little, importance for the moment; there he lay safe; his saviour was her favourite and elect for him; and “All, all, Teddy,” she said that morning, “you owe to this dear and knowing head.”

At which the Prince lifted himself, bowed, kissed the Princess’s hand in a particular manner. The Princess’s forehead rushed into a blush, her eyes blazed. The Queen's bent head dropped a tear. It was an engagement.

Some moments later, though, the Prince again raised his head to say: "I fancy, Your Majesty, that I shall be well enough for the fight" — and she started! knowing that tone of her son.

He, for his part, had it in him that Eulalia lay dead of Oyone's hand, and, on the whole, thought well of wars.

CHAPTER XVII

THE FLOOD

ALL THAT MORNING Britain was rent by a civil war of placards, “Too Ill,”

“An Hour Will Decide,”

“He Will Be Present — Special,”

“The Doctors Forbid,”

“Hope Abandoned,”

“Prince Leaving Waterloo,”

“For Her Skipper was Ted!” — this last a Star 4th edition placard before noon, which the widow’s mite was spent to buy.

It was a bright spring morning, breezy: but for him in that compartment the sun was black in eclipse behind a shadow “like unto the son of man”: for he had come out of prison to a world perfectly new, in which the chess-game of Europe that day to be decided, so momentously in others’ eyes, was to him child’s-play.

“China!” he breathed: “how queer! how abstruse!” When laughter among his suite behind reached his ear in snatches, it touched him with a sense of astonishment that men should laugh under the sun. But they did it in ignorance.

He was as surprised as at finding himself straying on a planet where every plant is saffron, and the heavens a heavy yellow, and stared before him, smiling with a child’s amaze, his “well-dead” Eulalia pushed into the back of this brain by Li Ku Yu in the front: for that shadow like unto the son of man eclipsing the sun dangled a pigtail.

Always, from boyhood, he had thought that Li Ku Yu was born to modify things — would invade India and Siberia — and that he, the Prince, was somehow ordained to checkmate him; but his heart had never really conceived that the stars some night in time might look down upon a yellow Europe.

Some words of the Japanese girl heard in his confinement had caused him to start and shy; but it was not that which now bent his head.

He held in his hand a document, that day translated by the Private Secretary, addressed to him as President of the P.C.N.S. by a certain Oberstwachmeister Bergmann, a refugee from Kiao-Chau, just arrived in Europe, and his eyes read and reread of themselves....

“This my Memorial, which at the same time I venture to address to my Imperial Master and to your Royal Highness....

“The Memorialist’s escape was due alone to his disguise in the costume of a Mongolian camel-driver, and to the good graces of the said Hsi, the junkman.... The Memorialist cannot think that any other European has been so favoured by Divine Providence.... The scanty European garrisons were overpowered without difficulty in the same night....

“He has divided the Chinese Empire into 240 corps regions, each containing a population of two millions, each region being subdivided into 150 sections, each section to provide one line infantry regiment, twenty sections forming an infantry-brigade-command, forty an infantry-divisional-command, the latter under Japanese generals, the former under both Japanese and Chinese....

“In each region have been quartered the field army-corps elements, the staffs, recruiting dépôts, dépôts of artillery, transport, clothing, and camp-equipment, and supplies of food and forage.

“Each corps has been provided with a corps-cavalry-brigade of great dimensions, whose weapon in the main is the “long spear” of the Daimios, and the animals camels and mules mainly; the regular organisation of a corps being completed by eighteen batteries of cannon, six artillery parks, six sections of artificers, six telegraph sections, twenty-five companies of pontooners, and forty-five field-bakeries.

“The Memorialist estimates that during the past four months some 30,000 rifles and 20,000,000 rounds per month have poured from Japan into China, in addition to artillery, swords and spears.

“Many of the conscripts seem to be still armed with nothing but a poker or a club, which may be considered a sufficient equipment for some of the elements of a war-host which includes many classes of women, and may more resemble a locust-swarm than an army.

“For each peloton is provided an armoured cart of considerable length and weight, making a kind of locomotive shelter-trench with loopholes, to serve the purposes of transport, of travel, and of defence.

“The Memorialist considers that the China of the moment little resembles the China habitually conceived by Europeans....

“He regards it as a country characterised by much unrest, and impelled by a very remarkable tendency toward migration.... The presence and personality of this one man appears to have acted as an intoxicant, or goad, upon the masses of the people, goading them to a vague angriness and a very extravagant adventurousness....

“The load of new taxation is borne with a patience due to their daily expectation of Messianic marvels.... Li Ku Yu is everywhere regarded as a sort of angelic juggler....

“The exploitation of the mineral mines of Manchuria, Quang-tung, Heilung-Chiang and the Kirin Provinces, have yielded to so exact and administrative an intellect an adequate exchequer.... The results of all which the Memorialist holds to be at hand....”

The results were present: for a Times paragraph had it that on the previous evening a yellow regiment had entered Europe, and put to the sword the Ural volost round Mount Iremel.

He, for his part, so ill, felt his back bend under this thing.

Moreover, a wireless telephone to the train gave the rumour of three German brigades having quietly occupied Brussels overnight, of a German squadron engaging the forts of La Floride and de l’Heure in artillery duels, seeking to effect a landing at Havre or Honfleur.

The French, then, and the British on the French frontier, were to be taken in the back — that seemed the meaning: this, indeed, being Germany’s week, in which, if she failed, she failed — perhaps failed anyway: and now like a gambler staggered and callous, was throwing her last throw.

The crowd, therefore, of captains and commanders, summoned to Government House on the Prince’s arrival, met with a flush of excitement at this German tidings; but a mood of excitement new to their nerves awaited them there.

The Prince, standing near a window, as the room filled, could see a sea of heads without, and his face-muscles suddenly convulsed toward tears, seeing them, he thinking that there are tears in things, and that fives are like waves, and like leaves....

All that region of England, in fact, had been pouring itself for two days into Southsea, Portsea, Gosport, Portsmouth, and a bustle of “them that go down to the sea,” mixed with the other multitude, gave the day an air of gala. From the Portsea quays, the Cumber, the Hard, the harbour had an aspect of preparation for some great day and date, the Portsmouth inner harbour pregnant with craft, with a rattle of anchor-chains, a chaos of smokes and sails, scouts outgoing, incoming, and gulls that were aeroplanes playing in the air. But it was not holiday that was in men's minds.

The Prince by this time had had copies of the Memorial handed round; and, as he rose, four-striped now and banded, the others hung on his face, his manner, his phrases in a hunger of curiosity, with criticism, with question and wondering.

“After what you have read, gentlemen,” he said, “little need be said now, for if this destiny is incredible to you to-day, I prophesy that to-morrow you will see it. In which case, what to do? The P.C.N.S., you see, have conspired with Admiral of the Fleet, Sir John Shepherd, to tempt me into accepting command, and no doubt you wonder, like me, what sin I have committed: however, here we are — weather winky — sick skipper at the wheel. Thank God, we belong to a lot who may be a common enough mob in easy years, but will be well groomed on Judgment Day. I don't think we are going to be afraid — even of throwing off our old modes of doing and thinking in the face of this new day: for we in this room are the rulers; Civil Power, Navy Staff, are out of it now; and so I say, since this thing is on our backs, and we may be bitterly wanting the ships which we shall sink to-day, let us beg the enemy to go back, and not bother. What do you say to it?”

He sat: and from half, perhaps, a sound of approval surrounded the table; but others, hardly yet grasping the reality of the Dragon Antichrist's advance, sat silent their eyes bent upon the papers; and when Sir John Shepherd, an old gentleman, spoke, it was to read a memorandum of the enemy tonnages, from which it appeared that Britain's tough tussle over the ocean had left the allies a preponderance of 32,000 tons in newest-type capital ships.

But it was the Prince's words that more and more filled the mind....

His flag had been hoisted on the Queen Mary; and by 3 o'clock the Cumberland and Southsea Castle guns were gonging god-speeds to the double column going at six cables down the flood.

Already at that hour a big-ship battle was in progress with the raiders on the Havre forts, though the forts themselves had previously been stilled, and a landing of infantry affected.

But the enemy's main body was away in lat. 52 between Harwich and Rotterdam, though their objectif was understood to be our south coast, the whole east being very thickly patrolled by mosquito flotillas.

However, about five o'clock, when opposite Brighton, the Prince received tidings that the enemy's fleet had turned northward, and he then signalled eighteen knots — forced draught for his slowest units.

A little later the three ships, Antrim, Argyll and Cæsar, all very lame, were sighted southward, as the sun went down, these steering apparently for Newhaven from the fracas round Havre.

Off Beachy Head the Frenchmen Jean Bart and Danton came up to take their place in the port British column, these being said to be the only sound capital ships now left to France.

At the fall of darkness the Germans were still turned northward, and the British, two interminable processions of searchlights, worked on at the chase until eleven in the night, when (nigh the Thames-mouth) the Prince heard by wireless that the Germans had turned south; and he then changed his formation to single column line ahead at sixty-six revolutions.

However, the night being rather gloomy, gusty (though the sea was smooth), the enemy apparently gave the slip somewhere about Long Sand, and were found to be some miles south at one o'clock. The British, pretty well in touch, put down the helm to come at them.

It was ten minutes later that a scout-cruiser came in with the news that probably all along the east coast of England and Scotland a battle of destroyers and submarines was then raging; and the Prince's head fell upon a table to consider it. His thought was: "I wish I was only well...."

In the midst of which his flag-captain pushed in his head to say: "Here comes the comet, Sir!" and the Prince rushed to see what was already a chose vue to everyone else — a brightness sheening on the sea's eastern horizon.

It soon had the night alight, and yonder to the southwest, a crowd of toys, lay the enemy.

And now the Prince wrapped up in oilskins, signalled his departure down to the ninth in the line (Sir John Shepherd, the Lion), and was away with a sub in a hydroplane of high speed, a night-glass eager at his eyes.

Within sixteen minutes he was in the cabin of Grand-Admiral von Bachberg, the Donnernde; in thirty he was spurting back to the British, his blood up, his proposals of peace having been coldly received; and now his illness was in the background of his being.

He immediately ordered the fleet northward, calling a meeting in his wardroom, where, speaking very quickly, he said: "Gentlemen, we have to fight, and the thing now is to do it a little trickily. Their object, of course, is to destroy our resistance to invasion; all along the coast the attempt is now going on in detail; and, whether they themselves are destroyed in the attempt or not, the attempt is a success, if they destroy Well, then, since fight we must, let's fight shy and fly; let's kill them without dying ourselves ("Bravo!" and laughter). We can: for I've seen people snatch up glowing coals and juggle them trickily on their palms without a scorch, and people prettily handle nettles without ever a sting. This, then, I recommend as your primary object — not to be sunk by them; and this, as your secondary — not to sink them; but to capture them; for I tell you that you may be wanting ships in Europe.

‘And now you want to know — in two ticks — how I think these two objects can be accomplished.’

He proceeded to lay before them a plan of battle.

By this plan, every British ship was to present a broadside to the enemy; and every enemy ship was to present herself end-on (whichever way she turned), to be raked fore and aft by some British.

And the method was quite simple!

The British were to fight in two lines ahead at right angles — along two sides of a square — with the enemy between.

One British line was to lie east and west, one, a mile eastward of this, was to lie north and south. He read lists of the ships which he designed to fill each line.

If an enemy ship turned her broadside to the British ship attacking her, the British ship was to desist from that particular ship, leaving her to be raked fore and aft by some ship in the other British line, to which she would then be end-on: the British aim being, not to kill ships, but to kill guns and crews, not to shoot at hulls, but to shoot at decks.

Some other hurried instructions, and the throng of captains were darting back over the ocean to their various vessels, a blaze raging in breasts where depression had reigned; instantly the new mood was pervading the navy; the flagship signalled the battle word: “Sausage and Smashed”; far over the vast of the ocean the laugh, the challenge, passed; and Jack, conscious whose gallantry had him now in hand, buckled to the trouble with an alacrity glad to the galaxy.

And the instant the fleet was out of the enemy’s sight it split into two: the flagship with 1st and 3rd battle and cruiser squadrons moved east, southeast, south; the Second-in-Command, mainly with 2nd and 4th squadrons waited, then went south.

And before the enemy could realise the plan, the Battle of Margate was upon them — a big ship drama, though all the North Sea fought that morning in smaller combats; and the comet's searchlight, urgently journeying, solemn in the morning, saw.

For three minutes the two flagships were engaged: for when the Donnernde — the behemoth of the Germania Yard, 85,000 tons, the largest warship yet launched to load the ocean, the men of whose stern were as foreign to her for'ard crew as Holborn men do not know what Strand men do — when she, reserved by Germany for this day, turned her broadside to the Prince of Wales in the British north, she faced the Queen Mary in the British east, and from the frying-pan was in the fire. An outbreak of a thousand thunders struck her suddenly dumb, strewed her superstructure, funnels, masts, guns, steering-gear, bow-works, all in the shout of one sharp shower; and she lay a flagrant log on a crimson sea, after lodging three shells in the Queen Mary's engines.

When, twenty minutes later, the Queen Mary went down by the bow, a boat that carried the Prince and sixteen sank; but by swimming they got to the St Vincent; and when the St Vincent was sinking, as day broke, he boarded the Britannia in a boat, having nine lives that night.

By which time the fight was all but done; the sea a reddish scene of wreckage wherever the eye could reach; and the dawn came strangely that morning.

By now results could be estimated. A third more British had sunk than German, Russian, Italian: the fact being, that the British, in presenting broadsides, had presented a greater area to fire than the enemy to them, so that the enemy's more numerous hits had hulled many British; and some naval criticism has blamed the Prince, his plan being what it was, for not engaging at closer quarters than he did.

Be that as it may, the enemy's more numerous hits proved to have wrought far less havoc each than the British: so that the thirty remaining British were still mainly battle-worthy, while the thirty-four remaining enemy were gunless, some capable of repair, but shaved of upper-works, and British captures.

The destruction, meantime, among the smaller craft in that vast battle along the coast had been enormous; but, as to the Margate Battle, such a result, when the country heard it that forenoon, without quite troubling about how the trick could be done, was heard as a wonder, the work of a wizard with a switch which he whirls.

Hodge at the hedge-side, the jobber at the station, the Queen in her chamber, stood astare at this news, then crazily flew to proclaim that the Prince of Wales was again bringing Germany in chains, and the war was warred, and wire-gun had finally beaten Krupp, and comfortable peace and the day of plenty come again, for ever.

The war, however, was hardly ended: for while the treble of British bells were again singing to glen and city, German brigades were surging toward Paris from the west, and three regions of Eastern Europe were putrid with yelling yellow troops — though during that forenoon this fact was not known in western Europe, for everywhere the first work of the yellow men was to destroy the telegraph; and precisely like the night-floods of African rivers they sprang up to roll over Europe.

But before nine in the night, when the Prince landed at Dover, planning how best to call warning to western Man, the shriek which was already rushing through Europe, as of a woman fleeing with shrieks in the pangs of travail, had reached to British ears. No bell greeted his coming that evening.

He, for his part, though the heavens fell, felt that he must see yet once that face which he supposed to be now four days dead; and, as he could not go himself to get her — again ill in a reaction from the battle-night, and gashed in the chest — a young man, a certain Lord Percy Burnett, an aide-de-camp, left Dover at midnight on the mission, with the 2nd Somersetshires in his mind's eye.

A fortnight of appalling haps was to be his lot in that howling anarchy that he now found the Continent to be.

He was shot in the leg by a squad of flying patrols while riding by night through a pine-wood between Rouen and St-Pierre-les-Elbœuf, in which a German brigade had an examining-post posted; and he was kept prisoner as a spy five days and taken to Vaux near Paris: or, as may be conceived, the momentum of the new German incursion needed time to check itself, just as the machinery for recalling the British troops from Europe needed time to be put in motion; so that while Europe was fleeing in tens of millions to her western and southern ports before those spread wings of the yellow pestilence, and while the world's mercantile marine was churning the seas toward their screaming, German troops on the back and front of British were getting into touch on a front of fifty miles over the plain of Picardy, blind to all but this one last cast of the dice, one last orgy of carnage, and then to fly. They met on a day when every Russian roadside between Archangel and Bessarabia was already red with butchered moujiks, when Mongolian flesh had glutted the guns of Kônigsberg, and overflowed them; the next day yellow was on the glacis of Coblenz, in the gardens and bedrooms of Metz; it swarmed over the European combatants like a wall that falls upon three battling boys; and what the Europeans mutually slew the yellow men mutilated.

When Lord Percy Burnett, after many adventures, arrived in sight of Bar-le-Duc castle, where he had hopes of coming in touch with the 2nd Somersetshires, no battalion of Somersetshires was any longer in existence, and Bar-le-Duc was a smouldering ruin. The same night he was flying westward with a banefuller stain of yellow on the brain than Eulalia's remains.

These North-French hordes were a portion of the central tentacle of the three great tentacles which the Mongolian race stretched over Europe — Midland tribesmen, these, of Shansi, Shensi, Kansu, who, after reaching the borders of Chinese Turkestan by train, had trailed itself in interminable caravan through Tarim and those desert stretches of Siu-Kiang and Chinese Turkestan which, in his earlier day, Li Ku Yu had strewn with masses of Mohammedan dead.

These were they whose front had been reported on the Caspian foreshore while nightly the stars still marked their five corps camped from Kashgar to Bokhara, marked the bakeries' blaze, the lament of the baby at the breast, the tethered camels' clamouring — corps that had very little resemblance in extent and organisation to the corps in which men had yet gone to war, since the units of a corps would have occupied 1200 miles of road (supposing it could have moved over one road), and have occupied thirteen days in passing any one point: the administrative convoys and regimental trains occupying by themselves more territory than is customary for all an ordinary corps.

Of a sallower hue, true Hans, with little Manchu admixture, were the sinews of the second tentacle, Hunanese, tribesmen of Fukien, Kuantung, industrious blades, hardhanded by habit, short of stature, sturdy, who had furnished washermen to Sydney and Frisco, and diggers to the Zootpansberg: men to whom a li, or a pinch of salt, was much, who now already on the march saw salt squandered round them, with rice, dried vegetables, tea, sausages, pressed meats, fresh meats, a foretaste of the Hopeland they are pressing to.

These in seven corps, separated sometimes by quite short distances of thirty or forty miles, drop half-a-corps for Bengal, as they go working in interminable worms up to the “Roof of the World” by the caravan routes betwixt the sources of the Mekong and Yangtsekiang; and under heavens that weep ceaseless rains, by great swollen streams, they go pouring, through groves of the mulberry-tree, by priest-cities droll as a Gulliver’s dream, and by cantonments where their four échelons of auxiliary convoys take up deposits of cereals, biscuits, hay, two of the administrative convoy échelons being half-a-day’s march behind the regimental trains, the other two bringing up supplies from the rear, the cattle marching between advanced columns and the main body.

As to the third main array, which was the first actually to turn a European villager into stone, they were composed of the taller northerners, most of them nomads already by mood and heredity, Mongolians, Manchurians, Kirinese, Pekingese. Their twenty corps left Northern China desert, to find the ice of Lake Baikal already melted, and to be carried across in their trains and armoured carts by train-ship to the Baikal village side.

From which third-first mass of power, three corps branched off, about Omsk, to turn toward Balkash and the sources of the Irtysh, where the Central Plateau of Asia has its western gate, thence to go swarming like many waters down upon those lowlands and lonesome steppes, where the yowling of the wolf’s mouth breaks the moon’s muteness round about the Aral Sea, where Russia had so clutched, and in vain spent her strength.

But even on these arid tracts, there seems to have been no creaking of the commissariat machine, each unit of a host carrying some utensil like a mess-tin, containing eight pounds of emergency rations, which it was death to touch except in extreme need, and each corps headquarters having droves of dogs, mules, camels, cattle, sufficient at a pinch for six days' food.

This streamlet of the northern stream crossed the Caspian narrows from Krasnovodsk to Baku in twenty-six hours on huge sail-pontoons which the pioneering (Midland) stream had constructed for its own passage three days previously: for, by reason of the inconceivable legions which formed a corps, works could be turned out in hours which other great aggregations of men would take weeks to begin — the objectif of the streamlet being the conquest of the Caucasus, and the occupation of New and Little Russia, as well as of an already Mongol Hungary, while the pioneering five and twenty were to be Central and Northern European, as the Thibetan seven Southern European.

Wherever the flood met resistance, as at Konigsberg, Paris, Venice, it was precisely like the resistance of isolated obstacles blocking a tide; and long before the obstacle was down the tide was about and beyond it.

It was German forts, really, which furnished the first line of defence, since in Russia, now utterly an anarchy, part of her nationals fled; part hid until caught; the rest stared and perished: for the coming of the yellow feet seems to have been everywhere preceded by rumours of such a suggestion as to transmute many into pillars — mephitic infamies, massacre complicated by madness — and it was as if somewhere the earth had opened to pour forth a smoke that, as it rolled and approached, clutched the throat with drought, and smote the foot motionless: so that a refugee, a bugler of the Kuban voisko, could report that half his village stood rooted, staring at yellow troops pelting barefoot upon them down a lane, and could not stir, fascinated and paralysed like birds by serpents, like men by spectres, seeing in that crowd of countenances nothing but a visit of ghosts, ghosts bloodless with lust of gore, bonily ugly, with rigid grins, and it was then as if every grave gave up its dead in the great and dreadful day of God, so that many a woman stood quite mute, rooted, and died of white affright before ever the spear could pierce her, the club crush her skull, or the blunderbuss blow out her astonishment and awe; and of those who fled many died later in a delirious frenzy of memory.

And with instant versatility these eastern pioneers turned from the work of murder to the works of industry, divisions disintegrating into brigades, into regiments, into battalions, to form communes of peasants drinking vodka instead of samshu; so that millions of sticks in midfields round Ural villages were showing some Chinese claimant's name, and the Pechili housewife, vowing now to be sage after the carnage and scarlet dark debauch, was taking stock of her new belongings, before the slaughter round Paris and Venice was half accomplished.

It was at these two points that the flood was longest dammed, because Paris was "impregnable" — or would have been to any other army with the few aeroplanes used by the Orientals; and because Venice was an island when the Malghera Garrison had once blown up the Ponte Sulla Laguna.

Yet even here three days saw it all over.

In Paris nearly half-a-million people had been trapped, with such a speed did the avalanche sweep from Coblenz westward; and these, with that desperate pride and chivalry of Frenchmen, decided to enrich with flesh the marsh-land of De de France ere they perished.

The outer ceinture of forts — Corneilles, Franconville, Montmorency — had aeroplanes in plenty, with great 30.5 cm. guns good and new, not half the Garrison of Paris had fled; so, like a last rock standing out of the sea of European ruin, Paris stood redly desperate; and when the yellow hordes, after blowing up railways, drew lines nearly forty-five kilometres in diameter, and dashed with siege-guns upon Domon, it was to find Paris of harder heart than Port Arthur.

But the flood was already far west of Paris.

That same night, near eleven, a thin westering moon illumined a moorland near St Quentin, in the south-east corner of which was a gipsy camp without any fire, and on a sort of road running north-and-south across it an ambulance waggon — stationary, since its one horse had just dropped dead.

But on the heath were three nags, shaggy and longmaned, which three Tommies in scarlet with white facings were trying to catch in wide effort, looking like ghosts running crazy over the moor in the moonlight's vague mood, when suddenly a flock of fifteen Chinamen and women came running out of coppice to the south: and, catching sight of the gipsy camp, the waggon, the runners, these let out the scream which ever jumps from Chinamen at anything sudden, and went pelting to their right for the gipsies.

At the same time two ladies, Eulalia and Sister Darling, who had been standing by the waggon, darted into it, snatching their rifles; the three Tommies dropped into bracken, and began to pot at the Chinese; and the flock of gipsies, screeching, scattered and ran.

Three of the Chinese instantly dropped shot, seven dropped into cover to engage the Tommies' fire, and five, changing direction, dashed for the waggon.

On the waggon beds were three wounded, a German, nearly dead, an Englishman, one-legged, and a young Frenchman, an army aviator named Bonet, his left arm in a sling.

Besides these, there was a certain Burslem, who, in the flight northward, had somehow become associated with the waggon — a “living-picture” adventurer, of whom now the Chinese were likely to make a dead picture.

He, with Bonet and Eulalia, took aim at flaps, while Sister Darling knelt in the dark behind, her rifle grounded — the battle meantime cracking away between the seven and the Tommies, while over the rough road and over scrub pelted the five nigher with silent footsteps, like death’s-heads running, the one on the road naked-breasted to the waist but for a bandoleer, one to the left without pigtail, a girl in cotton trousers, her gun stuck gawkily out before her, running furtively as on hot bricks with long strides, her mouth howling wide without sound.

When they were a hundred yards off, a clammy hand in the dark was laid on Eulalia’s arm, clammy on clammy, and a hoarse throat strove to utter: “Dear, don’t shoot: leave it to the men.”

No answer: the next moment Bonet fired, and like an echo Eulalia, and like an echo Burslem.

The Chinese girl stopped running, looked downward, sat down.

At the same moment a fourth shot, which rang out of bracken from a Tommy stopped the Chinaman who was on the path, he, after some thought, suddenly snatching up bracken with passion, as he dropped.

The other three Chinese, pealing shrieks now, ran on toward the waggon. But shot after shot met them: two fell coming; the third fell flying.

The battle of seven-with-three, meanwhile, had become a battle of five-with-two, the Tommies stealing ever nearer to the Chinese.

In the midst of which the girl sitting solitary in the gorse gurgled forth a sort of dolorous sing-song of two notes, one sol and one mi, like a death-dirge just audible: upon which out to her dashed Sister Darling.

“Katie, mind, come back!” cried out Eulalia.

She might as well have cried to the deaf dead....

As Sister Darling ran, a shot carried away half her left ear, fetching a scream from her, whereupon Eulalia in a forage-cap, rifle in hand, dashed out to her, and they ran toward the sitting girl; but as Sister Darling in advance bent to raise the girl, in Eulalia some nerve of passionate aversion burst out with, “Ah, don’t touch her!”

In a moment more, however, she was assisting to lift the girl, who moaned; but when a shot sang past her, she tossed from the girl — all their actions being characterised by that jerkiness and distraction of brains agitated to frantiness, and, dropping upon her face in gorse, she began to pot at the potting Orientals, while Sister Darling, who was very strong, trotted under the girl’s burden toward the waggon, dropping red upon yellow.

But three minutes afterwards the firing ceased, and three Chinese were spied stealing back to the coppice whence they had popped out.

And now the ambulance-lamp was lit for some minutes, to glow upon visages haggard with hunger and anguishes, while the gashed ear, and the girl’s hurt, were dressed, and two of the Tommies, having found their comrade dead, came in.

Whereupon they sat in grass round the waggon to debate, Burslem observing that their one chance now was to abandon the waggon, and “make paces to the coast before the Chinese reach it, if they haven’t already.”

“Then, oh, go,” Sister Darling implored: “Eulalia, go for me! Why, why, should you all wait and lose your last chance like this!”

“You are not going to catch us leaving you, miss,” said one of the Tommies, “so it’s no use.”

“But this is a lunacy!” cried the little Bonet in good English: “oh, but frankly, mees, pardon me, one is no longer able to consider you as mentally sound. For in clinging to these two men who are dying, you wilfully murder us six all. Me, I call that — distraction!”

Upon which Sister Darling clapped palms to forehead, distracted, crying out to God: “I can’t leave them! I would if I could, but I can’t!”

“Then,” said Burslem, “since Miss Darling persists in being so wilful, I think the time is come for us others to consider whether we should not leave her. Anyway, let us put it to the vote, and if—”

In that instant he was flying, and the council vanished, both the Tommies in their scarlet lying dead, shot out of hedge-bush to the west, the two ladies flying into the waggon, Bonet and Burslem buried away somewhere; and five Chinamen, bursting out of bush, were running wild-eyed, hot-footed, sweating, gasping gasps audible from afar, toward the waggon.

One of them Eulalia laid low by three quick-successive bangs four yards from the entrance-steps; the other four were hotly in, whelming the ambulance with the raw sirocco of their breaths and frenzied presence, fleshing a spear quick as one-two-three in the two wounded men and the Chinese woman, who whooped a shriek, then overpowering and tearing down the ladies: for many Chinamen did not at once butcher white women, but idled with them awhile; and if the white woman chanced to be a saint, or a princess, that made no difference to Chinamen.

Now, then, was the mouse amid ill cats.

However, a few seconds before Eulalia’s first yell of rage burst from her entrails like a blast of blasting-gelatine upon the night’s silence, Bonet and Burslem were at the ambulance-shafts, taking careful-trembling aim lest the ladies should be shot; and soon they had two of the Chinese shot in the waggon, and two as they were getting away.

And now it was a question of capturing two of the moor-nags — no easy thing; and there were the two little gipsy nags; on which four the four rode barebacked northward, with halters, flogging the nags.

But they knew that few escaped — a new rashness of the Chinese in the face of gun-fire now showing itself everywhere, as Paris was then witnessing, Venice: for in neither case was any assault at all necessary, since the population of Paris was already living on dogs and cats, and some days' investment must have ended it; while, as to Venice, four Japanese cruisers stood beyond the Lido after sinking the Austrian Tegetthof and Franz Ferdinand, and capturing a mob of Austrian and Italian gunboats: which cruisers, though under orders not to shell Venice, stopped supplies from the sea (if any had come), and had under their guns the murazzi of the Lido, and the Lagoon forts.

It was only necessary, then, to wait: but waiting was no longer to the taste of yellow men — rather dash through marshes of pigtails to a city-gate now than tarry an hour: for, having got the taste, their swarms dashed themselves forward, with a trembling intolerance of obstacles, for the last bath and draught. To drink the red sea dry, to sin now by mountains, to be crimson in iniquity, to sink, to sigh, to die of crime — whatever kept them one second from this end they fell upon with frenzy, making assaults in close order, whose masses the rains of flame from the air and from forts mowed down by thousands in a moment.

At St Cyr the guns gluttled their gorges with carnage until their tired rifling could no longer keep range.

One by one, Domon, St Germain, Versailles fell.

Before the seven batteries of the monstrous Fort de Marly massacre was so common, and the Azrael of mortality so mawful, that at one moment the Chinese line, advancing with scaling-ladders, wavered and shrank: whereupon a little Japanese colonel dashed forward to take the fort alone, calling, waving. They stood lashed by gashing gusts of bullets, but would not go: he fell. A major dashed forward, waving, calling Come! They would not budge: he fell. A captain dashed forward to take the fort alone, calling, waving, inviting. Still they shied at it: he fell. But, tis he fell, the yellow men yelled, pell-mell they pelted; now red hell will not repel them; and yellow hell within twenty minutes was the citadel.

At Cotillons the stock of ammunition was all exhausted in slaughter before the overflow. The next day Vanves was overflowed, Ivry, Montrouge — closer and closer like a death-malady spreading relentlessly to the heart. Paris, frantic with panic, knew that yellow was at St Cloud, at Putoux, at Suresnes, at Sèvres.

That same night the Venetian Canal Grande presented a strange sight — gondolas and corpses — one throng — gondolas gaudy with lanterns of Chinese and Japanese design, like a night of Carnival in the olden times of Venice, only a millionfold more vermilion-tinted, splashed with pageantry: for within some hours the Chinese were washed and at home in a town, like old owners, and lords waddling in slippers through inherited residences; and since Venice, like Paris and Buda-Pesth, was intended to be the capital of one of the three great States into which the new Europe was to be federated, greedy had been the press and competition to get pied-à-terre in it: so that such a crush of human beings now brushed shoulders with a buzzing of bees within those rii and narrow colli, as no city of man had ever seen.

Hour after hour the stars, the comet, saw the watch-night swarming and gory; half the Ghetto to the northwest a conflagration glaring on the night;

all night that lunar glory of gondolas gliding through the glooms of the gory Lagoon, clogged with throngs of goggling eyeballs, pigtails grinning dead amid the Christian dead, all up the Grand Canal, the Giudecca, away out to the Cemetery and Murano, without end; all those Byzantine palaces — the 'Cà d'Oro, the Palazzo Foscari, dreams of colour and decor — reeling unceasingly with the abomination of desolation; all through the Giardini Pubblici prostrate lives lying amid corpses, gorged like the cormorant with orgy, dying of licence in wine and white flesh; all among the graves of the Cimitero; of the Jews' Burial-ground; up in the Campanile, the Clock Tower; down in the vaults of St Mark's; among the columns of San Giovanni e Paolo, where an image of Puffa, the many-handed, a joss of eagle-headed Fé, and of Gan, the big-bellied glutton, grinned at the Mary Magdalene of Bergamasco, whose marble must have blushed.

Throughout Paris the next night it was the same, yellow men despising rosewood to carouse at tables of flesh, despising eiderdown to sigh on couches of flesh; publicly on the Grand Boulevard it raged, in the Madeleine, Notre Dame; the Dragon-flag on the Elysée flapped.

By which time the four fugitives from St Quentin had contrived to snatch their lives through jeopardy to within five miles of Douai; and at about nine in the night were making their way — on foot now, since their hungry nags had failed them, they themselves footsore, famished, foredone — when there reached their ears that shriek of the Chinese, well known now to them, more detested now and dreaded than very death.

A crowd of about a hundred, carousing in a cabaret two hundred yards ahead on the left of the road, had spied them in the moonlight before they could hide: and out they flew.

But on the right, closer to the fugitives, were three detached houses — mansions almost: so they dashed into a gateway, locked the gate, then through shubbery to a door, locked it, up a stair, locked a door, and dropped, all the four, upon a bed, to pant, Within a minute, though, ‘they were aware that the Chinese were scaling the gate and garden-railings; and they darted to a window to see the garden beginning to teem with Chinese.

A moment more and the Chinese were battering on the front, a rough row, like the Vox Dei, heart-horrifying.

On which Eulalia in her distraction let down the jalousie with a racket, and dashed open the persiennes to shoot — rashly! revealing where they were — and turned to snatch her weapon.

At that moment Sister Darling said to her: “Dear, don’t: it can do no good”; but Eulalia, her face dead-blanced like a white radish, her teeth rigid, hissed back: “Won’t it? I’ll show them a bit of Irish,” and with a kind of dance in her gait ran back to the bed for her gun.

However, she was never to fire, for in the instant that her back was turned a shot was fired from outside, which found Sister Darling’s heart. When Eulalia turned again to the window, it was to see Sister Darling down; and the gun tumbled out of her hand.

At the same time Bonet was whispering: “Let us try the back — come —” dragging at Eulalia by the arm.

But she would not go, lay over the dying girl, who was staring as if in scare, rolling a death-ruckle in her throat, pouring it low, hurried, like a purring rolling. And one lover’s-kiss Eulalia pressed, wild-whispering “beloved?” and one wild press more and deep-secret “beloved?” then by a cruel tug Bonet had her away, and they were gone on all-fours amid bullets, not four, but three.

By a covered arbour at the back, soft-running, they made their way down a sort of park to stables, whose doors they secured; and in there in blackest darkness the three sat in three corners of a spacious, paved chamber heavy with harness and saddlery, haunted with stench of dead horses.

And soundless through hour and hour of the dark they crouched so apart, shivering, without prospect, but without much care any more for the morrow, sleepily hearing as in a dream shrieks of cheer pealing from the Chinese, who must have crowded into the house, and were carousing; and if one of the three slipped a little into sleep, ever, on his starting awake, the dream-shrieks reached the ear, like a machinery acting everlastingly, afar.

But once toward morning Eulalia started awake to another sound — an exclamation— “In the name of God, a Blériot!”

For Bonet, shuddering from cold, had risen to pace, and in a neighbouring chamber had stumbled upon a monoplane.

He found in it a good 7-cylinder Gnome, and, moreover, he found tools, petrol, rugs, compass.

When he examined it with matches, it seemed good throughout; and now, clasping one of the chassis-wheels, he sat weeping.

On pulling himself together, he mentioned that it could carry two, and no more; and set to work.

By a large doorway it was taken out into meadow-land at the stable-back, as day was breaking, and Bonet fastened it to a larch there with a strand of shredded rope.

But the engine’s hubbub was instantly heard by the Chinese, who hurled themselves out of the house to see what was stirring; and quickly Bonet leapt to his place, Burslem and Eulalia standing pale by the plane. Not one word as to who was to be Bonet’s passenger had even now been uttered.

“Now, Mss Bayley, all ready,” said Burslem.

The Chinese screamed at a corner of the meadow, spying them, pelting.

“You go, if you like,” said Eulalia.

“Women and children first, lady,” observed Burslem with a hideous grin.

A shot from the Chinese chanted past Bonet’s head.

“But why?” — from Eulalia—” an ‘excellent rule for clowns and cowards: but for us two, surely, the question is, whose life is the more valuable? Mine isn’t very.”

“Vite!” from Bonet in a shivering shriek, “or I go alone, God be my witness!”

At which cry Burslem snatched a revolver from his pocket, and discharged it into his right eye. The Chinese shrieking was near. A shot tore Eulalia’s shoulder. As Burslem dropped, she sprang up beside Bonet, her averted head turned toward Burslem, smiling him into eternity. And Bonet hitched the engine; her strain broke the restraining string; she tripped down the meadow merrily amid missiles and throatings, suddenly sat fluttering as with laughter on her throne in the air, and before long was landing safe at Dover.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE RAY RADIATES

BUT DAYS BEFORE this Lord Percy Burnett, sent to search for Eulalia's body, had managed to get back — with tidings on his tongue! for, though it was known in Britain that Oriental troops were in Eastern Europe, nothing was known of their numbers, character, and rate of advance.

It was about ten at night, and the Queen, daringly holding a Court amid the break-up of civilisation, had lately stepped into the State Ballroom with the Royal Family, the King en colonel-in-chief of the Coldstreams, she in an all-round crown, with Koh-i-Noor, Order of the Garter, cloth-of-silver train, parading her Prince on her left, her Elizabeth, the King's Band babbling to six hundred glitterers a ballade which breathed that there was no such thing as grief or grinning dead — not there, anyway.

On the top of which let Lord Percy Burnett drop hotfooted to have speech with the Prince, and at Belshazzar's banquet is handwriting on the wall, awe, and harrowed hearts.

The Chinese had already sat down before Kônigsberg. And it was not a river, it was the sea....

The Prince, listening, siffled through his teeth-edges: "Onward, Christian soldiers...."

Suddenly he was up — and his action, when he acted, was like a clock, or a watt, at so many mâts of work per second — and, throwing behind him,

“Percy, try to see the Queen,” he vanished headlong, was quickly in a carriage at the Garden Gate, and off for “Ning Shou Kung.”

For a week, since the Battle of Margate, his thought had been: “Just possibly, if it is true that I am tricky, I may crush Li Ku Yu at sea”; and already he had set going a great haste of hammering, gun-casting, overhauling, and repairing at Paisley, at Portsmouth, at Newcastle, at Glasgow, at Sunderland, at Chatham; but even if the sea was his, the air was Li Ku Yu’s with Chinnery’s air-boat in Oyone’s hands — perhaps in Oyone’s head; hardly yet in Li Ku Yu’s head, since she had so lately read aloud Li Ku’s statement that he could understand nothing of her account of it.

Where the boat was he had no notion — it might be at “Ning Shou Kung”! Anyway, the thing was to seize Oyone quickly.

He had had qualms, however, as to seizing her, because of his contract with her; but while Lord Percy Burnett had been blurting his flood of news, he had said to himself that that contract referred only to seizure by the police, not by himself.

On the way he picked up two policemen, made them await him at the gate, went in to find a scared Huang smoking her pipe, and, without saying one word, took a lantern to roam in search through room after room, she moving mutely after: and her pipe went out that night.

No sign of Oyone! He half expected to see her still sitting there before that hole in the door, sewing, painting, speaking unceasingly; and in that narrow long room, and in the alcove, he spent several minutes, holding up the lantern to everything, remembering how he had asked himself which was the yellowest, momentum or energy, and how he had heard “boo-boo, whose boy...”

Then it was down in the grounds, prying about with the lantern's light; and at the back he saw an odd thing: four stakes where the air-boat had stood! and in the garden-house on a window-ledge an odd thing: a pipe — Chinnery's! for it had a chloride chamber for moisture-absorption like Chinnery's pipes: which put anew into his head a question on which he stood there brooding many minutes: "Is Richard Chinnery living? Is he? Fifty words of his could rescue this Europe..."

But nothing else was found, and he went away heavy-hearted....

Yet Oyone was not, in fact, far from him — living in a solitary cottage on the borders of Epping Forest, near which she had alighted on the night of her flight, awaiting every day Li Ku Yu's summons to join him with the air-boat, which lay under tarpaulins in her back-yard. There, too, Richard Chinnery might anon have been seen, pottering feebly in slippers.

She, meantime, was lying quite low, her only servant a little English girl, she herself venturing out very rarely, in general as a coster-girl, though sometimes in the hush of night a lone figure which was Oyone could have been caught in that back-yard of No. 11 Frith Street, a spot which fascinated her, wringing her hands over the hole where the Redlike Ray had lain, sure that the Prince had it now from Eulalia, wondering where Eulalia was: for since her flight from "Ning Shou Kung" she had been once by night through the air to France to see the Six Millions still untouched, but had failed to discover anything of the 2nd Somersetshires — which had been cut to pieces.

But on the day when the flood of immigration from the Continent suddenly stopped, when the Chinese, having everywhere reached the sea, were lying gorged in the rock-galleries of Gibraltar, and were slaughtering the inhabitants of Hammerfest, she ventured upon a day out as far as Regent Street, and there in a way wonderful to her came across the Redlike Ray.

Her object was partly to buy some crêpe de Chine, partly to see that changed aspect of things of which the papers spoke: and for hours she enjoyed herself in it, seeing now that she need not have come in her coster disguise, she was so utterly lost in the whirl and swirl of this wonderful new London, whose population must have been swelled by millions, as everywhere in Britain, the Mediterranean and Ægean Islands, North Africa, America.

Such a brushing of shoulders like an everlasting Lord Mayor's Day, a polyglot of gabbling, an eager and heated atmosphere of life, thronging the centres of streets and pavements alike, all the old ways and restraints broken down now, everyone speaking to everyone, like members of a jolly, hot family on a holiday, the merchant Jew of Astrakhan in fur cap and coat, the gabardine and ear-lock of Bokhara, the hausfrau of the Black Forest with her last packet of coffee, the Parisienne affectedly slurring her r's, the Amurski Cossack with his sabre, the English girl with her blush, the drosky-driver in full-skirted coat and fur shapka, all intimate in a whirlpool of intercourse, many destitute, most more or less hungry.

France would have grumbled if Britain had overflowed her so; but Britain — world-brotherly, world-worthy — did not grumble, though she had once grumbled a little for nothing. If she had, it would have made no difference.

But the shops were much less thronged, so it was not a crush which prevented Oyone buying her crêpe in a shop at Oxford Circus, but a commotion outside which she rushed to see. It was then near three o'clock: a bright Spring afternoon.

The source of the trouble, whatever it was, was away down toward the Marble Arch: for there was a pelting eastward thence of feet, and thence came eastward a distinct wind of wailing and lamentation.

“What is it? What’s the matter?” everyone was asking everyone in that region of the crowd round Oyone; and, even as they inquired, the word “blind! blind!” had spread up from the west, and was with them.

Some moments more and they could see the fleeing stream of people split in the middle of the street, the split reaching nearer and nearer, as if a bull in eastward career was throwing them from his road into two crushes; and all at once the cause of it all broke into Oyone’s sight — a man madly running with spider’s legs, panting, wildly staring — a Yankee, like Yankee caricatures, lank like ribbed sea-sand, goatee-bearded, hugging like a terrified mother the Redlike Ray.

By this time he was in a region of people who divided before his flight by mere imitation, without knowing why he was flying, and was being fled from: so a cabman who was creeping westward a little eastward of Oxford Circus took him in without question, turned with him; Oyone flew after; and, as vehicles thereabouts could only bore their way coaxingly, she had little difficulty in following until she met another cab, in which she followed him eastward to Aldgate.

There he alighted, and, still wild-eyed, anon going off into daddy-long-legged runnings, with ogling glances, he gained No. 11 Frith Street. Oyone saw him toss one last ogle from the door, and go in.

So the Redlike Ray had been there in the cottage all the time while she had been groaning over the hole in the ground.... She would get it now!

In that same hour the news of the Marble Arch event reached the Prince’s ears, and he, too, said: “I’ll get it now.”

And the same day Eulalia, fresh come to London through the air, told herself: “I should not delay in digging up the box for the Russian, Hartmann.”

But look at Mr Silas P. Stickney, stretched there on his bed at No. 11, sobbing like a child — a respectable ship's captain, he, of "Chicago, Illinois" (he always added "Illinois," with a nasal fling on the "nois" — I guess), who had lately decided to end his days in London near a married niece, and had bought a forty-years' lease of No. 11, to settle in. It was even yet not furnished, save a top room.

But already he had planted the back with stripling trees, and, in digging to plant, had happened upon the Redlike Ray, where it had been buried by Alexis the Sexton while the house had been still "For Sale."

Alexis had been a man of some enlightenment and science, and had once gone a pilgrim to see Chinnery, who, with his habitual affability, had admitted and shown him round, showing him with the rest the Redlike Ray, not knowing that Alexis was an Anarchist, or not caring; and as soon as ever Chinnery was said to be dead at the date of the Six Million raid, Alexis had entered Chinnery's place by an area window, and was away with the ray.

He had then handed on to Hartmann the secret of the ray in the event of his arrest or death, as Hartmann, in breathing his last, had laid it on. Eulalia to hand on to one Taska.

It had been Alexis's terror of blindness that had protected society from the ray dining two weeks preceding his death: for Chinnery had stuck on the box a strip of paper for "Monty's" benefit, written with: "Do Not Touch The Cap."

But the burying had much obscured this. "The Cap" had been rubbed off: and it was only by studying it through a magnifying glass that Mr. Silas P. Stickney had deciphered "Do Not Touch."

This for three weeks had kept his eyes constantly on, and his hands constantly off, the box. The box became the man's mania. He suspected that it was packed with diamonds, and that "Do Not Touch" was only a bogey.

But, then, it might well be an infernal machine. And the question was: how to find out.

In the end he decided to take it into some open place, slip down the cap-thing, and fly. If nothing happened, he would make other flying experiments; and, if still nothing, then the thing was full of diamonds.

So, that afternoon, he had gone to Hyde Park, laid the box on a bench, uncapped it, and fled: nor had looked back till a lamentation came to him out of Park Lane.

Then he could see that out of the apparatus was proceeding a pencil of rays, very large in area, though very faint, for whose strange shade he had no name — something like the sawdust of cedar-wood — just revealed to the eye by the dust-particles which the rays touched in the air.

But it was some time before his brain connected the ray with the lamentation, till the lamentation spread to those who had rushed to their windows, to those who had rushed in the street, to see why the wailing was. Men, women, children, were every instant being struck blind by scores.

When the truth entered his head he flew to the box, himself now very troubled in the eyes — for behind the box, too, the reflected rays from motes in the air had a blinding effect — and catching up the box, he dashed with it through the Marble Arch, too madly agitated, too preoccupied with the sorrow in his own tight-shut eyes, to think of shutting the cap, and, as he ran stretched and long-shanked, he ran disseminating calamity and lamenting.

Three different policemen who flew to seize him stood still midway, their knuckles in their eye-sockets, moaning: and Oxford Street was half a moan, and half a scamper, before he had the cap closed.

And now he lay on his bed sobbing, thinking of the ill it had been his lot to do, thinking that, with his marked appearance, he would be tracked that day, and, if not hanged, then lynched. England was no place for him: possibly he might hook it to America, if he looked alive. As to that devil's-thing, which he hardly dared look at now, he would rebury it just as he had found it, and so, washing his hands of its bewitchment, do a bunk for Liverpool without bidding good-bye to a soul.

This he did: sallying out soon after dark, bareheaded, his wide hat left behind, his beard shaved off: and Oyone, who for hours had not taken her eyes off the house, saw him go.

She instantly slipped into the yard, found the back-kitchen open, and in she stole, to seek, and seize, and flee.

However, to her horror of astonishment, no box: not in the little trunk left unlocked; in no cupboard: up no chimney.

She tapped all the walls, carrying his chair to stand on, reckless if he came back upon her, though gradually growing conscious of the ghosts gathering round her in that gloom to mock her agonies.

When he did not come, she guessed that he had taken to flight, but about nine ran to throw a glance out of a front window, and now — again — saw the ray — in Eulalia's hands, Eulalia having tranquilly dug it up with a shovel which she had fetched, while Oyone had been moaning about the house.

Oyone pulled her coster-shawl farther over her face and ran shivering, tracking Eulalia eastward through teeming streets, where to shoot might have been to shoot an unintended head, and to stab would have been to be mobbed; Eulalia, meantime, making her way east and then north into a tumbledown slum of tall houses, a back street rabbit-warren of Hebrews and Slavs that ran east-and-west.

There Oyone saw her go into a house, and now propped her back against a wall, dropping with fatigue of soul and body, thinking what next to do, how to get the ray, and then drop and die.

Eulalia, meantime, in the wee back-room on the third floor which she had hired at five shillings — for lodging was dear — was scribbling off Hartmann's message to "Taska"; and she wrapped up the Redlike Ray in a newspaper, and directed it to "Mr Taska, Shoemaker, Bowery, New York" — having no notion that the box was of any importance to humanity.

Oyone, during this, was being sore tempted to throw up everything for that day, and get some rest, when she again saw Eulalia sally out — with a parcel.

About the same size as the ray — but wrapped up: impossible to be certain whether it was the ray or not.

Round the corner, to a crowd pressing round a pawn shop — a Saturday night. Eulalia entered the press; and it was long to wait while she gained an entrance, and came out again.

Then the way was along by-streets toward a main street, Oyone more than ever uncertain now, her eyes troubled, the parcel sometimes looking smaller to her, as if something had been taken out in the pawnshop.

But in the main street a species of little shriek pitched from her lips: "She is posting it to the Prince!" as Eulalia made into a district post-office.

Now, then, was the second for electric energy and concentrated venom, all mortal things hanging on the hazard of an instant.

' The throng scattered before Oyone's fury. When Eulalia was already at the parcels' counter, suddenly the box was gone out of her grasp. And a second later a tigress's arrogant cry rang through the place: "not stop me!"

For the room was full of men, and two postmen with empty bags on their arms who had spotted the robbery barred her escape.

A moment more, and she was struggling like ten men with twenty men, trying to tug off the wrapping and get at the cap to strike mankind blind, not minding if she was struck blind, too.

But the mass of force, the number of hands, was too much for one, and in half-a-minute she was hanging deadlike in someone's arms, sobbing a little in her faint.

Four then dragged her out to hand her over to the law; but after forty yards of it, when her weight became a bore, they threw her on a doorstep, and left her.

For in the new London snatchings and such-like acts were common, and crime had now quite a new aspect.

Civilisation, in fact, was on the brink of disorganisation — in Britain, too; and one of the first nerves of the State to be infected with the disease was the police. Having, in fact, far more to do than they could handle, they had begun to do nothing.

Thus it took them three days to trace so marked a personality as Mr Silas P. Stickney to Frith Street — and this in spite of the zeal which a Prince could inspire. By which time Silas and ray had well vanished.

However, two days later a report came to the Prince that on the evening of the Hyde Park event a certain nurse had been observed by three persons carrying a black box not far from Frith Street.

“Then,” said the Prince, “find me this nurse.”

But that was no easy work in the new whirl and turmoil.

At any rate, as Oyone fainted, a Polish Jew handed back the box to Eulalia, its wrapping rather damaged; but she put it on the counter, and turned to go.

A clerk, however, called after her: “This can't go like this.”

“American packages aren't taken in that way now,” he answered: “besides, it must be fastened with sealing-wax.”

But to pay the postage was more than she liked — no clothes now but what she wore, no jewellery left but the wedding-ring, six shillings in money from a ring just pawned.

So she took the box away, till she should be better off, wondering at the face of the coster-girl who had snatched it, with a thought of the Japanese at the back of her consciousness.

Oyone still lay at the door where the four men had thrown her, thinking wearily that the ray, if it was the ray, was posted now; and she, Oyone, had touched it, yet had it not.

Afterwards she rose to get home; and there, as soon as she had rested, sat and wrote:

“Li Ku Yu: strange things have happened this day. An American struck many blind with the Redlike Ray. I tracked him, and while seeking it in his house, looked out and saw the ray in the hands of that same Eulalia Bayley, the Prince’s honey, of whom I wrote. I tracked her to her lodging, after which she came out with a parcel like the ray-box in size, but wrapped up, went to a pawnshop with it, and thence to a post-office, where, in spite of an attempt which I made, she succeeded in posting it.

“Li Ku Yu, I am not perfectly certain that it was the ray, nor to whom it was posted. It have been posted to the Prince, but many things now incline me to think that, all the time, this woman may be quite unconscious of its value, so it may have been posted to ‘Taska, Shoemaker, Bowery, New York.’ I am a work-basket thick with knick-knacks of wonderings, contradictions and intricacies.

“Li Ku Yu, it is for you, who are as obvious as the Nine Tripods of Yu, to decide whether a ship should be sent to America to take the ray from ‘Taska, or how it is to be taken from the Prince, if it is he who has it, whether in this the Princess Elizabeth may be of use, or whether I shall first determine that it was really the ray then posted, though it is dangerous for me to be prominent and active at present, with the air-boat here. The foolish Chinnery still forgets when I get him to attempt to tell how the ray was made. I think he has not long to live. London is now incredible, a nostril stopped up with cold. Farewell.”

In order to get this to Li Ku Yu, she made a midnight trip three thousand feet up, striking the French coast by Gravelines, where a very great temptation suddenly assailed her to go on to Paris to spy upon Li Ku Yu’s face; but her pride still waited to be summoned: she sent the letter by camel-riders.

Three nights afterwards a Japanese captain, after lying low about her house, suddenly ran to it. He had reached her by special ship from France, with a letter in cypher within his cloak lining:

“Oyone, my business is immense.

“But to-morrow, the third, at noon, I transfer headquarters to Dunkirk, Casino des Dimes. Meet me, then, soon before the hour of the tiger (8 A.M.) two kilometres to the north with the air-boat. There, south of the Sea Baths that are at Rosendaël, I will light a fire to guide your descent.

“You will then be requested to conduct an aide-de-camp to the wood of the hoard of gold.

“It may be His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (not so deeply buried as you reported) who has the Ray, or ‘Taska,’ or neither. I calculate, from the facts I have, that it is Taska, so am sending emissaries to America. But you get Mr Chinnery to write a dexterous letter, asking His Royal Highness to meet him on Rosendaël sand-dunes, that I may capture His Royal Highness....”

On this Oyone cried out: “I shall see him!”

But the hitch in the Chinnery-plan was that Chinnery resisted, saying: “Oyone, it would kill me to write again to the Prince of Wales.... The Prince of Wales has forgotten me, because God has withdrawn himself from me....”

To this Oyone, who had suppressed two letters to the Prince, answered: “It is only because of the war that he has not replied! Now he will fly to you, if you write.”

“Oh, Oyone, I cannot.”

“Then, no wine to-morrow.”

This conquered Chinnery. Paper and pen were got. But when it became a question of dating the letter from Rosendaël, his brows knit. “Why Rosendaël?” he wished to know.

“Because I am taking you there in the air-boat.”

“Oh, not in the air again, Oyone!”

“Then, by a ship.”

But, little suspicious though Chinnery was, the whole thing scented of a mystery: he would not: and now no threats or rage could change him.

Oyone spent the night in writing a letter in his handwriting.

It came to the hand of the Prince while dictating letters at three in the afternoon, and he read:

VILLA DE ROSENDAËL.

“MY DEAR TEDDY: There have been reasons for my silence, since I am a kind of prisoner to a girl who is your enemy. Can you help me for old times’ sake? I am here in a country flooded with yellow men, where my life is bitterness and my bread unleavened. If you can come to me in a ship at 3 A.M. of the 4th, when the Chinese are all asleep, I may manage to light a fire on the dunes to guide you to the spot where I shall be waiting. I ask much, my friend; but I have much to tell you of new inventions. A Japanese sympathiser takes this; but I am ill, my hand shakes, I cannot write. Your sincere friend...”

Now, the Prince, like Chinnery, may have been little suspicious, but it was impossible for this letter to escape suspicion. “My life is bitterness and my bread unleavened” was so furiously curious as from Richard Chinnery.... And the bribe! “Much to tell of new inventions”... “old times’ sake”... “sincere friend”...

“Bring me the Japanese who brought this,” the Prince said: but the Japanese had gone.

However, just the possibility that the letter might be from Chinnery when drunk agitated the Prince’s fingers, and drew him to see the end of it.

At eleven he was at Dover; at midnight the fires of a swift little yacht in the harbour were lit and banked, and a little quick-firer from South Front Barracks mounted in her bows: at half-past one he was darkly cruising, without lights, quite close in to the French coast, noting an inconceivable host of floating things of every species massed in every roadstead, port, harbour-basin; Calais sleepless; Dunkirk flaring; each a reel of revelry mixed with military movements; no moon, the ocean’s floor smooth like a pool, the night quite calm, darksome, starless, till the comet (Tempel’s) entered it in Capricorn with horrid locks sprawling aloft, tempering the vapours a little, brindling a little the black sea in tracts of quicksilver.

At two the Prince, springing from a boat’s bow, was in Oriental territory, in the Dragon’s jaws, he all swathed in oilskins, a black mask over his nose, and with him in oilskins and masks twenty-seven fellows — all that were left of his old Asahel men — all armed to the teeth with revolvers, rifles, knives, hatchets, and one of them, named Commander Pilcher, the smartest of the smart, who had passed part of his youth in racing over the Iowa prairies, had a lasso — the Prince fairly sure now of a Li Ku plot to capture him, and wishing rather to capture Li Ku Yu.

So he had come an hour before the rendezvous.

They lay in a patch of scraggy grass on a sand-hill, gazing stilly inland.

Two miles south, on their right, a shine in the night which was Dunkirk; on their left, a mile north, a hint of Rosendaël houses, darkling, uninhabited now; and between Rosendaël and them a row of seven bathing-machines on the edge of the sand before it breaks to roll into a roughness of scrubby dimes; two boats lolling beyond the surf; the yacht lolling a long way beyond, all dark; the surf purling murmurings, like a murderer's lips speaking secret things in sleep.

Half-an-hour: — and now a sound somewhere, like horses' hoofs afar; then ten minutes — and now a light, a fire, about half-a-mile inland, between the bathing-houses and Rosendaël, though it was impossible to see who lit it in its deep dune — the land all wavy here in hills and hollows; and very quickly there was the radiance of a pharos blazing there like a building on fire.

The watchers did not budge: no sound now, nor sight but the light.

But suddenly the Prince clutched Pilcher's sleeve on his right, hissing: "Pilcher! a girl! — capture at any price! if not, shoot. Follow, you five!" — and he was flying, stooping, into the sea.

For he had spied a black object drop down out of the air a little north and inland of the blaze: and as against the chance of grabbing both Oyone and the air-boat in one beautiful swoop danger was nothing.

He, then, with Pilcher and five, ran north through the sea-surf past the bathing-machines, until they had the fire behind them, then inland, with the fire on their right, flying through hollows, dropping on hill-tops, until they were over against the blaze, and now saw south of them a crowd of about fifty yellow men in khaki.

At the same time they themselves were spied in the off-shine of the fire by a hill-top sentry, who cried out and fired; and in a second a volley flew from the group round the conflagration — without effect, the seven adventurers being three hundred yards off, and like ghosts to the firers with glare in their eyes.

The seven, then, successfully ran the blockade of the forty yards of valley across the hollow; and instantly as they attained the next hill-top the Prince's eyes distinctly descried Oyone, hardly more than twenty yards ahead, labouring frantically away up the next slope, apparently to get back to the air-boat.

And between her and him, two hundred yards south, stood a group of five — four small, one tall, whom the Prince's eyes divined to be Li Ku Yu.

These five must have been going to meet Oyone coming, when she had taken fright at the firing, and had fled back to get herself and the boat safe into the air again.

The five Orientals instantly dropped behind cagnards (low rocks in sandy scrub) to fire at the seven adventurers, while six of the seven dropped behind cagnards to engage the five, Pilcher alone of the seven pitching onward like a wind to catch Oyone, who saw and flew: and twice in that flight he fired, twice he cast the lasso, four times he missed her: for though her quarrelling frocks were quite nigh him, things were very indistinct, the light of the fire in the dune being quite local, that dune being big; and she vanished from him beyond the next hill-top.

But even as she vanished, he had the ray of an electric torch: on her, and was casting again.

This last cast caused him to fall flat forward: but the tug told that he had got something; an agony of angry cat-screams told; and soon he was over her, his handkerchief down her throat, he staring about for the air-boat.

To his amazement, he could see no air-boat; but he had her; and within six ticks was off northward with her kickings.

Meantime, the fifty or so by the fire were flying uphill to the support of their fighting five; but almost before they were on the hill-top, they were attacked in the rear by the Prince's reserve who had spurted inland; and as the attackers were in darkness, the attacked lit up, some twenty of the latter instantly fell.

But now a terrible sound fell upon the British ears — guns going off over the sea: and they knew that their yacht was done for.

Li Ku Yu, in fact, had posted a ship without lights a little north of Rosendaël with the object of destroying the Prince's ship and chance of escape; and this ship, on hearing the row of rifles inland, had gone to scout for and had easily found the Prince's ship, though unlit. The Prince's snip, indeed, had had a six-pounder mounted in her, but was powerless against guns of so big-mouthed a sound as those now pounding her.

Hearing which, the Prince wriggled snakelike on his belly from his cagnard to go to see to the air-boat — the rifle-fire pattering rapidly as pattering typewriters at present, the two main-bodies pattering, and the two small parties pattering, too: so he got to the next hill-top inland unnoticed, down the next hollow, looked about, flew about — no air-boat.

Yet he was certain that this was about the spot of its descent....

He ran on to the next hollow — to the next — still no sign of it; and no bush anywhere that could half hide it; nor could he think that Oyone had escaped in it, for, having heard her screams, he believed her captured by Pilcher.

He could not conceive how the air-boat had disappeared.

And as he ran about wondering, he heard pantings and feet in the next hollow seaward, and creeping up to peep, saw some ten yellow men running every way, evidently seeking the air-boat (despatched by Li Ku Yu to guard her), and apparently as aghast as he was at her vanishing.

Some of them presently ran up toward his hill-top to search further; he then spurted serpentlike away on the belly, first northward and then seaward; and, in passing behind his firing five, butted upon Pilcher, who was running from the sea to rejoin the five.

“You, Pilcher? Got the girl?” leapt from the Prince’s lips.

“Gagged and tied up in one of the bathing-machines!”

“Good work, Pilcher” — the Prince’s under-look dwelt on him—” but the air-boat, man!”

“Couldn’t see it anywhere!”

“Now, how odd. Well, yacht’s gone, I expect. Am running to see if anything of boats left. Kill or catch Li Ku, if you love me” — he was gone.

Whereupon Pilcher, instead of running southward to rejoin the firing five, ran on inland, and then southward, and then seaward, so as to get behind the Li Ku Yu group, keeping afar in the dark, catching sights, meantime, of horses which had been galloped to the group round Li Ku, who doubtless found the spot hot for such as he. Anyway, before Pilcher could get to their back, Li Ku and four were a-horse, two falling as they mounted, three drumming the ground south-eastward.

These three passed within twenty yards of Pilcher, who hissed to himself: “The middle’s Li Ku — no missing!”

Another second and the lasso sang snake-songs in air, darting, and had a pigtail within its grip, dragging a man from his saddle; but like a magical Jack-in-the-box the man was back sitting within two ticks, as if sprung back by springs, so that he could not have let go his reins an instant; upon which Pilcher, seeing with astonishment the lasso coming back, shot sharp three bangs: but the horsemen vanished, apparently unharmed. He found the noose cut smooth as by a razor; and said bitterly to himself: "Oh, I wanted to be smart: I ought to have shot from the first."

Meantime, Li Ku Yu, in fleeing, must have felt quite at ease as to the Prince's ultimate capture, since the ship appointed to destroy the Prince's ship was now lying, visibly to the night-glass, at anchor in the offing; and, as to the two boats, the Prince could see no trace of them but some wreckage resting on the sea.

Decision had now to be quick: so quickly he shrilled a whistle of recall, and collecting his men behind the bathing-machines, which the shooting Chinese were chary of approaching, he spoke a few phrases, even as he stripped naked, and in two minutes they had widely scattered, were crawling over the sands, were in the water, swimming with revolvers, knives, hatchets in hand and teeth, far scattered and under-water, forty-three of them — sixteen from the sunk yacht, three boatmen, and the twenty-seven fighters, less three disappeared.

The ship, one of those Havre-Antwerp mail-boats, lay with a show of rouge over her funnels about three hundred yards south of the bathing-machines, a hundred yards out: and darkly, soundlessly, by roundabout routes, the swimmers drew near her.

Not a sound now on her: no sound but the shore Chinese still shooting from the dunes toward the bathing-machines, where no one was but Oyone.

And now the Prince and Pilcher are travelling up the anchor-chain like white night-flies; others are arriving fast; and that pigtail gazing over the port bow toward the dunes is drawing his last breaths here below, for suddenly a grain of sea-salt is lodged in his brain from a hatchet which chops it, as he silently dies; and the same with a little mate pacing the bridge, and a watch-keeper leaning under a dinghy — they die quite silently as the shade of the angel of death steals upon the sleeping and the wakeful alike through the ship; only once, far down, one echo like a gun-shot sounds; then three stokers surrender; and the ship is English.

Now a boat was rowed shoreward for the clothes in the bathing-machines, and for Oyone; the bodies were dropped into the sea; the dunes were sprinkled for fun with shell from two four-inch guns; steam hurriedly made; and the ship steered for English land, not wishing to have a Japanese battleship on her back.

“But the air-boat!” said the Prince half-way home. “Where was it? Ask, Pilcher — see what she says.”

So Pilcher, grinning, went down to Oyone lying on crimson cabin-cushions, the Prince hanging behind at the door; and said Pilcher: “You may just as well mention what became of the air-boat.”

She lay with her face buried; the spasmodic shivering of the ship at the screws shook her body; but she lifted herself a little to utter with a sullen sideward eye: “It is in one of those valleys not far from the fire. If you go back, you will find it.”

“No, we won’t go back,” remarked Pilcher.

Suddenly she was upright like a squirrel twisting, with: “Is this Your Royal Highness’s promise to an unfortunate girl?”

The Prince had uttered not one syllable to her, nor answered now, but a lavish blush bathed his face.

CHAPTER XIX

THE HOARD OF GOLD

BUT THE QUESTION now was: where to lock away Oyone?

These were days of scanty house-room, and of a care for half-pence among Kings. Sandringham, first closed, had then been handed over, half to the Imperial Family of Russia, half to the Austrian Emperor's throng. England was rich in crowned heads: one crowd herding at Windsor — Servia. Montenegro, Greece, Bavaria, Spain — while Italy, Norway, Denmark made merry at Osborne — let us not pry into their privy purses. The German Emperor held Balmoral, though the Princess Elizabeth, by a kind of right now, bided at Buckingham Palace: for she, when death was in men's minds, meditated still on marriage, and, by a steady activity of negotiation and a sending of telegrams, had now her Imperial parent's seal to her espousal to the Prince of Wales, and had kissed her ring like Kitty in a lane. The Prince, too, now lived at Buckingham Palace.

Our Civil List, meantime, had undergone much modification. The King, for one, had suggested a considerable reduction of his income, and had insisted. For no seer was needed to see that the break-up was so near, that it would quickly be a question of finding the shilling to pay the fighter. Treasury Bonds were light as air, Consols a vain thing, credit, public, private, dead — this before the irruption; after the European stampede into Britain, every day beheld civilisation more ailing, every midnight the passions of ten million men dealt her an added deathblow. Shops, mansions, banks were pillaged; a cracking of pistol-shots rang in the land.

In which case, nothing was left to be taxed but land; and Sir Bostock Henry, the Chancellor, suggested in his budget a 2s. 4½d. tax.

To this, however, the “owners” of England — some 2000 men — said in their hearts “No.”

They made no outcry, as previously when taxed by half-pennies; now they were in earnest, and quietly said “No.”

And having, of course, seen what was coming, they had leagued themselves into an essentially secret Landowners’ Protection League. So — that was four days after the capture of Oyone — they sent ambassadors to Li Ku Yu.

They were perfectly aware that, if the Prince of Wales managed to crush Li Ku Yu at sea, he would then be virtually Dictator of England; they were fairly certain that he would then take what at that date they still quite seriously called “their” land from them; and since the land-tax was to be spent in the repair of ships to fight Li Ku Yu, this gave a basis for negotiation: they sent ambassadors.

It was late in the night, the Prince was in his laboratory, transferred to Buckingham Palace — a room looking on the park — when his assistant, Sturge, handed him a letter come “by hand” from the Continent:

“To His Royal Highness, Prince Edward of Wales, The First, The Last. [Meaning “first and last “ son of his mother.]

“Let the Prince of Wales be aware that the landowners of Britain, having made overtures to Li Ku Yu, are in negotiation. Terms: Li Ku Yu to give guarantees as to their estates; they to refuse to pay tax.

“Li Ku Yu needs no aid from traitors: but does not reject their offers, having reasons for wishing to cheat them.

“From a Younger Brother to the Prince.”

Now, the passions of the Prince of Wales were volcanic: so away now he dashed the letter, violently enraged, and went ranging, light-footedly dodging among obstacles, just shaving bench-corners, saying: “No more dukes — no more lords — they’ve done it now — they’ve dug their own graves — no dukes — no crowd of little clown-kings...” but in the midst suddenly paused, pshawed, thought, “one mustn’t be incensed at lower types of life,” and now picked up the letter to pry at the writing, asking himself: “From him?” muttering, “Decent,” for some bits of it looked as if Li Ku Yu had designed to disguise his writing, but had been impatient of the pains.

He was still studying it, when Lord Percy Burnett — who had been sent to search for Eulalia’s remains, and had an interview for that hour — was announced. He entered looking very depressed, so that the Prince said at once: “Bad news; sit down; stab it in straight — used to it.”

“Only this,” said Lord Percy with a stir of the hand: “I have been a traitor.”

Silence.

“You in it, too?” the Prince cried out—” Oh, yes, I know all about it! — a Sky-Blue negotiation.”

“I came back from the Continent this morning, I and — someone.”

“You, Percy? A friend of mine? A Brockweir boy?” — the Prince was frowning piercingly.

“That is the fact. I am sorry. I thought I’d tell you, before—” he paused, staring at the ground with an expression of great depression.

“Seen Sky-Blue?”

“Yes.”

“But I can’t believe my ears!” — with passion—” I could forgive the rest! — but you, a cultivated intellect—”

“Teddy—”

“Teddy me no Teddy!”

Lord Percy bowed. “I was going to say, Sir — you speak of ‘a cultivated intellect,’ but possibly you do not quite fully realise the conditions. A boy of my caste may have quite strong impulses toward nobility of living, but, born into a hopelessly false position, what chance has he? If he can think a little, he pretty quickly realises that he is not an Englishman, but a true foreigner, as every parasite is a foreigner to the organism it fastens on — without a country — living on England, but never in England, having no social function, belonging to a mob of rent-pocketers, who only care for England for what they can get out of her, and are quite ready to throw England to the dogs the instant this jumps with what they imagine to be their self-interest — pure Jews, only, with their bad heredity, lacking the brains of Jews. What is a poor boy, so handicapped, to do? He remarks that his caste, living by a nefarious trade, must necessarily be men of a muddy conscience, and though, theoretically, a boy might have the mental strength to say, ‘Oh, this isn’t good enough, I’ll chuck the rent, and start on the square,’ — does he ever? Tolstoy did, but not by mental strength, but by quixotism of temperament. In the case of a sane boy, by the time he might have the sense to say that, he is already vitiated by his environment, his ideals dying or dead, his moral sense compromised. Thenceforth he is hopelessly in it — only one remedy, a bullet. And it’s not much good if his head’s ‘cultivated’ when the rest of him is stuck in mud.”

“Well, but I know,” said the Prince stepping petulantly about; “there’s a saying that ‘to understand is to pardon ‘; and, of course, I understand; and yet I can’t pardon. Really, you men have ‘done evil as you could’ — for centuries; and many men have sighed and died of you. And for what? If twenty million men live in bliss at the expense of twenty millions in misery, that mayn't be very 'just,' but I think there's much to be said for it; or if two thousand live in bliss at the expense of forty millions — or if one single man live in bliss — J think there's something to be said for it. But you men! You are as unacquainted with gladness of heart in your muggy comfort as the multitudes who moan under you, scarcely a little less ignorant, vulgar and crass yourselves than the classes you drag through ignorance, crassness and vulgarity. Wouldn't men blessed with one drop of generous blood, seeing this, have said long ago, 'No, let's throw it up, the game's not hall worth the candle'? But not you cowardly clowns: never, never, any generous temperature, or pretence of being gentlemen. Let twenty million women and children sink with bubbling shrieks within reach of your ear, if you but float with your clown-countess in your loathsome boat, then you can shower tips all round upon your bishop-boatmen, to keep men's mouths from shouting the shame of your meanness. Lately there has been a little light in the world round you: but you have deliberately elected to remain eighteenth-century barbarians. The sun is one of the stars of a constellation, and you persist in thinking that the universe ends five miles up where the sky is. Well, you've got me against you now, if we don't all go under. I have been dull in country-houses, hoping to influence you, and been ill of ennui among you at race-meetings — no more, by God. You can't influence wood but with an axe. You may mention it — it's no secret. And it won't be any good for anybody to come begging me for any money, because I won't give any."

"Quite so, Sir: though that may be embittering" — with an under-glance.

"Oh, you're a worthless lot," said the Prince, with a laugh: "embittering? If you shoot at me, you're sure to miss; if you stab at me, you probably don't know that the heart of mammals is on the left, and you'll stab on the right. Embittering? I should like to catch myself being affrighted at such blind mice."

"I hardly meant any threat, Sir — only to suggest some clemency. They — we — cherish the superstition that a little of the greatness of England is due to us—"

"The blindlings! — as though the littlest mouse of good could come out of a mountain of ignominy. What right have you to cherish superstitions? If you have never peeped into a history-book yourselves, ask somebody in the streets whether it is not in spite of the hissings and grins of you varlets that England is not still a sixteenth-century land? Inch by inch against you she has had to battle her bitter way; against every blessing to men you have darted to arms; every noble thing has found in you a foe, a delay, and a diluter. I say, cursed is the name of men of that sort; you're a worthless lot; blessed above men be the man who exterminates you."

"Well, so I say, too, Sir.... I only hope you do not include the Throne in the proposed overthrow."

"On the contrary, I support the Throne.... Because I'm a Prince, of course. Think that?"

"No, Sir, I do not think that."

"Like a publican who is theoretically in favour of public-houses, because he is a publican — what? Or a King who thinks well of monarchy, because son métier à est d'être roi? I am unable to conceive a baser being, or to believe that God ever gave birth to a dirtier dog. So you are right there — that's not why I support the Throne. Not that I support it much; but — it has something of a function, is pretty and historic, costs the country nothing — half-a-million — that is, nothing. To abolish it would cost far more energy than the abolition was worth! And there's a difference between one king, and two thousand kings, isn't there? Between one pound and two thousand pounds? Between one fire in a room which warms you, and two thousand which scorch you to ashes? Besides, there's this to be said for Monarchy, that any day a monarch may be born with light and eyes; and how splendid then the room to his elbow that the Throne will lend him! The same thing is true of aristocracy; but, then, the aristocrat's uneasy consciousness of unclean hands and of a false position keeps him from being ever anything much more than a rent-collector. Hence every class has produced great-like men, and quite two or three Kings have seen something new a little, done something a little memorable; but never one of you men, never, never one."

"I perfectly see, Sir," said Lord Percy, rising. "I wished, Sir, to let you know that there is a negotiation with Li Ku Yu, and that I am in it, You perceive, Sir, that I first betray the country I live on, and then I betray my confederates. I will say — good-night, Sir."

The Prince did not answer. The other passed through the doorway.

But as he vanished, the Prince dashed after, caught him in a passage, with, "I am willing to make it up, Percy."

Lord Percy bowed. "Your Royal Highness is very gracious."

"Rot. A man can do no more than repent. Shake hands!"

Their hands wrung together, and they parted.

But two hours later Lord Percy Burnett blew out his brains in a chamber in St James's Street; so that in a new embassy to the Continent on the next day another took his place.

Now, it appears that at this time Li Ku Yu felt some need of treasure; and Oyone had been captured just when about to lead him to the Six Millions. It was not, therefore, only on account of the air-boat (which had vanished as strangely from him as from the Prince), that he was eager to get Oyone free: for he needed the Six Millions for the knocking together of the inconceivable fleet of junks and barges soon to swarm the sea toward England. Hence, he (a born bargainer) said to the Landowners' League ambassadors: "You set me first free a girl named Oyone, and then we may come to terms."

But that was the Sphinx's riddle! no one having any notion where the Prince had put Oyone.

However, the handsome young Marquis of Tullibardine, who had at one time rather drawn the eye of the Princess Elizabeth, and was intimate with her, had an idea: and he, approaching the Princess, suggested that since this Oyone was said to be so beautiful, that might be rather a desirable-thing if she was set free from being the prisoner of a young Prince.

Now, it so happened that Oyone was in all the Princess Elizabeth's thoughts — ever since Oyone had made the statement that the Prince was "married" to Eulalia: for though the Princess could scarce believe that the Prince, if married, would have engaged himself to her, the mere statement was a seed of unease in her. She would not, then, have wept to be told that Eulalia was in heaven, and often wondered how Oyone was getting on.

Tullibardine, therefore, found her ears open. She whispered that she would try to find out where Oyone was kept; and thenceforth set herself to pry upon the Prince's steps.

One night when the Royal Family were chez eux after dinner, a card was handed to the Prince with the name of Commander Pilcher; and just then the Princess Elizabeth found occasion to step out before the Prince could.

She did not advance far; saw the Prince enter an apartment to Pilcher; and since in Courts the luck of the ear is indigenous, she luckily, en passant, could hear the Prince say: "I want you, Pilcher, to have one more try with this Oyone: I'll be with you in two minutes."

On which the Princess tripped back to the salon, muttered something to the Queen, was speedily out again, and then, her head in a wrap, was out of the palace, she and another looking both ways out of a cab in Constitution Hill.

She saw Pilcher and the Prince pass from the Park Gate in a brougham, and she followed slowly through the thronged thoroughfares — to “Ning Shou Kung.”

For the Prince had, without ceremony, turned out the Chinese occupants of “Ning Shou Kung,” given the gate a fresh lock, installed three retainers, and thrown Oyone into the room where he had moaned.

So now Pilcher sat on the stool where she had used to sit sewing before the hole in the door, while the Prince hung near, unseen, listening; and Pilcher renewed the offer — liberty within one week, if she would reveal in what kind of hiding-place she had contrived to secrete the air-boat.

Soon a voice spoke out of the gloom within, glum, low, slow, as if in soliloquy: “I am happy here. I no longer long for the insect’s wing of liberty. The world is vanity and wrapping-paper. I trample under my feet its sweets and its pomps that merely lead mortals into evil paths. My heart is changed and white as a virgin’s, and my eyes turn themselves toward Heaven. Here a Holy Sorrow is my paramour, and I am the compliant wife of Calamity. For nothing is good but to be good, and there is no carousing but in renouncing. I, for my part, envelop Pensiveness with my arms, I smother Moodiness with my kisses—”

“But the air-boat,” suggested Pilcher.

Now she was sharp! “I have told you that the Chinese have the air-boat! The instant I alighted Li Ku Yu sent men to take her—”

“No; not true,” said Pilcher, getting up; and he and the Prince went away, Suddenly, in twenty minutes more, the Princess Elizabeth was with her; and Oyone's heart started.

The three retainers — two men and a woman — had duly said, "Against orders," but the Princess had said, "I just wish to peep — the Prince needn't know," with an intimate manner; and their toadyism and her cajolery had readily opened her way to Oyone.

Oyone was like an escaped canary in the room, exclaiming: — Now I shall be free! free! I expected you, and you did not come!"

The Princess pressed a button in a bracelet, and produced a ray. "You must see that I daren't let you out. But there are others who may. We will see in time."

"Time? Not to-night?"

"No."

Oyone wrung her hands, asking at once: "Have you found out now that he is married to Eulalia Bayley?"

"That is nonsense. The Prince of Wales is definitely affianced to me."

"Then, he may think her dead! I told him in bragging, for I was angry-mad, that I had killed her, and — possibly — he thinks her dead. But she is quite alive in the East End! and he any moment may discover it, for she has in her possession an object which the police are eagerly seeking for for him — a black box, that he'd give his life to get—"

"What is in this box?"

"It is a kind of infernal machine," said Oyone, chary of mentioning the Redlike Ray: "let me free this night! Then I will get it, and he won't find her, even if she keeps alive, otherwise he must; and it is certain that they are married — she bragged of it — he admitted it — only there is some quarrel between them—"

Elizabeth was white. "Is this box her property?" she asked.

"No, it is mine."

“Then, I will get it for you.”

Oyone moaned; but then said: “Do so, then. But I am not sure that she has it — I saw her posting a parcel like it; but, if she has it, remember it is dangerous! it will blow Your Imperial Highness to pieces the size of a fly’s feet, if you handle it wrongly, or keep it without knowing its moods. So, will you bury it at once, to give to me — ?”

“And if it blows me into flies’ feet when I touch it?” suggested the Princess.

“Not if you hold it carefully by the sides.”

When they had discussed it a long time, Elizabeth set off for the East End with Eulalia’s address, to fumble through the drizzle of a dismal London blinking dully upon its muddled multitudes through half the old number of lamps, it being now about nine in the night.

But, once in the slum, Eulalia’s abode was obvious, for there on a pane was a square of paper pasted to say in three languages: “A Skilled Nurse Lives Here.”

And the door was open; a wondering woman told her “third floor back; she may be in, or she mayn’t”; and the Princess picked her way through swarms of children and sinister visages, thinking: “What a strange place!” At Eulalia’s door she listened, could hear nothing, rapped, no answer, passed in, and rayed a beam from her bracelet upon a wee oasis of daintiness within this wilderness — the wee bed lily-white, the Prince within a silver frame on the petty mantelpiece, a canary, and there on a chair a parcel which must be “the box.”

She tore the already torn wrapping to see that it was “black”; but then, on seeing, had a throe of fright....

If she held it “carefully by the sides,” it would be well: but which were “the sides”? The box was a cube! “Oh, no,” she breathed, and stood suspended near the door. Just then, for the third time in two minutes, she heard steps, for the third time fled out, and this time it was Eulalia.

They passed each other swiftly on the rickety stair, where it was not so dim but that Eulalia was aware with some amazement of fairy raiment in Tatter-land; had a fresh surprise in finding her door open; and, on lighting her lamp, a fresh surprise in spying the wrapping of the box more torn than before.

“This is funny!” she went, with a laugh.

And as that wrapping was no good any more for the post, she now tore it off, posited the box on the oilskin of her little table, and sat before it, for the first time wondering what was in the box — why it had been buried — and was of importance to “Taska.”

It looked like a kodak; there was a cap to it; if she moved that, perhaps she could see within....

But there was a paper pasted above the cap, and writing under the grime, which, when she held the lamp quite near, seemed to say: “Do Not Touch...”

Which was tempting to one’s curiosity. For who can help touching, when mysteriously told “Not Touch” like that? Eve touched, and suffered touching. No doubt there was money in it....

It was this probability that held her from touching when on the point of touching: for she had it in trust from the dead. “Better not,” she said at last.

She then laid out her shopping — bacon, cheese, and loaf — bacon no longer what it had been, nor bread, nor she any longer the fanciful Sappho, fanning the atmosphere with volleys of sighs, of her opulent times, spare diet having dispirited the love-wine in her vitals.

She was very poor: not that she lacked patients, for she was constantly occupied, but her patients did not pay. Her mother or sister had never answered her; and butter had become a Sunday luxury.

However, to the rich indigence is a spree, and she was just about to be infinitely rich.

For it chanced that she had been summoned to nurse a certain nut-brown young sailor named “Buddo,” a Berkshire boy, stabbed in a Commercial Street affray: which “Buddo” had conceived for her a passion, half amorous, half idolatrous: and the point was, that having lived five years at Shanghai, Buddo was a Chinaman among other things.

So when she had told him that she had a vast mass of gold in France, but the Chinese would have it now, his answer had been: “They won’t, miss: I could get it for you as sweet as kissing your hand.”

His plan was to go with a couple of mates in a large sail-barge— “get one for sixpence now,” he said — to a solitary spot on the French coast, he to land in Chinese disguise, the others to come home, and go back for him.

He would need some horses and carts, but he reckoned that £45 would see him through, if she could get it. The Chinese were pretty deep, but he an inch deeper still, could speak Chinese better than they, and it could be worked as sweet as a nut.

In going to her to show himself as a pigtail, he had been twice mobbed on the way.

Eulalia had then gone late in the night to Sir Robert Barrington to lay the plot before him; and, finding him suddenly aged ten years, let her head rest on his shoulder where he drew it.

“Will the Chinese be getting into England?” she breathed to him.

His forehead dropped. “Dear, I can see nothing to prevent it. The Prince of Wales is a great captain of ships, but cannot create ships. It is a question whether some even of those we have will be available: for while the Chinese preparations are near completion, we have an aristocracy refusing to be taxed—”

“Yes! I have wondered. Do these men by chance call themselves Englishmen?”

“They even think themselves Englishmen — at least, the more weak-headed among them. But, as things are, there is scarcely any machinery available against their combined resistance; the regunning of the Donnernde has had to be abandoned; and the Prince has enough to do to—”

“Yet he finds time to get engaged!”

“Yes. And here — frankly — Your Royal Highness is doing wrong. I do entreat you, dear, to release me immediately from this extremely difficult position. Not two hours since the Prince was with me — referred to your death — and for me to stand dumb and see him—”

“I cannot understand how he can think me dead, whatever this Oyone may have told him, considering that, just before, he heard me call him — answered me—”

“Hallucination! Boo-boo! And he reasons that, if it had been really you,’ it would have been you who released him. But it was the Princess Elizabeth, a young lady, I assure you, of quite superhuman acumen — in the Queen’s eyes at least. Hence he, in gratitude to her — to please the Queen—”

“Is the Queen at all times quite all-wise? He will hate this girl. And though Her Majesty has been pleased to speak of me as a miserable little woman—”

“Never mind that! One more glass? Yes?” — he had noted with passionate pain the soupçon of avarice with which she drank sherry now, and ate cake; insisted upon another glass; and then proceeded to discuss again the details of the “Buddo” Six Millions scheme, of which his judgment approved, though he prophesied that the whole hoard would hardly come to her hand. But to this she answered: “I think it will, every grain, if any comes: for I trust my rough Buddo not less than I would an angel. There are people essentially excellent — sincere, competent, proud —”

Sir Robert had bowed, with “That is very true, Your Royal Highness”; and he had lent her £45 for the adventure.

At that date of the Princess Elizabeth’s visit to the slum, the hoard was slowly moving over the Dover road in four old dust-carts for London....

They arrived before the house in the slum five days later when Eulalia was out, and there stood the faithful “Buddo,” wiping his perspiration — for two hours amid crowds of people who, had they conceived the least suspicion of what lay beneath those pieces of sail-cloth, would certainly have made short work of Germany’s Reichskriegsschatz.

Then came Eulalia, and, seeing, leapt in a glee to buss her Buddo on both brown cheeks; gave one greedy little peep beneath a tip of sail-cloth; and then, taking a letter from her pocket, said, “Now, you have to take it straight, with this letter, to Buckingham Palace: and remember this, whoever wants to know about the sender, you know nothing whatever.”

And “Buddo,” after one stare of amaze, cried out: “Right you are!” and rolled to a horse’s head to obey.

Tins grotesque procession of carts, on arriving before Buckingham Palace gates at three in the afternoon, was refused admittance. But the letter bored and bored a way to Her Majesty’s hand:

“To Her Most Gracious Majesty, the Queen.

“Your Majesty, I am venturing to present to the service of the country in its need (through Your Majesty’s most gracious hands) the German Six Millions, winch I lately discovered in France.

“Your Majesty’s loyal subject,

“AN IRISHWOMAN.”

The letter fell of its own weight out of Her Majesty's hand.

“Well!” her lips breathed; then, “listen to this” — she read out the letter — “or is it some hoax?”

“The carts are said to be before the palace, Ma'am,” answered a lady.

“Fly! Let the Prince know...”

She herself made haste, and the carts soon now found an entrée to the Quadrangle, to remain there for hours, the King, the Court, Ministers and everyone coming to visit and revisit them, picking up the bars, some of them bent and chipped from the bombing, “Buddo” still there, waiting for his strings of horses, scratching his pate in a pretence of idiocy at the hosts of questions poured upon him, everyone on the heights of delight, save Elizabeth, in whose upper lip was something white and spiteful, for this was German Gut, with “Reichskriegsschatz” stamped on it.

Six millions then was six hundred millions, and when someone said: “Who can have sent it? What boundless bounty!” the Princess was seen to smile omnisciently, secretly; and now someone asked someone: “Is it a German Princess who has presented this German treasure to Britain?” For it was fashionable at Court to discover ever deeper depths and meanings in the Princess.

Now, the Prince of Wales was aware (from Oyone) that Eulalia had known where the hoard had lain, and when he heard that the gift was from “An Irishwoman,” some half of a half of a something moved in the vague depths of him, and he said: “Show me this letter.”

The Queen was standing there by the carts with him, so was Elizabeth, when his eyes fell on the letter, and both noticed him going slowly pale, paler, to that paleness of the gold before them. For, though Eulalia had very carefully disguised the writing, she had a fantastic manner of making Her M's which emerged like murder; and he knew that she liked to call herself "Irish."...

To the Queen his pallor was all a mystery; but Elizabeth, seeing it, felt the world whirl away beneath her feet, with a feeling in her: "It comes from that girl... he thought her dead... and they are really married...."

But the Prince was left in utter doubt. When he took "Buddo" away to cross-examine, to tempt, to coax, to command him, Buddo proved even more ingeniously foolish than before: could tell nothing whatever of the lady, save that she was an elderly lady.

But when the Prince sent post-haste for Sir Robert Barrington to tell of it, he noted with a steady under-look of suspicion how the baronet's palm slowly rose toward his forehead, and thought: "He knows something...."

And felt something! for three days later the Queen received this confidential letter from the baronet:

"In venturing to pen this to Your Majesty, I commit something akin to a breach of trust. But, truth to tell, I am unable any longer to bear the strain of refraining from mentioning to Your Majesty the fact that I have reason to believe that the lady who has presented the Six Millions to the nation is living in want on a third-floor of that noisome whirlpool which Whitechapel now is.... Her address is 19 Chapel Street..."

This made Her Majesty moan; and she said: "Oh, this day I go myself to that woman...."

By this time the discovery of the Six Millions, and its presentation to the nation by a woman, was being bellowed by the papers, most of which continued to be published in shortened form; and since that unknown "Irishwoman" was the wonder and joy of the nation, which had lately raged at the fiasco of the Budget and the action of the aristocracy, it was quite in harmony with the mood of the moment that Her Majesty should decide to go herself to that idolised donor.

Yet she had a sense of disappointment at Sir Robert's letter: for an innuendo had worked its way to her — through all the Court — into the papers — that the real secret donor was a certain wonder-working Princess, whose detective acumen had already been proved in the discovery of the Prince's prison; the whisper was now all about the Court; subtle reasons were discovered by the subtle ones for the Princess signing herself "Irishwoman," not "Englishwoman"; the quick-eyed ones whispered that they had caught knowing looks passing between her and "Buddo"; the Princess had a smile of Isis, and, denying, did not deny it. Hence Her Majesty's sense of disappointment.

And the Princess got a scare on the day of Sir Robert's letter, when whispered by a maid-of-honour that Her Majesty was preparing to go herself to the giver!

"And what is this giver's address?" the Princess asked. "It is 19 Chapel Street, East."

Now she knew that Eulalia was the giver, and instantly was desperate.

"Well, I suppose I must speak out a little," she now said, "for I can't, after all, see the Queen flying off to Whitechapel for nothing. You, Lady Julia, whisper quickly to Her Majesty that you heard me say that I don't think her acumen here quite so keen as usual. Point out that Sir Robert Barrington must have got some false information somehow, and give Her Majesty this proof of it: that the giver can't be 'living in want' when, as Her Majesty knows, one whole bar of the gold has been taken out — over £8000. The giver can't be 'in want': whisper it, Lady Julia, to Her Majesty: but please do not whisper whom you imagine the giver is, for I know well whom you imagine."

Now, one complete bar of the gold had, really, been found missing — taken by Oyone that evening when Eulalia had seen Oyone in the wood. So that day Her Majesty, after all, made no descent upon Whitechapel; and that night it was generally known among the sager heads of the Court that it was the witch-Princess who was the donor: on hearing which that evening in the reel and rage of his preoccupation the Prince of Wales struck his forehead.

CHAPTER XX

THE SEA AND THE AIR

A PREOCCUPATION THAT was “a rage”: for the next day was necessarily a day of battle, and it was a case of the telephone, the telegraph, and quick spinning-round.

Britain, meantime, and her added population, saw in the darkness hardly any ray; perhaps the Prince himself saw none.

Of forty-three super-Dreadnoughts docked to be overhauled, twenty-three only were ready, ten American just come, three Brazilian, two Argentine, one Austrian, three Spanish; beside which, a tangle of Continental small-fry thronged Portsmouth Harbour, Swedish, Netherlands, German, French, Russian, together with five great greyhounds armed with six-inchers; these, and mosquitoes, were what white man had left to show.

On the other hand, it was known that fifty-five Japanese and Chinese, all over 16,000 tons, were patrolling the French coast from Havre to Calais; and that that day a forward movement of yellow man was due.

Twenty-five thousand red-coats massed upon the south coast — the guns of Dover — stood ready to make a row; and most Englishmen had quietly laid by some gun, or dub, or old sword, to die game with — wind against the sea-drift.

Leaden, then, in that day were the spirits of men. The circumstance that the earth was to traverse Tempel’s comet in three nights’ time, though there was said to be no kind of peril in the meeting, seems to have deepened the blackness of humanity's bile. Some black rain that fell during a period of midday gloom (due to fog), sent streams of people about the Italian Quarter careering with piercing screams through the streets, screaming "God's comet is upon us!" All along the edges of pavements the sight of lines of men was to be seen, men seated with their heads bent to their knees, done for, dumbly waiting. During which, a certain deranged curate rapidly became a known personage, journeying the streets in surplice and hood, preaching with his finger the finish of things. And Life began to be a stagnant thing, and to gangrene in that dark.

It was, then, with hearts draped in crape that men attempted to conduct services in churches at that afternoon hour of the navy's weighing; and it was in such spirits that the Prince himself left Spithead with his following of ships, manned mainly by the nucleus crews of old Fourth Division ships, by the residues of the Royal Fleet Reserve marine ratings, and by the Volunteer Reserve, consisting, this last, of men of the middle classes.

In a conference with captains and admirals the Prince had said: "Let us go and see: a sailors' grave is the sea; and it is sweeter to be eaten by a fish than by a worm."

So they set out: and, as if destiny intended that as little loss as possible should attend the landing of the millions of yellow men, a milky mist dimmed the sea.

They moved, then, close in single line ahead, pouring smokes sternwards which searchlights burning beneath the controls rolled in lurid beams, the ships' shapes fretted round with sprays — a spectral procession to the Prince looking poopwards from the Colossus bridge, they seeming as broad as they were long, dominant masses of majesty moving mutely to some mysterious deed or doom in the mood of some mysterious dream.

In succession a motor-pinnace, a hydroplane, and a destroyer came hastily in with news that the forefront of a floating locust-host was already four or five miles from the French coast, from St Valéry to Dunkirk, and that the Oriental navy was at present pacing the sea with its rear in the longitude of Hastings, and its front on Pevensey.

Then a mysterious wireless was received from a tiny cruiser-scout that the enemy were more numerous by five Dreadnoughts than had been estimated — a crushing message, incredible, until it was suggested that they might be the ships once hypocritically proffered to German purchase, and then asserted to be wrecked.

Then arrived the wireless that at the back of the enemy's line of battle was a 2000-ton yacht flying the Dragon-flag, to which the enemy's Admiral Commanding had been called to a conference — she probably bearing Li Ku Yu.

The floating host in junks, flats, and barges were said to be moving very slowly on, most with the help of oars, some with an elementary paddle-wheel astern in the fashion of Rouen river-barges. A ration of some green mess was being given out, and peals of laughter screaming across the sea from some of the craft.

A shadowy shape or two soon after this began to show ahead, the Prince at that moment up a control, gazing through marine glasses. His lips muttered. He span to order nine knots, and was glass-gazing again.

Immediately afterwards the shadows ahead vanished.

Now, it was evident that the enemy had no reason to be eager for an engagement. The few troops and coast-guns ranged against the locust-host, the few scores of submersibles lurking inshore, could not exclude the innumerable: so that, if the yellow fleet merely interposed itself between the white fleet and the locust-host until the landing should be accomplished, it had no other military object. Hence when the shadows vanished, the supposition that they shrank from a pitched battle was established.

So did the white fleet shrink: for even if the whole yellow fleet was sunk at the expense of the destruction of the white, nothing was gained: the locust-host would land.

Destruction, then, somehow, for life, but not mutual destruction, was the white man's captain's ticket; and destruction, somehow, for fun, but not mutual destruction was Li Ku Yu's ticket. They shunned each other.

And as the shadows vanished in mist the Prince had his plan. A hiss of "the mist!" was on his breath now. It was a white mist, for white men. When he span round, there was that in his eyes which was startling, and he looked taller. From nine knots he ordered five, and dropped down the tripod-steps.

At about the same time, however, Li Ku Yu, fourteen miles eastward, was in a yacht's crow's-nest, watching the execution by his Admiral of a stroke of strategy which he had inspired; and he, too, dropped his spy-glass from eyes that had lights of guile and triumph in them — he, too, in a glee at the mist, that from minute to minute thickened. It was a white mist, like white men dead.

As for the Prince, astern of his file of titans came an array of eighty-three small-craft of every sort, British and foreign, old ram-monitors, sloops, torpedo-gunboats, old Scotch coastguards, unarmoured cruisers, motherships, R.N. Reserve Merchant-cruisers, destroyers, torpilleurs, following for following's sake: all which by trumpet call running down nineteen miles of ocean he got rapidly mobilised into a stationary line abreast lying east-and-west, mixing with them twenty-five picket-boats fitted with dropping-gear for 14-inch torpedoes, and thirty-two hydroplanes with hundred-pound bombs; and he steamed thence leaving them heaving in serried series on the swell which gently heaved, secreted in haze, teeming with many hundreds of torpedoes, prepared for whoever might come rushing that way — prepared in perishing to perish amid a tremor of western Europe.

They were not, indeed, destined so to do, and end: for, far eastward, the trap which the Prince laid had been laid for him — still more effectively perhaps: but, if it had happened so, maybe they would have left a memory among men.

The Flag-ship signalled eighteen knots, her bow now south-east.

When next in contact with the enemy an hour later, the white ships were steaming west upon the yellow ships which were steaming east, both in single column line ahead, The Colossus, still at the head of her line, opened upon the shadow which the Ibuki was two miles away: opened in ghostly gong-shouts at which the white fog shivered; and a gun of the Ibuki's forward 12-inch battery cracked. But she did not answer; put her helm hard to starboard, and immediately was the rearward of a line flying under forced draught westward.

On which the Prince, like an omnipresent spirit flitting and filling the Colossus conning-tower, said to himself: "It isn't fighting they're after! I have them dead — Unless—" he sent his eyes out over the sea.

At that instant he was entering a region of sea where a twelve-mile line of submersibles lay submerged, to end him in one belch.

They did not depend upon periscopes to see, lest they should torpedo their own fleet, but had out telephone-buoys, awaiting a megaphone signal when the moment of action should come, the buoys being just awash — with slight chance that the white line-of-battle should spy them through the hazy air five hundred yards to starboard.

But in one of the submarines near the east end of the series the unforeseen was being transacted — a big boat of 800 tons with a 2000-mile surface-range, whose name had once been “E3” she having been British. She had once sunk, been resurrected, captured by the Japanese in the East; and something extraordinary that had happened in respect of her in a raid upon Melbourne Harbour had once caused her to be called “haunted.”

At any rate, the fog that day of battle apparently gave up all its ghosts to go into this boat. Five minutes after her sinking in the waiting line an accident had happened — the sea beginning to pour into the engine-room by the ventilation-mast valve — unaccountably! — the indicator pointing to the “shut” position.

This had been remedied — the stern ballast-tank half emptied, the inflow more than kept down by the bilge-pump — and the crew, under strict orders not to emerge to the surface, retreated into the midships section after closing the bulkhead.

But now they were shattered men all — from commander to artificer, the very spirit of panic rattling their teeth, blanching their cheeks. They could not speak — sat astare, waiting for what would happen next there in the lap of the sea.

Nothing happened — for five and twenty minutes: but then with wildhearts they were aware of vapours pouring, fumes of chloride; and now they were flying about like lunatics immured in a fire.

It is believed that the heeling may have upset acids in the accumulators, causing short-circuiting and the smouldering of vulcanite fittings; anyway, the lieutenant, himself a ghost, gave the order of retreat into the fourth (torpedo) section, determined not to emerge to the surface: and this was done.

But they had not been in there six minutes by the clock when, like a flock of mice, their hairs on end, they were fleeing out in a squealing squeeze; and now, wildly silent, but decided, they took matters into their own hands: and before long the boat was bobbing up to the top.

The Prince from the Colossus saw them madly springing from her at random into the sea about three points on his starboard bow.

Steering a point nearer to starboard, he spied a little of the line of telephone-buoys — with a baleful harsh heart which danced in him. And, looking now for it, his eyes descried, or divined, north of the buoys the shadow of the shadow of a ship — waiting to give the megaphone signal to the submarines.

He then pricked off four points to port. So did the enemy. And he pursued their rearmost ship two miles westward of the west end of the submarines; but in his attempt to push them still farther upon his trap, they turned upon him, and now heavy battle began — their aim being to turn him back upon their trap.

For fifteen minutes he showed fight, both lines breaking up to present broadsides in a hotch-potch of horrible brawling at hardly three thousand yards between near ships, he washing himself in hundreds of tons of sudden thunderings like ducks fluttering in puddle, for he loved the dreadful drench, watching the Ibuki cock her poop up a little more each moment, until she stood bow downward, and now her bowels rumbled with tumbling burn-lumber like Stromboli across the waters solemnly, and she sank; and the Kashima not far; and his own foremast with all its tackle lashed the water.

Now he fled east-by-south, leaving his Rio de Janeiro, his Odin, his Orion behind....

During this fighting, he had ordered twelve of his rear invisible ships to proceed north of the submarine row by its east end, in order to blow out of the water quickly, at withering close-quarters, before the hubbub of the main battle should lull, whatever enemy-ships were waiting there to give the megaphone signal to the submarines. And this had been duly done within the dim rooms of the mist — four of the enemy and five of the twelve being now foundering wrecks.

He, for his part, after reforming his line, started at his fullest speed east-by-south, with the yellow fleet in his wake.

And when the Colossus, now the rearmost of her line, was three miles east of the east end of the submarine row, he again turned west; engaged one enemy vessel in an almost momentary gush of gunshot; again threw their line westward; and they went leading him, always with a northward leaning, toward the submarine row.

In their former passage across the ambush of submarines, the ill-starred men had apparently dropped buoys which with disastrous accuracy now led their helms within a hundred yards of the submarine row; and when the sun was a blotch just above the horizon, and a shadow of night had already fallen, they lay stretched, a line ten to eleven miles long, along a twelve-mile line of submarines.

At the same time the Prince, coming west, two miles east, turned east with his line, to fly from the face of the immensity that impended. In those moments the dumbness of sun and sea and mist seemed a dumbness of shock and stound that such a thing should be about to be.

The British, in fleeing, could hear the megaphone of at least one of the six British which, appearing now at top speed out of the northern mist, went with obstreperous trumps of resurrection bawling along the row of telephone-buoys. “Come forth!” And twenty seconds later the air commenced to be in a dangerous state of wave-agitation, apparatus and plate to break, the plain of the sea to quaver and quake, rain to drip, and tremendous terrors to menace men.

And then that which the ear feared was suddenly come upon it; suddenly that which the tongue cannot utter was: mountains of overpowering sound that drowned men’s senses profounder down “than ever plummet sounded,” Alp-masses packed upon Cotopaxis of distracted clattering, like Arctic trumpeting rantings to Atlantic in the rumpus and rush of Jurassic dramas of disruption, terrorising rhetoric, reigning, long lasting....

For at least three Japanese torpedoes had pitched upon each of the Japanese ships — all at once; and on the farthest of the British ships eleven miles away every man dropped flat, slapped down by the blast.

Even to the floating locust-host far on the Normandy coast it suddenly seemed to be midnight bleak and stormy, their barges and flats wobbling on the water’s wash, while every English shop-window and window-pane between Deal and the Needles darted from its fastenings.

In London the Queen was seated alone in the gloaming over a gold brooch which she Was making, when she noticed that the tools jumped and shook; and a minute later there came to her a muttering like thunder, then some kind of thump, then rougher thundering that kept on, like a truck running a rough road.

Away in the East End Eulalia was attending to her canary, when the cage-glass began to shake, to be followed by the same sounds; and Oyone in her prison was washing her hands when the water rocked, and soon thunder was moaning, then a thump, then rougher thundering...

It was said to exercise a doleful effect on the soul like the tolling of a knell.

Oyone moved to her pigmy grate where she sat musing in the gathering gloom.

There was no fire, for it was warm, and, being better treated than she had treated the Prince, she had a lamp, and no need of the firelight.

So she sat in shadow, first wondering if there had been an earthquake, and then wondering how the battle had gone: for her wardress had gossiped to her that this was the day of days.

Presently she became aware of bells ringing carillons; and then, when she had been seated so about an hour, suddenly there reached her from somewhere a shriek, brief and muffled; then, near the stair-foot, a scuffling and shuffling of feet which cut short her breathing, and sent her peering through the hole in the door. In another minute six men in masks came running, one tried the lock with several keys of a bunch, and soon they were with her in the room.

“You are free,” said one.

“Who are you?” she asked.

“Don’t mind that. A motor waits you at the gate, and a boat at Dover. Be off.”

Her hands were at her hair, fast patting like her panting heart. In three minutes she was ready and running from her liberators, lest they should change — emissaries of the Landowners’ Protection League, to whom Oyone’s prison had been revealed by the Princess Elizabeth.

At the gate Oyone asked “Are you under my orders?” of her chauffeur, a man manifestly agitated, who said “yes,” and laughed to himself. She said:

“Drive fast to Chingford”; and, as he started, asked: “What is the matter with you? What are the bells for?”

“Don’t know?” said he, amazed: “didn’t feel the thunder? Yellow fleet wiped out, yellow swarm gone back, hundreds of thousands of them caught, gunned, run down — wireless — it’s over — it’s done — we’ll scrape through all right now.”

In an impulse she half lifted her parasol to hit him; then pinned her veil with agitated fingers, muttering: “He has the air — he will sleep on your skins this day week.”

Now it was night, they passing — where alone it was possible — through by-streets, though, even there advance was not easy, the world wondrously astir as with new birth, such a trump had summoned it from the old centuries to the new to come. It took her two horns to penetrate to the outskirts of Epping Forest.

All the way she had a boding of trouble; and there what she had dreaded ever since her imprisonment fell upon her: her cottage all dark — Chinnery gone.

It was not astonishing, since she, intending to come back, had left him with hardly any money. Anyway, he was vanished, the cottage haunted with the absence of his feet; where to seek him she could not conceive; and the possibilities of that vanishing planted her a stunned stone on her doorstep.

Then she dressed herself in reds and splendours, and leapt into the motor for Dover; and now her thought was: “Before all else I will quaff wine, I will be a wife.”

But the turbulence of Li Ku Yu’s bustle and momentum whirled her as in a whirlwind’s urgency the moment she entered his presence at Dunkirk. She had meant to sell the air-boat, now tenfold precious, for marriage, casting off bashfulness and delicacy; but the moment he asked her: “Where is the air-boat?” she, as if mesmerised, told him’

“It is on the dunes!”

“No.”

“It is” — she laughed—” come, you will find it.”

It was really there, quietly lying on the sands near the spot where so many men had sought it.

For she, when lassoed by Commander Pilcher, had been in the act of springing into it, but, dragged back, had just had the chance to dash down the ratchet-lever; and Pilcher’s fall upon his face had prevented him from seeing, what distance had prevented the others from seeing, the going up of the boat into the gloomy air.

Moreover, since the night had been quite motionless, Oyone had known that the boat would parachute down to about the same spot, after rising beyond the atmosphere probably, and exhausting the petrol in the little engine.

To fall like a famished man upon the boat Li Ku Yu banished all from round about him and his screw-drivers, spanners and wrenches: and in twenty minutes knew its whole simple truth. Now it was his for ever.

But he could find no time to thank the giver, who glanced in vain into his eyes for a glint of gratitude. The Channel tragedy had slapped him with a blast of shattering wind and glass which had gashed his chin, as he lay off Dunkirk, and he had said: “My signature!” but it had been another’s signature; and this had pestered and tenfold energised him. Thenceforth he gave man or woman no rest, in one second living two.

So at that morning hour of seven, after her night of travel, he had Oyone off by train to take men to the wood of the Six Millions; and at the Casino des Dimes door told her: “Make haste come — to go back to England.”

For the news of the vanishing of Chinnery from the cottage had much irritated him, especially as he had no news yet of the Redlike Ray and “Taska” from the ship despatched to America for it.

As for the Six Millions, though England had rung with its discovery and presentation to the nation, he had no knowledge of this, for between England and France was now a great gulf fixed; and the Landowners’ League ambassadors had, of course, been careful to tell nothing of it, since the English Chancellor’s lack of gold was their only basis of negotiation.

Nor had Oyone in her imprisonment heard one word of the Six Millions to-do: so that she bent her steps to the old wood with the old assurance that the gold was there, thinking: “When I give him this, he will have to marry me.”

But “her” gold was gone! and now she was an aristocrat without “his” land, a thing of shreds and patches, wretched, devilish, addicted to killing.

She went back humble that night to Li Ku Yu; and he said to her, very ungratefully: “You see! you fail” — judging her with his eye where he sat cross-legged in apricot on tiger-skins, encompassed with adjutants and aides.

Her head bent before him.

“Your boat is ready,” he then said in English: “and first — the ray! make certain whether the lady, Bayley, has it, has it not; then — Mr Chinnery: seek! Farewell.”

She, very tired, eyed him lingeringly under her eyes, before she said: “Farewell.”

CHAPTER XXI

THE DYING LIPS

THERE IN EULALIA'S chamber lay the ray ready for Oyone to enter and take; but, as to finding Chinnery, at the time of her start from France Chinnery was where she would never find him, Chinnery had made the scanty funds which she had left him last to within two days of her liberation; then had been breadless; the little servant had deserted him; and he had pottered forlorn.

Now, he had an income of his own, which, however, he had lost the habit of drawing upon ever since the air-boat raid, for Oyone had found means to prevent him, because, if he had, that would have been to reveal that he was not dead.

But now, poverty-struck, his Oyone flown, the lone man, after one day's want, resolved to walk to his bankers in Fleet Street, get a cheque-book, and draw money.

Well, it proved a terrible walk. He had known that he was living somewhere near London, but not quite where, did not think it would be far, and set out about eleven in the morning, hatless, for he could see no hat, asked his way, and walked and walked, anon resting on walls.

When he got to the populous parts, he began to fancy himself crack-brained, for the drama of humanity had been transacting itself almost without any knowledge or concern of his, and now for the first time his eyes lighted upon the turmoil of a London quite unlike the London he had known. At any rate, he was very unfitted to make his way through it; was pushed about and sandwiched; the beams of a hot and hazy day beat into his brain that reeled for hunger, for fatigue, for feebleness, and for burning thirst; and twice he fainted on the way.

But he knew that he must be at the bank before four, so with the remnants of that strength of soul which had been his, he trudged insistently, and found himself in Fleet Street about ten minutes to four.

But the bank-doors were closed. An Englishman told him that he thought that it had long since failed....

By this time he had a kind of sunstroke, his forehead branded red, he hardly any more in his right mind. Dementedly he set out to make back to his bed at Epping, and now he muttered as he trudged, and now he chuckled, his eyes glaring wild, his gait wandering, staggy. At the third street-corner eastward of Commercial Street he fell all his length in the centre of the street.

This was no uncommon thing, and there he lay unaided ten, twenty minutes amid the mêlée of footsteps, until Eulalia, making homewards, almost stepped upon him. When she bent over, she started, recognising him.

Now, she assumed that he, in collusion with Oyone, had stolen the Six Millions, but still moaned for him, stretched there so wrecked; wondered what she could do; remembered the underground den of a gay Hungarian girl whom she had nursed in Grayson Street near; and with her begging grace, by saying "he is my brother!" got some help.

He was taken down a narrow stair into a back-room twelve foot square, where it was difficult to see, and was put on the stupid bed, he breathing sterterously, she searching his pockets, and on finding not one farthing, thought, "The Six Millions did not do him much good."

She then loosened his collar, took off his boots, covered him up, left a note for the girl on his chest, and went away to her lodging.

It was then, while she was attending to her canary, that the cage was shaken, and there was thunder, then a thump, then rougher thundering....

An hour later she went back with digitalis and gruel, to find the Hungarian standing arms akimbo over him, inclined to grumble: but Eulalia gained her, making an arrangement to share her bed with her.

Chinnery was still unconscious, and though, when he had been fed, his eyes opened and presently recognised Eulalia, she understood that he was dying.

She sat an hour with him, he grasping her hand, as the drowning do, and the next day thrice came with nourishment and brandy, and sat by him. Near seven in the evening she decided to say: "I think you will die."

"To-night, I think," said he.

"You are not afraid?" said she.

"Why, no," said he: "of what?"

"Of dying," said she.

"Why, no, dear," said he: "I shall die almost painlessly."

"But," said she, still thinking of the Six Millions, "have you never committed any sins?"

"Sins?" said he, with a look of alarm: "why, dear one, no. Such a thing as a 'sin' is not possible in the cosmos. Everything is just-so for the time being, don't you know? or it would not be a cosmos, but a disorder."

"Oh, well, no doubt you know more about that than I. But tell me this: would you not like to see your friend?"

"The Prince of Wales?"

"Yes."

“I should much. But I must not ask him, dear, for I have asked him before in vain.”

“That is strange.... He thinks so highly of no one else, I know. And he is at home, just back from crushing the Chinese power on the sea. If you had been conscious yesterday evening you would have felt it: there never was half such an awful thing on earth, they say—”

“No, he will rush to you, if you can write. I have a pencil, and this notebook — only, you won’t say that you’ve seen me, will you?”

He shrank with alarm when she presented the pencil, but when she pressed him, partly for herself, that she might listen to the visitor’s voice from the front apartment, he caught at the pencil, and with the scrawl of an old man, she holding the candle, wrote.

“DEAR TEDDY: I am dying. Are you interested physiologically?

RICHARD CHINNERY.”

She added the address in print-letters, folded, directed it, wrote over the address: “From Mr Chinnery” ran to find the Hungarian, sent her in a cab, and came back to see Chinnery now asleep.

Now not twenty seconds could she sit still, but was up and down, making snug, tugging the bed-clothes, snuffing the taper, as pale as its paleness.

And all at once, long, long before she expected him, he was upon her, his voice suddenly on the stair, addressing the Hungarian, her escape utterly cut off! “Oh, God!” she gasped distractedly, her frocks darting frantically about the little apartment, filling it — for one second; in the next she was on her face under the bed — there was nowhere else! — and, as her dress disappeared under, he entered.

Chinnery slept.

The Prince, in pea-jacket and cap, sat on the chair, which lacked a back, and, taking up the candlestick from a box, held it over the face on the bed — a bed very begrimed, the pillow greasy, Chinnery's cheeks very hollow, his forehead blanched as alabaster, like a young prophet, and son of the prophets, prostrate in poverties and sorrows. The Prince's face suddenly convulsed....

“Girl!” he called low, and when the Hungarian looked in: “where is this nurse you spoke of.”

That heart beneath the bed was beating quick as cats' feet twinkling.

“She must be gone, sir,” the girl said.

When he again looked down Chinnery was smiling with him, and his bent ear, deaf since the battle, could hear: “Well, Teddy.”

“Well, Richard,” he said.

“Thanks, Teddy.”

“Richard, why have you kept so dark from me?”

“Who has? I wrote you twice.”

“Ah! I did not know.”

“Well, here you are now.... I have been much darkened and afflicted....”

“Richard, listen: you have to collect yourself. The girl who has your air-boat, who was my prisoner, has escaped, and the Orientals are likely to overwhelm us in it: you have to tell me its structure, and of your ray.”

“Which ray?”

“Ah, Richard, you must—”

“There's some brandy under the pillow....”

The Prince held it to the dying lips, saying: “Now, Richard, while you can. The air-boat — I have made a model, and it wouldn't budge—”

“Why wouldn’t it? A magnet, a keeper, the lower lines through the keeper ‘doing work’ on a little armature, whose current goes to the magnet-coils — have you a pencil?”

The Prince’s palm lifted toward his forehead as a sudden half-light struck him. He quickly produced pencil and paper; Chinnery drew a few lines; and suddenly was anew asleep.

At the same time the candle began to flicker, so the Prince stole to the door to send off his second gentleman for candles and brandy; then sat again; and presently again Chinnery said: “Well, Teddy.”

“Now, Richard, the ray,” said the Prince....

“Ray?”

“Richard, your Redlike Ray.”

“Ah, my Redlike Ray! Did I tell you of it? There are still far more X-rays than known rays in nature, I think — still half of even the solar spectrum unknown. I got a ray with only 397 millions of millions of vibrations a second — almost not with Herschellian rays — resembling the two lines of rubidium, but quite faint, and paralysing to the optic nerve-ends. It is in a black box in the Horseferry Road — or was: I think my Oyone told me.... She has left me! she is gone. I have had much religious joy of her, though, I confess, she has not been invariably gentle to me. But one should be careful of the cap and wear violet goggles, for its dropping switches on the little flame-arc that has salts of yttrium and erbium mixed with the silvers. Then the rays are decomposed by a lens of ruby of high refractive index, and are then passed, polarised, through three lævo-rotatory — Have you a pencil? Perhaps...”

His breath was at present puffing very bluffly at his lips; but instantly the pencil was in his fingers, the Prince bringing the flickering candle to bear with one hand, supporting the paper on his other palm; and the drawing began, with letterings, cyphers, chemical signs, here and there, the Prince a breathless thing in the momentous dumbness of those moments, broken only by the breath of death and the remote drone of London. Suddenly the candle-light darted away, and left darkness behind it.

Chinnery sighed and dropped back; the Prince groaned.

He had no matches; none in the candlestick. He went groaning, groping. "Girl!" he groaned. There was no answer. "Oh, no matches," he moaned. Eulalia carefully pushed forth a box of matches beyond the bed-clothes; but he did not know.

Anyway, he felt, it was too late now; and, hearing Chinnery speaking to himself, he moved to him, stumbling with a moan against the soap-box before he could discover the chair.

Now his near ear could just hear Chinnery's dreamy speech, who seemed to be wandering a little, his tongue thick, half paralysed.... "Anaesthesia is merely a first step.... I believed that I should be able to change each pain, as an amputation, or travail, into a corresponding transport... But my Megosme interfered, and that, too, I neglected.... I have been flighty, self-pleasing, ill-mixed.... But soon, I think, God will give birth to good men... blessed be His name.... It was to be to smell what the microscope is to sight.... Drunken dancings to God.... When men of much light shall come... blessed be His name... He teaching dances to their heart... step-dances to their heart's heart.... I prophesy... for though He slays me, yet do I trust in Him.... Teddy, is it you...."

After this he said nothing audible to his friend's deafness, and just as a gentleman was dashing down the stair with candles and brandy, his breathing ceased.

CHAPTER XXII

THE RAY MIGRATES

NOW, THEN, FOR some days was the régime of air-boats, Chinnery's body still lying in its coffin in Buckingham Palace when twenty boats lay in the Park, the Prince and Sturge themselves winding, winding magnet-bobbins — without any very definite object! for it was a fairly certain thing that Li Ku Yu must have Oyone's air-boat; and air-boat-making ceased suddenly in England on the fourth day, when Pilcher and others who had been scouting over France in air-boats reported that hundreds of thousands of magnets were being turned out at every "forges et chantiers" — de la Seyne, de la Gironde, de la Méditerranée — at Châlons-sur-Saône, at Rochefort, at Cherbourg: whereupon the Prince set himself to make the ray.

He worked in those days under the eyes of the Princess Elizabeth: for along one wall of his workshop ran a gallery aloft fronted with big-bellied balusters of old stone, through which one could peep down without being seen; and thence day after day, midnight after midnight, in patient vigil, peeped the Princess down: for the Prince of Wales was strange to her in those days — stiff, stiff, and still.

She suspected that he may have been told that she had visited Oyone at "Ning Shou Kung," suspected that he suspected that Oyone was free through her: and there in the deepest unease, often when the palace was deeply asleep, she sat peeping, peeping, keeping her eyes fixed upon his flying activities, he finding time neither to eat nor sleep.

By this time England, that had sung so glad a song at the damming of the flood, again knew, not only its doom, but almost the day of it.

Every hour air-boats and aeroplanes flew home with fresh news of the hosts of Chinese now shrieking like fowl of ill-omen under the clouds, undergoing air-training in every town and countryside from Ghent to Guyenne.

Already there had been shots exchanged between air-boat and air-boat; already three flocks of a dozen air-boats had appeared over London, and dropped rice-greens into men's eyes.

The destruction, then, was to be, not from below, but from the air, not an eruption, but a rain; and western man, knowing nothing of the Redlike Ray, understood that the Prince was powerless now to save.

He, for his part, reckoned from the reports sent him from Aldershot that the rain would be during the night of Friday the 9th of May; and he reckoned, by restless effort, to have the ray ready by the noon of Tuesday, the 6th of May — in time to send a letter to Li Ku Yu.

But he and Sturge worked with a blackness of uncertainty in their hearts. At least half of the apparatus they were making was being made, not in reliance upon known truth, but in reliance upon likelihoods.

And by the noon of that fatal Tuesday Oyone's steamer was speedily approaching the English coast near Deal, in haste for Eulalia and the Redlike Ray.

Oyone had started from France days before, on the very night of Chinnery's death, but had not steamed nine miles when she had been sighted by the third-class cruiser with a twenty-knot speed; and now — a chase.

Oyone's yacht had finally escaped among the Scheldt channels, and she had since been a shrinking prisoner on the sea, till now by dodgings she saw the English cliffs; and instantly on landing was off by motor for 19 Chapel Street, Whitechapel.

Before that hour, about noon, the Queen had come into the workshop to see if the work was finished — not knowing what was being made, for her son would tell no one, but knowing that it was something immensely momentous. She laid her hand on his shirt-sleeve at the bench to murmur: “Not finished?”

He did not look at her. “No, Mother.”

“I have brought you these delicious little sandwiches.”

His deafened sense caught “sandwiches,” and now for the first time in his life he was intolerant of her. “Oh, Mother, for God’s sake!” he said with a very intense fret’ fulness of nettle-rash; and now her paled face went paler, and out mouse-mute she moved.

He nor Sturge ate; at six the work was not finished; at eight it was not finished; at nine it was near completion; at nineteen past it was finished.

Now the two faces were like ghost-faces down there in the light’s glow, their frames in a tremblement resembling the make-and-break of electric bells that tremble, as they flew about the room, mute but for a breath tossed anon from one to the other, while Elizabeth wondered, peeping through balusters above....

Now was the moment of testing. They had a little black cat at hand, so after locking all doors, they set her on a chair and ran, the Prince with two strings, to the remotest part of the room behind their black box on the bench; and there, their backs toward the box, the Prince pulled: the cap slipped down; a pencil of rays shot from the orifice upon the cat.

Dumbly now they hung some moments, though their hearts in their bosoms blabbed like tongues; and suddenly in those mute moments the cat mewed.

The Prince pulled the other string: toward her they flew; and, to their sorrow, saw her washing her chops with her paw... cynic.

“Puss, puss, come,” went Sturge, and she ran straight to him.

The Prince sat on her chair siffling through his teeth-edges, calm now, but blanched like chalk.

At that moment Oyone’s motor was already in Southeast London, travelling fast toward the ray, her chauffeur a Japanese from the Continent.

But it happened so that now, as the Prince sat there siffling his hymn, a pressing visitor was announced, and presently the Chief Commissioner was there, saying: “The nurse who was observed carrying a black box has been unearthed, Sir. The box is now actually on a chair in her third-floor back room at No. 19 Chapel Street, East.

Whether it is the black box — it has a cap—”

“It is it!” — the Prince had sprung to his feet—” I’ll go myself. ‘Phone, Sturge, to the stables.”

But before that word “stables” the Princess Elizabeth was away flying, wild and white, and quickly was at the Queen’s knees, entreating her: “Teddy has discovered that girl — all is up with my life — has had out men seeking her — and oh, I know — I know — in ways unknown to Your Majesty — that he will surely marry, if he once finds her — as he must now — unless — Mother — you graciously intervene. Go yourself — you and I — only it must be instantly — he has telephoned — if you bring her here, he will never find — everywhere else he will now—” “Come,” said Her Majesty.

Wraps on heads, hand in hand, they ran.

Just outside the palace-front they chanced upon a cab, dashed down the Mall; and as they dashed past the Admiralty, the Prince dashed after in a brougham, Oyone at that moment motoring past the Elephant, between which and Blackfriars Bridge three people were injured by the speed of her wheels.

Now, the Prince's cylinders had more horse-power than his mother's, and all along the expanse of the Mall he rapidly overtook her, even though she, on cautiously looking, thought she saw him coming, and incited her driver to his highest speed, pleading, "You know me — the Queen — please — please—"

But once out in the Strand throng, the two were on a more equal footing, both being forced to forge slower through the misty and muddy multitudes; and beyond the Charing Cross Hotel the Queen just escaped what befel the Prince — a fallen horse, round which the crowd thickened like a boil in the blood's circulation; and no side-street was there....

Nor was he aware that there was any race or very special necessity for haste, or he would certainly have turned back, or driven through the screams of men and women. But he waited.

So the mother got well ahead, dashing into Chapel Street six minutes in advance of the son — a shudder now in Elizabeth's nerves lest Her Majesty, on observing the street-name and house-number, should remember that this was the very address of the Six Million donor as given by Sir Robert Barrington. But her Majesty had other troubles, as they dashed into the drab caravanserai.

Eulalia sat by her table and lamp, letting her eyes rest on a Pippa Passes that had passed in her pocket through European bloodshed, through her Chinese nightmare, through the air, when — a thumping at her door — the door flung open — and before her the Queen — and peering over the Queen's shoulder the Princess Elizabeth's speculative spectacles....

"I am here to take you away" — from the Queen— "no time to explain — for the good of the State — your country, to which you owe everything — will you come?”

A stare!

“Will you come?”

“I — suppose so, Ma’am” — with a glance toward a soap-box containing underclothes.

“What’s in the box? Clothes? Leave those! Come—”

“My canary—”

“Bring that — quickly—” popping upon Eulalia’s head a forage-cap which she saw while Eulalia was taking the cage; which done, Eulalia cast a parting look round, spied her “Taska’s” black box, caught that up, and with the ray and her packet of letters under her right arm, the cage hanging in her left, the forage-cap cocked awry over her right eye, they were gone, like straws caught on cyclonic storms.

By which time the Prince, having passed Aldgate, was pretty near.

And down at the house-door there was delay — through Oyone, just come: for when the Queen reached the door, it was to near her chauffeur screaming to Oyone’s chauffeur:

“Are you drunk, or what?” the latter having shocked end-on upon the Royal cab’s engine.

And as Her Majesty stepped into her cab, and then Eulalia, out jumped Oyone from her motor, and saw the face of Elizabeth, just stepping in, in the off-shine of a wall-lamp; and she ran to Elizabeth saying: “ — ? I have wished to speak—”

But as Elizabeth turned to her, the Queen’s face was out with “Make haste! Who is this?” — and Oyone, with a starting heart, recognised the Queen, instantly thinking: “She here? What for? the ray?”

The cab moved before she had had an instant’s chance to peer within and see Eulalia and the ray; but before the Queen’s head was withdrawn, Oyone had cut a face of venom and disdain at her.

If, now, the Royal cab had run west, it must have met the Prince, but it ran east, then north, then west, the Princess's glasses, meantime, throwing ogles of distrust at the black box, not half liking the idea of being blown into "flies' feet," even with the Queen for companion. —

Meantime, Oyone flew inward with wings, up the stair — resolved, if the box was absent, to follow the Royal cab, and, if necessary, lay dead....

Without ceremony she rushed into Eulalia's chamber — plied a hundred eyes — not there — and down she rushed....

Causing the Prince's heart to start! who was just near enough now to the house-door to see her heels pitching into her carriage; and, instantly convinced that she had the ray, he and Sturge were after her, as her car turned eastward, whither she had seen the Queen's car speed.

Now, she in rushing out of doors had noticed his motor and him looking out of it a second before his recognition of her had leapt into a conscious recognition: so, seeing him follow to capture her, she leant out, sent two rapid shots at his car, and dashed off, scattering the throng from her path.

The Prince's car ran into wall on the right, and was smashed, his chauffeur's right arm fractured; and he pursued on foot, till Oyone's motor disappeared, then ceased.

When he and Sturge spurted up to the "third-floor-back," it was to discover nothing — a nurse's coif, tips of little slippers peeping, Pippa Passes, a poor cupboard, a nightdress nicely folded, a photo of the Prince in silver... more fay than ray....

And Oyone herself failed to discover the Royal cab, which arrived safely at the palace.

CHAPTER XXIII

INTO WHOSE HANDS?

“THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH and I,” said Her Majesty I in a high-up chamber on the west palace-side, “are both clever with our needles, so we have plotted together to make you up some lovely dresses with our own fingers, if you will let us — simple but chic. For we consider that it was amiable and good of you to put yourself into my hands, as you have.”

Eulalia curtsied, silent, standing withdrawn, mysteries of pride hiding in her eyes, she understanding that she was being patronised, and condoned, and graciously tolerated, since she was graceful and an interesting little sinner.

So now was the régime of the tape, the fashion-plate, the scissors, the prettiest mousselines. A trunkful of fairy linens had already come from (Irish!) Yvonne’s, toilet-things from Bond Street. The Princess Elizabeth measured with tape and spectacles. Eulalia was to be made a thing to kiss the fingers at. It was the Queen’s will.

And as they came out, in went the lady-in-waiting, Lady Julia Newcome, to amuse and be amiable, for Eulalia was never left alone; while outside Her Majesty cast up hand and eyes, sighing: “She is pretty!”

Whereat the Princess had an unease: for the Queen, with all her moral severity, was very well known to be amorous, prone to fancies and fads and favouritisms, often capricious, inconstant, incalculable: and that she should acquire the same taste as her son in respect of Eulalia was not a desirable thing to the Princess, who was now inwardly convinced that Eulalia was a wife.

“How long do you intend her to be here, Mother?” she asked, cutting muslin over the Last Supper at the centre of the satin tablecover in the “Newmarket Parlour” (with three horse-scenes by Wootton) — a favourite retreat of the Queen, a small room, nicely proportioned, lighted by a bay looking west upon the Park, with a north lobby.

The Queen, vacantly staring, presently murmured: “How long will I keep you here, or myself? Whatever it was he was making, he has failed in. He sits like a stone Achilles; no one ventures to address him.... It is well that you take it stoically....”

The Princess now sat down near on a Chancellor of the Exchequer chest (in which Chancellors kept their cash before the age of cheques), and, poring with her spectacles on the Queen, came out with the statement: “Your Majesty, I am not at all afraid of the Chinese.”

At the moment the Queen seemed not to hear, moving her head musingly up and down a little, lost in despondency; and the Princess continued: “Not that I am sublime... but that I have special knowledge. I know what Teddy was making — a machine to blow thousands of men into quite tiny pieces in a minute; and I have only stood by and seen him fail in it, in order to show him clearly that I am a little worthy of him, in order that I, in the day of his failure, might step in and say, ‘Teddy, here is the thing ready made which you have tried to make, and failed to make.’”

At this the Queen started! for it has already been shown, in regard to the charlatanism of this young lady, that there is absolutely no limit to the superstitiousness of men — even of men of some clearness of vision — when the intellect is once predisposed, infected and mesmerised toward a particular creed and epidemic of belief.

The Princess, for her part, knew from Oyone that Eulalia's black box "blew one into flies' feet"; knew that Oyone was eager to seize it; had noted that the box made in the Prince's workshop was exactly like it; and felt that she would have little difficulty in winning the box from Eulalia, who, in her present bashful situation, had a natural tendency to be affable.

As to the Queen, she had seen without seeing Eulalia's black box like a kodak, nor had seen at all the black box in the Prince's workshop. She was instantly leaning keenly toward the Princess, breathing: "Tell me, dear...

"I just say so much to comfort you, Mother," replied the other with her smile of Isis: "I am not at present prepared to reveal more — except to express the confidence I feel that Teddy, with the help of what I have been able to divine and discover, will find himself quite competent to cope with all these horrors, and many more. On, I take no credit to myself! — I know now that there is Something that prompts me, whispers me, like Socrates' daimon — yes, Something, Something. But, as to the girl, send her quickly to America, Mother! Suppose — just suppose — that Teddy were to discover her here!"

"She is pretty!" sighed the Queen, vacantly staring at a row of miniatures of the Prince on an old-oak console-table by the hearthplace; then suddenly: "Give her this from me! — that will flatter her," taking a silver-gilt rose-water dish, engraved with lion and unicorn, from a Queen Anne cabinet.

"Very well" — from the Princess—" though we must not make her think herself a saint."

"She is not depraved!" said the Queen quickly—" se voit. What I cannot understand is her motive for keeping herself so completely from him, that he had to be seeking her; she, meantime, a Prince's light o' love, living in penury in the East End! The thing baffles me!"

“He tired of her — that’s it. Such honeys are only delicious for a day, Mother: then men cast them aside.”

“How do you — know?”

“From my study of life! Studiosa sum, Mother, nulla studia a me aliéna puto.”

“Very good: let us say, then, that he tired of her; that she resented it; fled from him, hid from him; and that he then repented and sought her afresh. But all this does not explain her poverty! Had he never lavished any presents upon her? Why did she go as a war-nurse? I cannot understand! — unless she is supremely proud! And pride is never depraved.”

“Of course not. But it is pitiful that women must reap as men have sown.”

“And does not alter the peril of her being in England....”

“Well, but I have given orders for her passage next Wednesday.”

The Princess smiled. “Shall I go and try this on her? and give her the rose-water dish” — she went out by an east portal, up four steps into a north-and-south corridor, where, turning left, she passed under a draperied archway on to Eulalia’s apartments on her right. Demurely smiling, the Lady Julia Newcome came out when she went in. — ...

And presently the Princess was saying: “What is in that box of yours? Is it photographic?”

Eulalia answered: “I know nothing of it, except that I dug it out of the ground for a dead man, to send it to America.”

“Curious” — the Princess stood off, inspecting the fit of a bodice—” is it dangerous to touch, by chance?”

“Not that I know of — though it has marked on it, ‘Do Not Touch.’”

“Curious. Pick it up, let me see how you handle it.”

“There is no particular way,” said Eulalia, complacently raising it from a Louis XIV. writing-table where it lay.

“It strikes me as curious,” the Princess then remarked—” something scientific, maybe? You will no doubt permit me to take it to my apartments and analyse it a little.”

“If that pleases Your Imperial Highness.”

And the fitting went on.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE YELLOW DELUGE

AT THREE IN the afternoon of Friday, the ninth, fewer words probably were being spoken over the breadth of Britain than ever in a populous country before. Hundreds of thousands of the moneyed, the aristocrat, the royal, had migrated to Man and Ireland, where, too, was a silence that waited. But the British royal household had abided. As for the Prince of Wales, ever since the hour of the cremation of Chinnery it was as if a paralysis had taken possession of him.

At that hour of three the Princess Elizabeth had still not the Redlike Ray from Eulalia: and now all mortal things hung upon the vanity of this Teutonic fraulein, who sat with guilty tremors, putting off from hour to hour the revelation that might rescue the relics of western civilisation, in the hope of yet making that revelation in her own way.

When, on the Thursday morning, the Princess had gone to take up the box, Eulalia, after consenting, had said: "I think, after all, that I should prefer it not to be taken away, as I have it in trust...."

And it had been excruciatingly difficult for the Princess to ask again — the thinnest wall of delicacy now between her and the box, but a wall of steel.

But she had broken through it that same day, and afresh on the Friday: had asked afresh — with a scarlet flush.

And this made Eulalia stubborn. She remembered by this time that a coster-girl who had reminded her of Oyone had snatched the box, and also that she had seen Oyone speak to the Princess at the cab-door in Chapel Street, East. This made her stubborn. She resolved to 307 have the box packed and despatched to “Taska” before the Princess should again have a chance of asking. That was on the Friday at 11 A.M.

Accordingly, when the Princess then left her, Eulalia obtained paper from her maid, made up the box, and placed it on the shelf of the alabaster hearthplace of her central apartment, till the collector should pass.

Meantime, the Princess, in love now with loneliness, clung to her own apartments on the floor below, where she sat a staring stone, bitterly regretting her brag, a limp and guilty rag at the going, going of the moments, yet smitten with motionlessness.

But at four when the Queen, who was restlessly wandering, visited her some moments, the Princess pricked herself to sprightliness and careless smiles — knowing well all the time what the Queen had come to hear; and though Her Majesty did not directly refer to the promised “help,” she did say with a sigh: “Heaven knows what this night will bring forth for mankind.”

And since the charlatan is in every extremity and fix a charlatan, and in the last ditch dies a charlatan, the Princess now, with a bound of her rash heart, found herself in the thick of saying: “I think, Your Majesty, that, if Teddy will come to me at, say, six o’clock, I shall have something of value to put into his hands.”

But how to get it? From then to half-past five she sat the most agonised girl, probably, in all the agonised world.

At half-past five a Queen’s-page requested the Prince to visit Her Majesty in the Newmarket Parlour; and there for half-an-hour they sat, mother and son, hand in hand, with hardly the murmur of a word, and heard windy wet weather yearning in the Park.

At twenty to six Elizabeth sped like a spectre past Her Majesty's door to enter Eulalia's apartments, pallid, concentrated; resolved at all costs to have the box.

She saw the box packed, directed; knew that soon after the stroke of six it would be gone; but still she put off action, dallied, palely paced, dallied, declaring across the lump of aching in her throat that Eulalia looked lovely in the blue-festooned muslin, sole specimen from the loom, with the miniature at her throat of the Prince in Eton-jacket — a miniature which the Queen, to the scandal and whispering of several, had daringly presented to Eulalia in her daring way.

But at last when the clock was about to strike six, Elizabeth miserably found herself in the act of saying: "Oh, well, I am going to have the box, after all" — and had it.

But Eulalia stopped her. "Your Imperial Highness — please — put yourself in my place" — and laid hold of it.

"No, it is no good, you must."

"I must not" — and now a struggle of several seconds, which only the Princess's terror of an explosion ended; though, as she let go, she viciously tore the wrapping across, rendering it useless for the post, and Eulalia then petulantly tore the whole off, in placing the box back on the shelf.

They now stood confronted with rough sea-weather in their breasts, and discomposed countenances; and in a tone loud with hysteric stress the Princess said: "Your being here has made you insolent!"

Eulalia laughed!

And that laugh penetrated the still a little deaf ear of the Prince of Wales.

He, bidden by the Queen to go to Elizabeth's apartments "at six," was on the four steps outside the Newmarket Parlour, about to turn to the right, when, to the left — that laugh....

He made some steps that way, could hear voices, and went like one in a dream....

Meantime, the Queen, by some instinct or sense, seems to have gathered that he was going left instead of right, and ran with stealthy steps to see. He was then between the arch-draperies, walking like a sleep-walker drenched in dream, and she, struck with sudden apprehension, lifted up her voice at him: "Why that way?"

He took no notice, possibly did not even hear; and suddenly out of her throat there broke a hoarse roar of horror and terror like a death-cry: "Teddy, in!" — for his hand was on a door handle.

But in he went, and she, swiftly flitting, was in almost as soon as he.

There in the middle stood a muslin Eulalia, like a picture of tripping Spring, and Flora picking roses, and there the Princess, and there the Redlike Ray.

In the instant that the Prince saw Eulalia with one eye he saw the ray tied with string, with the other; and lightning struck into his consciousness the thought: "She was 'the nurse' ..."

And for the tenth of a second he stood suspended, pulled toward her, pulled toward the ray, but then flew to her to kneel an instant in a scarlet passion, clasping her, with "My love! my luck! my star! my lucky star! my love! my luck!" then was up, and he and the box vanished together.

Within some minutes he had struck a dog blind, and was in an ulster in the air with Sturge and Pilcher, a wet and windy air which threatened a wild night; and before they dropped him at the Lord Warden, Dover, he had handed them a note for Dunkirk:

“To His Excellency, Li Ku Yu. If Your Excellency likes to meet the Prince of Wales, alone, at nine o’clock, behind the ruins of St Mary’s, N.E. of Dover, something of moment to His Excellency will be told. His Excellency’s safety is hereby guaranteed.”

“But,” said Pilcher, “is this thing safe, Sir? You go alone — suppose he doesn’t.”

“You have no reason to think him treacherous,” answered the Prince.

“Still, Sir, we pray—” said Sturge.

“I’ll see,” the Prince said: “you go on.”

He passed into the hotel, as darkness fell, and the two flew on over a rough sea, sighting on the way five different air-boats apparently making for Britain.

At seven-forty they were standing in the Casino dancing-hall before Li Ku Yu, who sat high, smiling down upon some rite, round about him being the Chiam (High priest) and bouzis in hosts in a thronged hall all a hotch-potch of hues, like boxes of coloured chalks, or that coloured spectacle in prisms, or the coloured chemistry of iridium. The two were led quite up to him, and saw his head dotted with sweat.

He, on casting his eye over the note, had the instant thought: “Either he has the ray, or will pretend to”; then aloud: “You, Sturge? Glad to see you. I keep you two prisoners two hours.”

“This is outrageous!” cried out Pilcher in a maze and rage.

“Seize these men, feed, keep two hours,” Li Ku Yu murmured to a colonel, and was instantly off, soft-footed, swift, with swinging pigtail swaggering, slanting a wee bit backward on his heels like the Northern Chinese, down the bowed hall, and out.

In ten minutes he, too, was in an ulster in the air, and ten men in ulsters in his boat’s hold. (Hence he had kept Pilcher and Sturge, lest they should follow and watch his landing.)

The night, inclined to be foul, was almost without light, and in a quarter of an hour the knot of men were darkly disembarking south of St Margaret's Bay, where they hid themselves and their boat, while one alone, an agile young scout of the Choshus, darted up and southward to ferret out St Mary's ruins.

He was quickly back; and then, with elaborate stealths, crawling under hedges, through marshy mid-fields, they all darkly marauded, with more caution than haste, having forty minutes to spare. They were seven pigtailed, three Choshus, and Li Ku Yu.

He himself reconnoitred the ruins, noted which road the Prince must come, then gathered his gang to lie in wait behind a row of broken stones rankly grass-grown; and from one to the other he moved, stooping, breathing a secret: "Seize, not shoot; shoot, if need be."

But even as he breathed it to the ninth man, with a pang of the heart he acquired the consciousness that there, lying in wait, were not ten men, but eleven.

"Hands up! — quick, quick..."

"Bright!" cried Li Ku Yu recognising the cry of the Prince, who had long since slipped into the rear of the band in the dark.

"Drop your pistol."

Li Ku Yu dropped it.

The Prince, springing over the row of stones, his muzzle still at the other's bosom, said: "Right turn — walk": and they went stepping toward Dover, a pigtail not less long than Li Ku Yu's swinging behind the Prince's back, his face not less yellow-brown.

After some hundreds of yards, he muttered sullenly: "Immoral!"

Li Ku Yu, smiling quite unmoved, said: “Why, Prince? You guaranteed safety; I — no!”

The Prince now pocketed his pistol, saying, “I think I am as quick as Your Excellency” — a remark which brought a rush of blood to the other’s forehead. He made no answer.

Then, “Is Your Excellency disposed to sit here?” asked the Prince, and they sat on a mass of rock by the path under the shadow of a larch, but still lashed by squalls of wind and water.

There was silence. Then Li Ku Yu: “Let us be quick.”

“What is it all about?” said the Prince: “may one express to Your Excellency the surprise one feels that one is still ignorant of the casus belli of China against the white races? You declare no war; you invade; you butcher.”

“No time! But stay — hear. What one thing is it that concerns living beings — that living beings care about? Happiness? Agreed?”

“Good! And happiness consists in worshipping God? say in ‘religion.’ Agreed?”

“Yes.”

“Good! Now, the scientist denies that apes, negroes, bishops, bouziss, dervishes are religious; denies that anyone can possibly be religious — but him; since no one can have any knowledge of God — but him; denies that anyone knows what religion is — but him. And he is right — necessarily! Agreed?”

“Yes.”

“Good! Now, at my birth I observe two masses of men, equal in number — one white, one yellow; both having what they call ‘a religion’; but the brain of the yellow much more disengaged from his ‘religion,’ equally superstitious, but less deformed and diseased with superstition, less incapable of being led to look in a centric sane mood at the universe, and to be truly religious. So said I to myself: ‘The European brain will take two hundred years to evolve out of the notion that Christianity has some connection with religion, resemblance to’; and if one answer, ‘but already France, Germany, England had rejected Christianity,’ I answer back: ‘they think so!’ but for many days their mentation will be infected by the fact that for ages their fathers entertained the conceit that a mammal of their species, with 800 rudimentary organs, was the Infinite Itself. Imagine the astonishment of a zoologist of Mars to know that on some planet in space there paces an animal into whose head the disease of a conceit so eccentric could creep and fester. Man? Comic! the laughing-stock of the cosmos! So said I: ‘Save mankind two hundred years; abolish Europe.’”

“Well said,” said the Prince— “provided Your Excellency is sure of what you substitute. But what genius for discovering God’s truth have the Chinese given proof of?”

“Cluck! True! — none — little. But their brain older than the European — not more evolved — less! — but more mature for evolution.”

“I did not know that. I wonder if that is an opinion? for Your Excellency is aware that opinions have no value. Prove it, and I need not say that Your Excellency shall have your way unresisted by me.”

“An opinion gathered from many things! But, as to strict proof — no.”

“And for a concept which Your Excellency cannot prove you butcher a hundred million women and children.”

“Cluck! Our grandmothers’ thoughts, Prince. Is it wrong to kill an ox, a man?”

“You are said to ‘rob them of their life.’”

“Precisely! But it is wrong to rob of anything — why? Only because you make to suffer! to suffer long! Agreed? Good! But suffering implies consciousness! No wrong to rob, if the robbed-from is never conscious of it, or only conscious one second, as when you rob of life.”

“But the killer may suffer,” said the Prince.

“Ah! then! wrong! Wrong for me to kill a fly, for I suffer — so made! But not wrong to kill a flea, to kill two hundred million fleas or men for the least reason, for I do not suffer, they do not suffer — especially when done for the benefit of one! two! two hundred millions!”

“True,” said the Prince: “but I question ‘the benefit.’ That, you have admitted, is an opinion; I have the opposite — and Mr Chinnery’s Redlike Ray.”

Li Ku Yu started in the dark, made a grimace, sprang up. “Not civilised warfare, Prince!” — with a grin.

“No. Hence I asked Your Excellency to come, to tell you” — the Prince, too, stood up—” for since the white race seems to me a type capable of higher evolution than the yellow, I will not see it wiped out, if I can help. And you seem now to be in the hollow of my hand. Shall we not come to terms? Save your people from this — take them back to China!”

Silence ten seconds. Then Li Ku Yu: “Could not! — if I wished. The die cast! Had the ray from Chinnery, Prince?”

“No... Chinnery, by the way, is dead.”

Li Ku Yu snatched off his cap, bowed his brow. “Brockweir’s greatest!”

Silence.

Then: “I go, Prince. If — since — you possess this ray, we meet never more: for this night I invade England, I myself sharing the danger of my regiments. In case I fail, I will take dispositions to make it easier for you to deal with the Chinese, and resettle men. I wish you well.”

“Good-night.”

Li Ku Yu walked north in front of his fluttering ulster-skirts, while the Prince dropped, as if shot, prostrate upon the rock, sob upon sob of world-sorrow bursting from his breast like the night-winds' volleys, and water from his brain like the rain. And Li Ku Yu, who heard a sob on the squall, stopped, turned, murmured some words, and moved on.

As soon as he was back at Dunkirk he had Oyone alone in the old Cashier's-office, to whisper her: "Kill! — tonight — your chance! An Empire your reward!"

She had never beheld him pallid and agitated before, and catching pallor and passion from his potent emotion, flashed a defiant eye at him. "Why send — am afraid to be in the air in the dark over the ocean—"

"Look at a woman afraid of something!" — he pointed her out with his finger!—" yet dreaming of queenship! Be quick, lest I teach you fear! Whom have I to send that well knows his face? he may be painted yellow — he may be white—"

She seized his sleeve, kneeling, staring up into his face: "Marry me! I can't any more — marry me!"

On which he shrank in alarm as from a rat rushing up him, palms up, with "Woman!" and she sprang up with a high and tragic cry: "You do not want me?"

"To marry takes time!" he cried. "To-morrow! Tomorrow! He is at Dover —"

"To-morrow we may die blinded, though I will not mind, if to-night you marry me, for the earth and skies heard you promise it, and I have bitten you in every bit of my bread, and washed in you in my bath, and—" she broke down, dashing water from her eyes.

"So unless I marry, you do not go?"

She passionately stamped at him. "I say no!"

A dangerous look of bale shot toward her before he stood up bustlingly with, "Let us marry — come, come—"

But this, as he had foretold, took some time, so that she saw herself forced to be off some moments after the furtive and hurried contract in the Garden-kiosk; and when her eyes, that teemed with pleadings and wifely meekness, implored for a moment alone with him before her departure, he patted her back publicly, with, "You kiss Li Ku Yu another time, Oyone. No failure! Farewell!"

She started off with a little Japanese scout, sharp as a spaniel's snout, using her own old boat in which alone she felt herself at home, though half-way over to Dover she had a horrible shock, when the boat unaccountably dropped a hundred feet down, leaving her heart above. She had not been in it since Li Ku Yu had ransacked its mechanism, and her apprehension lest he should have flung it too hurriedly together again was very unpleasant, until she descended outside Dover.

There in a shed she dressed in male clothes, and as a boy in an ulster entered Dover, her nerves aburn with her husband's "No failure!" — she every five minutes shocked afresh with astonishment at finding herself a wife! his helper and high left hand! She laughed in the face of the rain. The night was not wilder nor the winds raged wistfuller than the strange and dangerous things that raged in her nature.

But she soon discovered that the Prince was no longer in Dover, was off to London by train, taking the ray — to get an air-boat, in fact, after waiting long in vain for Pilcher's and Sturge's return from Dunkirk; and he had gone as glad as vexed, thinking to see Eulalia a minute.

But he did not see her: for, as his cab was dashing through the Palace Park, there ran to meet him Pilcher and Sturge, who half drew revolvers at him, seeing a Chinaman.

“Where on earth have you been?” the Prince asked; and Pilcher answered: “Kept prisoners two hours, Sir — just come — missed you at Dover — invasion commenced — Chinese have set fire to three pine-woods between Ashford and Folkestone for signal-fires, and are at present alighting at the rate, we reckon, of twenty-five a minute with some camp-equipment.”

“Let’s go,” the Prince said, springing down, and in another minute was in the air.

By that time Oyone, following him to London, was flying north of Croydon, and her boat and his passed within two hundred yards of each other, though she did not spy it in the dusky air, for just then for the second time that night she had a shock of fright at the dropping two hundred feet of her boat. But, landing safe in St James’s Park amid drenching rain, she hid her boat, resumed her woman’s clothes, and now stood confronted with the task of discovering the Prince.

Beckoning that his train must by now have arrived in London, she was away to Marlborough House...

There a foreign sentry informed her that the Prince was at Buckingham Palace, whereupon she ran back to St James’s Park, and, taking her scout now, went up, to descend a little west of the lake in Buckingham Palace Park — an invasion of Royal rights based upon the fact that kings were invented before aeroplanes and air-boats were foreseen.

A second after she touched ground a drenched black figure in an oilskin cape came trotting, but dropped down dead with the scout’s kokotana in his heart.

The two then stood in bush, looking at the palace which had a few lights behind its blinds.

The problem still was to hit upon the Prince, the ray: for whereabouts in the vastness of the palace he would probably be Oyone had no notion.

But now up yonder across the central blind of the Newmarket Parlour she spied Her Majesty's shadow pass diademed: and she started; her clasp tightened on her knife.

"Kill her," she instantly thought, dark-hearted: "then hide; then he' ll run to her; then I'll have him."

"You see that window?" she now whispered her scout: "kill everything you meet between that arch where the sentry is and the room-door behind that window; stab, not shoot; hide the bodies; then be back to me."

The little Jap, quick-wristed as a twisting squirrel, instantly slipped off and vanished, until she saw him after a minute insinuate his nimble being into a palace-portal.

Oyone then waited ten minutes, till he was suddenly there with her anew, holding up four fingers close before her eyes — meaning two sentries, a gentleman-at-arms, a page; and she herself then sped away in front of her fluttering ulster-tail with a wet wan face, her hair fallen half-lax under her hard man's-hat.

But the hour of the Chinese invasion, which could not be postponed when once fixed, was against her otherwise good ruse to get at the Prince, since he was now three thousand feet in the air near Folkestone, leaving the Chinese signal-conflagrations glaring like eclipse and the midnight sun on the night below and behind' him, he making for mid-channel; and, mixed with the hubbub of the wind blustering by the boat's bow, was now a troubled sound of moaning and lamenting in the air.

Pilcher, steering, was grovelling at the hatchway, with violet-blue goggles, got from Sturge, at his eyes, and a bandage over the goggles which anon he lifted a little; Sturge, begoggled, was in the hold, and, acting as watch-keeper, anon peeped up to see that no boat got above them; and the Prince, begoggled, his eyes tight, lay on his face in the bows under the ray-box, which was bound to the stem, its cap bent somewhat downward.

And out of it for miles into the night, downward, skyward, to right, to left, spread the rain of rays, invisible at a distance, but appearing to one a little in front of the boat's prow as a little sprout and spray of rays reddening the night's denseness for nine or ten yards; nor was there any other light, only an Admiral Colomb lantern in the hold; and anon Pilcher directed an electric ray upon the compass a moment.

"We are over the sea, Sir," he sang out presently; and the Prince sang back: "I should go pretty slow now, zigzagging north-east and south-east."

Their voices noised in the dark like voices calling in song on some orb where there's no talking, but only song and moody emotion, the gale making them musical, the gloom, the restless rain, that sang together an anthem godlike sad. Though high aloft, they saw not a light in the sky; vapours fared westward in haste on their way over their heads; the blast ran brabbling past like the spattering breath of a benzoline brazing-lamp braying; the midget engine pistoned and spittled, the little carbons sparking a little anon like the anvil of Thor; and the red-like spray of rays reigned steadily there in heaven like a Divine Eye whose ire strikes sightless.

Presently the Prince sang out: "Hear anything odd?"

"No — what like?" Pilcher called.

"The wind too near in your ears perhaps," the Prince sang out: "to me distinct, a sound like distant towns. Ask Sturge."

Pilcher asked down the hatchway, and Sturge sang up: "I know what the Prince means — hear it every now and again — sort of universal murmur going on. There may be a hundred thousand of them about."

"How many do you see, Pilcher?" the Prince called.

Pilcher slipped up his bandage, turned his back to the ray, and, standing on the steps, called back: "Three in sight for the moment, Sir. Two astern fifty yards apart, one to starboard two hundred feet down. I have seen as many as six — we should see hundreds, I think, on another night. Everything is rather ghastly through the glasses — livid-like — poor devils."

A dumbness now among them some moments: until a thump and thud somewhere was heard, and Sturge, then on the steps glancing abroad, called out: "Two have bumped, and both gone tumbling, not forty yards to starboard! I thought there'd be some bumps."

"Can you see the sea?" sang out the Prince.

"No sign of it here, Sir." He shut his eyes in trouble, and went down.

"It seems monstrous, sir," called out Pilcher presently, "that your warning was disregarded!"

"I doubt if Li Ku Yu fully believed," the Prince sang back: "he said once 'if you have the ray,' then corrected to 'since you have' — to be polite! He may have felt that my warning might possibly be a trick and last resort. And he probably found himself compelled to make some attempt with some proportion of the intended numbers. But he is not a cruel mind."

"Hark!" sang out Pilcher now, and, listening, they could catch a song-sound like lo, lo, lo, lo, lo, babbled lamentably by some tongue not far below; then immediately from the east there reached them a screech which lasted a long while, and died away and away in a tailing song; and presently after this a pistol-shot from the northwest.

"A suicide, I suppose," called Pilcher — with probable truth, for very many were found on the ground with gun-wounds in different districts of England.

That night it was as if the skies rained a rain of flesh, as well as wet, not in Eastern England merely, but in the Midlands and West: for the air-boats still went on and on (until the engines were empty), when their helmsmen were sightless.

Many of the squads in the boats' holds appear to have been provided beforehand with bandages, and been told to look out for the rays, but were probably blinded before they saw any ray, or properly realised the possibility of being stricken blind; and of those in holds who escaped blindness by bandages few probably had any training in the handling of the boats.

But many thousands (who began to fall high enough) came down without accident, saved by the parachute-bottom, some of them not blinded; and with the morning's dawn in many a home of Southern England was lodged a Chinaman, sightless or seeing.

The rest crashed shrieking into street or field or river, or, landing on roofs, slanted and crashed, or stuck in trees.

By midnight England was agaze at this rain, amazed, with a suspicion of hallelujah and strange new hope springing in its breast, and the name of a man panting on its breath. In the London window was a face upturned, spurting feet in her streets. A throng on London Bridge saw through the rain one air-boat drop upon another, and both drop upon the gold cross of St Paul's, and go cracking. Some dropped upon cabs, carts, and men. Seven in a boat came down safe in the middle of Southampton Row, and were pounced upon to be roughly handled, until the astounded crowd found them to be blind, and guided them by the hand into houses.

Before this, at about ten o'clock, Sir Robert Barrington, on his way to an interview with Her Majesty, saw, as he stepped out of his house, a light sinking in the air, waited, watching, and saw it gently sink to an area rail opposite, on which it tilted, spilling five shrieking blind Chmamen into the street; and the Queen herself, seated with screened lights in her Newmarket Parlour, started, hearing their screams....

And there was yellow still nearer her than they! She did not know all that was in that room....

She was waiting there by her pear-wood fireplace that had a Lambert landscape in its carving for Eulalia, whom she had summoned — the fireplace (in which was a fire that chilly night), being south, the corridor-door to the Queen's left, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's chest a little within the lobby north.

And as Eulalia came to the top of the four steps outside, she seemed to see on the corridor-door's rose curtains the firelight shadow of someone five feet behind the Queen, keenly leaning, stealing toward the Queen, a knife in hand.

As in she dashed, the shadow vanished; and Her Majesty glanced round, astonished at her irruption.

"Is Your Majesty alone?" she sharply asked.

"Yes, Miss Bayley. Why?"

Now, the shadow had not been distinct, so, suddenly feeling unsure, and reluctant to alarm, Eulalia merely answered that she had "seemed to see" a shadow behind Her Majesty....

"No," said the Queen. "Sit here.... Now, what is to be done? Ah! you wear the miniature I gave you! Let me see it?"

Eulalia took it from her neck; handed it to the Queen; the Queen tossed it into the fire.

"Now, what is to be done? Here we are in the gravest scrape, with eight or ten indelible disgraces threatening a Throne — You see, do you, into what a mess of mud many men may be sunk by one young woman's unseemly mutiny and misdemeanour? The Prince's 'love' you are! his 'lucky star' ! — unlucky. Where he got the audacity — in my — in my presence — What did His Royal Highness mean by calling you his 'luck'?"

"I think the Prince referred to the black box, Ma'am. I seem to have brought to His Royal Highness no other luck." Eulalia was staring straight into the flame, aware of the raids of wind and rain upon the window.

"And this black box which you say that you digged up — is it this that blows people to pieces?"

"I have no knowledge of its properties, Ma'am."

"It must be this! in which case it is the Princess Elizabeth apparently who discovered its properties, and it is she who is his luck. She, poor lady, has been made quite ill by the disgraceful scene, and can scarcely speak — whether she will continue in the palace now I can't say; and, as for me — what can I do? I put it to you. If I send you away, the Prince seems to have a craving for you — What, by the way, made you withdraw yourself and hide from him? You have volunteered no statement — —"

"It would be long to explain, Ma'am."

"It is short to say it would be long."

"I am like that, Ma'am, I'm afraid: pray forgive me." The Queen's eyes dwelt on her weighingly. Then: "Well, if I send you away, this very fiery young man calls fire from heaven upon me; if you stay, no lady in the palace can — I couldn't, anyway. So what to do?"

"I can fly and hide without your sending me, Ma'am. That is the way out."

"Will you do this?"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"Oh, but you are not bad! You are not bad!"

"Hark!"

“What is it?”

“Didn’t Your Majesty hear anything?”

“No. It is the wind.”

“Perhaps.”

“Don’t be nervous. Listen — you shall have another of the miniatures, though they are precious to me — that one in the sailor-shirt when he was eighteen — And afterwards we can meet, you and I — and you will think you see him when you see me—”

“Your Majesty is gracious. I will fly this night, the Prince won’t find me, and on Wednesday I can use the ticket for America. But on one condition.”

“Oh, now, that spoils it, a condition. What is the condition?”

“Your Majesty must come to my apartments with me.”

“I must?”

“Yes, Ma’am.”

“What for?”

“You will see, Ma’am.”

“Well!” — the Queen stood up. “But where is — everybody?” she said with wonder at the door, seeing the corridor desert as death. A small bunch of lamps above the hangings of the arch beshone its long forlornness.

But as they were going toward the arch, there was someone — a golden big being from below who bore a card on a salver. The Queen read “Sir Robert Barrington.” The next minute Eulalia was saying in her bedroom: “I have dreamt of being a Queen — and will be one a little. Your Majesty will give me your diadem and clothes to put on.”

The Queen had a tweak of fun. “While I descend to receive a certain man who awaits me in a state of — nature? An intensely proper man, too.” She appealed to heaven.

“I meant that we should change places,” said Eulalia, pale, pale. “I a Queen, you a nurse.”

“Now, the odd request!”

“It is the condition precedent of my flying.”

“But your real motive?”

“That is my affair, Ma’am.”

The Queen stared. “And if your sleeves are too short for me?”

“Not much, Ma’am.”

“I’ll do it.”

The transformations were made. But now the hairs gave a new air to the gowns, Eulalia’s a glow of gold and bulky club-head, Her Majesty a dusky mosque.

Eulalia followed to the door to say: “I — Your Majesty — feel that Your Majesty should keep your eyes open to-night.... I can’t help thinking that I saw some shadow.... The Prince of Wales has enemies — perhaps Your Majesty has, too...”

On this Her Majesty started at some thought, looking into Eulalia’s face, winch of late had flushed at the palace fare, but now afresh was utterly bereft of colour. She did not say anything, but held out her hand; Eulalia kissed it; and that was quaint to see the diadem curtsy and kiss the nurse’s fingers.

And now the Queen went hurriedly, turned back to say hurriedly: “I will come back: stay in there till someone comes,” and went hurriedly down the North Stair.

In fact, the shadow caught by Eulalia, though faint, had somehow brought Oyone into her memory, and also the remembrance of Oyone’s bitter face cut at the Queen at the cab-door in Chapel Street, East.

She peeped out, saw the corridor still a solitary street, and went creeping toward the Newmarket Parlour, taking care at the arch to peer and push the draperies.

Nothing there: but at the top of the four steps her heart started into her mouth when once more she chanced to catch the vanishing of a shadow.

But she had not been through the war, and through the Chinese, without learning audacity, so with a dash she was through the curtains, and a poker was in her hand, she searching the curtains, the furniture, all eyes and whiteness: for though she had said to herself in changing clothes with Her Majesty that she didn't mind dying, her life of no value, when it came to the point she was inclined to make a fight for life; and she explored the whole room, the obscure lobby beyond, a dark apartment beyond that: but did not think of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's chest.

Meantime, Her Majesty in a bijou drawing-room below had asked Sir Robert how she pleased him as a nurse, and why he appeared elated, to which he had answered: "At this moment, Ma'am, the mastery of the West over the East is being for ever settled. I believe — if it is not yet over — that yellow men are now being struck blind by hundreds of thousands in the air. I have just seen five—"

"Blind?" breathed the Queen.

"Am I to take it, Ma'am, that you are not aware that the Prince of Wales has Mr Chinnery's Redlike Ray?"

"No.... He is striking them blind?"

"I take it that he is."

"Now, how horrible!" — her eyes shut—" His poor hand is already thicker than itself with brothers' blood...."

"Forgive me," said Sir Robert: "I assumed that Your Majesty would know."

“No.... I know that he has a black box which blows to pieces.... The Princess Elizabeth apparently discovered that it had some property of explosion, then the Prince found it — Can this be the same? No! And yet — Of course, this ray has no explosive property?”

“Why, no.”

“Is the ray contained in a black box?”

“Yes, Ma’am. You may know that the Prince has long been seeking it, lately attempted to make one like it, failed....”

“Then, it is the same. How, then, could Elizabeth pretend — ?” The Queen paused, pondering.

Silence. Then Sir Robert, frowning at the floor: “I have besought this interview of you, Ma’am, under the pressure of a necessity to be frank as to the Princess Elizabeth. It appears that Her Imperial Highness has pretended more things than one, and this to the detriment of others. It has lately, for instance, come to my ears, that Her Imperial Highness is generally credited at Court with being the donor of the German Six Millions. Now, I have already had the honour of writing to Your Majesty the address of that donor; she is poor; I hoped that Your Majesty would deign—”

“The Princess Elizabeth,” answered Her Majesty emphatically, “virtually — yes, admitted — that she was the donor. Do you say that you doubt her?”

“I say so, Ma’am. The fact was not so, believe me. And my reason for being here is this: that the donor has recently disappeared from her lodging — I cannot trace her — she treats me ill — but I desire to say to-night to Your Majesty that it is a matter of national honour and concern that that royal person should be searched for, and comforted, Ma’am, for her many adversities.”

At the strong vibration of his voice, Her Majesty’s eyes sprang water by contagion, her face agitated, pale with indignation — against him, or against Elizabeth.

“I will see to it,” she said; “and I only hope that you are perfectly certain of your facts, Sir Robert Barrington, or your tone in referring to the Prince’s betrothed will be thought improper. Pray tell me afresh the name and address of the lady in question.”

“I did not tell Your Majesty her name in my letter. As for the address, she is gone — impossible to guess why or whither — gone — leaving her few little linens behind — in a soap-box, Ma’am — in a third-floor back-room — in a slum, Maam—”

“Soap-box? Third floor?” — wonder was dawning, dawning in her eyes — “what address?”

“It is 19 Chapel Street, East, Ma’am.”

“Chapel? Yes — 19—” She remembered that that was the address whence she had taken Eulalia; and now there burst from her lips the question: “Is this donor a nurse?”

“She is, Ma’am.”

“Her name!”

“Eulalia Bayley, Ma’am.”

Her Majesty’s head rested on her chair-back, her lids shut down, and there was no speech there during some minutes.

“It occurs to me to add,” observed Sir Robert suddenly, “that it was this same lady who discovered the Prince’s prison. It was not the Princess Elizabeth at all, as was said. Miss Bayley, having discovered, came to tell me the address, and the Princess, who was at my place, certainly heard her. I have to be frank — these are facts. I say that the Prince of Wales owes his life, the nation at this moment owes its existence, you your life, Ma’am, I my life, to that young lady of the slum. I dare to say that, if she were an Aspasia — and she is the chastest of the angels — still her royal soul would merit to share this Throne.”

The Queen opened her eyes to say: “I agree as to the ‘royal; the ‘angel’ I leave to your serener reflection; but I agree, I agree, as to the royal. She is here, by the way. You shall see her, looking royal, in my diadem.”

Sir Robert was all astare. “Miss Bayley — here?”

“This is her nurse’s costume! I left her — I’ll fetch her to Sir Robert Barrington’s parental embrace.” She bent her head with an underlook, as she stood up.

“One word, Ma’am! Does the Prince of Wales know — ?”

“Yes, he discovered her, and she had this Redlike Ray: he called her ‘his luck’ — no wonder!”

“So all will now be well? — one word!”

“Sir Robert Barrington, take it from me that the Princess of Wales cannot be a thing of spots and patches so long as I am Queen of England!” Her Majesty stood at her mighty height smiling at the universe beneath her chin; and up Sir Robert threw his eyes, as she moved on and out, bound for Eulalia.

But in the corridor just outside the door she found the Princess Elizabeth lingering — meek, and ill, and cringing.

“Mother—”

“Judge!”

Under that withering look the Princess stood a shrunken thing; but then, suddenly looking up, said: “I am not ignorant that I have been maligned to Your Majesty, for ‘quod est mihi suspirat’! but since ten minutes’ talk would completely clear Your Majesty’s mind of every misconception—” “Stay: did you not declare that you had discovered that that box of Miss Bayley’s had the property of shattering men!”

Pinched now with shame, pain, apprehension, perplexity, the Princess stood pale, a sinner in the day of his calamity, an irked nerve, like worms of the deep sea squirming beneath burning beams.

“Yes,” she admitted, “I said that it shatters men.”

“But it strikes blind!”

“Precisely. It shatters the eye.”

“I see! — for it has not shattered mine. But tell me: did not Your Imperial Highness hear the address of the Prince’s prison from Miss Bayley at Sir Robert Barrington’s?”

“Yes — I did. I went there foreknowing that I should hear it: as I did.”

“Foreknowing.... And you Elizabeth, were the giver of the Six Millions, were you? You were that adored donor, complacently accepting the adoration of men?”

“No. I was not the donor of the Six Millions. I said so! But though I was not the donor, I was, so to say, the donator—”

“The donator.... Oh, Elizabeth, you are a charlatan” — in a voice low and cold.

Now, desperate, detected, the Princess’s lip whitened with spite. “If I am a charlatan, is not the world one mass of charlatanism? Hasn’t society been built upon charlatanism — archbishops, emperors — queens — ?”

“What has that to do with you? You repent, girl, and strive to make yourself worthy to be the wife of some pettier man than the Prince of Wales.”

Blood rushed now to the Princess’s brow, and she was about to vent something venomous against her love, the Prince, when he himself came rocking along the corridor in haste, causing the ladies to start at the Chinaman they thought they saw, at the pigtail swinging behind his dripping ulster, the hairless skull of paste....

“It is only I,” he called out.... “Well, it’s all over, Mother, invasion stopped, a new sun to-morrow morning.... I am pretty sick of it, and sad, God knows, yet glad.... Turned nurse, Mother?... Eulalia upstairs?”

Her Majesty started! “Let not the Prince of Wales forget that he is in the presence of ladies!”

“Scott, Mother, let us keep cool,” the Prince wearily said: “to-morrow morning I start a rational world, so help me, God. But, as you like rites, Mother, let me tell you to comfort you that that lady has been Princess of Wales since she was sixteen.”

One looking close would have seen the Queen dodge a little from it; she then stepped back to stand against the panelling, and suddenly covered her face with her hands, uttering a sound; the Prince, meantime, saying: “Elizabeth, forgive.... She ran away on learning that her husband was the Prince of Wales — public grounds, I suppose, for she’s very noble-minded — and then I heard that she was dead — had reasons to believe — forgive! She upstairs?”

Before he could receive an answer, a series of shrieks reached their ears from afar, screams of one extremis that seemed to say “help! help!” screams that affected some vein in the Prince to a piteous sympathy, his face instantly taking on an expression of intense pain, like one ready to cry. He flew. And, promptly as he flew, the Queen flew more promptly still... heart-smitten....

He soon passed her, however; and, on coming near the North Stair, could hear a press of feet pelting down the second-floor stair above him; one moment more and Oyone broke white into his sight, a narrow bright knife in her right hand, bright yet reddened, and three men impending upon her heels.

He, on dashing to that landing, was just in time to see that one of the men had caught her up on a landing below, dashing a little past her: upon which she dodged back sharp, and jumped the balusters to the bottom, some twenty feet, landing like elastic on her feet; the next instant she had slipped out of the palace, the men after, the Prince after them.

But they were still twenty feet off her when she was twenty feet in air. The Prince saw her boat's shape rising across the rain, caught a cry of "Cranes!" screamed down from the air, and immediately was away back into the palace.

But to the other three, lingering a little, a sudden thud sounded somewhere: for the boat could hardly have been forty feet aloft when it dropped like a stone; then all was still....

Meantime, the Queen had reached Eulalia through a throng of ladies and men, to find her still with the diadem on her brow, and with smudges of blood about her breast, stretched on a couch. Her Majesty stopped short a yard from the unconscious form, gazing, then, extending her arms, called out lamentably: "Oh, but greater love hath no man than this!" and a second later had Eulalia raised in her strong arms, and was away with her.

Without a sound now, her lips fixed in a vindictive way, she trotted, brushed past her son in the corridor, did not take Eulalia into Eulalia's apartments, but down the North Stair, step by step, heavy laden like a cat carrying her kitten, down and away to her own apartments, her own bed.

Feet, meantime, were speeding for the physician, but long ere he got there Sir Robert and the Prince, who were as good as doctors, had examined the breast-wound; and then, looking into one another's eyes, had smiled.

"Fought like two cats!" said the Prince.

The cuts in Eulalia's fingers were, indeed, the worst, so that by midnight she was convalescent, Her Majesty then alone with her in darkness, their arms enfolded close, culling one another's roses, roaming in one another's country, discovering one another, chuckling at their delicious riches of love and kissing kinship, the clicking of the clock not more constant than their talk that lasted on and on into the dawn of morning.

The Queen, discovering the ring hung round the neck, said: "So this is the wedding-ring!"

"That's where I've always kept it!" — Eulalia laughed.

"But what a pair of pirates! Who could divine...? You were only sixteen?"

"Hardly more. Before I knew anything he had me off my feet."

"Say crushingly defected."

" — Yes! Ah, if I could only say those sorts of flashing swift things like you! — you'd think more of me."

Her Majesty held her hot and close. "Could I, sweetheart? I doubt it."

"Tell me the truth: do you love me a lot?"

"Couldn't you see — from the first! Sweet as honey — ! I have longed for a daughter-sister, and to think it should be you, you!... You'll make the fairest, silver-slipperdest, finest, whitest Princess of Wales that ever yet was! I'll be like an air-boat bathing in the sunlight of your hair and flying about in the sky of your eyes! But I do abhor a woman who throws away the severity and thorn without which there's no rose of womanhood, or preservation of a nation. So I had to try to dislike you, feeling you sweet in my liver, but never dreaming half your sweetness and high royalty — forgive — I humble myself — kiss."

"You make love something like him!" said Eulalia.

"Do I? Is he nice as a lover?"

"Aha — electric-like. But it is said that you are fickle: if ever you leave off loving me, I shall just die, or if you regret that I am not royal, or about Germany.”

“I sha’n’t. The Prince of Wales has authority and prestige enough now to marry Sally-in-the-alley — if she be vestal. He can make Germany an English Crown-colony, if he likes. Don’t be afraid of that. If I am fickle, it is only to pretty dummies, not to real people. Ah! where you got the audacity this night — if you had got yourself killed for me—”

“Oh, I was wide awake! I seemed to recognise the shadow’s face — She was wonderfully lovely—”

No longer! — as the morning then dawning into the apartment revealed to three men in the Palace Park, who found the little scout dead on the ground, and Oyone still sitting, stiff and cold, at the boat’s hatchway, her hand on the ratchet-lever, her right eye, at the shock, having shot half out of the socket, her hard hat cocked awry....

CHAPTER XXV

IN THE COMET'S TAIL

THAT NEXT (SUNDAY) night, the night before the comet crossed our orbit, Her Majesty and His Royal Highness argued long together, wrestling together, alone in that Newmarket Parlour, on whose Last Supper table lay a document drawn up by him, she at one moment almost going on her knees, entreating, holding him, with “Don’t do it, my son — don’t do it.”

But he, pacing short about, his hands behind him, said again and again: “It is no use, Mother...”

“You depose your poor father, you see,” she said with water in her eyes that hung on him.

“Mother, you talk.... ‘Depose.’... What does it matter? Only for some weeks.”

“Oh, I’m afraid! afraid!... It will profoundly offend the British people, I know!”

“Mother, as if that mattered. I am the light of the world, Mother — for the moment. In fifty years’ time men will smile — I hope — at my little say as obvious baby-talk; but, for the moment, it is what I say that is wit, if they have the wit and grace to recognise my face and my voice, and the oil that anoints my appointed pate. And they will, I think — some time. My anticipation is that most of them will jump for joy. Anyway, it doesn’t matter. I have the whim and the power to do them good, and I will.”

The Queen, seated at the table, made of her hand a bed for her heavy head, saying wearily: “Isn’t it a Morrison Pill? I begin to doubt if the sorrows of men can be cured by any Morrison Pill.”

“But why do you, Mother? Oh, now, that seems rather unscientific of you. The question is: Who is Morrison? Can he see facts? If so, his pill is Divine, and nothing in the universe is the slightest use except just his pill. Do, do, let’s shun catchwords like death, shall we? Everything that’s done is done by a pill, Mother: to every effect its special effecter: that light there was not lit by vague exhortations to be good, but by a pill, by special measures; the sun shifts its mass 600 miles a minute, not more, not less, by a pill. And in the case of a man who catches cold, then from the skin the kidneys sicken, then from the kidneys the heart has it, the artery-walls, the circulation, the stomach, the nerve-centres, and the man pants a complex discordance — in such a case Morrison has to be rather a shrewd man to adapt his pill to the original root of all that; but, as to the root of the complex discordance of society, no such acumen is required: for it is known, it must be obvious to blockheads, that if a nation has no country — if Israel live in Egypt — if Englishmen live on a foreign England, making bricks and paying toll to foreign Pharaohs from Normandy, who own England — then in England you must have national discordance; and if Man has no planet, then you must have international discordance. What is amusing is, that war is regarded as the greater evil of the two! But war is not a great evil, or not a deep, because it is God’s penalty for a small wrong — for the wrong of the seizure by peoples of land that belongs to all; the monstrous wrong, bringing the monstrous penalty, is the seizure by only one individual of what belongs to all — and this is that simple catching cold, pitching into complex discordances, that needs no seer to heal it with a pill. And it is not because it was not seen that it has not been healed, but because our England has been governed by lubbers and, blunted pundits.”

“Yes, I agree,” breathed the Queen—” I know, I agree” — reading the document—” but still — oh, listen to me. Some of these things — Tell me frankly, Teddy, does this clause here mean that you intend doctors to murder infants?”

“What else, Mother!”

“Ah!”

“Mother — really — that sigh does not touch me. Mother, is it wrong to kill a man? We kill a German, or a man who kills a man; but, of course, one filthy infant kills many. Only last night Li Ku Yu was proving to me that it is not wrong to kill two hundred million men.”

“Oh, the bloodthirsty — And, Teddy, you believed him?”

“Mother, I said ‘proved’: perhaps you did not catch.... Oh, Mother, how we distrust truth! — our only friend — our Blessed Saviour from all our sorrows and wrongs — how we dread Her Heavenly face in our barbarian brainlessness and irreligion—”

“Yes — I see that, too — that’s all right — but just think, Teddy — think of the shock to the moral sense of England—”

“Yes, but, Mother, the moral sense of England is not a fixed thing! It mayn’t be very high at present, but in six months I’ll have it raised—”

“Oh, Heaven, what shall I say to him?” — the Queen shook her bowed brow—” This about doctors is an interference with evolution — Oh, I’m afraid! — We mayn’t have the right—”

“‘Interference’” — the Prince stopped in his pacing—” Really, Mother, you bring out things now that I’m sure would never have passed your lips when I was ten! I suppose the brain ‘tires’ like steel-temper—”

“Meaning that I am getting old?” — with a dwelling underlook.

“Scott, Mother, no, of course — old, no — God forbid. But ‘interfering’ with evolution, Mother. How supremely — ! — They reckon ill, Mother, who leave God out: when we fly from Him. He is the wings; when we interfere with evolution, that, of course, is evolution interfering with itself — as you know.”

The Queen did not answer; but presently was muttering: “Well, it is all over now — no more little Teddy — the fledgling flown — the Spring-time over and gone — Oh, my God, I must be satisfied —— — —”

As she broke into tears, with tears the Prince threw himself at her mother’s knees.

All that night and the next forenoon he spent in interviews; and in the afternoon, as Mr Mackay, the Prime Minister, was making an oration in the Commons, intended to be impressive, in praise of the Prince of Wales’s services to the world, the Prince with fifty blue-jackets stepped into the House, and, standing by the Speaker’s Chair, said: “Gentlemen, this Parliament is dissolved; force at hand; my regrets for breaking in upon your grave deliberations.”

When they were gone, he locked up the House.

His Edict was in the evening papers:

“Men of Great Britain and Ireland.

“You know me, as I think I know you.

“I undertake (without prejudice to the Majesty of my Royal Father and Mother) the direction of our country, until the following sociological experiments be in the way, of being made:

“1. That Great Britain and Ireland be considered my private property by right of conquest.

“2. That navies be now abolished.

“3. That rates and taxes (except ‘death-duties’) be abolished; and ‘customs.’

“4. That citizens be liable to daily drill, including running and breathing, between the ages of five and fifty-five.

“5. That it be made a privilege to be British, citizens to receive a citizen-salary of 8s. a week from the age of seventeen in the case of males, of 15s. in the case of females, and of 85s. in the case of married couples between the ages of thirteen and nineteen. Old Age Pensions to be abolished.

“6. That such nervous diseases as insanity, epilepsy, drunkenness, paralysis and idleness be considered incorrigible.

“7. That the sale of love be made a felony.

“8. That our nation devote itself (A) to getting knowledge of God, and (B) to teaching it: these two activities, Research and Education, to be its two main activities, and to cost it dear, each one, in millions per annum.

“9. That each boy and girl learn at least five handicrafts, or ‘trades,’ three of them to be (A) Working in wood, (B) Working in iron, (C) Working in land.

“10. That the following be Government monopolies:

(A) — Education, (B) Milk-supply, (C) Electric-power supply, (D) Doctoring, (E) Publishing, (F) Amalgamation and Distribution of Businesses.

“11. That Members of Parliament be paid three thousand pounds per annum; and be Doctors of Science; and be workmen, having educated hands and eyes, personally acquainted with God; and be not bald nor toothless.

“12. That Doctors be twice consecrated (A) by a Bishop, (B) — by an Archbishop; and be Bachelors of Science; and be State-servants; and be taught in Consecration that ‘to the pure all things are pure.’

“13. That every species of clergyman now leave off uttering in public for money whatever has come to seem childish or savage to ordinary centric people, and begin to behave themselves like grown white men and good patriots.

“14. That the idea of ‘punishment’ be abolished. Animals are (apparently) electro-chemical, or V- chemical, machines, and the idea of ‘punishing’ a machine is senseless. Therefore let the mood of penalties; be more impersonal, purposeful and sociological, imprisonments to be lifelong, in general, and prisons pleasant places; and other penalties to be by fine, pain, shame, and death.

“Writs to be issued for a new Parliament within six weeks...

“Edward...”

Silence followed all that afternoon, That a tempest was mustering its thunders to empty itself everyone felt: but whether of anger or gladness was the question.

As for the foreign population of Britain, they little cared: for to them, already thinking of packing their trunk for the Continent once more, whatever the Prince might do was wondrously done: but it is certain that some nerve in every Englishman winced at his action, dazzling angel as he might be in the nation’s eye.

There was silence and musing behind closed doors....

Then wire-messages commenced to fly, men to collect in eddies working into whirlpools, and, near five, feet to steer toward the palace; then, as at the turn and uncertain time of tides boats on the surface lie any way, but suddenly determine to stem all one way, and men say, “that’s the way things are,” so before six the national answer to the Edict was known — by a tendency — by a current’s rush — by an ocean’s roaring. At seven South-west London was one welter and howl of heads.

A vociferation of “Teddy!” entered the palace, pervading it from bottom to top like a hot and restless presence unrelentingly, the King, Queen, Princesses, everyone, praying the Prince to present himself; but he would not.

It turned out that, just as when a lad outgrows his Eton-jacket, or a larva takes to wings, or a tadpole to the solid land, so the people now were perfectly sick and tired of the garrulous old gang, child-playing and play-acting with the lives of generations, quoting from one another’s “speeches” scoring points (loud cheers), “voting censures”; and now, suddenly, it was done, the Age of Sham, and let’s pretend, and baby babble; suddenly, in a day, the Age of Business was born; and now was the hour for joy-bells to jargon and jangle together, and hearts to join in being glad.

But the Prince said: “I am not obliged to go when someone says ‘Teddy’”; and was glad to get out of it when, at eight-twenty, a letter from Li Ku Yu was placed in his hand:

“Prince, I write by the hand of a woman who received me Friday night into her house at Forest Hill — 18 Bread Street — I blind-struck before being well in air, left leg broken, suicide to be at nine. It pleases me to think that you, Prince, will trouble yourself to cremate my body.

“I enclose scheme of the Europe by me conceived. What is good adopt, as God inspires. Blessed be His name.

“Li Hsi Hung and Yoshio Kanin have instructions that you, Prince, are next the guide of China. These will write you.

“If Chinese show reluctance to evacuate, strike one blind, here, there. Deal leniently.

“I, in your place, should keep at least one million in Europe, and mix. Meditate this. Great at the wood-lathe, land-culture. Or give Russia to Japan, China itself will respond to scientific institutions. Behead opponents.

“I have loved you well. Farewell.

“Your Younger Brother, “Li Ku Yu.”

It was then eight-twenty, and the Prince had a will to get to that address in Forest Hill before nine. But since the Princess could not now part from him, nor the Queen part from the Princess, they set out together.

It soon appeared, however, that it was hopeless to make way through the Strand.

The fact that that was the night of the comet's crossing — a thing long regarded with an exaggerated interest — packed the throng thicker; not a vehicle but the royal one was anywhere visible; advance was step by step; the Prince fretted and vexed; but still the car crawled, the crowd growled.

The night being very mistily dim, for some time they were not recognised, but in Kingsway it came, and then the situation became dreadfully distressing. Backward now nor forward they could not budge, and would soon have been exhausted, if they had not been rescued by a posse of police into the so-called Opera-house, where they were accommodated with seats at the stage-back, and there sat salved but wretched, hearing the speech of a Socialist on the Edict to a hall packed chiefly with working men — a meeting convened by the S.D.F. — the stage almost as thronged as the hall.

And there on prickles sat the Prince, resentment on his lips, very vexed with Her Majesty and the Princess, who had influenced him against going through the air.

It was only after some minutes that it dawned upon the consciousness of the hall that he was sitting there within it, and all at once the oratory stopped short at a call of “Teddy!” — then call upon call — negligible to begin, but growing great, and then big, august, like gales, and the guns of nature.

“Speech!” someone uttered, and then it was “Teddy! Speech!” shrieked with the ceaselessness of some machine urgently at work which shrieks: “Speech! Speech!”

The Prince’s teeth siffled his “Onward, Christian Soldiers,” his lids disdainfully lowered.

“Just to humour them, then, a little,” shouted the Queen, leaning near his ear which a clamour now filled thick as masses of javelins flashed in battle; “Yes, Teddy,” the Princess said with her head and eyes; “Speech!” shrieked the machine; and presently he, impelled, compelled, went stepping in a dove-coloured dust-coat with that quick little sway of his shoulders to the front, siffing, spinning a little stick pretty trickily quickly round his fingers.

Clamour! Hush! Silence!

“I confess, men, you rather astonish me clamouring Speech at me like this. Suppose I have nothing new to say? will you still want ‘a speech’? (“Teddy! Yes! — That’s odd! That what you’re accustomed to! (“That’s it, Ted!”) I see! The right honourable gentleman sat down amid loud cheers after having been on his poor old feet two hours — that the style? (“You’ve got it, Teddy!”) And if he had been on his poor old headpiece, no person on earth would have been one penny—” (— of joy.)

“But from me you look for solider stuff, do you? (“We do! Teddy!”) Hunks of bread and beef, do you? and honeycomb? (“Right you are!”) Well, I’ll see, you, on your side, trying to sympathise with me, remembering that if I live a little generation or so ahead of you, a leader should, and that if in anything you ‘differ from’ me, you are ‘differing from’ your sons, and your own future selves.

“Which I say so confidently, for the reason that I foresee that ‘the speech’ won’t have any of my opinions in. No opinions. You have heard that it has been said by them of old time ‘Every Briton has a right to his opinion,’ but I say to you that no Briton has, least of all I, I think, since it has been proved that opinions are wrong — two opposite opinions both wrong — and we can’t have a right to a wrong. And again it has been said by them of old time, ‘Don’t believe everything that you hear,’ but I say to you, ‘Don’t believe anything that you hear,’ if it is the least bit abstruse: distrust, if you desire to foster strong minds; until truth is proved: and then believe vitally deep.

“Do you feel like me, I wonder, when I find that I have been believing something that’s not true? as if some thing or other a little behind and above me had been smiling all along at me, not unkindly, but very disdainfully — rather offensive. Hence’ the speech’ will be pretty brief. I think — no opinions, only ascertained facts; and then all practical politics, I think, touching the spot of your private lives and minds and happiness closer home than the fantastic politics you’re accustomed to; and then plain, I think — no foreign long words. Possibly I may want to use the foreign word ‘phenomena’ — is there some workman who does not know what’ phenomena’ are? (A voice: “Want of sleep, Teddy!”) Nonsense! that’s insomnia! No! ‘phenomena’ are whatever you experience, as when you sneeze; yes, or feel sleepless; or are conscious of the bliss of eating when hungry, of drinking after ripping long wood with the saw; or are conscious of being conscious, and of the oddity of such a thing; or conscious of loveliness — for this globe is only a bit of drift-log gadding down the river of being with meteor-stones and other streaming drift-log, and yet, see, she teams with gleams of beauty, tones of music, in blue eyes, in Geissler tubes, in the salmon satin of copper flushing in flame, in shavings, in that song of strong winds in forests which no tongue can sing, in the moon on wild white nights winging away among Switzerlands of cloud, like some white wildfowl with a tail all colours, and your heart’s enticed in you, and suddenly you find that your mouth has kissed your hand — aye, and afresh the next night when it is calm she'll ravish you afresh, since age cannot wither her, nor custom stale her infinite variety; or are conscious of sexes among animals — some sorts have more than two — and of their tumid moods and enthusiasms; or of the twenty million suns which you see over you at night — another twenty millions over you by day, which you see without feeling that you see; or of your own sun when clouds seem clustering round him, he looking some illustrious sultan-priest of the sultry countries, strutting in such stuffs as you cannot peer at without tears: dark then with excessive bright his skirts appear.

“Such are ‘phenomena’: all our impressions of the manners and customs of this panorama of lamps and Arab tabernacle of the Most High God, which we with our dog’s-eyes blink at a little, which twenty million years hence the sons of men will see better, and love more, but will never see well, nor love enough.

“Or possibly in ‘the speech’ I may use the word ‘philosopher’ — is there one man who doesn’t know what a philosopher is? (A voice: “Man who bears pain, Sir!”) That again is nonsense. No! a philosopher is a man who habitually sees things a little (a very little) as they are, and other people as they seem. Here we are in Kingsway, for instance, and someone may imagine that a minute hence we shall still be here: well, a philosopher is a man who laughs at such a fancy, seeing and feeling that a minute hence we’ll be away out where the North Sea is — if the North Sea itself, meantime, had not vaulted a thousand miles. (A voice: “What about a scientist, Sir?”) Well, a scientist laughs, too, when he thinks of it, but not so heartily as a philosopher, who has not merely swallowed truth, like the scientist, but truth is become the substance of his blood. A philosopher must, of course, be a scientist, but some quite distinguished scientists that I could name have been laughably far from being philosophers, just as a national economist must be a business-man, but not every excellent business-man is an economist. Every living thing, in fact, is a scientist — that is, knows something — but here below only men are philosophers; so that the ‘scientist,’ the ‘expert,’ is the mere raw material of a man, and any studious goose can be a ‘scientist’: it is the philosopher who is the man, not a Bachelor of truth, but a married man to truth, a Master and Doctor of truth. And the inventor is a philosopher: for he not only acquires two truths, like the scientist, but uses them intimately like his tools, sees a relation between them, i.e., a new truth: becomes a wielder and foreman of truth.

“Is this, then, to be henceforth our national aim — to be philosophers, inventors, real men? And shall not this be the subject of ‘the speech’ — of all future ‘speeches’? In which case, shall not my text be those words so associated now with my respected ancestor, His Majesty King George V. ‘Wake up, England!’ It is to be assumed, of course, that His Majesty understood what it is to wake up — well, everyone knows: it is to become conscious that there’s a picture on the wall, a basin on the washstand, a sun, clouds — conscious of facts; and the more facts we become actively conscious of — the laws of tension in the picture’s string, the chemistry of the basin, the sun’s mass, age, speed — the more awake we are; the more we are philosophers.

“To wake up, then, is to become philosophers? cognisant of God? (A voice: “But, Teddy, we don’t much believe in no God, most of us!”) No? Well, I didn’t know that workmen still spoke in that way; though I know that one day when I was fourteen a ship’s-captain smuggled me — stole me — behind a shed at Hayling Island, and begged me with intense agitations never to believe if my teachers told me that there’s ‘a God,’ since, as a matter of fact, there isn’t one — a most amusing man — his furtive earnestness! his leering secrecies! — and for three minutes I wouldn't let him rush away from me, until I had made him admit what rubbish he had hissed. Not that I had any quarrel with his belief — I knew that his belief was true — but I did think little of his English. He simply did not know what the word 'God' means, or it never would have entered his head to say that there's 'no God' — i.e.. no beyond of sense-impressions, no cause of phenomena, no maker at every instant of heaven and earth. What he believed was that that cause is nothing at all like what horses, or Mrs Jones next door, or Mrs Bobmbobm on Mars, imagines it to be; but he did not say what he believed, and he said what he did not believe, that there's no cause at all, which was hardly very glittering English. In fact, strictly speaking, these are the only three things of which every living being is perfectly certain, that there are phenomena, and a cause for them—' I, ' a world, and God. (A voice: "What sort of being can God be, Teddy? And whatever caused Him?") Well! But why stop me with impossible questions? Is it possible that you bother to ask yourself and me a thing like that? Cats ask that, when you see them looking at the moon; cats ask, bishops and witch-doctors answer; ancient (so-called) 'philosophers' asked (they were not really philosophers); but modern philosophers don't bother, knowing that what Life is for is more and more to enjoy and love God, not to guess at and comprehend Him, as priests and negroes pretend to do, since God is infinite, i.e.. infinitely inconceivable, x for ever — not, of course, meaning inconceivable to men, to whom everything is inconceivable, but I am speaking of creatures on spheres older than this, with their cocoanuts roomy as cathedrals, through which unceasingly streams of adoring music roll their roarings. And if someone wonders how I can know that to them, too, God is x for ever, I answer that this is known; but to explain how might make 'the speech' tedious.

“You won’t bother, then, any more about what God is: you know that He is amiable, producing wheat to make man brisk and European, and fruit to make man amorous and romantic, and milk within the weasel’s teat for her weans. How fresh is the ocean of March-wind! Oh, how well after all is it then with men, and with the birds of the air that laugh aloft with the blasts that whirl them! And suppose your tongue was a hint too big for your mouth? or was fitted in with the littlest list and lee-way, as when novices saw box-wood? How irritating to frenzy the friction of the teeth on one side! But it is a nice, true fit, like a rotor spinning in its stator-tunnel with scarce a millimetre clearance-space: He is good, He has compasses, and callipers with verniers, and decimal micrometers, to build with His bricks the multiple eye of the fly. And you know that He is worshipful: that Expanse is His knapsack, and Eternity is His journey; and you know many things that He is — nothing like what He has been conceived — not a steed with wings of wind, nor a plant with stars for apples; not short, not long, not middle-sized; neither masculine, nor feminine, nor neuter; not living, not dead; no saint, though He has no failings; does not know anything, though He more-than-knows everything; cannot see, though in each billionth bit of a minute in each billionth bit of a millimetre He busies a billion billion fingers. (A voice: “But how do you know He’s not a horse or a tree, Sir?”) Because you are a horse and a tree (very like), and hardly look the kind of agent that can nudge an atom with your elbow to do its duty, or sprint foot-and-foot with electricity in a foot-race. (A voice: “Yes, but how do you know He’s not dead? Who? I haven’t the faintest idea what you mean. Have you yourself? How can anything ‘be dead’ unless it die? Only syntheses — i.e.. souls — can ‘be dead’; a tree can ‘be dead,’ i.e.. its soul, but wood and stone can’t ‘be dead.’ Or you may stretch and say a clock or a chisel can, ‘be dead,’ but not brass and steel. Really, it is time for workmen to begin to use words with a little more ‘cuteness and gumption. (A voice: “But it was you yourself, Sir, who first said ‘He’s not dead.’”) I did? When?... Oh, well, yes, that’s true: I was saying He’s not this and not that, and, happening to say ‘He’s not living,’ I added, ‘He’s not dead.’ But it was absurd to add that, for if He never lived, He can’t be dead. ‘God’ ‘dead’? Queer meeting of words! — make a cat laugh! Some say the devil’s dead; some say he’s not dead; and that’s a quite legitimate controversy, since all things that we know with hoofs do sooner or later die. (“Kick the bucket,” the Queen whispered quick to the Princess.) But God’s above the devil, don’t you know. Stay: I’ll tell you something I know about God, something new to you, and pretty wondrous: listen: God everywhere at this instant is acting as He never anywhere acted before. Got that? I say never — a long time. He ‘acts by law,’ you think, He’s ‘the same yesterday, to-day and for ever’: well, no, those statements squint: we should say ‘He acts like Himself,’ and in two like cases would, no doubt, act in a like way, but has never had, will never have, the chance to. For you know, do you, that if nine of you light pipes to-night, you will do nine things that never were done before? That If you “braze brass on Monday and brass on Tuesday, if you make chloral on Wednesday and chloral on Thursday, between all the four will be a million million differences? A few days ago I was filing a piece of tin for a tenon template, and it must have cut my finger, for on looking at it through a glass, I saw some blood corpuscles; now, I guessed that, besides blood, there were very likely on it traces of several things — naphtha, tetrachlorinated ether, bichromate of potash — and I felt sure then that never in time and space had there been that particular meeting, or any precedent for that particular myriad of actions there taking place. And so in every case. Why, the right eye of the fly Y is a curio unique in the universe, dealing with light in a style quite new and unique. If you draw two circles with a compass, or rule two lines, do you suppose they are alike? Eye them through a microscope, and one will be a drawing of the Andes, the other of the Balkans; glare at them through God's goggles close-gloating, and the pair of pencil-lines will be spacious like planets, with collapsing palaces, Persepolis and Serapis, precipices, Saharas, and sand-storms oversweeping teeming peoples — alike in nothing save in their uniqueness. Even in so confirmed a thing as an earth's journey each year has its own course and story, and on high-roads of ice between England and France the gorilla has strangled the sabre-toothed tigress. If I step up Piccadilly, at my every step trillions upon trillions of events occur in eternity, each medley of events unique in eternity — electrical events between my body and clothes, my boots and the pavement, electro-magnetic events as each boot-nail moves, magneto-luminous events, events of capillarity, of osmosis, of friction, of pressure; of surface-tension, of moment-of-inertia, of molecular vibration, of chemistry, of heat, of sound in Australia (for I shake the globe), events of a thousand forces, no doubt, whose name men will never name. How comes God to 'know' how to juggle with the emergency of this eternal diversity? What twisting Proteus is His foreman, swift-whispering wisdom at his tympanum? He is never at a loss, look, nor stops to con His law-book, but pat as pat He acts with spinning spontaneity. 'Spontaneity' as living things seem to act: for you know — unless some one of you is awfully thoughtless — that living things only seem to act spontaneously, one going on four legs, one on two, one behaving as a baby, a Bavarian, a curate, a eunuch, a lunatic, a woman, a man, a martin, a Mozart, a Martian, strictly in the strain of his make and nature at any instant. What shall we say, then? That God actually is what living beings seem to be — spontaneous? that God is living? We may say so, if we like; and then we will divide things into three kinds — God living; things like us lifelike, doll-like, dream-living, or dream-life-positive; and things like iron dream-life negative, But that would be rather a queer way of putting it, since 'living' already has a definite meaning, meaning things like us; so you had better divide things into — iron life-negative; we life-positive, or 'living'; and God more-than-living, or x-being. God, anyway, you see, is not very 'dead.'

"I hope I so express myself that you see what I mean, though it is a little difficult in English of two syllables. By 'life-positive' and 'life-negative' I mean to suggest that everything is living — as I have long thought, and said — just as (we know) everything is electrified, things that contain more electricity than a certain stock or neutral amount being called 'electro-positive,' things that contain less 'electro-negative.' So I call men, trees, life-positive, iron life-negative, crystals life-neutral — in which case, of course, a moon is much more living than a man, the difference being that between heat and temperature, between momentum and speed, an ounce of boiling oil having much less heat than a ton of ice, though a higher temperature, and a bullet much less motion than the Severn, though more velocity; so a man less life than a mountain, though at higher 'potential' or pressure; and death is doubtless an 'earthing' (as electricians say), that is, a flowing back to the common earth-stock of the excess of life-fluid in life-positive bodies, through some break or short-circuiting of the vital dynamo. But now I am saying more than I know, so am certain to be wrong somewhere: though this, or something like it, you are likely to hear frequently repeated during the next fifty years.

"Well, but though God is x for ever, we must have some conception of God, though wrong: and civilisation consists in nothing but this — the getting of an ever higher conception of God through a broadening consciousness of His ways — through science — through being philosophers and inventors — through 'waking up.'

“And isn’t this desirable? Yes, for waking up, or becoming conscious, means happiness. Or is it necessary for me to prove that? It is easily proved. For happiness is a property ‘of life, isn’t it?’ Life is sweet.” You know that every insect or plant that has not had some mishap is happy, and, with one apparent exception, does not want to die. Well, but the trait of life is consciousness; so the more conscious, the more living: but happiness is a property of living; therefore the more conscious, the happier; and he was the most foolish of the foolish ancients who said, ‘he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow’: for knowledge, if it be real knowledge, and not the Chinese ‘knowledge’ of ‘scholars,’ is knowledge of God; and the more we know of God, the more we adore Him, and are happy.

“Yes, but mark this: that life with very little consciousness is still happy, if without mishap, if healthy. Does some one of you by chance know what health is? a singing hiccup of religion in your inwards? One March morning when I was a boy I saw from behind a hedge in the Highlands a girl come running, her hair and plaid fluttering on the winds; and when she chanced to pull up, half breathless, half laughing, not far from me, I think I never saw man so affected and sick with bliss. Up to God she threw her eye, gasping with a sort of fond reproach: ‘My health! Oh, I accuse You of love’; and when the mixed wind and water whistled and swamped the willow-whips sweetly by the water-brook, I saw her lover’s-glance go languishing and gush toward tears, she groaning ‘beloved,’ and then ‘beloved.’ Another day a Scotch meenister put into my hand a tract: and it was about a cobbler who sat singing in the sunlight; so someone asked, ‘Why are you always singing, Jamie?’ and what did the cobbler say? ‘It is Jesus singing, singing in my heart.’ There, again, was a happy life, though, of course, the ancient Asiatic whom he, a modern Scotchman, so familiarly mentioned had nothing to do with the matter, as is proved by — But, by the way, talking of proof, are we going henceforth to be sensitive to proofs? For it is suasibleness that distinguishes high types from low, it being difficult to persuade a negro, for if you din into him a series of known truths, the deduction from which is an axiom, he'll say, 'That may be all true enough, but I think I'll still stick to my own way of thinking.' Apes are worse! Whereas scientists stand ever ready to cast for ever behind them at the breath of a proof the convictions of their lifetime. We must be attentive, then, to proofs, if we desire to be high types. Of course, if one's brain is degenerate with age, that mayn't be easy... but I, personally, address myself to the young: I am pretty nimble myself, and have, I confess, little interest in stiff knees and intellects. In some lands a son will say to his father: 'Climb me this tree,' and if the father is too decrepit, the son will hang him on that tree. ("Old Age suspensions," the Queen whispered quick.) The Chinese, on the other hand, worship their aged and ancients; but we here are hardly just now in a mood to adore the Chinese, and their oddities ("Wipe them, out, Teddy"); nor must we hang our aged; but support them with gentleness and patience.

"But I was saying that one of many proofs that that ever-charming adept whom the cobbler mentioned was never the cause of his singing is that blackbirds, singing-apes, Hindoos, sing in that same happy manner: so the cobbler was not happy because he was pious, but was pious because he was happy, knowing Who made him happy, and made life without mishap to be happy." Of course, he would have been happier if he had had more life, i.e... more consciousness — if, by a consciousness of anatomy, he had understood what an adorable miracle it was that he sat there without one ache in any one of his myriad bits; if, by a consciousness of geology, he had got into his nerves a sense of Eternity, and of the exquisite preciousness and romance of those days of his happy lifetime, to last not one millionth part of one click of the clock of God, while Saturn gads with whinings for life to arise on her, nightly to eye those fires that fight her flying sky; if he had understood that his sky had not always been blue, nor his brook bright, but were the triumph of æons for him to sit and sing a little at, and still were becoming bluer, lovelier, for his sons' sons to tumble dumb and blub their bliss at; if he had felt himself, not the peasant of a village, but a civilian of that Infinite down whose bowels he was bounding with a thousand wings a thousand miles a minute that blessed day; then, you will say, the tone of his singing would have deepened, and from the pewit of penny-whistles and wren-twitterings would have grown to the roaring of oratorios and the vaunt of organs.

“Then, too, he would have been richer in pocket: for if, while he was making such music in his soul, some crude Jew of a duke had come saying, ‘Please pay me some rent — give me half the boots you cobble, and you’ll go to heaven,’ the cobbler would have answered, ‘What, old Rip, you about in this region of space? Sit down and let’s discuss it with some singing between.’ (“Teddy! Hurrah! Teddy!”)

“And suppose the cobbler had been freed of all fear? fear of to-morrow, of death, and hell?

“Suppose he had known that, so far from being an everlasting being, he was a being who could not last two seconds? that, beside those flights of spheres sweeping him on a heyday through the heaven of heavens, there was another scamper — of atoms — equally sweeping, inconceivably fleet, wheeling within him; that he was like a sand-form of the sand-storm, a rain of the gayest grains gyrating into such fugitive unions and dissolutions, that in four months he would be a totally different man — his ribs brand-new, his brain, his hair — and in four seconds by no means the same man: so that whatever calamity might befall him to-morrow would not be befalling — , but some body else — which only sounds fantastic since truth is in that strain, fairily romantic, Divinely wild.

“For the cobbler’s feeling that he was always the same being from the time when he was a quadruped, ‘crawling’ as a baby, then was a triped holding on to things, then was a biped, then in bent old age again became a triped with a stick, again tending to be a quadruped — this feeling was a pure illusion, due to the steady fleetness with which millions of cobblers succeeded each other like the flitting films of the cinematograph, each very like the last, yet different, whose steady swiftness causes us to suppose that we are watching one photograph of a horse jumping, when we are watching a hundred photographs; or like that steady swiftness of the globe which gave the cobbler the illusion of staying in the same place, when he was millions of leagues removed from where he had been a week before, and still with the swift’s wing was flitting through infinity: for the child is not the man; nor the father of the man; but the man’s ape-like ancestor.

“Suppose he had known this: that every stitch which he commenced some other cobbler finished, by an exquisite ‘division of labour’; that when he went to bed it was never to wake; and that what was true of him was true of his awl also, since at all instants all things are altering in a dreamland where all reels, and the dreamer is a dream, where everything is just freshly created, and there is no such thing as an old oak-tree, where an atom in this palm of mine may be from farther than the Pleiades, and ancients than the suns whose colliding belched this earth (for we are made of eternity, and have been at the ends of infinity), where the vast fallacy is to be flat and dull, and dull are you, and oh, dull am I, if we see this thing that we see, and are dull.

“But the man knew none of these truths: his nut was one vat of fatuous fancies: he was all in the revel and fairyland of Heaven, and thought himself in common cobblerland.

“If he had been conscious of some of this — as I once said to a Scotch girl when I was a boy: she came up to London to see an aunt, and in church on the Sunday her aunt whispered her in a confidential way: ‘That’s the clergyman who married your uncle and me.’ The next year she came up again, and again in church her aunt whispered her: ‘That’s the clergyman who married your uncle and me’ — causing the girl to wonder! for it was quite a different type of clergyman. And again the next summer she came, and again was whispered in confidence: ‘That’s the clergyman who married your uncle and me’ — another clergyman! ‘Hallo,’ thought the girl, ‘the wish must be father to the thought here, and the thought illegitimate’; and I remember saying to her, ‘What did it matter? whichever of the three had married her, she would still have been unmarried the day after, since he, the husband, would have been a different he, she a different she’ (“And the clergyman a different it,” whispered the Queen quick): for plasm, the stuff that palpitates and suffers, rages into alteration.

“This consciousness, then, you will say, would have lessened the cobbler’s laughable vast egoism, giving him that humility and Nirvana which goes with adoring and true religion, would have freed him from fears, and enlarged his happiness.

“Yes, but don’t forget the main fact here: that the cobbler was still happy — without all this consciousness; and, with all this consciousness, the philosopher, Herbert Spencer, was not happy. Why? Because he had indigestion. (“Teddy! Right there!”) “Shall we not say, then, that this healthy cobbler with Sankey and Moody singing in his heart was a better man than ten Spencers? more ‘right with God’ somehow? since happier? and a dog barking for gladness of heart a better being than ten Spencers? more right with God? Let us say this! as

Spencer would have said: and then you will better sympathise with some bits of my Edict. (“Teddy! You are our man!”)

“Are we not at present made of trumpery stuff? grumpy ugly stuff? — so many druggist-shops! hospitals! Nor is it difficult, I think, so to change it, that every lid shall lower with love in resting on every face, and that a pain shall be a strangeness. Let us try this, then: for it has already been successfully tried by barbarian tribes — Spartans — tribes of quite tiny brain-power compared with yours, but brains undrenched with quixotic dreads and crotchets of Laputa, seeing things level-headedly in daylight, not through mists and comic convex-mirrors.” (“Teddy! Don’t stop!”)

The Prince was glancing at his watch; and he said: “This minute the earth has entered the comet, men, and, you see, we are not poisoned, or anything. Oh, we are still infested with many dreads, like children and savages shrinking from things in the dark — let’s cast them off to-night, to confront with bright eyes this new era whose sunrise-beams stream on us.

“What must be the aims of that new age we have-discovered by analysing our cobbler: — first, health high to heaven; and next, waking up into philosophers and inventors: for, surely, the respected sayer of my text never meant: ‘Wake up a little, England! but for goodness’ sake keep one eye still shut awhile’?

“To be philosophers and inventors, then: for which you must have leisure, and you should have wealth. To have leisure I see that you need only one thing — a country of your own: to have wealth you need, I think, two things — a country of your own, and some new tools, by which you will make in an hour what you now make in two. A country of your own I will give you (“Teddy! Hurrah! Teddy!”); the tools you must invent for yourselves: I undertaking that whoever of you produces a really good new tool I will make of him a strutting duke.

“A little quickening of our wits’ activity will do it all; and we have it in us, I think. When they were digging the Simplon tunnel, they could make no headway, the rock was so tough, until some genius engineer suggested ‘Try English labour’; and then the tunnel was soon digged. Well, that’s your Englishman all over. Say to him, ‘Work like a serf with your hands, and I’ll give you three pounds,’ and he’ll answer: ‘Right you are, mister’; but tell him, ‘Work a little with your head, and you’ll see heaven coming down out of heaven,’ and he’ll answer, ‘Go on, what do you take me for?’ Yet I think that that grit and grimness which digged the tunnel will bring us out top-boy when it is forced into the direction of the discovery of truth. (“Right! Teddy!”)

“Wake up, then! Why is there already dissent at my suggestion that every child shall acquire five trades? There’s no difficulty. I myself know ten or twelve. I wonder if you men and women understand that those of you who can’t work in iron are uncivilised? this being the stock definition of civilised man—’ man of the iron age.’ Or do you suppose that rolling in a motor-car has any tendency to civilise a countess, any more than to civilise the poodle rolling on her knee? The question is, Can she make a motorcar? if she can’t, she is ‘out of it’ as regards motor-cars, though she roll till she’s a rolly-poly. For surely, if a man or woman can’t make castings, can’t even soften, harden or temper steel, can’t anneal, case-harden, upset, weld or braze iron, doesn’t even know how to make a chisel, a reamer, or a countersinker, has no kind of truck with iron but when he cuts his crust, how can he be said to belong to the iron age? he belongs to the stone age, and is essentially hairy, as he would admit with horror on a desert island, seeing there his face in the glass of God, and himself rapidly lapsing to frank savagery. And there are many thousands of men and women who consider themselves cultured — like a young man whom I knew, who in a beautiful poignant voice would repeat from some old Greek or Negro minstrel named Homer the Farewell of one Hickson to his wife Anne (“He has forgotten her maiden-name of ‘Dromache,’” the Queen whispered quick to the Princess), of which young man I discovered that, to the delight of the solar system, he did not know how to cut a screw, or tap a drill-hole — not even a suspicion of what education means having ever entered the heads of these essentially Chinese — Korean — Laputan — and profoundly uneducated Simple-Simons. Nor can I myself boast of culture, for, never having learned to work in land, I am in that respect nothing more than a nomad of the days of Abraham. However, mankind from Japan round to America and back is now about to ponder the sense of this word ‘educate,’ and to relearn its ABC in a new mood.

“Be quick, then! Wake! Why already is not every man, woman and youth among you an electrical engineer, say? (A voice: “Tall order, Teddy!”) Apparently, you know little of the matter! There’s no difficulty — a little semivoluntary quickening of yourselves. Anyone who will give up novels for three years can be that. As to novels, that, I think you will admit, is all nonsense, and I undertake that novels go under in England, if I do not. Anyway, you get not one out of me for ten years, by which time, I expect, your tastes will have changed: for, if I delight to spend my time in making an experiment, and you in mooning over George Meredith or Jules Verne, that’s not because I am the nobler born, but because I have been subjected to noble influences, and you to low. Subject you to the same, and you, too, will soon choose the infinitely romantic truth rather than the more or less ninny, sham-romantic myth. And just imagine that instead of every English man, woman, and schoolgirl writing a “novel,” as at present, each began to regard it as disgraceful to pass through life and die like a sheep without having, for his part, invented something, seen something really novel and peculiar to his existence — what a giddy gay England then!

“For consciousness of truth, I say, since it is consciousness of God, is joy: and to make a joyful noise in our hearts to Him, not because of any hotch-potch of Hindoo, Hebrew, Chinese and African fancies in us, but because of facts ascertained by white toilers — to make a joyful noise to Him — we can’t perhaps chant yet for a century or two, but already can kick up a sort of joyful shindy in us — and that’s life, mind, that’s delight, that’s civilisation, that’s cultivation, that’s waking up — blessed be His Name, faithful is He in all His ways. To this, then, men, I call you, and come tapping at your doors. The midnight time is past, or passing, for man, some spray and prickles of the dayspring already surprise the night: be up to witness the thing that the sunrise will be.

“I’m afraid the midnight and sunrise metaphor doesn’t quite run on all fours. Never mind, you understand. Goodnight. ‘The speech’ is speechified.”

For some moments after this all the hall sat mute; but soon after he had moved, in one corner of the stalls a chanting, low and slow and moody, started in which the words were discerned:

“He has saved us from harm”; and it ran like alcohol on fire, rose and rose, from droning to roaring, and suddenly screamed, every creature present leaping to his feet, as a tempest like Pentecost seemed to seize and possess the place, inflaming every breast, blazing in every brain, wrapping the platform, too, in its rapture, catching in its passion Her Majesty, too, who sprang and sang, catching in its rhapsody the Princess, who, spitting fire from her eyes, sprang and sang.

And once more, when it was over, it rose low, to be luxuriously rolled in the throat with rocking bodies, solemnly like a nocturne droned, and rose, and rose, and roared, and suddenly screamed:

“He has saved us from harm With his dreadful flails, With his stretched-out arm...”

The Prince alone was sitting, his lids lowered, thinking of Li Ku Yu.

Children of the Wind (1923)

Children of the Wind was first published by Grant Richards in London in 1923. Despite a conviction for child molestation in 1914, Shiel managed to maintain a professional relationship with Richards, who continued to publish his works. It is not known what exactly Richards knew as Shiel had not been honest with him regarding the details of the conviction. Shiel remained unrepentant about his sexual relationship with his twelve year old step-daughter and his second marriage to Esther Jewson collapsed in 1929 due to his sexual interest in Jewson's young female relatives.

In the years before he wrote Children of the Wind, Shiel had become increasingly interested and active in radical left wing politics. He had translated pamphlets for the Workers' Socialist Federation, which was a political party that had emerged from the early twentieth century Suffrage movement, led by the prominent communist, feminist and anti-fascist, Sylvia Pankhurst. Children of the Wind centres on the tale of a white woman becoming the 'Queen' of an African tribe and the subsequent adventures of her English cousin, who goes in search of her. It is an action-packed novel, although unfortunately it also contains many of the colonial and racially prejudiced beliefs prevalent in Britain at the time.

I. ROLLS

MR. R. WARREN Cobby writes in his diary (June 8th):

“Tea in the Carlton tea-room with Jeffson of the F. Office, when in walks Stead of the Bank, with a man of Greater-British type— “flash” hat, rather handsome person, black-bearded, blue-eyed, brown-baked — forty-five, fifty. Stead, on seeing me, throws up a finger, as who should say ‘the very man,’ and, coming to my table, introduced the colonial as ‘Mr. R. K. Rolls,’ adding: ‘By special request, Cobby.’

“‘Mr. Rolls knew of me,’ I remarked.

“‘That’s so, Mr. Cobby: happy to make your acquaintance,’ Rolls said, and we four had tea and talked, or three of us, for the tongue of my Rolls was still: not so the man’s eyes though, I noticed, for I think that nobody entered, went out, or moved in the place, that he did not see it — apprehensive, haunted perhaps I might say; and though one gets a general impression from his air and gait of a laggard and languid swagger, some of his motions and glances are as sharp as a panther’s — middle-sized man, straight in the legs, his blue eyes broody, sleepy — sleep of the spinning-top, perhaps — and written all over him ‘Experience.’

“He interested me — apart from my curiosity as to what the man wanted to know me for.

“‘You know Australia, I think, Mr. Rolls?’ I said to him.

“‘Oh, yes,’ he answered absently, eyeing under his brows a man who stood up some way off; adding: ‘African mainly, Mr. Cobby.’

“Stead put in: ‘Explorer, I think we may say, Mr. Rolls?’

“‘Well, not quite,’ Rolls said, twisting now quickly away to peer at someone coming in, then adding with a twinkle in his eye: ‘never mind, “explorer” is near enough.’

“Then Jeffson invited the trio of us to Jermyn Street, and thither the journey was — stupid waste of time and life! Inane people these super-clerks, and all their kind ‘about town.’ When they have forgotten Greek, there is nothing left in them, and before they forget there is nothing. Then, why associate with them? I won’t; not good enough: they waste life. Fifty of ’em aren’t worth one Rolls, I think. Dinner with them at ‘The Troc’; then ‘The Empire,’ to show girls in tights to Rolls, who has been in England only two weeks; but Rolls said that he was accustomed to see ‘more elegant’ legs than those without any tights on. Oh, the ‘Empire’! What’s Empire to me, or I to Empire? No, I was not amused. Then, walking up Regent Street, Rolls with me, the other two ahead, says Rolls: ‘Do me the honour to dine at my expense to-morrow?’

“‘The honour’ — ‘at my expense.’ If he had not said ‘at my expense,’ I should no doubt have said no, but this naïf, and so true, way of putting it won me, so that I answered: ‘Since you wish, Mr. Rolls. Why do you?’

“He looked about and behind before he answered: ‘You see, I know you better than you know me. Quite five years ago I did business with you, but you’ve forgotten; seen you several times before to-day. Then I’m a bit of a thought-reader in my way — “psychometrist,” they call it here — seen enough of that out there’ — throwing his hand toward the Equator: ‘I could tell you quite a lot about yourself.’

“‘Tell me something,’ I said.

“‘For one thing,’ he began, and then, quick as a wink, he span on his pins, calling out sharply to a man now close upon us: ‘Well, sir! How can I be of service to you?’

“I saw a big man in a cloak, whose collar covered his ears, he standing now with shoulders shrugged up high, his innocent palms expanded, a picture of French astonishment, and says he to Rolls: ‘Mister addresses himself to me by chance?’

“Rolls made no answer, peered into his face, looked him up and down, then said to me: ‘Come on’; on which the other laughed, with some effort, I fancied, and crossed the street, as we moved on.

“And presently Rolls remarked: ‘You see, we are of interest to others’; and when I asked him if he really believed that that man had been eavesdropping upon us, he answered: ‘I know.’

“‘What for, though?’ I asked him.

“This he did not answer, but said: ‘I was to tell you something about yourself: check me, if I go wrong. Age thirty-two. Residence, Tillington, Sussex. Living alone with a sister. Man of means — no need to swot at work. Yet you do. Hard worker, energetic, always glancing at the clock. If I didn’t know it otherwise, I could spot it from the roan red of that hair of yours, from the style it grows upward and backward in a thicket of wires that curl, or from that fresh flush of your colour, or from the style your elbows work up and down when you walk, like an engine on the jig. Stern worker. Proud of your head-piece. Proud of your Age and Continent. “Nourishing a youth sublime with the fairy-tales of Science” — quotation from a poet. Now engaged for the Government at Teddington in discovering the best camber for aeroplane-wings. Fond of flight, of rush, of getting things over and done. I know you. For wealth you care nothing — —’

“‘Don’t I, though, by Jove,’ I said: ‘love wealth — any form of Energy. Wealth is stored Force, Power, that is, God, and is well named goods; is potential Energy — Power to do good to oneself and others.’

“‘Well said,’ Rolls muttered: ‘yet you have two or three rich relatives, one of them’ — he flung a flying glance behind— ‘an emperor of wealth — a cousin — and little you bother about him, because he’s not of the intellectual set. And you have another cousin — female cousin’ — now he put his lips to my ear— ‘a Queen, this one — —’

“I could not help laughing out at the earnestness with which he imparted this absurdity; and I said to him: ‘No, there the “thought-reading” is miscarrying: no female cousin — certainly no queens in the family.’

“He did not answer at once, but then suddenly patted my arm, saying: ‘I may see fit to tell you more when we are better acquainted.’

“Soon after which, having arranged to meet to-morrow at the Hotel Cecil, we parted; and I walked back home by the Embankment under a black sky bright with Sirius and the three present planets.”

II. ROLLS STABBED

THE NEXT NIGHT Cobby and Rolls duly dined together; and Cobby writes of it:

“Such a care about the selection of the table! for Rolls must have one in a corner, whence to survey all the salle à manger.

“When this had been obtained, I showed him the note that had come to me by the morning’s post, on which Rolls produced spectacles, saying, as in apology: ‘I have the best of eyesight in sunlight, Mr. Cobby, but artificial light bowls me over for reading purposes.’ Then he muttered over the note ‘type-written,’ and read it half-aloud drawingly: ‘The man, R. K. Rolls, is nothing else than a common jail-bird, well-known in the Rand as an assassin, a slave-trader, a swindler and thief, a scoundrel of the deepest dye. To be connected in any shape or form with this dirty rascal spells certain disaster. Be warned in time, Cobby. A well-wisher.’

“Looking at Rolls, as he read, I saw his eyes twinkle. ‘Oh, well,’ he said, taking off the spectacles, ‘you evidently don’t reckon me up to be as black as I’m painted, or you’d not be here.’

“I told him no, that such a communication is without weight for me.

““Then, we need say no more about it,’ he said, and: ‘May I keep this pleasant missive?’ and, on my saying yes, put it inside his watch.

“Then I had quite a pleasant evening with him. Though not exquisite in culture outside, he exhibits considerable shrewdness of wit on things in general, a sound sense, a trained intelligence, and such a storehouse of memories and world-lore as render him really an entertaining person, his lips once unsealed. I found myself liking, admiring, him — so much, that when he expressed a wish to feel what flight is like, I immediately offered to take him into the air, he to come to-morrow to the aerodrome. It is not true that he is a rogue: I know better. Of the anonymous note he said nothing more until the dinner was over, we then smoking ‘long Toms,’ as he called them, cigar-sticks which he produced out of a tube of leopard-skin, his dress-clothes being constructed with quite a number of pockets apparently; and now he said to me: ‘I suppose you couldn’t reckon up who it was sent you that pleasant missive?’

“I said no, how could I without data? on which he, his voice dropping to secrecy: ‘That comes from a cousin of yours.’

“This had the effect of tickling me, and I said, ‘Really! You people the world with my cousins, Rolls?’

“‘I have only mentioned two all told,’ he answered— ‘a male and a female.’

“‘I think I have only one cousin,’ I told him— ‘a Yankee — millionaire — man named Douglas Macray — —’ “‘Let’s talk low,’ he muttered; and added: ‘he is our man, sir.’

“‘Well, but,’ I said, ‘the man does not know me’; but then, remembering something, I mentioned that he knew of me, since, some years ago, I got from him an invitation to a ball, but didn’t go; on which Rolls said: ‘Aye, always giving big parties, fond of fal-lals and high jinks, especially in Paris. You’ve called him “a Yankee,” but he’s only half that, since, as you know, his mother and yours were English sisters, and he has mostly lived in France. Curious you never chanced to drop across him. I’ll introduce him now to you.’”

“On this Rolls picked something from a pocket, and, holding it within his fist, brought his fist into contact with my palm, on which he left a disc of cardboard, and I saw the photograph of a man of thirty or so — bearded — something hard-headed, cynical, self-seeking (I fancied) — man of some draught and horse-power, tearing toward his own ends — or that was my impression — something flat and flabby about the upper lip, as though he lacked upper teeth....

“Rolls, taking back the photograph as clandestinely as he had handed it, said: ‘That’s Douglas Macray — that’s the gentleman. Never saw him in the flesh myself: but that’s he.’

“‘Well, what about him?’ I asked. ‘Why are you and he bad friends?’

“‘Because’ — he tossed down his ‘long Tom’ with emphasis— ‘I refuse to be bribed by his dirty hand; and because he drops to it why I am in England, and wants to bottle me up.’

“‘Why are you in England?’

“‘Mainly to get you.’

“‘How do you mean “get” me, Rolls,’ I demanded.

“‘Get you out yonder, — he nodded away toward one of the continents.

“‘Get me to go to Africa?’ I asked.

“‘That’s about it.’

“‘You won’t do that, Rolls,’ I told him.

“On which he muttered, with his eyes cast down: ‘Leave it at that for the present. Maybe when I see my way to put my cards down, you won’t be off it. A Red Kaffir inyanga — that’s a doctress — predicted that what I am now on would come off all right, though I might die in the attempt, said she. Well, you don’t believe in inyangas, and yet I could tell you a tale or two — —’

“‘That’s right,’ I said, ‘tell me tales ... though, of course, I am trained to believe in white people, not in black.’

“But this as little influenced his conviction as it unfixed the sculpture of those tough and weather-beaten wrinkles of his face. ‘Well, no doubt,’ he answered: ‘but it appears, Mr. Cobby, that we are made with two minds — the conscious mind has talent, and finds things out, but the subconscious, that’s really the cleverer fellow of the two, has genius, and knows, without swotting to find out: this being true, not only of humans, but of horses, dogs, elephants. I know a little Basuto pony that foreknew the date of his master’s death — he now proceeded to relate several tales of African occultism, but without presenting any proof of their truth, while we each smoked another ‘long Tom,’ he finishing up with the advice, ‘Don’t despise the negro, Mr. Cobby,’ and with the statement: ‘After all, the savage is ahead of the civilized.’

“This dictum disappointed me in him, as I had thought better of his intelligence; but even here it turned out that he had a meaning, and he can be very convincing when he sets himself to prove. He said: ‘That, to you, is all-out nonsense, no doubt. But reflect a bit: what is it that all are after — all dogs, men, Martians, angels? “Happiness,” you’ll say, since nothing else can possibly be of any interest to any life for one instant. Yonder hangs a Christ on his Cross: what’s he there for? The good of others? Sure thing: but that’s what makes him happy, look; and he bears the nails, that “he may see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied,” or happy. Or look at that man yonder flying from a prairie-fire — staring he is, crazy for life; then look yonder at that other holding a revolver at his forehead: both flying from sorrow, both after happiness. Same with you brooding in your laboratory: for you the discovery of truth spells happiness, and your interest in truth is an interest in happiness: for why should you care more for truth than for untruth, for pudding more than for putty, for any one thing more than for any other thing, but that truth and pudding make for happiness? Happiness is the aim of the race of life; and, of course, those nearer the aim are ahead of those not so near.'

"To this I readily agreed, since really it is an axiom; but asked him if he considered savages happier than I; to which he answered: 'No, not than you; but such as you aren't Civilized Man: you're an accident of civilization. Like you are half a million, say, in England — foreigners looking on at the forty million real English inspanned to the buck-waggon of England, dragging at the trek-tow, sweating great drops. Well, of course, that's not practical politics; that's no chop any road: Unhappy is the name of it. Hence, when the crew of the Endeavour made acquaintance with Otahito, some of 'em did a bunk, thinking: "No more England for us." But when I say that the savage is "ahead," don't take me for a fool. Here is a river, the river of life' — he drew it in pencil on the table-cloth— 'and here is the sea to the East. Let the sea represent Happiness, Bliss and no end. Well, the river runs East to A, and at A is the savage; but then it winds back West toward B, and between A and B is the civilized: evidently A is nearer the sea, and so ahead of B, but B is further on nearer bliss, and so ahead of A. At B, as I pan it out, the river breaks into cataracts and rapids — revolution there — civilized man grabbing the planet's crust out of the grasp of the foreign onlookers who now hold it, and thence the course toward Happiness may be rapid, and the savage soon be nowhere in comparison. The same may be true of the two minds — the conscious, and the subconscious. As life in becoming civilized, has lost something for a time, so, in becoming intelligent, it has lost something: dogs and horses are more psychic, or "sensitive," as they say, than men, and will see an apparition quicker, and black men more than white men. But maybe when the river of Mind turns again toward the sea, men may be more psychic than any dog for being more intelligent, just as they will be all the more happy for being civilized.

So I pan it out. Don't look round suddenly: one of the enemy has entered — the man at the table behind that lady with the diamond spray.'

"I glanced, and saw a young man, who might have been a Neapolitan count — handsome, but for his loutish, foul mouth. He was in talk with a garçon, and seemed to be thinking of anything but Rolls.

"‘One of the enemy,’ I said: ‘who are they? and — how do you know?’

"‘Agents of Macray,’ he answered, ‘who is out to get me, and it's no chop when a rascal has power. How I know? By the movement of an eyelid. Besides, I live here, and so does yonder carrion-crow.’

"All this I found difficult to realize; and, reverting to the previous question, asked him if he was sure that the savage is the happier.

"‘Down to the ground sure!’ was his answer: ‘your savage is likelier to die sudden, I admit: but you come with me to Basutoland, that belongs to the nation like the air, and for every rag and groan in Glasgow or Bethnal Green you will see a grin of gladness, and a toe that dances. “Here,” the Barotse say, “hunger is not known.” Or come with me — Yes, I think I may tell you now of another country: Wo-Ingwanya — but don't pronounce the “I,” Ngwanya say; the people are Wa-Ngwanya; one of them is a Mo-Ngwanya; their language is Se-Ngwanya. Far up country — South-Central Africa — not far from the Indian Ocean— “Children of the Elephant,” they call themselves, either because they are Zulu in origin, or because of an enormous rock, bigger than London, that stands on four low legs; but I in my own mind always call them “Children of the Wind,” because in those uplands the breezes of heaven don't cease from streaming through their feathery head-dress, breathing upon their faces health and freshness — at least, they didn't during the weeks I was there — and sometimes terrific tempests visit them. It is sixteen years since I first heard of that country, and then I heard one and another assert that no such country is on earth; ey, but there is that country, for not nineteen months gone I was in it with a caravan of negroid Arabs, and saw the men inlay metals — noblest lot of blacks I've dropped upon. They trekked north, like Umzilikaze; but long before Chaka's day — before any Zulu King whose name is known to us; yet are so conservative, that I could still drop to much of their lingo. Well, those darkies are in Paradise in comparison with St. Pancras — scream with laughter of heart in the face of sun and moon, their moochas of ox-tails and plumes of ostrich and saccaboola feathers, that stream on the breezes, seeming to scream with laughter, too — so long as they don't get killed, look, by enemies, or by "our mother" — that's their ruler: for she's a devil of a despot. "Our mother" owns each inch of Wo-Ngwanya for her people, and is paid rent for it; no man may say "this acre is mine"; and that's where the laughter comes from, if I am a man that knows anything. Eh, but she's a hot un, is "our mother"; I ought to know: the beggar sentenced me to death — ugliest bit of road I've yet got over. If a Mo-Ngwanya girl slips, without "our mother's" consent, that's a sure case of "off with her head" — harsh, bloody. And who do you think "our mother" is?" — here Rolls laid his hand on mine, hard, with the knuckles whitened— 'You'd never guess; hear it now: girl of seventeen — eighteen by this time. White girl. Hear her name: Spiciewegiehotiu.'

"His voice had risen and risen, his eyes had brightened, and he uttered this procession of a name, 'Spiciewegiehotiu,' in such a crescendo of loudness, that most of the diners glanced our way. It seemed to be uttered in defiance and challenge, the defiance of one breaking through long restraint, for at the same time fire shot out of his eyes toward the Neapolitan-looking man seven yards away. Immediately afterwards he smiled on me, nodded, rose, and saying: 'Back in two minutes,' walked away out.

"A minute afterwards I saw the foreigner also saunter out.

“Well, Rolls did not return in ‘two minutes’ — I wished that he would, for just then I felt sick at my second ‘long Tom’ — horridly strong and raw — and presently I became aware of some commotion in the entrance-hall west of me — running feet, calls — so, among others, I hurried out to see, and there by the Office stood a mob, craning to see something in their midst, the hotel-people fussing about, begging them to stand back.

“I, being taller than most, soon caught sight of a form— ‘the enemy,’ the Neapolitan — lying unconscious, and one of the diners, probably a doctor, kneeling near, whom I heard say: ‘Only a faint — right arm broken’; and I understood that the injured must have been on the way to seek aid for his arm, but had fainted before reaching the portal.

“When I went to him, I saw him rather pallid under his tan, rather scant of breath, and, showing me a dagger, he told me, ‘I went to the lavatory — thought myself alone — he stabbed me in the back with this — I cracked his arm.’ He showed me some blood on his fingers.

“‘Come,’ I said, and led him toward the front, where a crowd and two constables were now watching the foreigner being carried into a cab for hospital; and Rolls I soon had in a cab for Essex Court, where, after ‘phoning Dr. Hammond to come, I undressed Rolls; but the wound, an island in an ocean of tattooing, I at once saw to be of no importance, so ‘phoned Hammond not to bother, and dressed it myself.

“‘But what about the legal aspect?’ I then said to Rolls: ‘this is London in Europe.’

“‘Oh, the incident is ended,’ Rolls said, putting on his vest: ‘it’s no chop my charging him, and he, you may bet, won’t charge me. May the stink-cats all catch it as hot, and may the devil get their master, his son.'

"I gave him to drink, and he stayed with me, telling tale after tale of venture and escape, funds of lore, till eleven, then went back to the hotel, saying he'd be at the aerodrome at two, I soon to hear more of his Spiciewegiehotiu, or 'Hot Spice,' I called that lady, 'our mother.' Rolls is a man, and not at all a bad sort."

III. ROLLS LAID LOW

THE NEXT DAY Cobby duly flew Rolls over London; after which the relation between the two became more established. Rolls spending several evenings at Cobby's chambers, bringing along his own peach-brandy — for himself to sip, alcohol being not often good enough for Cobby; and it was when Cobby was one evening expecting Rolls for the fifth of these visits, that he heard his door-handle wrenched, his door slammed, and on rushing out to his hall, found Rolls there standing with his back on the door, short of breath, and blanched.

“Hurt, Rolls?” Cobby cried out.

“Don't think so,” Rolls answered on a pant. “They got me on the stair — rushed me from No. 7 door.... Two I treated with the naked mauleys — the third chased me up — fired twice — air-gun — tore my sleeve, see — they wear silent shoes — I hadn't time to draw....”

Indignant blood rushed to Cobby's forehead. “We'll do the attacking!” he cried, running in, to return with a small Colt's.

“You keep out of it” — Rolls held his sleeve.

“This is intolerable!” Cobby said, with a florid forehead— “come on — rout 'em out.”

But Rolls held him. “They are under cover — it's no chop fighting on ground chosen by the enemy. Wait — wary's the word. I reckon they'll be getting me in the end, but let that cost them something.... How would they have got into No. 7?”

Cobby explained that No. 7 had been unoccupied, and must now have been taken by, or for, one of the gang; but complaint at the Inn-office the next day would rid the Temple of them. Meantime the police ...

But these, bespoken over the telephone, failed to find anyone at No. 7; and Cobby, nervous for Rolls' life, would not let him go; so Rolls, for the first time, slept that night in the chambers.

That was the night of the 2nd August.

On the night of the 7th, Rolls was "got," as he would have said.

Near nine he was walking up Essex Street — his usual route for Cobby's — lonely at that hour, obscure at some points — when he was stabbed in the abdomen — mysteriously, for not a living thing did he see near him. Any nerve less trained in alertness than he, any adventurer less veteran in the trick and luck of escape, would doubtless have been laid dead at once; but something or other caused him suddenly to spring upward, and, instead of in the breast, he was hit below.

He contrived to rise, to stagger and drag himself to the Temple not far, to knock at Cobby's "oak," as formally as if nothing had happened. But as he knocked, he fell; and some moments afterwards, before the door was opened, Cobby, who had been out, darted up the stair, and there before the door saw the poor man prostrate in sorry case. Rolls sighed: "I think I'm done for."

The effect of this upon Cobby, who was hot-headed and full-blooded, was to cause him to dash into a passion at outrages of this sort done in his own London; and he vowed vengeance. But for days Rolls could give no lucid account of what had taken place, the police appeared to be beaten, and no vengeance was taken. Indeed, during two whole days Rolls was delirious, the doctors anxious; but he was too tough a catgut to snap at one tug, and the days of danger passed.

Soon after which he breathed feebly to Cobby: "I've brought no end of a bobbery upon you, haven't I? — coming here. You were so much nearer — and I reckoned you'd want me to."

Cobby, busy as he was by nature, would stay an hour by the bedside, and himself help in Rolls' nursing, till the evening when Rolls was wheeled out to the work-room, when he said to Cobby: "Aye, I think I can drop now to it how they got me. From a motor-car. A rod running in sockets to push out, and a spike or two on the rod to stab with ... I think I remember a car passing, and I distinctly remember making a spring: I must have caught half a glimpse of something in the half-dark — I can't swear. Well, in the end they'll do me in, no doubt, since they're so down on it."

"Miscreants!" Cobby muttered, running his fingers through the backwoods of his hair: "if we could do them in ... But, as we seem unable to, you cut and run, Rolls. That will be horrible, if, when you get well, you are again — —"

"I have always stood up to my man so far," Rolls said, "and am not for turning tail now. The worst of my trouble is that I've brought you, too, into it. Promise me now that you'll not go out unarmed."

"That is foreign to me, Rolls," Cobby answered, looking not unlike the boy in "Bubbles," robed in a camel-hair dressing-gown, and launching into the air a bubble bigger than a trunk, a great globe of glories and glammers, gas-blown, he then experimenting on the surface-tension of bubbles at a lengthy table littered with a tangle of apparatus under bright lamplight: "I don't want to go armed in God's good Fleet Street, nor do I yet understand why these clowns should wish to meddle with me."

Reclined under a rug in a lounge-chair on the other side of the table, Rolls answered: "You see, they pan it out that I'll never play it a lone hand, undertaking a trek to that country so far in the interior without one white companion; and if Douglas Macray once reckons that you are wiring in with me, his cutthroats will sure be after you, too."

"But am I wiring in with you?" Cobby demanded. "You see that I have interests here."

With eyes trained sideways upon him, Rolls watched a little that dainty handicraft before replying: "The thing's worth doing. Seven millions sterling: of which I reckon upon one for me, and one for you, if we put it over."

"How? Tell me now," said Cobby, pausing in the work to stand with his arms akimbo.

And Rolls, after some hesitancy, remarked: "Nurse will be still asleep ... Very well, we'll talk of that country.... You know that your mother's two sisters married two brothers. Jane marrying James Macray, and Ismene marrying Rob Macray. Rob being considerably the elder, his rascal of a son, Douglas Macray, was nine or ten before James married your aunt Jane — I know the whole jimbang of it, for about then I was well in with James in the Witwatersrand, where he laid the foundations of his fortune. Rob, he never had much wealth — once went bankrupt in Chicago — and our swell Douglas Macray would be a nobody to-day, if he wasn't in possession of somebody else's money. Aye, somebody else's, look — not his own — the money of Spiciewegiehotiu."

"Ah! Hot Spice," went Cobby.

"Hot spice — that's pepper — is what she is. Eh, she'd have that rascal's head off as sweet and clean — —"

"But how was it? Tell me."

“You remember the loss of the Florida?”

“Let me see — Yes, yes, of course — I was eighteen — she vanished — my aunt Jane was lost — —”

“And your uncle-in-law, James Macray, and his daughter, your cousin, Flora Macray: the Florida being James Macray’s 5,000-ton yacht, in which, with a party, he was globe-trotting, going to Japan; but after touching at Somaliland they were caught in one of those easterly Indian Ocean storms, to which they had to turn tail; and to this day the timbers of the wreck of that craft remain on the African coast, for I’ve seen them.”

Cobby lowered himself to sit, saying: “I gather, then, that this Hot Spice is Flora Macray?”

“That’s so. James Macray’s dollars, inherited by his brother Rob, and then by Rob’s son, Douglas, whose name, too, should be Rob, for ’tis his nature too — those dollars now being spent to murder me for knowing too much — are dollars of Spiciewegiehotiu, every cent, by her father’s will — —”

“He was drowned, then — and my aunt?” Cobby asked eagerly.

“No, not drowned, I think. The Florida grounded inside a half-harbour, and probably all hands were saved. They were received, and not badly treated for some weeks, by Daisy, King of M’Niami, a man still alive, for I’ve done Konza to him, and given the beggar ivory — this Daisy being the neighbour to the north-east of Spiciewegiehotiu, and now lives in terror of her sceptre and butting horns, though twelve years ago she was a kid of six in his hands, and with a wink he could have sent her to the kingdom of heaven.... Well, sir, after the Florida lot had been with Daisy some weeks, Daisy suddenly receives a request from the King of Wo-Ngwanya to hand over to him the white child then in Daisy’s great-place, in exchange for five hundred Wo-Ngwanya cattle. Now, this was an all-out rum request; and, as at that time Daisy's M'Niami were considered a more powerful crowd than the Wa-Ngwanya, Daisy scratched his wool and demurred — couldn't drop to what the bobbery was about! the real reason being, that a certain woman of the Wa-Ngwanya, named Mandaganya, had months before had some sort of premonition that a 'lamb coming up out of the water' would make Wo-Ngwanya great — that being what 'Spiciewegiehotiu' means, 'Lamb come up out of water.' This Mandaganya, too, I know, by the way — a remarkable woman, I assure you — big, grand being — highly intelligent — and if ever there was a medium, or 'sensitive,' or 'psychic,' as you call 'em here, it is that woman. That woman has outraged the moral sense of all Wo-Ngwanya, all her fifteen children, except two, having different fathers — a capital offence there — yet her influence in the State remains immense, she being the chief of the College of Doctors — a triumph of personality. Her two children by one father are Sueela and a little brisk beast, sharp as a needle with two points, who is the executioner — a little ink-black beast whose limbs seem oiled, whose close acquaintance I almost made, by George. The flash of that falchion of his will have a head pitching away in one swift swish, and then, his right leg bent before him, his left leg stiff behind him, he'll glance up sharp, as if asking everybody 'how's that for a wonner?' and then the next, and the next — brisk as a flea! and his sister Sueela is Spiciewegiehotiu's pet and weakness; sprig of seventeen, Sueela — ah! you must see Sueela — Venus, my boy — Venus is the thing's name, not Sueela. Spiciewegiehotiu's fondness for her is a scandal in Wo-Ngwanya, by the way, for Sueela's mother, the inyanga, comes from the dregs of the people, so — —"

"But about the Florida people," Cobby interrupted, glancing at the clock.

"Aye, that's the point," Rolls said: "pull me up when I get long-winded. I have a soft spot for that country, and no doubt am apt to gas about my memories of it— ‘Children of the Wind’ I name ’em, dwelling there in this twentieth century among the wrecks of a civilization ancient as Abraham, maybe — relics of pyramid, temple — and, the sweet winds that sweep them — I might do worse than sleep eternally under the turf of those uplands, if those that sleep can be hearing the breezes breathe through the trees at midday and at midnight. But I was telling you — the King of Wo-Ngwanya, panning it out that the white child at Daisy’s great-place was the ‘lamb come up washed out of the water,’ demands her of Daisy; Daisy, for his part — —”

But at this point a nurse looked in to claim Rolls, and would not be disobeyed. “Here’s another Spicey,” muttered Rolls, moving out with her, while another moon covered over with Constantinoples of topaz and opal floated aloft from Cobby’s bubble-blower.

IV. THE “CASTLE” LINER

BUT DURING THE two following nights, Cobby had from Rolls the whole story — how Daisy, King of M’Niami, refused to send the white child to Wo-Ngwanya, having been warned by the whites of the Florida that, if he separated the child from her parents, the white Knulu-knulu (great-great God) would be down upon him, whereas, if he refused to send her, all would go well with him. By this advice he was guided: whereupon, war — Wo-Ngwanya warning Daisy that, if one hair of the white lamb was harmed, then, the Wo-Ngwanya army, if victorious, would not fail to raze Daisy’s great-place to the ground. And Wo-Ngwanya was victorious: whereupon Daisy, in a passion of anger against the Florida unfortunates for their false prophecy, and for all the disaster it had brought upon his head, turned round and put them all to death, except the little one, whom, on capitulating, he handed over to Wo-Ngwanya.

“Eh,” said Rolls to Cobby, “but that King of Wo-Ngwanya was cutting a stick for the back of his own royal house, look. Spiciewegiehotiu was no lamb come up out of any water — dragon more like — Machiavelli — Napoleon — and proved one too many for that royal house. The prophecy of the inganya Mandaganya that ‘the lamb’ would make Wo-Ngwanya ‘great’ has proved abundantly true, for when Spicie entered it, that country was no bigger than Bucks; now she can put into the field 180,000 of the bravest warriors — can and does put, for like a butting goat she has pushed and butted, north and east, and west, till that country may now make a map broader than Wales. But her idea was to make Wo-Ngwanya great for herself and her ‘children,’ the Wa-Ngwanya, not for the reigning house; and she was not much over sixteen when her scheming and intriguing broke out in the deuce of a bobbery. She got round the King, who now had cancer, to proclaim her his President of the Council at a new-moon ceremony; upon which two of the King’s three brothers, and his only son — a lad of nineteen — took flight by night with a troop of followers from Eshowe — that’s the royal kraal, or capital — in order to bring three regiments from the North upon Eshowe, seize the power, and get hold of Spiciewegiehotiu and Mandaganya, whose designs they were quite up to. Well, your troop of indunas gallop full bat through a night and day, they reach the regiments, they hold an indaba — that’s a debate — of officers in a forest at midnight, decide what to do, and to do it quick; and, as the indaba is about over, one of the assembly stands up, points at the princes, and commands, ‘arrest the traitors’ — Spiciewegiehotiu, wrapped in an officer’s kaross, her face blackened; and with her her Sueela. She rode back to Eshowe at the head of one of the regiments, the three princes prisoners in its midst.”

Cobby over his work murmured “efficient,” and Rolls dodged one of the bubble-worlds which Cobby constantly created and launched.

“Aye,” Rolls said— “has a sense of the value of seconds, and will always be a minute ahead of her enemy. She had reached the three regiments only one half-hour before the princes, within which interval she had done a world of work and winning. The third of the King’s brothers, Dzinikulu, who related to me all this, told me that Sueela on her knees entreated Spiciewegiehotiu to kill the three princes there and then, but that Spicie, who always knows just how far she dares go at any juncture, and goes to the limit of that, but no farther, would not kill — bided her time. But she suffered for this: for soon afterwards she was poisoned — only scraped through by the skill of the doctress, Mandaganya — and for two months it was as much as the sick King could do to keep Spiciewegiehotiu living — plot after plot. Then one midnight the King dies; Spicie still sick from poison; and quick the four princes rush, silently invest the sigodhlo — that's the royal enclosure — with troops that they have waiting ready, so to make sure of Spiciewegiehotiu. And now they look through the sigodhlo for Spicie, they ransack it: no Spicie. Spicie has fled, Sueela fled, Mandaganya fled — gone by a little back-way in the very nick of time. The princes give chase; scour the country; they cannot drop upon Spiciewegiehotiu. A rumour comes to them that Spicie has fled north-east to the garrison brigades on the M'Niami frontier, and is marching against them, with a force of 12,000 assegais; on which, with overwhelming numbers, they rush to encounter and crush these regiments. But while butting about, looking for this force, they come to know that it has given them the slip, and is now with Spiciewegiehotiu at the great-place, Eshowe, together with other forces. Back to Eshowe they rush, to crush her there. When they arrive in sight of Eshowe, at ten in the night, they see it all a sea of torches; it sends out to them a sound of carousing, of shield-beating, and drum-beating, dancing and fal-lals. They become aware that Spiciewegiehotiu has that evening been proclaimed Queen of Wo-Ngwanya: and they prepare to invest and besiege Eshowe. Meantime, hundreds on hundreds of emissaries are being sent out from Eshowe to their regiments, by Spiciewegiehotiu, with messages — let them not besiege Eshowe — let them march in — are not the gates flung wide for them? Let them come and kill her, let them come and kill the white lamb washed come up from the water, let them come and kill Wo-Ngwanya, let them come and kill the mother and luck of the Wa-Ngwanya — is not her bosom bared? bared are the young mother-breasts that suckle them — let them come and pierce it with hundreds of spear-points, that they may feel like sons and heroes. And the fakement works all right. As you know bubbles and sub-atoms, so she knows her Wo-Ngwanya, and can move the mass of it with her finger, as a chit's touch launches a ship. Though she has her forces posted out of sight about the town to pounce upon the enemy, if necessary, it isn't necessary, for, as the princes' impi marches upon Eshowe, the populace of Eshowe swarm out to call and talk to it; it thaws, dissolves, and walks off like waters; and in a frantic scene of timbrels and dancing, breast clutched to brother's breast, it enters the gates of Eshowe to the great square, at the top of which Spiciewegiehotiu sits throned within a glare and smoke of flambeaux, tired and sick and pallid, but smiling, seeing prostrate before her feet the manhood of Wo-Ngwanya, hearing howled to heaven from ten thousand throats the roar 'Bayeté! — Sovereign!' And in the midst of it the princes — for the second time — her prisoners."

Now Cobby paused to stare, and suddenly muttered again: "Efficient, that chit."

"Aye," said Rolls— "and now she saw herself strong enough to strike.
After a trial that lasted ten days, a trial on which the entire nation hung in a hush of suspense, she sentenced to death three of the four princes, reprieving only, from some motive of policy, Dzinikulu, the late King's third brother. After the trial, tears, entreaties, warnings, were poured out before her by chiefs and headmen to win her to spare the princes; but Spiciewegiehotiu was deaf to them all, and, as that brisk little beast, Sandelikatze, Sueela's brother, the executioner, swished off the three heads, and glanced up sharp, asking 'how's that?' — I've seen the beast — a howl of dismay went up from Eshowe, seeing that flow of great-great gore, and like one man Wo-Ngwanya clapped hand to mouth at it, and stood dumb.
The Wa-Ngwanya are pretty fickle, emotional and touchy; and there were some local insurrections, which Spiciewegiehotiu did not crush, but, by quickly picking a quarrel with Sebingwe, a King to the north-west, and quickly declaring war, turned the thoughts of everybody from the internal bobbery. And ever since it has been drill, drill, and war, war, with her; nor she don't sit still at Eshowe and send out her impis: under her eye they fight, with her strategy — —”

“Bloody young person,” Cobby observed.

“Public-spirited, I call it,” Rolls replied. “She don't consider that she is there for the good of humanity, look, but for her ‘children,’ who pay her — is there to make them happy and top-dog; and there's no end to her public-spiritedness, to her devotion to the Wa-Ngwanya, to the anxiety of her forehead for them.”

“She has quite a hero-worshipper, Rolls,” Cobby remarked with a smile.

“Well, no doubt I am a bit shook on the girl, though I ought to hate the beggar — —”

“Why, then, did she sentence you?”

“Only for proposing to her to let me bring her to Europe — nothing more. She seems, by the way, to have as strong a colour-prejudice against us whites as her father probably had against niggers — as good as told me so in four English words — and very strange it was suddenly to hear that English uttered in Wo-Ngwanya — while I stood before her judgment-seat: up she cocks one eye, trying to remember English, and then, wrinkling up her nose, says she: ‘Hwhite — mans — is — stink.’ The retort leapt to my mouth, ‘And what about white girls? They're worse’ — eh, but R. K. Rolls was too old a fowl, thank God, to give it tongue. Aye, she had me in chokey six bitter days under sentence of death inside a continent of a rock that they call ‘The Elephant’; and what do you think saved me? Seven matches — the last I had. An inspiration came to me to send them as a present, and they so fascinated her, that she let me off, but banished me, commanding me never more to set foot in Wo-Ngwanya.”

“I see — you proposed to bring her to civilization,” Cobby said: “you had discovered that she is Flora Macray. How had you?”

“Oh, everything proved it. She remembered the name of the Florida, the name ‘Flora,’ though not the name ‘Macray.’ I told her I had known her father, and she showed me his photo in a locket — there’s no doubt. Of course, I saw at once that there was big money in it — as well as justice — if I could get her home: for if I could make her sign to tip me one million out of seven, that would be fair — —”

“But when you offered her the lion’s share, she forced upon you the ‘Elephant’s’ portion,” Cobby put in.

“Ho! Well put,” Rolls cried— “that’s how it pans out. However, I was no sooner out of Wo-Ngwanya, with my head still on, than I was playing to get her yet, and, when next in the Witwatersrand, I set about getting together an expedition to kidnap my lady. But I blabbed — a bit. Funds being low just then, I approached Schartz, the financier — didn’t let on where that country lies, you may bet, but I let out ‘Florida,’ let out ‘Flora Macray.’ Schartz he had vowed to be mum, but I now know that he was in with the Douglas Macray crowd; and a hint of the fakement actually got into the Cape Times. He suggested to me to sell my knowledge to the enemy, and lie low ever after, mentioned £20,000, and when I wouldn’t look at it, he steered off, the expedition looked sick, and, to top it all, I found myself with Douglas Macray’s knife in me. His arm, reaching from Paris, just nearly made me a deader one evening in the Johannesburg Exchange Bar. It was then that I said to myself: ‘Cobby!’”

Cobby rushed his fingers through his leonine bush of hair, shook his head rather irritably. “Leave me out of it, Rolls. I — can’t. Beside this surface-tension of bubbles, I am counting the droplets in vapour-clouds with Stokes; and, then, the Government — No, no, leave me out.”

“Still, you are coming slowly round, I can see,” Rolls remarked with a twinkle.

“I am — not, Rolls,” said Cobby.

“You don’t want me to be assassinated in a London street — that’s why.”

“No, that’s true, I don’t, I don’t.”

“Therefore, you’ll come. What’s the good of bubbles? This is solid cash, this proposition — not bubbles. With a million of Spiciewegiehotiu’s money in your bank, you could blow bubbles as big as this building. And, then, justice, Cobby. Your cousin. Isn’t it a duty?”

Bent over his work-table, after a while Cobby replied: “I don’t see that it is a duty to kidnap anyone. The girl is free, and if she doesn’t want — Moreover, my head is of some value, apparently; I am not anxious to have it hacked off by the little brisk man who glances up and asks ‘how’s that?’”

“I’ll look after your head,” remarked Rolls.

“What would have become of your own, if you had had no matches?” Cobby demanded; “I hope they were safety matches: they deserved that name.”

“Ho!” broke out of Rolls, in whom laughter was a rare and a volcanic event.... “Oh, Jimmy! the wound hurts when I laugh.”

“I make painful jokes, I see,” Cobby remarked, on which yet another “Ho!” broke out of Rolls in a pain of explosion.

Then Cobby’s grandfather’s-clock struck eleven; his man bore in a supper, consisting mostly of bread and cheese — for so Cobby lived — and, as they sat at table, he asked of Rolls: “But is she — fair at all to look upon, this minx, my cousin?”

“Spiciewegiehotiu is a beauty,” Rolls solemnly asserted. “She is —— Did your mother’s family, by the way, have black hair?”

“Dark. My mother’s was black.”

“So is Spicie’s. Looks Spanish to me rather — staid face — pale, strong-boned, grave —— I’ve seen her laugh merrily, but never saw her smile. Sits leaning sideways, her finger-joints at her cheek — steady eyes, meditating on you, judging, dark-blue — noble brow, for though you can’t see much of it for the two wings of hair that cover it, there’s a lane between the wings, running up the side of the brow where the hair-parting is, and at that lane you can spy the noble height and bulge of the brow; and the hair puffs over the ears, which puff may be what makes her Spanish-looking. And her sweet lips, boy, neatly fitted together, a little pressed — rose-leaves may be something like them — not red ones, pink ones — but I can’t tell of the winningness and pull of ’em ——”

“Why, Rolls!” Cobby cried, “this is love.”

“I wish she’d returned it, then. I shouldn’t have been off bussing those particular lips. But no go: white mans is stink. Maybe for a cousin she’d feel different, Cobby: for they say that some cousins are more akin in nature than brother and sister.”

“Really? People say that of cousins? I am surprised, because it happens to be true — scientifically known. But all that does not allure me, Rolls. You see that I have other pre-occupations than the lips of ladies.”

To which Rolls, sipping his peach-brandy, confidently answered: “You never felt the sun, old man: wait till you do, before you boast. Here the sun is a hearsay, as toothache is to one who hasn’t it; but the sun’s a Reality, look, and no fun. You’ve read of the rage of the vegetation of African forests: well, the same with Master Cupid; a dog in the sun bites the boy, and the boy goes dog-mad.”

“Oh, it is all a question of mental pose and habit,” Cobby remarked with a pout. “The mind cannot think of two things at the same time — —”

“Exactly!” cried Rolls. “And the sun insists that you think of it, and quit bubbles. If you say ‘No’ to it, it says ‘Very good; there’s no hurry, to-morrow will do.’”

At which Cobby chuckled, roaring out in his big voice: “And this is what you propose to me! — to transform myself from a blower of bubbles into a blower of sighs! Stash the fakement, Rolls, as you say.”

But Cobby had been, and was being, more influenced by Rolls than he admitted to himself, and three nights later was influenced still more by an event.

That midnight he was walking home from a scientific function at the Holborn Restaurant, and, after passing through Lincoln’s Inn Fields, had descended some steps behind the Law Courts, going down into the lane of Clement’s Inn, where it was dingy and desolate, when three men, who had on masks, appeared before him; and cried one, presenting a revolver: “You were warned, Cobby! Up with the hands!”

Cobby did nothing of the sort. Hot-headed as ever, he sent at the man a blow that staggered him, and had actually felled the second, before he was struggling with the third. As this third and he dropped together, he cut the hand of this one with a lancet, and, reaching out, cut the hand of the second, too, who was still half-prostrate.

Their object, apparently, had been just to strike terror into him, for when all were again on their legs, instead of any shooting, there was a foolish pause, while the two cut ones glanced at their hands, and Cobby touched a bump on his forehead, until on panting breaths Cobby said: “Now, look here — just yonder is King’s College Hospital: run to it, you two — tell them you've been cut with a septic lancet, or you are likely to have your arms off."

The three looked at one another.

"C'est la blague," remarked the non-cut to the cut.

"It is Not blague," Cobby said, suddenly walked away, and was not followed.

All in a flush he reached his chambers, indignant, dominant; and, as he broke into the room where Rolls under his rug awaited his coming, words burst from him. "Well, I have decided, Rolls. I go with you...."

"Good talk!" breathed Rolls astare.

"I've been attacked" — he told the story of it.

Rolls snapped finger and thumb. "Good luck! They reckoned to scare you off, that's it — and have done the other thing! They don't know their Cobby, the blackguards!"

"Very good, it is settled, we tackle it, we two. How long will it take?"

"Eighteen months."

"Oh, a year, say! We go armed, you know."

"Well, of course, we go — —"

"I don't mean with guns — with Science — with civilization — motors, accumulators, aeroplanes — —"

"Oh, I say!" went Rolls, "that's hardly orthodox, to spring aeroplanes upon Wo-Ngwanya. Still, there's no reason — —"

"Oh! we go fully armed, Rolls, to meet every eventuality. Time! Time! In which case, say a year."

"Let's hope it, anyway. A million a year — not bad for R. K. Rolls!"

Cobby, who now stood pondering, all at once asked what was Douglas Macray's address.

“Hotel Meurice, rue de Rivoli,” said Rolls, “or just ‘Paris’ will do. But — why?”

Without answering Cobby sat at his escritoire, and wrote: “Mr. Warren Cobby is about to start on the quest of his cousin, Flora Macray” — and at once, having summoned his man, sent it to the post; on which, with a look of alarm, Rolls suddenly asked: “You haven’t written to Macray?”

Cobby told what he had written.

“Well — but — —” Rolls said. “Myself, I’d never see fit to forewarn the enemy.”

“Miscreant! The insolent licence —— Well, now he has my challenge.”

Rolls shrugged. Challenges, flourishes, moral ebullitions were hardly his style, but the plain way toward an end; and in the next three weeks, while preparations were under weigh, and Cobby tearing himself out of his place in civilization, Rolls’ unimaginative sense had enough to do to check the other’s excess of zest and effort. “Our money won’t run to it,” he would say: “we don’t aim to be an invading army with baggage, look. There’s no chop any road in bringing arc-lamps and gelignite, telephone-sets and nitro-toluol....”

“To have done it, and be done with it, Rolls,” Cobby said: “to be back here in Fleet Street, doing surface-tension! If we go, we go as white men, armed with the white man’s wit and might — not with seven matches.”

Rolls flung his hand. “Well, there may be something in it. Go your own road.”

Hence, on the day of departure, cartfuls of paraphernalia lay stored for the expedition within that belly of the Saxon. To watch all snugly stored, Rolls, hardly yet quite on his legs, had been aboard some hours, and Cobby, at the eleventh hour, was walking alone with quick steps toward the ship along the dockside, pulled askew by a bag, when a voice said behind him:

“Carry your bag, sir?”

“Very good” — he gave it to a tall man, loose-limbed, shaven, dark-haired, wearing a cloth cap, and rough clothes that looked new.

And, as they walked together along the dock-railway, said Cobby:
“Where have I seen you before?”

On which the man chuckled, saying: “Not at Buckingham Palace, I’m afraid, sir.”

When they reached the bustle of the ship, now shouting “visitors ashore,” Cobby at once lost sight of him; but four evenings later, out in the Bay of Biscay, on wandering with “The Zulu-Kaffir Language” into the bow-regions, to watch the bow-foams wash and dash, he beheld the same man there, leaning over the rail among some steerage-passengers.

Cobby addressed him, with “So you are here.”

On which the man touched his cap with a chuckle. “Yours as ever, sir,” he said.

But there was some difference now about the man somehow, in air, or face. Cobby, just aware of a difference, could not say in what it lay — was not interested.

V. THE VOLUNTEER

BEFORE MADEIRA WAS passed, Rolls had become an institution in the ship. He liked winds in his hair, and dismal nights, when he had the vessel and the universe to himself, and sometimes the saloon-dinner was his breakfast, he was such a night-fowl, scarcely mixing with the others — differing from Cobby, who let himself be led into whist-drive, sweepstake, saloon-ball and nonsense-talk under the quarter-deck awning. Cobby's name as a scientist having been known to two or three beforehand, as he saw himself sought after, he lent himself. But he wrote in his diary: "This is dreadful! This emptiness and waste of days. But what idle people! and I as idle as any of them. May Spiciewegiehotiu perish...."

A voyage to the monotony of whose routine the engines' throbbing beat its monotonous baton, until the eighteenth night, or nineteenth morning say, when Cobby in his sleep had a feeling that he was not alone, and woke in a flurry to find the ship pitching, and there on his bedside, when he switched on the light, Rolls seated, gravely meditating on a cigar between his fingers, wind from a porthole winnowing within his bare hair.

"I'm not sorry you've woke up," he said. "Myself, I always sleep with my state-room locked, and you should ditto. There's an enemy aboard, look."

A new idea for Cobby. "How do you arrive at that?"

"Just played it on me," Rolls answered— "narrowest escape! I all but disappeared over the side— 'suicide whilst of unsound mind.' On blowy nights I generally go up the foremost's shrouds, to have things to myself a bit — was up there a couple of hours — rough stuff — dark — then got down. When I stepped upon the lowest ratlins, they weren't ratlins any more — cut through. Feet pitched overboard, dragging off my hand-hold; my clutches missed one, two, of the upper ratlins — didn't miss the third, or I should be well astern by now. But if you're born to be hanged, you never will be drowned."

"Incredible licence!" breathed Cobby. "Who can it be?"

"There you beat me — though I expected he'd not be far, and have been on the look-out to spot him. Anyway, here he is."

"And are the ratlins of fibre or wire?"

"Wire-rope those foremost ones."

"Then he must have a hack-saw. We will report to the captain, and have a search — —"

Rolls threw his hand. "Of course, the captain will know; but that says nothing. The bottom of the Atlantic is a fine place to hide a hack-saw — if he didn't nick it from the ship's chest, to put back after using...."

This thing sensationalized the last three days of the voyage for everyone — an eruption in the uninterrupted.

Only one man — a steerage passenger — did not appear in the assembly before the captain in the saloon: him the doctor reported to be ill — had pharyngitis — inflammation of the mouth — had to be interviewed separately in his bunk.

"Which of them would that be?" Rolls asked himself.

Knowing all the faces present, and unable to recall the absent face, he conceived a curiosity to see it, and the next morning took down a bottle of "bub" (rum-and-milk), in a neighbourly way to the sick one— "something to keep the blues out, friend."

He was warmly thanked with nods, but no words, the sick mouth being covered with a cloth, the brow bound about with a towel, so that, as it was dim within the bunk, Rolls got only a dim impression of a nose.

Nor was there time to repeat the visit: now loomed on the ocean's brink that bluff bulk of Table Mountain, with a table-cloth of cloud, and silver dish-covers of cumulus-mounds, the mass of which, Rolls told Cobby, recalled to him "The Elephant" of Wo-Ngwanya; and soon, as the liner warped up, all was an arrival-scene of greetings and luggage, tips and kisses, pith-helmets with pugarees swinging, sunshades and white attire fluttering, all in a colonial tone of its own, dotted with various shades of blackness trotting to and fro, from Hottentot copper to Madagascar blacking; and here Rolls was sweetly at home, Cobby following in his wake from quayside through custom's officer to dock-gates, asking of Rolls in respect of the Malay who drove them to Cape Town, "Why does the being vociferate so needlessly?" to which Rolls philosophically answered: "Has a fare — sort of song of joy that he blows off, look, like the hylobates ape: let him howl away."

And when the sun sank, and sudden darkness invaded Nature, said Cobby, thinking again of his Malay: "We might have done well to travel in our cab, which was as breezily speedy as the train is lazy. How long, Rolls, before the expedition actually starts out?"

Rolls said: "Three weeks, I reckon."

"Ah! three weeks.... Well, provided I am back in Fleet Street in a year — that is your undertaking."

Rolls' eyes twinkled. "No, not undertaking. You wait — you won't be so fidgety when Africa once gets its grip on you. Even this Karoo seems to you now a meaningless reach of plain, doesn't it? — no trees, nothing — yet it has a meaning of its own — says something, sings something. Hark! heard that cry? A riet-bok that is, out there in the vastness and darkness — never saw a train before: I know it from the way he whistled. He's living still away back in the bottomless pit of the geologic ages, that chap: all this Africa is. Wait till you see a geologic river washing solemn along, with the hippo's nostril snorting out in the choppy mid-channel: he's pretty old and knowing, that cove. But, of course, we'll be looking as lively as we know how: let's only hope we're not crossed and balked any road, for the enemy has a long arm. I'm all-out gallied now about not getting to see that sick man's face aboard. I wonder what's wrong with his mouth?— 'inflamed mouth': never heard of that disease in man. I looked out at the landing, but no sign of him."

Snuggled in a corner, his eyes closed to the world, Cobby murmured: "I think I know who he is — saw him first in England. Some poor man — carried my bag along the dock."

"And was anything wrong with his mouth then?"

"Let me see — Yes, I fancy now that he spoke with some impediment or effort."

When Rolls next spoke, he got no answer: Cobby was asleep.

Then by way of the corrugated townlet, past the rock-kopie, the stead of the Boer alone in the world with his ostrich-kraal, the journey was to the Gold-town, where at once Rolls threw himself into the work of getting together map and plan, man and automatic, inspan and biltong, bead and button, medicine-chest and waggon-box. And all went merrily well, save at one point — the sweeping-in of at least one other white, for which he was eager. He got two, indeed, but both failed him.

The first, a transport-rider of Natal, a fellow of grit, though addicted to "square-face," and now down on his luck, readily agreed, said to Rolls, "The thing I'm after — a dart into the interior," and a bargain was struck.

But soon afterwards Rolls, on entering Botha's Yard in Commissioner Street, where the waggons were, spied his transport-rider head-to-head in a confab with a broker: and the next day the fellow vanished.

It was the same with the second, a Texan — Kimberley adventurer, up-country hunter, who dreamed in millions, though to-day broken in boots — he had all but fixed-up with Rolls, but then cooled off, and when he suddenly began to throw money about, Rolls understood that this one, too, had been soaped.

“They're at us again,” Rolls said, when Cobby got back from a trip to a vlei up north, whither two mining-engineers had taken him to shoot veldt-duck and antelope. “They reckon I'm too wide-awake and chock-full of six-shooters to be knocked out from a corner over here, where I'm a cock in my own yard; but they aim now to make us a pair of lone hands among a crowd of blacks — —”

“It doesn't seem to me of great importance,” Cobby remarked.

“Blacks do such things as mutiny, don't they?” Rolls demanded.

“Well, there are still three days to try in. If you come across any possible man, strike hands with him on the spot, then send him out of the town beyond temptation.”

Which was what Cobby himself did on the following evening; for, as he was smoking on his hotel stoep, the light of day then dying out, a man appeared before him — the man whom he had seen at the dock in England, and then on the liner; and said the man: “Here we are again, sir! I got it from a certain party that you are after a white for up-country trekking, and I'm in it, if you'll have me — stones, gold, ivory, makes no matter to me.”

“Sit down.... When did you come to Johannesburg?”

“Only yesterday. Been in Cape Town.”

“What brought you to South Africa?”

“You should ask what took me to England. I know South Africa — Australia. Fortune-hunter — I haven’t always carried gentlemen’s bags for a bob.” He chuckled.

“You can shoot, then, probably.”

The man snatched a revolver from his hip-pocket, and negligently shot a peach from a tree in the yard.

“Good in this half-light” — Cobby presented some vegueras— “have a cigar.”

“Thanks — I’m in misery — can’t smoke — —”

“Not well yet?”

“Better — not well. You hear how I talk — across a hot potato.”

“Yes, I can tell that there is something. Healthy otherwise?”

“Oh, yes, I’m all there.” He chuckled.

“Talk Zulu?”

“Some. Can cluck some Hottentot, too.”

“Well, come inside: I’ll send for my partner, Mr. Rolls, and we’ll discuss details.”

But Rolls, sent for, could not be found; and Cobby, apprehensive lest this one also should be got at, struck a bargain, asking, as he wrote a contract: “What is your name?”

“Douglas Macray.”

Cobby’s pen paused in air. Looking at the man, he muttered, “Singular”; and added with a smile: “You are not, I take it, the millionaire of that name?”

“W-e-ll, I’m afraid not, if there is such a millionaire. But never say die, sir! I may yet stand in his shoes.”

Now, frowning in an effort of memory, Cobby asked: “Where have I seen you before? Some where.”

“Dartmoor jail, sir.” He chuckled.

“No, I never was there. You?”

“Well, no — not actually inside. I wouldn’t say that the traps have never been after me, but they never yet got me.”

Cobby smiled on him — liked a certain hardihood, stoicism, and cheery frankness which was about him.

“Well, sign,” he said, and, this done, wrote a letter to a Boer at whose stead he had slept during his hunting-trip, a letter of no importance in itself, only written in order to get Macray, who was to take it, out of reach of schemers. “We others will perhaps have started before you get back,” he said, “but you will readily pick up our spoor. Here’s the cash; and now I will come with you to the yard.”

There Cobby saw him horsed and off, then walked back to his hotel, wondering what had become of Rolls.

It was not till an hour later that Rolls came in, looking sour, to tell the tale that, having gone with one of the Square auctioneers to drink a bottle of fizz, they both had got imprisoned in a room — something gone wrong with the catch of the door, which in the end had had to be forced.

In view of which odd disease of the door-catch, when Cobby told of the bargain with the man whose mouth was sore, Rolls’ countenance fell.

“My God, Cobby,” he said ruefully, “you might have waited for me to crop up.”

“Why, though?” Cobby asked.

Rolls had no answer; but felt ill at ease.

“And what do you think his name is?” asked Cobby.

“Beelzebub — I shouldn’t wonder,” said Rolls, strolling about.

“Douglas Macray.”

“Same thing as Beelzebub,” said Rolls.... “But you mean to say he had the devil’s cheek to give you that name?”

“Oh, no cheek, I think; that chances to be the fellow’s name: he’s all right.”

“Well, you’re the newest of new chums, and no mistake! Haven’t you learned yet to mistrust your man, Cobby?”

“The man is all right,” Cobby obstinately repeated.

And, as arranged, the expedition duly started the next afternoon; but not till nine in the night, when it had outspanned twenty miles up in the interior, did Macray with new hunter’s-swag and outfit ride in; on which Rolls and he, for the first time, looked into each other’s eyes.

VI. A QUESTION OF TEETH

THE THREE WERE eating an evening meal after the afternoon sweat and trek through leagues of timber, when Cobby remarked: “Here we are within sight nearly, and the plan of action still undetermined” — a browner Cobby, upon whom some beard had sprouted, in moleskin trousers now, and leggings above velschoenen, upon which the bivouac-tire shed beams in a dimness that was an island of dimness within the dismal Pacific of the night.

Rolls began to answer: “Well, we have the rough plan” — but paused, suddenly adding: “Another fight on! — that’s the utshwala (millet-grog) working,” and, springing up, he trotted off into a still dimmer dimness, where a little mob stood watching a Swahili and a Pondo duelling with two club-sticks in the midst of a bigger mob, who lolled and squatted, enjoying the day’s end, and at that lip the calabash tilted, and that puffed at the hashish (“dakka”) pipe, and that snub-nose sucked up snuff.

Rolls stamped at the fighters: “Stash that racket!” but still the two kerries acted, rattling anon like castanets, and the clattering antlers of antagonist stags rattling together.

Only when Rolls, roaring at them anew, drew his revolver, did the duel consent to stop, and then the Pondo dropped something at the Swahili’s ear, to which the Swahili consented with nods, so that Rolls understood that the feud was still to be settled elsewhere.

“Silly brutes,” he grumbled, sitting anew to his tin plate: “we can’t afford to have ’em cracking one another’s skulls up here” — for just “here” was cannibal, there had been two pitched laager-battles, flow of blood, and the sentries standing out in the dark now about the bivouac were not there for nothing.

“Well, you were saying — —” Cobby said, mopping his forehead and a chest all exposed at the opening of his dirty shirt, the sleeves rolled up.

“It’s only details that remain over,” Rolls answered, casting an underglance at Macray, who lay on his elbow, eating with evident effort and unease: “the dart is to get within the three enclosures one dark night, chloroform ‘our mother,’ and bring her off like a sack of mealies.”

“You’ll never put that over,” Macray observed.

“With your help we will,” Rolls answered, with a sullen eye askance on him.

“Well, no doubt I’m a host in myself,” Macray chuckled, ever jocular, in spite of pain.

Now Cobby irritably loosed his belt with its sheaf-knife and six-shooter holster, saying: “But are you aware that the administration of chloroform occasionally ends fatally, and that we have no right — —”

“Oh, now for a London sermon!” Rolls muttered intolerantly — tempers here not being at their best! for God caused a mist to rise up out of the ground, a steam of miasmas and malarias, good for snakes and the great venom-insects that came sailing in gay dress out of the tangle of undergrowth to glare at the flame and dance devil-dances to it, but bad for man.

“May I not express myself?” Cobby asked, glancing aside at Rolls, who sat by him, his back propped upon the same mass of banyan-trunk that had dropped there a century gone, to gather its scab of mosses and rot with all the rot of the tropic forest, within which, side by side, vied riot of corruption and riot of life, and the tribes of life thrived on the festering of the unburied dead.

“How many people die of chloroform, old man?” demanded Rolls. “One in a million? And what are we here for but to take a thousand bigger risks?”

“Very good,” said Cobby. “I concede the chloroform — let that pass. But there will be sentries round the royal precincts! How about them?”

“We stab the sentries, baas,” Macray said, looking at Cobby with one eye winked.

“There’ll be only four or five,” Rolls said. “Shoot ’em with air-guns — or stab.”

Now Cobby frowned. “That is,” said he, “we become assassins.”

“Put it that road,” Rolls curtly said.

“Very good,” said Cobby hotly, “be an assassin, if that is to your taste — on the understanding that you never shake my hand after.”

Macray chuckled; and Rolls sullenly said: “We’ll rub along without much shaking hands — just do a bow, look,” and, doffing his opulent hat, he bowed elegantly to the forest, to show how elegantly he and Cobby would bow together.

“I am in earnest, understand,” Cobby mentioned, in the act of lighting a pipe, and Rolls then said, patting his friend’s arm: “Hamba gachle (go soft): nothing is going to be done that you don’t cotton to — not likely! We’ll have a regular indaba (debate), and see how it pans out.”

He finished eating, drank, lit a cigar, and in that reign of stillness they two smoked together under a gloom of foliage hung with bugle-blooms of blue and ruby, with festoons of bindweed, barbarous triumphs of beard, while anon a baobab-fruit fell with a knell’s message, or a branch crashed, or a monkey rushed with shrieks, a hyena pealed the laughter of madness afar, a mule smote a hoof, or a laugh sounded from the crowd of blacks.

And presently Macray emptied his can of utshwala, remarking: "Here's to sleep for little Douglas of that ilk — dog-tired," and picked himself up.

"How's the mouth?" asked Cobby.

"Bad to-night. Good-night, inkoos." He passed away beyond the dying fire-light into the dark.

The others sat still, relishing their sense of full stomachs, and the comfort of smoking.

And presently Rolls: "Those two blacks mean to fight it out."

"Try and stop 'em," Cobby muttered.

And presently again Rolls: "Not bad, to-day's trek, considering the timber and the axes going."

"Fine," Cobby muttered.

And presently again Rolls: "We have sneezing-gas, tear-gas, chloroform, to deal with the sentries."

But Cobby did not answer, the pipe had dropped out of his mouth, his forehead nodded; and now Rolls raised him, saying, "Come on, we're done up," and led him away — they two, by a rule of Rolls, sleeping always together in a spot selected by Rolls, never in the waggon-cartels, now occupied by some wounded blacks, the two this evening sleeping between a rock and a screen of creepers that dropped like a drapery from the rock's top. On the opposite side of the bivouac-glade Macray lay.

But Rolls, who slept like a bush-cat, with one ear awake, was soon sitting up, listening to footsteps that stole near; and he was quickly away, tracking the two duellers, who, carrying their kerries, went prying for some starlit spot to fight out their quarrel.

Rolls, intending to catch them red-handed, and impress them with his omnipresence, shadowed them some hundred yards, then, becoming sick of it, was now about to call and order them back, when his prowling foot encountered some soft obstacle, upon which he switched on the torchlight, to see it.

It was Macray there — asleep.

Till now Rolls had never seen him asleep; and now saw a difference of expression in the face, sufficient to arrest him — the same difference which Cobby, too, had noticed between the Macray of the dockside, and the Macray seen on the steamer.

And though Cobby had not fixed in what the difference lay, Rolls at once did, on catching sight of a plate of top-teeth, lying near the sleeper — though the lightbeam had not been on Macray one second, when up he started, his palm for a moment covering his mouth in an instinctive impulse; and now his eyes and Rolls' met and lingered together a little — both faces pale. Then Macray chuckled; and Rolls said carelessly: "Those two silly niggers — sorry to disturb you," and halloed after the two.

Within ten minutes Rolls was back in his sleeping bag: but in that interval he had seen much.

He did not lie down: sat thinking and thinking. "That's where the sore mouth comes from," he muttered: "some mouths can't stand plates of teeth; this plate may be ill-fitting — perhaps hurriedly made in London for the occasion. Never has had the time to get a new set, nor never has given the mouth time to get used to this set — takes 'em out every minute he's alone, I reckon, they worry so; claps 'em in when needful: never seen without 'em. I see. Always shaved like a dandy in the primeval forest. I see. 'Douglas Macray' — he gave that name: devil's cheek — and cunning. I knew that I'd seen that face somewhere; couldn't drop to where — photo — witless. Otherwise, thank God, I've had all my wits in camp, or there'd be no Cobby now, and no R. K. Rolls now.... Well, the fittest will survive."

Tired as he was, Rolls hardly slept that night, there in the reign of rayless darkness between the creepers and the hollow of the rock, noting when the man-eater roared afar, when the mouth of the ounce yowled to the universe for food, when sentries went out, came in....

The question was — to tell Cobby, or not to tell? and toward morning Rolls answered, “No — not now; after the happening of what has to happen.” Cobby would command: “No killing!” and Rolls would obey, but Macray, who was out for killing, would not obey. Rolls, too, now, was all for killing. There are venoms, there are wrongs, which only blood can wash out, which only death can solve.

“One attempt on my life in that Exchange Bar at Johannesburg ... two in London ... one on the steamer. Low-down thug-work. If I forget, may God forget me.”

At dawn he shook Cobby with a rollic, “Out of it, lazy bones” — rollic and tender, for where he loved he loved, and hated where he hated.

And at breakfast all was as usual, save that both Rolls and Macray tended to more than usual merriment, which, in the case of Macray, may have been due to the absence, for the first time, of the plate in his mouth; à propos of which Cobby asked: “What is different about you, Macray? You are like a man who has shaved off a moustache.”

Macray answered with a chuckle. “Top teeth gone — gorilla knocked ’em out with a club in the night.”

This was a jest — like Macray’s jests in general: cheery, merrily meant: but pointless, clownish.

“Is it a question of teeth?” Cobby said: “yes, that is it. So what has really happened?”

“Only this — for seven years, off and on, I’ve been trying to wear false teeth, and last night I chucked them for ever off me into the bush. Bravo!

the eaters will be eaten by an ostrich. Now I can dine with my gums and defy the world. That was what made my mouth sore, baas.”

“I see. Why didn’t you ever mention it?”

“Oh, he was shy before the ladies,” Rolls flung off from over a bowl of meal and “amasi”-curds, which he was earnestly eating.

“Still, the teeth did rather heighten your beauty,” Cobby remarked to Macray: “and as you look now I seem to remember seeing you in some dream — somewhere — where was it?”

Macray chuckled. “You remember, inkoos, the night you caught your sister under the oak with a man? I was that man.”

At which Cobby lowered his lids, silent, many of Macray’s jests not being quite to the scientist’s liking.

And now the forenoon trek, to the singing of the blacks; and the noontide rest; and the sun’s altitude taken; and now the afternoon trek, which revealed that the forest was not really infinite, but had a limit where open country basked in the sun, and a river rolled between rows of crocodile-snouts, where flamingos in their crimson uniforms stood like sentinels who all have lost a leg in the wars; up which river the trek went three miles to find a drift, christened “Crocodile Drift” by Rolls over two years gone; and, crossing the river, they came upon the ashes and charred remains of a cannibal kraal, which, Rolls said, was but one of many of which the Wa-Ngwanya had cleared that region; and now the field-glass, scanning northward, could see a mirage of the mountain-range which bounds Wo-Ngwanya on the south.

And that evening the three men held their indaba on the plan of action, seated on a hillock in the shade of a yellow-wood tree, whence they could see eastward the reeds of a lagoon on a plain peopled with game, deer in thousands, giraffe and buffalo, crane and egret, the three smoking together like friends, with a jest anon; and no one could have guessed the suspense and tension that was between two of them.

Rolls said: “Understand that failure spells final failure for the failer. I know the girl: if you attack her, she fights; and if, as usual, she wins, she gives you time to sigh one last prayer: it’s woe to the conquered there, look. What follows? That we shouldn’t stake all upon one throw. And we shouldn’t try it on without experiment first. Let’s rehearse the whole fakement.”

“And if the rehearsal fails,” Cobby said, “the play never comes off.”

“Yes,” answered Rolls, “if we are not all in the rehearsal. So let Macray and me go forward alone, get into the sigodhlo, ascertain what’s what, and come back to you before we all pitch into it together. If we two come to grief, there’ll be still you left.”

Rolls’ and Macray’s glances lingered together, while Cobby flushed a little, saying: “But why am I being put up in cotton wool?”

“Because yours is the most valuable life,” Rolls quietly answered.

“Yes” — from Cobby— “but I am deliberately on an adventure, risking that life: I cannot permit you and Macray to incur greater — —”

“It must be so, isinduna,” Macray said, weighing his Colt’s meditatively on his palm. “Rolls knows the road: he must go; you or I must go with him; and he and I both vote you out.”

“You’re outvoted, Cobby,” Rolls remarked.

On which Cobby: “Oh, very well, since you see fit. If you two fail to come back, I shall go after you at all costs.”

And Rolls, stretched on the grass, gazing up into the yellow-wood: “Oh, one of us is sure to scrape through.”

“Sure,” echoed Macray, throwing up and catching his automatic, these both knowing that, if either came back, he would come alone, each knowing that the other knew.

VII. DUELLO

LATER IN THE night when the outspan lay asleep, Rolls, lying near Cobby, scribbled on a pocket-book leaf, under the beam of an electric torch: “Cobby, I reckon to come back, but no knowing. If not, know that this Macray is the enemy. Without me, and with him, I figure it up that your best course would be to throw over the whole fakement, and get back home. Good luck to you and me, Cobby. — R. K. R.”

This he put into Cobby’s tobacco-pouch, knowing that Cobby, who smoked only in the evening, would not see it till the next evening, when Rolls and Macray would be well away.

Macray, on his side, knew that Rolls would warn Cobby; but when at breakfast Cobby’s manner toward him was as usual, he concluded that Rolls would only let Cobby know after the departure from camp, and he saw why. Rolls, then, would write it, and place the writing where Cobby would be sure to find it: and Macray spent an hour after breakfast in thinking where that would be; till, in opening his own pouch, he thought of Cobby’s, of Cobby’s smoking only in the evening....

He then watched till he saw Rolls away at the waggons, and, going promptly to Cobby, said: “Give me a pipeful of that Boer ‘baccie.”

In a minute he had Rolls’ note out of Cobby’s pouch, and presently was reading and destroying it.

Before noon, with elaborate secrecies, he had buried a packet — a cardboard-box in oilskin, of which he had a jealous care — at the roots of a particular tree; and soon afterwards he and Rolls started out together.

And that night they two were plodding northward afoot forty miles from the camp, two lorn forms lost in a vastness of broken and rolling country, pathless, manless, plodding in the misty twilight of the sickle of a moon quite new, now sinking, and about four miles before them the mighty fact of mountains towering, brooding in their citadel of obscurity, mystery and muteness.

The two horses had lately been left knee-haltered; and Rolls remarked: “We might safely have ridden on: not much light from that moon; and those outlook posts of savages are only efficient for spotting troops, not small bodies.”

“Aha,” Macray went.

Few had been their words, and no word so far of enmity, of quarrel. Two strangers travelling together by chance in a desert would speak as these spoke; but ever these moved shoulder to shoulder, one never an inch behind the other, as their horses had moved shoulder to shoulder — a long strain on the alertness of nerve and brain and eye and hand. Both wished to God that it was over.

As over open sward they walked, through belt of timber, toiling up hillside, moving by the lonesome pool and the bitter bittern brooding, sending atrot the troop of little duiker-bok, hearing the wild cat whine, there were long silences between them. Their throats dry at that tension, each hoped for, yet dreaded, the setting of the moon, with whose setting his life might set.

“Cobby’s not a bad old sort,” Macray suddenly remarked: “nobody would hurt Cobby, except in defence of Number One. What made him take on this job? Just the money in it?”

“Not much” — from Rolls: “that’s what made me. Cobby’s after seeing justice done.”

“Aha.”

Then again that silent plod of hide-shoes over grass and dust and rock; and presently Rolls: “We’re climbing all along, even when it looks as if we weren’t.”

“Oh, aye” — from Macray.

“I know where we are now. One of their outpost vedettes will not be two miles from here.”

“Aha.”

Five minutes more, and they stood confronted with cliff-wall some thirty feet high, which seemed to stretch interminably to east and west, dropping here or there a waterfall; as to which Rolls remarked: “Yes, I remember this bit now; there are some passes going up — we’ll try this way” — turning westward to the left; and over sickly sward they walked close before the cliff, until they came to an opening in its face.

The natural rock-path that ran up here being steep, strewn with stones, narrow as a man, here one of the two had to have his back to the other, and in a flash both understood that the moment of action had come: and the quicker lived.

“Hands up!” cried Rolls like thunderclap, in the same second that Macray, without a word, fired at him.

But Rolls had been by the hundredth of a second the more thunder-prompt, and Macray, when he fired, was two Macrays, one firing, the other throwing his hands up, conscious of a muzzle already at his breast, so that his bullet shot upward....

“Drop your revolver,” ordered Rolls.

The revolver dropped: and Rolls, keeping eye and muzzle on the foe, stooped to pick it up; but his hand not chancing to encounter the gun, he glanced down to see it; and in the wink of that instant Macray was upon him, grabbing Rolls' revolver-wrist, tumbling Rolls over to the ground, dropping upon Rolls.

There they struggled together — a struggle that could not long continue for lack of wind, it was so cat-o'-mountain in the frantiness of its activity, life the victor's prize. Twice while it lasted those solitudes heard reports of gun-fire — Rolls firing; but without hurt to the other, who had the advantage of being much the younger, of being considerably the bigger, of being uppermost to begin with: advantages over which that inveterate toughness of Rolls might not have prevailed, if Macray had not let go Rolls' left hand to snatch his sheath-knife, and finish it. In that same second Rolls had him overthrown, undone, and under....

His knee on Macray's arm, his grip at Macray's throat, Rolls glared close into his foe's face, grinning at him, his throat rasping as hoarse as Macray's rasped.

Then he sprang up, picked up the two revolvers, dropped his own into its holster, dropped Macray's and Macray's knife into his knapsack, took from the knapsack a skein of window-cord, cut off a bit, and said: "Get up."

Then, Macray up, he said: "Hands behind your back."

On which Macray, as he obeyed, chuckled, or attempted to chuckle, uttering: "Anything to oblige!"

Rolls then went to bind Macray, saying: "One movement, and you're a dead man."

"Wonder I'm not that already" — from Macray.

"Well, and whom do you owe your life to — for the time being?"

"To the best of all possible R. K. Rollses apparently," said the unconquerable Macray.

Rolls laughed. "Not much! Not likely! Bad shot! You would be in hell now all right, if it had been only me. But Cobby don't cotton to ‘assassinations’: and I want to go back able to shake his hand and make him a truthful report of what took place.”

“Here’s to old Cobby, then, and to whatever gods may be. Life’s damned sweet; and I’d sooner be a crossing-sweeper at Charing Cross than a Lord Mayor in the realms below.”

“Prize to-night, then, since you like life” — Rolls tied the last knot on the wrists— “as I do. To-morrow night that moon will be a bit fatter and higher at this hour, but one of us two won’t be knowing about it. We’ll fight it out in the morning light, look. Come on.”

He moved now up the rock-path, and Macray followed, relieved and frivolous in a reaction from the long strain, anon making a remark meant to be jocular and mocking, though he did not fail, as bidden, to look at the moon with a new interest and wistfulness; and on they plodded over country that still increased in steepness, until the moon was down, soon after which another moon — at its full, this one — came into their view, this being the light of a fire shining in the circular doorway of a hut perched some seventy feet up in cliff-side bush — one of the outlook posts of Wo-Ngwanya.

This point being only eight or nine miles from the capital kraal beyond the mountains, Rolls meant, if again victorious the next day, to visit the kraal alone the next midnight, and investigate the possibilities, in order to report to Cobby, he having with him cord-ladder, air-gun, and every essential for “the rehearsal”; nor did the first step to this end — the slipping-in past the vedettes — present any difficulty: on such a night, in the absence of searchlights, a company of soldiers could have prowled into the pass unnoticed.

Here Macray crept foremost, with Rolls’ muzzle at his back, lest he should deliberately rouse the outlook by any sound; and now the way was up and up the endless stair of that tower of mountain-rock, that looked a suitable boundary for a land, not of Wa-Ngwanya, but of titans and archangels, and now they were crawling north-west through some gross grove of wood, the dwelling-place of gloom, and now were moving north-east along dizzy cliff-brinks within theatres of crags, trackless grandeurs, with organ-voices of waters raving everywhere, and always a noisy north-wind thwarting them, so that toward midnight they halted exhausted on a ledge where the rock above rather overhung them, and had a bluff which a little protected them from the wind; and here Rolls, having produced from his knapsack biltong, biscuits, Johnny Walker, tied up Macray's legs, untied his hands behind, tied them before; and there, seated, they ate and drank together.

"Here we sleep," Rolls remarked between bottle and lip.

"Or pretend to," said Macray, feeding his mouth two-handed.

"I'll be sleeping all right," Rolls muttered.

"Maybe I can roll you down the precipice during the night — good idea: the rolling of Rolls. Or knock out your brains with one of those stones."

"No, you won't be doing much stirring," Rolls answered. "I respect you some, Macray: an unscrupulous brute, born without a God or a conscience; but you have brains."

Macray reflected on this, and then, deciding, said: "Yes, all that's true. You're a man who can see, Rolls."

Rolls was now trying to light a cigar within his hat, but, after several failures, muttered: "Oh, well, here's to bed," and lay close under the crag.

Macray, too, lay, and both looked up with that pang of a look that may be the last at clouds that scudded southward over the vault, and, sailing northward, all the swarm of the constellations, steadily sailing together, like a navy that steadily sails and sails.

But, though the winds were touched with chill up there, within some minutes Rolls was asleep but for an ear: only Macray lay wakeful. And see him at one time, tied as he was, drawing himself softly a little to peer over the edge of the ledge, and ponder upon what he saw.... Then he lay anew under the rock-shadow, wooing sleep; but had just succeeded in drowsing, when he was roused by a shout ... a shout of horror.

He started up, staring at Rolls, whom he saw staring also.

“Bad dreams?” Macray asked suddenly.

Rolls did not answer.

Macray chuckled: “Conscience, Rolls....”

Rolls dropped again upon the rock, terribly trembling. He had dreamed that he was careering headlong down the ravine — a dream so real, and so dismal in mood, that it was hours before he could sleep anew — in fits and starts.

Hence the dawn of morning came upon him rather shaken, rather out of sorts. But showing no sign of it, save a slight pallor, he sprang up — summoned Macray — muttering: “Come, let’s have it over” — set free Macray’s legs.

“Well, what’s the rules of the game?” Macray asked, smiling — pale now, his eyelids twitching — but steadily smiling.

Rolls looked along the ledge — some sixty feet long, some four broad, rather concave in form, bluffing out at the north and south ends; and glancing over the edge in that grey of dawn, one saw only jags and crags and small trees, and no bottom but mists steaming; and on the opposite side of the ravine, fifteen feet to the east, a like scene of rock and tree.

“You will stand at that north end,” Rolls said. “I at that south. You will hold one end of this cord low, and I’ll slide your revolver down it to you. When I see it reach your hand, I fire.”

“Bah!” broke bitterly from the other’s lips: “and you talk of wanting fair-play to please Master Cobby! What’s this but assassination? While I’m getting my revolver from the cord I drop dead — of course.”

Rolls saw this — moved some steps away, reflecting, and came back saying: “Well, I’m game to meet you, if you have any better plan.”

Macray had a twitching of the eyelids, as in all his instants of high-pitched egoism. He said: “You want fair-play. Well, you bind my revolver to my right wrist, muzzle-backward; and I bind yours to yours with the same knots and length of cord. Then you tie a long cord to the two bindings, and retire till the cord is taut, which will be the signal to start unbinding with tooth and nail, and the quickest wins. Not quite fair to me, since I have more gum than tooth: but I’m game ... you want fair-play....” His eyelids twitched.

“What’s that — Mexican?”

“Yes; Mexican.”

Rolls anew moved some paces away, weighing it with a wary eye, and came back, saying: “Well, maybe we’ll make it that road: I’ll figure it up; we’ll have some breakfast.”

“God, man, get it over!” cried out Macray, staring at him.

On which Rolls, suddenly pallid with passion, flashing fire from his eyes, said sharply: “Damn it, yes, get it over it is. No doubt I’m as smart a man as you at any game. Sit down.”

And, as Macray sat with that pallid smile of his, Rolls in a flurry of action again tied his legs together, then searched him from hat to shoes, found a penknife and a flint-stone, tossed them away. He then drew out the magazines from both the Colt’s, and proceeded to free Macray’s wrists; then cut two equal lengths of cord, with one of which he bound one of the Colt’s to Macray’s right wrist, muzzle backward, tying up the trigger, making the knots with all his strength; and now, presenting the other Colt's to Macray, permitted it to be similarly bound to his own wrist. Which done, he tied the ends of a cord nearly equal in length to the ledge's length to the two bindings.

"That fair now, Douglas Macray?" says he.

"All serene, Rolls," says Macray.

With a slash of his knife Rolls now freed the other's feet.

"I will go south, if you like," said Macray, rising upright.

"What's that for?" asked Rolls.

"It is lower, and I am the taller — not that it matters." His eyelids twitched.

"Makes no matter to me either road," said Rolls.

On which Macray stepped backward southward, as Rolls replaced one of the magazines in his own Colt's, and, stepping backward northward, tossed the other to Macray.

With their eyes fixed on each other, they increased the distance between them, until the cord was taut; then instantly bent to the untying.

Macray, however, made no actual attempt to untie, but, while pretending to untie, stepped two paces forward, and, bending sideways, picked up with his left hand a flint-stone, of which there were many scattered about the ledge.

Of this act of treachery Rolls, with one watchful eye aside, was conscious; but though flints can be rather sharp, he felt no keen fear that the edge of a flint, picked up haphazard, would chance to get through the several thicknesses of cord that entangled the triggers, before he could rend away and loose his own entanglements with tooth and nail — a task well in progress already.

But Macray had no intention of cutting his entanglements.... The instant the flint was in his fingers, a shout hopped out of his mouth, as he leapt from off the ledge, and a shout hopped out of Rolls' mouth, as he found himself tugged forward askew, and falling down the gulf.

Macray alighted upon another ledge which he had observed quite thirty feet below, a ledge twenty feet long and half as broad, where a dwarf mohnono-tree, with leaves of silver, sprang out of the cliff-side: to which tree he clung with an arm wrenched to dislocation by the arrest of Rolls' descent, clung during several seconds of frenzy, while with the flint in his left fingers he sawed to sever the cord that connected him with the dead; and still when the cord was cut he clung on dizzied, drunk, distraught, watching the history and incidents of the body's voyage during ten seconds which seemed as many minutes, saw it wheel and vault from point to point of rock, saw it hurled by the earth's reeling upon the opposite wall of the ravine, and disappear into the sea of mists.

Macray fell upon his face, and lay there trembling. "My God!" he said.

But within fifteen minutes he chuckled in his gullet: it lived, that dear ego of his, that Number One that he had a fancy for; and "damn you deep!" he muttered to the dead.

However, he was a prisoner there on the ledge, he and a chough's chicks; and it was only after hours of efforts and very perilous failures that, by ramming fragments of his tree into crannies of the crag, he managed to regain the ledge from which he had leapt.

There he ate and rested; then, taking Rolls' knapsack, plodded on northward for the capital of Wo-Ngwanya, to tell a tale there.

VIII. THE SIGODHLO

TWO MORNINGS AFTERWARDS Cobby wrote in his journal: “My sentiment toward Rolls would better be named affection than liking: an affection based on respect. I have known no intelligence whose judgments in general were more trustworthy; and though his moral sense was not dainty, being as rough-and-ready as the whole Rolls, his substance was sound as a nut. Innate, moreover, in the man, strange to say, was a soul of poetry, a relation with the soul of Nature — a thing without song, or voice, or, I think, much emotion — hidden behind hides of commonness, but really there, and rare. My friend; my dear friend. Never shall I forget the sense of loss, of solitude, the pang of heart, when, near seven last night, I saw Macray riding in alone over the plain in the moon’s light, leading Rolls’ mare by the rein, and I knew that the moving Finger had written and moved on, as when the funeral is over now and done, and man has gone to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets.

“And so perplexing the way of it! It appears that the two abandoned their horses too soon, walked a long way toward the mountains, and stopped to rest in a forest, where Rolls desired to sleep, but was disturbed by a roaring, which Macray said was a lion’s, but Rolls maintained that it was an ostrich’s; and at last, exclaiming ‘Oh, stash it!’ Rolls dashed away to shoot the (supposed) ostrich. Macray heard Rolls’ revolver pop, then an outcry, and ran to Rolls’ assistance, to find him dead under a lion and lioness, which Macray contrived to kill, after dislocating his arm in climbing a tree.

“Such is Macray’s account of things. But who could ever have predicted that Ulysses would die in that silly way — by a lion. He himself would have derided the prediction, I think; and there is something in it which the brain will not realize. Moreover, I remember hearing my friend say that he at least could always distinguish between the roarings of lion and ostrich; nor do ostriches usually roar at so late an hour. Very strange: I do not understand; must only accept.

“Then, alone, Macray walked on northward, following directions that had dropped from Rolls; passed over the mountains; and at two in the morning actually effected an entry into the town, into the royal enclosure, and on to the grounds of the royal hut. So he reports. And his report is anything but heartening. ‘We will never make her, baas,’ is his comment, this her not referring to a lady, but to an enterprise. Three sentries, it appears, at the royal gates, each a giant. So— ‘take my advice’ — I am now to throw away so many months of effort, to turn tail at the very gates of the enterprise, and to ‘be quick about it,’ ere the Wa-Ngwanya get wind of our presence here, for then ‘all will be up with all of us.’

“This irritated me, and I said to Macray: ‘By no means up with us. Understand, Macray, that one white man armed with the science of Europe is mightier than all the Wa-Ngwanya, backed by all the blacks of Africa — given the opportunity to use the tools of his science. Am I to take it, then, that you are losing nerve?’

“‘Not a bit, inkoos,’ was his nonchalant answer: ‘if you are for seeing it through without Rolls, here am I. But I’ll cry to see a head like yours chopped off. You should be killed by electricity — something scientific — not by a nigger’s bill. Turn back, isinduna — take my tip.’

“‘On the contrary,’ I answered, ‘I will go on.’

“‘Good egg,’ he said: ‘I admire your spirit, if not your cunning.’

“I wonder why he chose this word ‘cunning’ — a quality which he himself may not lack, perhaps. Certainly, I have a sense of some unknown quantity in Macray, an X, a mask — my fancy perhaps. Throughout the trek he has shown himself ever jovial, cheerily enduring, cool in danger, quick to learn, versatile, serviceable, exhibiting no little initiative and efficiency as hunter, soldier, and traveller, so that I have congratulated myself on the bargain I made with him at Johannesburg. But there has never been any love lost between him and Rolls, I could see; and, as for me, something in him undoubtedly repels something in me. However, we are now bound together for good or evil. A week hence will test his mettle.... Meantime, hunting, improving the food-stock, and maturing a scheme for making the attempt when the moonlight is over, I cautiously excogitating each detail. I have determined to move the expedition no further northward, since it appears that many of the blacks feel nervous of advancing nearer the Wa-Ngwanya, whose reputation has bred terror in their breasts. And now, thou Pallas of Good Counsel, be my goddess....”

But on the seventh day thence, when the venture was to have been made, Macray stated that he was “seedy” from his sick arm, so it was not till the ninth night that, all being at last ready, the attempt was made, Cobby taking with him Macray, two Zulus, and a mule, which, like the men, was shod with rubber. Overcast and dark as the night was, they contrived, soon after abandoning their animals, to find that same pass up which Rolls and Macray had travelled, and, not without the aid of electric torches, crossed the maze of mountain shortly after one in the morning.

Macray acting as guide, they found out a town that lay drowned in darkness, and by an hour’s prowling round its outer stockade, came to its back part, Cobby estimating that the place, though more compact and peopled, was hardly bigger than Midhurst or Petersfield; and Macray whispered that from that back part to the sigodhlo, or royal kraal, was hardly a quarter-hour's walk.

When, from the mule's back, Macray had cast a rope-ladder, its grapples wrapped in rubber, the four were speedily in the outermost round of street, and thence prowled down a street that led pretty steeply centreward. No sentinel in all this part — a fact which astonished both Cobby and his blacks; and not a sound in all that gloom, only remotely somewhere the dumb boom of a drum going, and far off a baby clamouring, and presently far off the exclamations of a dog barking at the arising of some event in the reign of nothingness, and presently the shine of a fire in the round doorway of a round hut, and in there, suckling a child, a woman seated, quite close to whom they moved unseen.

Then an enclosure, woven of fine tambuti grass, over which they climbed, without needing to fall upon, chloroform, bind, gag or gas any guardsman, for none appeared. Inside — a village within a city — stood residences of royal son or cousin, of the late King's ladies, of Court-officials, roomy intervals separating the residences, every residence being a group of huts slumbering within its own enclosure, grossly embowered within its own grove of equatorial foliage and flower, which breathed out a sigh to the night-breeze, so that here the darkness was even deeper, because of all these arbours of large-leaved boscage, palm and sarsaparilla, banana, tree-fern; and it was beneath a big fig-tree near the middle of the ring that the marauders paused to take their bearings.

Here Cobby whispered at Macray's ear: "No sentries?" — for at this oddity, although it had an aspect of luck, he felt nevertheless a vague apprehension.

“Funny thing,” Macray whispered him; and one of the Zulus whispered: “Something wrong! Take care!”

At the same time Macray was whispering: “See that junk of bush straight ahead? In there she should be.”

“Come,” Cobby now whispered, and went headlong, bent, prowling keen and quick.

IX. THE ROYAL HUT

PROWLING CLOSE OUTSIDE the enclosure of the sovereign's domicile under gross shadow of foliage which overgrew, the four slowly approached the south portion of the enclosure. Now, however, there was alarm — a dog starting to bark.

On finding out the dog, a small thing tied near the stockade — why tied there was not clear — one of the two Zulus tossed it biltong, and Cobby then, in his zest for chloroform that morning, pressed a cloth over its nose, and shut it up.

In two minutes more they came to the gate of the stockade....

Here three at least of the four were quite certain of finding sentries, but there was none.

“What does it mean?” Cobby whispered to Macray.

“Very rum!” Macray whispered back. “Shall we turn tail?”

Both the Zulus already had revolvers in hand, expecting now an ambush.

Now Cobby, raising himself on the stockade, peered over, to see before him, a long way off at the bottom of an avenue, the round doorway of a hut, filled with fire-light, like a dim full-moon.

And with a heart now fast beating he dropped back to his feet, whispering keenly, “Come, try the gate ... this may be luck....”

His torch-ray, switched upon the gate's edge, showed two thongs for raising two latches of wood within: this was all the fastening; the gate opened easily outward; and they passed up a little ascent that had rows of stones imbedded in the earth to serve as steps, then on along an avenue all ambushed in blackness of darkness, having among the bush, on each side, five idols, mighty forms, of which the marauders were just conscious in moving close under them, these being the only sentinels visible; and in the distance ahead the steady disc of light, a dim eye, soundless, mysterious, that seemed to drowse and dream.

Cobby and Macray crawled foremost, and near behind them the two furtive Zulus, all eye and ear, all nerves and alertness.

Then, to the scandalizing of everyone, Macray dropped his revolver ... and loud it sounded, an outrage on that hush.... Some moments more, and it was as if someone muttered somewhere in the night.... The men stood arrested by it: but it was so low, and so momentary, a rumour from nowhere, that none was certain that it was not some birth from the night's disquiet, from the stirring of wind and tree. Cobby moved on, and soon, lying on his face, was spying into the lighted opening....

He saw a round room, big as his own drawing-room at home, with a vaulted roof supported toward its centre by two roof-trees of red-wood (mopane), ten feet apart, quite nicely fashioned and polished, between them in the roof being a smoke-hole, and under this a dying fire of logs; hanging from the roof a few charms — snake-skins, ivory elephants; over the floor a profusion of rugs, with some gourds and stools well polished; and round the walls swaths of tapestry of fawn-skin soft-tanned, all embroidered with elephants in beads of “gold-stone,” hanging from the ends of pegs; and between them on the wall shields, and sheaves of spears. But not all this did Cobby see, his gaze being riveted on two girls who lay on beds of rugs at the foot of the roof-trees, one on each side of the fire, their feet toward him, their faces as yet very vague to him, though it was evident that the one to his right with the ivory anklet was white, that the one to his left with the brass bangles was black: and motionless they lay.

Here, then, was the instant, and here a case for the judicious application of chloroform: so Cobby whispered "the black" into the tympanum of Macray, handing bottle and cloth, he having carefully trained Macray to apply anæsthetics, while he himself held bottle and cloth for the white.

And now he was impetuously in.

As little light came from the fire, he, on finding himself over the white, switched on the little ray of his torch, and saw her well, lying half on her side, with one arm cast naked above her head as in careless slumber, the rest of her wrapped in a kaross of yellow cloth embroidered everywhere with black elephants; and there, just as Rolls had once described her, was the lane running up the side of her high brow betwixt the wings of her hair.

Cobby, breathing "By heaven!" started, as a dart of admiration pierced his nature.

In that same moment there arose a sound — behind him — something like a snigger, like half a snigger smothered, which, as it slipped out, was finished. Cobby glanced alertly round at the negro girl, who, however, seemed asleep, then again at the white, whose lips, as if in sympathy with that snigger, had now moved into a smile, the vaguest ghost of a smile — but still visible.

The truth now pierced Cobby's consciousness that these people were not really asleep — a fact chilling enough to the heart. There he stood pallor-struck — saw all lost, his party trapped; but, as he was not sure, and as retreat was hardly his way, he was still about to venture upon doing what he was there to do, when, as he stooped to her, the Queen's lips opened a little to say "now."

"Hands up!" shouted Cobby in Zulu, spinning to the four winds with his revolver pointed at a circle of nine giants who spurted out upon him from behind all the swaths of wall-curtain; but no hand was put "up," and he did not shoot, understanding in a flash that that would be useless bloodshed, since, whichever way he span, some were at his back, while Macray seemed seized with paralysis.

One shot, however, was fired — outside the hut — by one of the two Zulus, who were pounced upon by an ambuscade outside; and this man, after shooting another in the abdomen, made his escape through the bush of the close. But when that shot sounded outside, Cobby was already on his back, panting under a foot on his breast and another on his neck, his arms bound to his sides with many rounds of hide, his poor cloth and bottle of science lying scattered from his hand, exhaling a smell of carbohydrates; two stood by Macray, holding his arms; while the Queen and Sueela, seated on their beds, Sueela with big ox-eyes, her head all kid's-horns of hair sticking out as in curling-pins, inspected the activities of the men, three of whom had kindled at the logs torches which illumined the room with a smoky glow.

But now one from outside entered the opening, and, on hands and knees, uttered the report: “Bayeté! Kindayana shot in the belly; the one that shot him gone off; another one captured” — and instantly the Queen's countenance changed. Springing to her feet, she went ranging about the chamber, resentment on her brow; but stopped to say over her shoulder to the messenger: “Carry Kindayana to Mandaganya” (a doctress); on which the messenger went running out, bent so headlong down, as to suggest one tumbling on his face, or seeking in haste a flea on the floor, while Spiciewegiehotiu again ranged the room, and Sueela, expecting squalls, followed her goings with ogling ox-eyes, with her fingers expanded like a goose's toes, with a pantomime pull of face, as when a baby does “Oh! bogies!”

When the Queen next stopped, it was to point a bâton of ivory at one of the nine giants, and say: “You run and tell his highness the Commander to send a mounted messenger to the captain who has gone to destroy their camp: if they point out the one who shot Kindayana, the captain let ten of them live; if not, he kill them all” — and, bent headlong, seeking a flea, this messenger went running, while Spiciewegiehotiu stood with a shoulder propped upon a roof-tree, her feet crossed, a palm on her upper haunch, like a birch formed of long curves perfectly outlined by a kaross bound in by a simple string at the waist, and falling to the ankles, a flimsy thing, accumulation of raiment not being the mode among the ladies of this community; and she pointed her sceptre, saying to another: “These two and the one outside to ‘The Elephant’ for now” — but at the same time made a silent sign that this was not meant as to Macray.

The feet that had been on Cobby then lifted, stirred him to stand up, and he, scrambling upright, faced Spiciewegiehotiu, though, as he was in a half-dark, with no torch near him, she hardly saw his face.

“What you want here, you?” she called to him.

Guessing her meaning, he answered in Zulu with a monarch’s head and offended lids: “I am here, not for my own good, but for yours. It appears that I am your cousin, and your rightful guide and guardian. You will have to do what I tell you — if I live. Soon I shall learn to gabble your jargon, then I will tell you.”

She, apparently, understood at any rate some of it, for with a nose of deadly disdain pulled at him, with her sceptre uplifted to hit him, she stepped promptly upon him, crying out with the flying tongue of a scold: “You think you have time to learn Se-Ngwanya jargon? You think so? Vultures know how black man taste; now they want to know how white man taste. If the man your man shot die, Ah! you watch vultures eat your tongue before they eat your lungs.”

And down the bâton of ivory came, or was coming, for his head, when it halted suspended: now she saw his face, that rock of his sovereignty, upon which the waves of defeat and danger seethed in vain.

But it was not respect that stayed her blow, but something else — Memory. For quite a minute of silence she eyed him; then a left finger summoned one of the torch-bearers, and for quite another minute of silence in the light of that torch her eyes pondered upon him, while Sueela, leaning forward, stared with wonderment at her.

In those moments it seemed to the Queen that in some dream somewhere she had seen that countenance, known its meaning, and within what household and home of mood it lived and moved — Cobby, in fact, having a very strong resemblance to his Aunt Jane, Spiciewegiehotiu’s mother, a stronger resemblance than to his own mother, as Spiciewegiehotiu more resembled his mother than her own.

Spiciewegiehotiu turned away without a word; stood again against the roof-tree, with lowered lids.

“If you care anything for Reason — —” Cobby now began to say, when she, with sudden fretfulness, shook her face intolerantly, saying: “Take these men out of my sight!” And at once this was done.

X. "THE ELEPHANT"

COBBY, MACRAY AND their Zulu, after being taken by a guard of seven through the gate of the Queen's park, walked southward down a slope, till they came to a palisade half a mile long that ran east and west, where a wicket was opened to them by a picket posted there.

Now they were at the top of "the Square," a place (called "awna," or "kotla") enclosed with palisades, long as Tottenham Court Road, with a river running along its east side, an area big enough to contain the live-stock of that district in case of invasion, an expanse of emptiness containing scarcely anything save, here or there, some tremendous old tree gone hollow, and rags of grass. But after stepping through that wicket, the party passed by a platform of earth, hard-trodden, three feet high, on which were pillars of wood supporting a roof of reeds some fifty feet long, under which canopy were three steps of stone, leading up to an arm-chair of stone, and before this throne two semi-circles of stools, concentric — this being the judgment-seat and council-police of the Queen, as shown in the drawing of the town by Cobby.

Then, south of that platform, they passed by another object — a cube of earth three feet big — very red then in the torchlight, for here heads fell. And then another platform with pillars and a roof — the market; and thence the tramp was past the guards of the great gate, and along country-road to the right.

Without pause the seven giants chuckled and chatted, as they sauntered on, and anon differed in opinion and waxed warm, full of other interests than their prisoners; but Cobby walked silent, and when Macray said in his light way, "Well, we seem to be in a bad old way, baas," and received no answer, he, too, walked silent with his thoughts.

Cobby was offended that Macray had not joined him in holding up the nine with his revolver in the royal hut; nor could he understand why his and the Zulu's arms were bound, and not Macray's.

But what was heavy now upon him was not his own fate, nor yet Macray's, but his camp's — those forty-seven whom he had led to death, for he had gathered in the hut that they were to be wiped out. But how possibly could Spiciewegiehotiu know where his camp lay in the vast of Africa? How, too, had she foreknown — with so much preciseness! — his attempt upon her that night? By nature slow to suspicion, he did not conceive the idea that Macray, after the death of Rolls, might have come to Spiciewegiehotiu, and told her all.

Down a slope westward the way was, with here or there a private kraal or farmstead that the eye could divine in the dark, where a cow lowed, a bull highed, or shrilled, and, outlined southward on the sky, the mountains, that were no more mountains now, but only hills; down, then up, and down, till they came to a lake, in which Cobby suddenly found himself wading knee-deep, and close before him cliff-wall, sixty feet high, passing away into darkness north and south. Imagining that this cliff was washed by the water, he wondered whither they were going, until, on coming to the cliff-face, his captor pressed down his nape to make him stoop, and, as he entered under the cliff, he understood that this must be the "Elephant" rock, supported on "legs," of which Rolls had told him.

Twice, as he walked on, wading, he happened to let his head lift a little from the awkward stoop, and twice bumped it; but after some minutes of it, the roof of rock rose somewhat, and thenceforth became a dead level a foot

On and on the walk was, the water quite warm, as if having a volcanic warmth, nowhere rising higher than the thigh, the bottom a bottom of rock; and here, where no breath of breeze seemed to stray, the torch burned steady, shedding a blood of slaughter over the jet-black surface of the water, showing anon patches of lotus and anon reaches of lichen — only one torch now, for after some time Cobby realized with a start that the party of ten had become a party of five, Macray and four of the guard being no longer in it; he had been all preoccupied with the strangeness of the place in which he now found himself straying — could not rid his brain of the impression that the place lay profoundly buried in subterranean depths, the abode of gnomes ruminating in there the opium of a reverie that never ended, brooding for ever in the bosom of that home of muteness, into whose gloom no glim of the sun or of the moon ever entered; and he understood that farther than the flight of fancy that roof of rock ran on and on, and under it always that night of water, farther than fancy flies: so he had had no notion at what moment Macray had ceased to be near behind him; it had been silently done ...!

A mile of that drowsy water went coiling away in waves like waves of oil round his wading thighs, a thousand times, and again a thousand times, in a silence not now broken by the blacks, because of the babble of echoes from the rock-roof that mocked all attempts at talking; only Cobby, twice turning to his Zulu, said: “Courage, Panda!” and was answered with the smile of a dauntless man.

And now the monotony of that wading and wading in a drowsy air saturated with water-vapour made Cobby drowsy in a reaction after his late agitations; he longed, as if he had drunk a drug, to stop and drop, to squat in that gloom of the lukewarm lagoon, and nod under the load of the roof of rock — did, in fact, begin to nod, when his head again struck the roof, which again came down a little for a hundred yards; at the end of which an area of radiance on the water came into sight, and then two stone steps rising out of the water at a place where the monotony of roof was broken by a vaulted room, in this room being a doorway shaped like a bow, and at the bow-string the two steps, the radiance on the water being shed from two torches at the doorway: and up the two steps, green-grown and slimy, the five stepped, stooped into the doorway, and went stooping up a rock-corridor to a rock-hall, in the middle of which, surrounded by nut-torches (oil-nuts stuck on skewers) twelve men lolled, smoking, snuff-taking, playing toss-and-pick-up with marbles.

All about this hall were piles of logs, and there was a fire under a pot, the smoke going up a hole tunnelled through the rock — chimney and ventilator to the whole. Those outer steps also were obviously artificial, “The Elephant” having been more or less modified by man into a prison and fortress: Cobby called it “the Elephant and Castle.”

Up leapt the twelve to crowd round the umlungo (white) — a colour respected here, because of “the white lamb washed,” but she was much less chromatic than Cobby, nor had they been at such close quarters before with that colour. One fellow just touched Cobby’s chest, then glanced at his finger-tip; one said: “Many of them — somewhere”; and another said: “Eheh (Yes), there’s all sorts of things somewhere; me hear somebody say there’s people with three eyes”; a third, agaze with hands on knees, observed: “Na! there is blue in his eyes, there is red in his hair, his lip is pink: me wish his nose was only green, he’d be pretty like the rainbow”; “Poh! let me alone, he is best as he is,” answered another. “He is no umfagosan (base-born),” one said: “see how he look”; and one asked:

“Where he spring from? What he come for?” but the prisoners’ conductors were not careful to explain, one of them now ordering: “Untie their arms, and put them in the big prison to the right.”

“May I not have my torch?” Cobby asked of this one, who had Cobby’s torch, revolver, knife, bag, hat.

The giant shook No from his head.

“It is not a gun, just a torch,” Cobby said, then with a sudden movement switched on the light in the giant’s hand; upon which the giant dropped the thing like hot iron, springing backward.

Cobby then picked it up, and, switching off the light, presented it to him, saying: “It is harmless.”

But the man now shrank from it. “Can you make it shine again?” he demanded.

Cobby switched it on.

“Na!” and “Na!” now sounded, all crowding round to see this thing under heaven.

“Now make it stop!”

“Now make it shine again!”

“You make it,” Cobby said, showing him how, and when he rightly pulled the switch, the light shone even for him.

Then he knew joy all over his face; and round now the torch went among them, their heads crowding upon it, crying out “me next!” everyone having a try, until it went back to the original holder, who stuck it with decision within the band of his moocha, as who should say: “this thing is mine.”

He got from Cobby an underglance of reproach....

And as Cobby was being led away, the man ran, put the torch and Cobby’s hat with haste and stealth into Cobby’s hand, and walked away out, poor but honest.

Cobby and the Zulu were then led along one of several corridors that rayed from that central room — a long corridor upon which rock-rooms opened, out of whose moody vaults floated voices in talk, moans, calls to the warders passing, voices of man and of woman, until the echoing steps bent into a second corridor to the left, where Cobby and the Zulu were soon made to stoop into a room, and the warders fastened across the door a bar, over or under which a body could not pass.

Cobby then examined the room with his torch, saw that it was circular and lofty, thirty feet across, and in it three men asleep on the rock-floor; in the centre of the floor a hole a foot across, into which when he put the torch its beam burned upon the surface of water beneath.

The air was heavy and hot, moist, noisome, an offensive smell pervading the place; but, tired of their night's effort and failure, the two fell down and slept soundly.

XI. DZINIKULU

WHAT FATE NOW awaited him, awaited his camp, Macray, Panda (the Zulu with him), Cobby asked himself many times a day — though between day and midnight was not the least difference in that place, where the eyes strained in vain to descry the hand, however crazily nigh they stared; so that, just to see light, Cobby would switch on his torchlight anon, always with a miserly economy, like one who sips liqueur, lest the little dry-cell, running down, should leave his eyeballs quite bereaved of light.

How the prison-people measured time he did not know — in that room of his time was abolished, but for the clock which the stomach automatically became, the prisoners all acquiring a pretty precise consciousness of meal-times — two meals a day, as it seemed, being given, when three men brought a board supporting calabashes, and a torch, the prisoners peering for them at the bar across the low-arched opening; and always the same food in the calabash — a mass called “poospoos,” but much of it, and described as “very nice” by Cobby, who in his diary writes a detailed account of its preparation — corn-meal being put into a pot pierced with holes, and this pot hung inside another in which meat is stewed: so the steam from the meat penetrates and cooks the meal, which then, as poospoos, is eaten.

But weeks of it: how many Cobby had no idea; and in white light now he saw his fault — hot-headedness, failure of restraint, he having talked too hotly and haughtily to a sovereign, in the hollow of whose hand his life and his followers’ lives were — a sovereign who was also a savage. Reflecting on it now, he wondered that he still lived even that death-in-life there, with his back against the wall, his legs out before him, his hung head staring at nothing. Here one did not determine the surface-tension of bubbles, nor count the droplets in a cubic centimetre of the water-vapour that one breathed and breathed. Europe was a dream now.

And for how long? for years? for life? till madness came? He had hoped that he would be “tried,” as Rolls had been, would be given a chance to speak, to plead, to appeal to human reason; but in the course of weeks this hope forsook him.

Meantime, however, his situation was not like “solitary confinement,” for here was much fellowship: he spoke with his Zulu; the three Wa-Ngwanya conversed together; and one of these, an elderly man of rank, whose name was Esingwe, imprisoned for agitation against a law, adopted Cobby as a listener, and, finding out Cobby whenever Cobby flashed the torchlight, would scramble to sit near, and give once more at great length the tale of his sorrows and wrongs. In vain Cobby again and again protested that he understood scarcely anything of it; the speaker did not realize this; and still the machine that spoke spoke on, speaking not so much to be understood as just to speak. Moreover, the speaker had found out that the Zulu at least understood much, as a Spaniard understands some Italian, and at special points he would insist that the Zulu should explain to Cobby, he waiting, nodding, until the explanation was made, and then continuing the endless tale. “What a fate, this tongue and this tale!” thought Cobby when it had long gone on; and then — suddenly — one day — it came like a revelation — he found himself understanding it all!

“Now I am understanding him!” Cobby cried gladly in Se-Ngwanya to Panda: “curious! the power comes, not gradually, but suddenly.”

“You understand me now?” said the gossip. “Na! now me tell you all, all; and now you send messages to the Sinder-ngabya: maybe he let you out” — this Sinder-ngabya (or “Guardian of the Sad”) being a dignitary to whom prisoners had the privilege of sending messages by an official who came at intervals to collect messages; and thenceforth Cobby did send messages, saying that he had come with a good motive, that, anyway, Panda, who had only obeyed his commands, might well be pardoned, while, as to the men of his camp, their innocence was complete.

But he never had any answer; and that baleful air began to sap his vitality.

However, soon after the fourth of his messages, an event arose for him — a visitor.

This was Dzinikulu, one of the late King’s three brothers, of whom Spiciewegiehotiu had beheaded two.

Mooning as usual against his wall, Cobby saw an invasion of light, and one of his warders peered in, calling eagerly: “Umlungo! come!” and he whispered in a flurry: “Prince Dzinikulu to see you — na! You ukukonza (do obeisance): maybe he do good for you”; and, drawing Cobby out to stand in the corridor, he ran off.

Then all in torchlight the royalty came, brow-bound with ivory, beplumed in crimson with the egret’s tuft, “and saluted me with no little dignity in quite a Zulu style” (Cobby writes). “His mantle not being wetted, I divined that he must have come under ‘The Elephant’ in some kind of boat rather than on a man’s back, for Dzinikulu is a very big being, man of forty-eight, say, with a mass of full-face, and eyes from whose corners peer intrigue and experienced caution. He stood with one leg cocked forward, and said to me: ‘You send messages to the Sinder-ngabya; the Sinder-ngabya report them to me, as the Great-great gone away from Eshowe on a tour to visit other towns: so me come to hear your complaint.’ Now he waved away the torch-bearers, saying to them: ‘Count six-three (i.e. nine) six hundred times (i.e. 216 times), then come back’; and as soon as he and I were alone in darkness, he said in a lower tone: ‘Trust in me: maybe you and me think the same things.’

“(My translation of their words, by the way, is not, in one sense, exact; but since it is based upon my knowledge of the genius of their speech, upon my knowledge of how an English language invented by them would be spoken, it is, in another sense, exact: for whoever has translated a tone, has translated everything. What is amusing is that some writers on Africa make negroes speak in a lofty sort of tone like Ezekiel, with verbs ending in ‘eth,’ rather confirming what I often think that untrained intellects have a kind of liking, a preference, for untruth.)

“He then wanted to know of me exactly with what objects and hopes I had come to Wo-Ngwanya, and I told him frankly all, explaining how my object was the Queen’s good; on which he, compressing my arm with his fingers, stood silent, until he said: ‘So you say: how she to know that it true?’

““From the fact that I have taken so much trouble to come to her,’ I answered.

“On this I could hear him chuckle in his gruff way, and mutter to himself: ‘Maybe, if she believe all that, she go!’ and I understood then that I have an ally in Dzinikulu, who hankers to see the back of his Queen, that he may reign in her stead.

““You will tell her all that!’ he said close and low, compressing my arm: ‘maybe she believe! Anyway, me and you bake bread together against Mandaganya and Sueela: me and you together beat everybody.’

““Who is Mandaganya?’ I asked him.

“‘Witch-doctoress — mother of Sueela. Spiciewegiehotiu foolish with love for Sueela: so Mandaganya powerful. Two months ago Spiciewegiehotiu say publicly she will take for her husband Sandelikatze, Sueela’s brother, the executioner. Everybody clap their hand on their mouth; everybody say Spiciewegiehotiu go too far, too far, too far. Next full moon she marry Sandelikatze. Sandelikatze is dirt! Sueela is dirt! Mandaganya is dirt! Everybody say Spiciewegiehotiu must be mad! She care nothing for Sandelikatze — Sandelikatze is dirt! but she in love with Sueela — na! she marry Sueela’s brother to please Sueela. When she do, all Wo-Ngwanya go against her. Then me and you bake bread together — wait, wait. Sueela and Mandaganya will fight hard, for if Spiciewegiehotiu go down, or go away, what will such dirt be? Corpses without heads. But me and you fight hard, too; me and you beat everybody.’

“I then said to him: ‘Yes, but when? Can you set me free? I am becoming ill, my teeth may decay, my clothes are filthy.... How long have I been here?’

“He said ‘a month,’ adding: ‘Me can’t set you free, but me think you go free. If Spiciewegiehotiu was going to kill you, she kill you long ago: she have some reason in her head not to kill you, me not know what it is. Soon she come back from The North; you send her message; beg her pardon — —’

“This I cut short, telling him that that I should never, never do.

“‘Proud man — na! induna,’ he went. ‘Still, you get free — me think so. Before the Queen went away, the old guest-house in the sigodhlo was pulled down, now a new one is put up, and a certain person said in my ear that Sueela said in his ear that she have reason to believe that this is done for you — not likely, but maybe so. When the Queen come back, me going to counsel her to cut your head off, and be done; then, maybe, she set you free.’

“All this, insubstantial as it all was, comforted my misery not a little; and I then proceeded to sound him about the prospects of Panda, about the camp, about Macray. And now a terrible blow was in store for me: for he answered unconcernedly: ‘No trouble about your camp: they all killed, except six-four (ten). Your Zulu who shot the Mo-Ngwanya that night had his right arm broken, then his right eye burnt out, then his head torn off.’

“It made me sick. Enfeebled as I was, I had to cling a little to the savage. To think that Woman can be so hard and heartless ...!

“I asked him if the shot Mo-Ngwanya had died, and he answered: ‘Eheh (Yes), he died. Belly went rotten.’

“‘But I, too, was threatened, if he should die!’ I cried: ‘I shall not be set free! And all my men, but ten, ruthlessly massacred for nothing! How unreasonable! How brutishly unmanlike!’

“To this he answered, patting my arm: ‘No, you wrong. Strong mind, Spiciewegiehotiu. When she have reason, she kill, kill, kill; but she not kill a fly without reason. She and me not friends, but — strong mind, eheh! clear, not brutish. You come to take her away; she capture you. Suppose she have reason not to kill you: you think she going to leave forty of your men round you to help you take her away? No, she kill them. She spare ten; sell them as slaves; take the price of them for herself.’

“‘But my waggons!’ I cried, ‘all my implements and baggage —— !’

“‘Oh, they all there in the royal park,’ he answered, ‘you never get them again. She love wealth — cattle and cattle’s worth; grasping; close-fisted — na!’

“‘She will not know how to use them!’ I cried. ‘And Panda! Can you not set Panda free? He has done nothing! And Macray — how about Macray?’

“‘Sir Caray?— ‘Caray’ we call him —— You trouble about him?’

“‘Why not?’ I asked him— ‘my servant and comrade?’

“‘Comrade?’ said he in a tone of irony, very surprising to me; nor, when I demanded of him why he questioned that Macray is my comrade, did he at once answer, but presently said: ‘Councillors and princes cannot gabble everything like gossips before a hut-door: a string pull them here, and a string pull them there. Maybe when me and you know one another better, me tell you something. For now, you no trouble about Sir Caray. You in prison, Caray living like a headman. Spiciewegiehotiu give him a kraal in Sitiwe (a west district of Eshowe), five huts in his park, seven incekus (Queen’s-servants), she give him twelve bags of money, a horse, two cows, goats, rugs, wood, guns, cloth, from her store-huts. He go to speak with her, and she receive him: but they say it is Sueela he go to see. He go hunting down the river; he lounge about the town; he get a lot of girls round him, he make them all cry out laughing, and hide their eyes, he give feasts at night, me hear he drink a lot of tivala (liquor), and they say two girls gone wrong after him. But it is Sueela he want: he glance at Sueela, Sueela glance at him. Sueela no good — loose like her mother before her. She look aside upon a man with a mocking eye that make a man fancy she scorn him: if he not daring, he not get her; but, if he daring, he get her. Not yet eighteen — five lovers: me could give you their names — na! count them off on my fingers — one, two, three, four, five. You tell Spiciewegiehotiu that, she fly into a passion, she call you liar; but everybody know it, except Spiciewegiehotiu, and Spiciewegiehotiu know it, too, inside her nose. A certain person said in my ear —— They come for me! You wait — you get free; me and you bake bread together; me work for you.’ He added louder, as the torches approached: ‘Me report your case to the Great-great,’ and, mutually saluting, we parted.”

XII. THE QUEEN'S RETURN

AFTER THIS A stretch of time that seemed like five or six days passed for Cobby, and then again an unexpected torch invaded his darkness. In its light he saw a white face — Douglas Macray's, and with Macray and the warder a servant of Macray's burdened with a buck-skin bag, which was pushed into the prisoner's room, while Macray, stooping in, cried out merrily: "Well, baas, here we are! — in the stations of life to which it has pleased God to call us. I prefer Bond Street myself, but this ain't bad for a month or two."

The torch being now gone, Cobby switched on his flash-light a little to see his "servant and comrade," who, smoking a cigar, had flung himself on the floor by the bag.

"Not bad for you, apparently," Cobby said, sitting before him.

"That's what I meant, inkoos. Oh, well, fortune of war, you know. Fact is, old Spicie of the throne has fallen head and ears in love with me — —"

"Absurd!" cried Cobby high, with a laugh.

"Why so, baas? Girls in Europe say that I'm rather a good-looking boy."

"Oh, quite; but you misconceive the quality of mind of the lady — —"

"What do you know about her, isinduna? She hates you like poison."

"Well, and I hate her like poison!" leapt from Cobby's mouth, and then he felt that this was childish.

"That's all right, then," said Macray.... "No, she ain't in love with me really, nor yet I with her. Handsome thing — but lives in an enchanted castle, too much trouble to get at, let her go to the devil: it's the Sueela gazelle I've got my gun on. Spicie's coming back from the country to-day, couriers have come in screaming that she is near, so I went to a nigger that they call the Sinder-ngabya, and managed to get permission to go to the waggons, now in her park, to get you some cigars — here they are in this bag, with a mass of fruit and things....”

“Good, good,” muttered Cobby, “and another torch, I hope, you have brought, and clothes, and matches — —”

“Oh, Gee, I forgot about matches and things — —”

“Then, how, Macray, am I to light —— ?”

“Here — I've got matches: take these.”

“And a toothbrush, I hope — —”

“Oh, Gee, I never thought of toothbrushes. You don't need a toothbrush in Wo-Ngwanya, baas: the niggers clean their teeth by eating nuts and hard foods. Look at me — I've got no top teeth, and get along all right.”

“I see. So I in all things am to become a copy of you — is this what you so calmly contemplate?”

Macray chuckled. “You might do worse, inkoos: here am I living like a nigger prince — Edward, the black prince, say, and you like Jonah in the ‘Elephant's’ belly, with no chance, I think, of being vomited out.”

“How, though, has this come to pass?” Cobby asked, peering without seeing: “I don't understand. Or, if it is understandable that I, the chief, am punished, and you, a secondary, pardoned, why is Panda in prison, and you free?”

“Ask me another — a woman's whim: I was born lucky, thanks to the immortal little star that winked and worked over my birth-hour. Besides, the girl by habit is down on foreign blacks who attack her: I must tell you that the Zulu voorlooper who shot her bodyguard was tortured, all our lot, but ten, killed, and — —”

“I know,” Cobby said with a bent head.

And at once Macray sat up in the dark, full of interest. “Oh, you know,” said he: “how do you?”

“I was told.”

“By one of the warders, no doubt.”

This Cobby did not answer, understanding that Dzinikulu’s visit was secret; but this silence gave the secret to Macray, who had come mainly to learn it; and he now bluntly said: “You have had a visit from Dzinikulu, baas. Now, haven’t you?”

At the indelicacy of which insistence Cobby answered with a puckered brow of protest: “Don’t you gather that I do not desire to speak of this?”

“That means that you have,” said Macray; “and now I want to warn you. Let old Spicie once learn of this visit, and all’s up with you, and perhaps with Master Dzinikulu, too. I may tell you that this man was seen to leave Eshowe in the dead of night and come toward ‘The Elephant,’ for, of course, there are eyes that spy for Mandaganya and Sueela: so they suspect that he came to visit you, in which case his motive is known — to ally himself with you in any plot to carry off Spicie. Now, any such plot is foredoomed to failure — I tell you so. It is true that Dzinikulu leads a powerful faction hankering to see the old royal house restored, but Spicie is going to whip him easy every time. Don’t you be drawn into anything with that princely nigger. If we had a man with the experience of Rolls, something might be done; but Master Rolls is now at the antipodes of heaven where pitchforks are all the rage — —”

At which Cobby with a shaken head, shaking the offence off him, sighed: “How offensive you can be, Macray! Dzinikulu, too, is crass, but not with that merry excess of yours.”

Macray meditated on this in the dark — did not like! but only said: “Right you are, baas — I forgive you. I think in some former existence I was a millionaire like my namesake, the millionaire, and so much fine gold made me a coarse brute, like the famous King Midas. Yet I seem to get along all right like that.... Anyway, have no truck with Master Dzinikulu! death’s the consequence. As it is, nobody seems to understand why you aren’t dead already. Is Spicie keeping you alive here as a sort of torture before she kills you? Lord knows! Twice I’ve approached her to ask what she means to do about you, and each time the same reply: ‘You will see’ — nothing more. I believe that she means to keep you here to tempt Dzinikulu into putting his foot into it, and then do for you and him together. Sueela, before going away, told her mother Mandaganya — —”

“You seem to be quite in the counsels of Sueela and Mandaganya!” Cobby exclaimed.

In his chuckling way Macray answered: “Sueela is destined to be near and dear to me, baas. I never thought a nigger girl could so poison the liver of men with longing and yearning. And Sueela’s a true nigger. Most of these Wa-Ngwanya show traces of an Arab origin, as the Zulus do — handsome some of ’em; but Sueela is your distilled attar of nigger: ink-black, slant forehead, flat-nose — sounds ugly, and yet, by some miracle of Spring, old Sue ain’t ugly. We didn’t see her well that night in the hut: if ever you do, see if that skipping kid on the hills don’t captivate your kidneys. Great big head, bulging out at the temples, bulging behind, bulging everywhere — beautiful — bursting with brains; and her great ogling eyes, alluring and raining raillery upon the universe of boys; and then her figure — her neck straighter than a straight line — taller still than Spicie, and lither: from the tip of her breast to the tip of her projected toe is the long concave of one perfect curve — she seems stretched to pirouette. And see her dance! — for every caper she cuts you cut one, too, or wish to, as if your nervous system was switched on to her activity. And the health of her youth — the crimson of her tongue and gums — her row of little teeth — you know before you smell her that her mouth is sweet like south-winds of these mountains, and the sweet whisp of slime that flies from a heifer's lips. Aye, and something very venereal in the beast — Eve in excess — gross rats-bane — the Black Plague I call her. And she ain't no prude, now; it's a case of 'all right' between her and me. Not that she's a bit in love with me: I know what's working in her — curiosity: wants to find out what a white sweetheart is like; but when I once win her, I shall know how to hold her. The difficulty is to win her outside the town, for, if she's caught, decapitation may result. But there's a field of sugar-cane half a mile out that I have in my eye. Whatever gods may be specially made sugar-cane to grow for happy lovers — a regiment of ferrets couldn't discover the cooing two in there. Unfortunately, the edges of the leaves scratch one, and if — —"

But here the lover's effusion, to which Cobby sat listening with cynical eyebrows, was interrupted by the arrival of a torch, and by an eager warder beckoning, saying: "Come! You free!"

Cobby and Macray sprang upright, both pale, Macray staring from the warder to Cobby, and back again.

"The Great-great come?" he asked.

"Eheh! She just come. She set him free."

"And Panda?" asked Cobby.

"No! only you. Come! Come!"

Cobby, his heart thumping in him, hurried to Panda to say quick and low: "Keep heart — I shall refuse to be free without you. There are some comforts in that bag — here are matches...."

Then out, and along two corridors, to a central room, Macray all at a loss, saying: "Oh, woman, in our hours of ease ..."

Then down a rock-passage to two steps, where two sanjwes (sort of punt) lay torchlit on the water, in one of which two household officers, braves brow-bound with spotted cat skin over their black plumes, awaited Cobby; and Macray, in the sanjwe that had brought him, followed the paddles and torches of the other through a league of gloom between the lagoon and the roof of rock. Anon his eyes moved from side to side, full of interest, of meditation....

It was about four in the afternoon when they shot out from under the rock to the shore, Cobby's eyes now blinded with excess of light, and when he saw the breadth of heaven, the freedom and holiday of the clouds, and breathed the bounty of the breezes, he was like one born out of nothingness into all: tears stung his lids; he wished to kneel. But his two companions, titanic with their black plumes, and gallant with the black ox-tails in their kilts, on their legs, at their elbows, all wafted backward by the wind, stalked steadily on a thousand yards to the great gate of the town, and on into the awna, or square.

This now presented a thronged appearance, all the top quarter of it being packed with phalanxes of warriors in their various war-dress, making there a region of spears sheening in the sun, then the populace packed, then looser throngs, among whom Cobby's conductors paused, one of them remarking to him: "The Queen salute the people: we wait here."

And twenty minutes they waited, until a group entered the square through the sigodhlo gate, and stepped on to the platform. The Wa-Ngwanya being tall, Cobby could hardly see, until, to his astonishment, one of his conductors, without saying anything, lifted him bodily like a child, to see: and now he saw Spiciewegiehotiu seated in the arm-chair of stone, meditating with her fingers at her face; standing about her two semi-circles of men, at her left Sueela, and at her right a shining being — Mandaganya — tall — shining in a mantle of snake-skin: but whoever has not seen how like silver this filmy substance beams in sunlight will hardly imagine the show and majesty of the witch's aspect.

She, stepping to the front, went down on hands and knees, and set to uttering the Queen's sibonga, or list of names; on which Cobby's lifter deposited him quickly, pushing him to his hands and knees: for on hands and knees the square was now uttering sibonga with the doctress. As when in a church the clergyman turns toward Jerusalem and Mecca to murmur: "I believe in god, the father, who has a son ... I believe in the holy church at Jerusalem ... in the resurrection of the body ..." and, with heads of docility bent, the worshippers murmur it an instant late, chasing his lips, and the monotone of the murmur solemnly fills the church, so these solemnly murmured with docility after Mandaganya the sibonga of Spiciewegiehotiu: "White Lamb Washed Come up out of the Water, Cow that Toss the Nations, Owl that Startle the Dark with Sinister Singings, Dark Cantatas, Deer that Speed Fleeter than the Breeze ..." and so on. After which there were some movements and man[oe]uvrings of the regiments for several minutes; and then Spiciewegiehotiu sprang up, stepped to the platform's very edge, stretched her mouth, and in a dead soundlessness shouted loud, with a laughing suggestion of countenance. But though Cobby was now once more upraised in his conductor's arms, only a phrase here or there was brought down out of the hollow hall of the air by some breeze to his ear. "Me come back to you! hum, hum, hum. Me see all Wo-Ngwanya, hum, hum. Wo-Ngwanya broad like the vault of heaven, hum, hum. Everywhere doves cooing, everywhere winds blowing.... Winds in the hills cooing like doves; doves cooing like winds in the hills, hum, hum. Me laugh to see it!

me cry to see it, hum, hum, hum. Me want to make Wo-Ngwanya broader still for you; broader still, and happier, hum, hum. Now me salute you — my sons — my brothers — my sisters — my own ...” now, overcome with emotion, she threw her arm, turning away her face, then turned again girl-like in the grip of a graceful indecision, but, failing to say anything, gave up, and tripped back, crying and laughing at herself, to recline in the throne.

Cobby’s face was distorted into a sort of grin — of interest, of greed....

Meanwhile, he was full of question as to whether his release had been timed, with design, that he might witness all this? If so, with what object? To impress him with a sense of her mass and majesty, that he might refrain thenceforth from machinations? Or just in coquetry to show herself dressed in her royalty? — a fancy which so flattered him, that he even found himself wondering whether his conductor had held him uplifted out of pure courtesy, or — by instructions? Flattering fancies, clouded with doubts and bodings. There he stood released: but for how long? and for what reason? “You will see,” she had said to Macray: and there is the frying-pan, and there is the fire....

XIII. THE GUEST-HOUSE

AS SOON AS the function of the royal salute was over, and the regiments had been marched away through the various gates of the square, Cobby's two conductors led him up the square through the now looser crowd, in which was now some group-dancing and much curiosity and swarming after the new face, until the three came to the north (sigodhlo) gate of the square, where, when an ivory ring had been presented to the sentry there, the three were permitted to enter the sigodhlo.

The black who had the ring then handed it to Cobby, saying: "With this you can pass out and in."

Cobby's heart started....

Straight before them northward stood the gate of the royal park, and after walking upward to this, and passing half-round the royal park, they passed, still northward, up an avenue dim beneath enormous yellow-wood trees, which led them to the gate of another park: and this they entered.

Here the first thing that Cobby saw through fronds of date-palm on his right was an aeroplane-wing, nor in the gush of his gladness could he refrain from rushing to it, and there in a glade surrounded by large-leaved bush stood his waggons buried in long-grass, with all his goods, given back to him.

In his incredulity at luck so good, he ran back to ask a flood of questions, to which the giants, smiling down upon him, replied that they thought the things were to be his thenceforth; the waggons had been taken there that day from the Queen's park.

They then led him through a grove of greenery, out of which peeped here or there a hut, to a big hut, evidently brand-new — which, indeed, was the new-built “guest-house” of which Dzinikulu had told him. He had become aware of sounds of music, and in front of the hut found with flute and drum six men and three women, who received him with prostrations — his household-attendants.

Out of the hut floated an odour of food, and in its roomy interior he found a meal of lamb, with yam pounded with butter, and eggs, water-melon, honey, and gaudy tarts made of grated cocoa-nut tinted pink, ultramarine and morinda-yellow, and gourds of spirit, to share in all which Cobby invited his conductors. “Nor from that moment,” he wrote later, “have I lacked any comfort.”

He expected now a summons to the royal presence, to be told the reason of his release and of this free-handed treatment, but when two weeks passed, and no summons came, he was torn with indecision as to seeking an interview, that he might see her face, and plead for his Panda. “Near as I am to her,” he writes at this time, “my park the nearest to hers, sleeping within a few stone-throws of her, breathing the air she breathes, I might be at Cape Town for all the sign I have that she is alive, save a sight of her twice in the square, the sight of her sentinels at her gate, who salute me when I go by. I can’t stand it long: somehow to be in touch with her, or go mad, I think.

“Yesterday afternoon I sent her Rolls’ American clock, expecting that she would, at any rate, acknowledge it and thank me; but no answer at all. Silly of me to send her that thing! whose silly insistence on ticking must have made her laugh at it and me. She will think that I am pursuing her! seeking to force myself like a hungry dog upon her notice — which Almighty God forbid. I think that what made me send the clock was the fact, of which I first heard from my Sansiwana, that she ‘goes to White River to bathe’— ‘White River’ being the name of the upper part of the river which, in the part flowing through the town, is called ‘The Gut,’ and below the town is called ‘Black River.’ But savages have such a slovenly habit in marking the hours of the day, that I could not learn from my servants at what hour she passes here northward for the sigodhlo-postern, and this may have put into my mind the sending her of a timepiece, with the idea that, if she learned to read it, and I learned the hour of her outing, I might spy upon her steps without much loss of time. I intend to-morrow to spend the forenoon in ambush watching for her.”

This man[oe]uvre proving successful, he saw her from his lurking-place go past his park in a gay troop of twelve or thirteen girls, with two bodyguards bearing cloths; and thenceforth some portion of his forenoons was devoted to this singular species of research-work. Meanwhile, we see him full of self-reproaches for his neglect of Panda’s interests, a neglect due to his shrinkings from seeming to “force himself upon the notice” of the Queen; he, meantime, doing much roaming about the country, collecting and making drawings and photographs of specimens, investigating its geology, especially that of “The Elephant,” whose configuration, he says, “is entirely due to water-action, as in the Giant’s Causeway, Fingal’s Cave, etc., the bed of the lake having undergone some subsidence since the age of the water’s action upon the rock-roof. The water, though so stagnant-looking, is in motion, being discharged southward by a stream which flows into ‘Black River,’ as ‘The Gut’ is called when, after leaving Eshowe, it bends eastward for the sea. ‘The Elephant’s’ area is about a hundred and eighteen square miles, the ‘legs’ (I have seen seven) consisting of columns of black basalt, all hexagonal, in clusters two to seven hundred yards in diameter, and from five to twelve feet high. I have twice ridden out to its west extremity, once with Macray, and made notes in No. III. One can climb to its top by an artificial stairway five miles out; but from no point of view have I been able to notice any resemblance to an elephant. It is said to contain several hollows other than that prison within which I have passed so many dark hours: these I shall examine later, as I have already examined (with what little technical training I have in this direction) a singular structure in the plain out at ‘The Elephant’s’ extremity, the relics of a pyramid, nearly half as big as the pyramid of Shafra, and much more ancient (v. III.). This plain, being a haunt of a little deer like duiker-bok, easily portable, is also a huntsman’s paradise, and daily tempts me out there, my stallion, Ali, being a good goer, a broad-breasted roan, obviously Arab in breed, with a ponderous battery of the feet in cantering like a war-horse; one, I hear, of a very small stud, of which the Queen and Sueela own the two fleetest specimens, ‘Selim’ and ‘Mustapha.’ My possession of him, I find, has caused quite a jealousy in Macray! to whom has been accorded one of the small native horses, many of which show traces of zebra blood. Ali thus, at any rate, contributes a little to my self-support, but still leaves me all too much the parasite of a throne, the louse of a savage’s bounty. Every third morning, it appears, my Sansiwana repairs with a list of my needs in his head to a species of major-domo, over yonder within the sigodhlo, and in the afternoon the baskets, in due process, come in. It will not long do for me! She must submit herself. I have to be her master, not her pussy-cat, fed with milk. First of all, Panda: he must and shall be free....”

Meantime, we find scattered about the diary some very heated references to the “full of the moon” — the reported date of the Queen’s marriage with Sandelikatze, Sueela’s brother, the executioner — outbursts of laughter which can be called mad at the idea of this marriage — threats of intervention even at the cost of life — frettings at the vagueness of the rumours that he can gather on the subject — all this subsiding when he hears that “nobody know anything but that the marriage is put off,” and when the full moon passes, and no marriage takes place.

Then there is a sight of Sandelikatze himself: “I was walking home — about four p.m.... with a bagful of flora.... Paused in the market to watch the traffic ... the Bon Marché of Eshowe ... from mica-schist (ground to sprinkle the hair with a blue glitter) to twine of hebescus-fibre and rope of ifé, and soap boiled from salsola-ashes, from guinea-fowls in great numbers to frogs (pyxicephalus), and locust-powder (eaten here with honey as by John the Baptist), fish predominating, a considerable trade in this being carried on with the dominions of Daisy, mullet from the rivers, ready cooked for sale, gaudy with coloured condiments, in big basins, barracouta and kingfish from the sea — this barracouta being known by them to be sometimes poisonous, anon all a family will die of it, yet, it is so nice, they still venture. Then I heard a herald or town-cryer calling something farther up, and remarked up there a drum beating and a knot of people, whom I found to be looking on at three executions. There were five armed men, three wizards, and — may I say ‘my rival’? my ineffable competitor? already before whom lay the headless body of a woman; and of the two men awaiting his handicraft, what was my dismay to find that one was Esingwe, my fellow-prisoner, the teller of that endless tale in the dark! After his handiwork on the woman, Sandelikatze, axe in hand, his legs apart, was in the act of glancing up with darting eyes that asked ‘how’s that?’ quite as Rolls had once described him to me; but the lightness and litheness and live-wire briskness of the picture cannot be described. He was nude, but for a few strings of leather: and never saw I the human body so beautified and elevated to the plane of the ideal — I thought of the Discobolus in black marble — the clean-cut creation of the hills and dales of the legs, the levity and enfranchisement of the figure. ... Has she not seen this, I asked myself? and has he been selected as a husband only for Sueela's sake, and not in the least for his own? I abhor a wanton. Let me go back to civilization, and forget that there are savages.... And yet here, I know, is the Reality of the world: not Sussex, but the Limpopo; man being a dark animal, with a few whites by a local freak, like white horses, white mice; nor are meadow-cows and polo-ponies the reality of the animal kingdom, but gnus and crocodiles and the black ant. But what dismayed me in this scene was, firstly, the nonchalance of those market-people, trafficking there while, three hundred yards away, three human beings were losing their heads; and then my Esingwe ... I had not gathered that he was to die! It seems, then, that one may be kept months in prison, and then be led out to death! In which case, what of my Panda? How I have delayed and delayed! — he must think himself forgotten. No more delay.... When my Esingwe smiled with me, I pressed forward to shake his hand. He showed no pallor; said to me: 'Happiness to you: me go to spear other deer,' on which a woman near to him bit her lip to repress her tears, for the women consider it ignominious to weep for grief or pain. Meantime, the Queen's elect looked askance at me, with, I think, an eye that implied: 'I will not be found unwilling when you are sent to me.' And then I hurried away...."

The next afternoon he presented himself at the Queen's gate in a clean shirt buttoned up, bearing as a present for her Majesty three boxes of matches, a little mirror, and a golden-syrup tin — a little object of which he knew that a billion savages, among them Cæsar and Plato and Shakespear, bending to it all the brain-power of the "sages" and the ages, could not have come near to creating. But he was told that the Queen was in the square, and would be for four afternoons, as usual monthly, in her function as a judge.

He then went down to the square, and, standing somewhat back of the platform, saw her for hours.

“The whole,” he says, “is conducted with as much formality as with us. In fact, lawyers, juries, ‘judges’ law-courts, seem to be an African idea (see Mungo Park); but here the jury, who consist of twenty, all elderly, and sit on stools before her, only function when she consults them, she otherwise being the sole judge, and wore, I think, an official vestment, a kaross of golden-jackal, soft-flowing, and three golden eagle feathers, à la Prince of Wales, beneath a brow-band of gold.

“I witnessed eleven cases that afternoon, civil and criminal, the parties with their barristers standing on the platform between Queen and jury, a knot of law-officers about the throne, while a small crowd stood before the platform.

“No little logic-chopping and fluency of tongue was exhibited in the arguments; and only in one case did I disagree with the sentence. When they took oath it was by ‘the White Lamb Washed,’ of whose face I again and again got a good view, and saw her brow always grave with care, or perplexed with doubt.

“All the defendants assumed an amusing air of indifference — ostentatiously yawning, and so on; but at one she stamped, suddenly crying out: ‘You are a fool!’ upon which he dropped, as if shot; and another was borne from her unable to repress his sobs, when, after sentencing him, she took and pressed his hand. Two were women, to one of whom the husband of both, now dead, had given a costly kaross all embroidered in blue, and both volubly claimed it. When the discussion had lasted long, the Queen appealed to the jury. The jury disagreed. On which she covered her eyes with her hand, and presently said: ‘Me cannot tell which of you is such an artful liar; but me artful, too: so me take the kaross for myself, you see’; on which an official beside her took it from the woman to her left. ‘A too facile way out, mother dear!’ I thought. But that was not the end: her eyes were still covered; I now understand that she was spying at the women through her fingers; and she saw that the one on her right pushed her lips far out, as they do when resentful, while the other smiled at the confiscation: and now suddenly the Queen laughed, tossed the kaross to the one on her right, and said to the smiler: ‘You think me not see into you? You wear “The Elephant” for a month instead.’ The crowd stood open-mouthed at it....

“When the next case commenced, I strolled past the platform and down the square, without once bothering to glance backward to see if she saw me.”

XIV. IN SUSPENSE

AS SOON AS the Queen had moved homeward within her troop of damsels from her “White River” bath the next forenoon. Cobby made haste to present himself at the royal gate; but was told there that “the Great-great” was about to dine, that he should try in the afternoon, and then only after seven days, when the mopato rites would be ended.

This fretted and offended Cobby. “These empty, restless days,” he wrote; and: “henceforth I shun the sight of her as she shuns mine — insolent little white nigger.”

Yet for three afternoons more we find him standing a witness of court-cases, one afternoon even standing in front of the throne, to see in what mood the Queen would look at him: but she did not seem to see him. Then for some afternoons more he stood witnessing mopato functions, of which he says: “Forty boys of fourteen to fifteen stood in a row before the throne, their nudity revealing the weals from the cuts of whips which covered them, these pains and circumcision being the initiation into citizenship: indeed, society here is organized on a mopato, or sort of Boy Scout, basis, one describing oneself by mentioning one’s mopato, counting one’s age by the number of mopato functions which one has witnessed....

light, a crowd round her, and in front of her a considerable crowd of militia and public, while of each boy in turn she asked: ‘What my name is?’ and when he had rattled off her string of names, she asked: ‘What the name of the headman of your mopato is?’ and, that string rattled off, she asked lastly: ‘What your name is?’ on which he rattled off the names which he had invented for himself— ‘Snake that Bite the Lion,’ ‘Ichneumon that Eat the Crocodile’s Eggs’ — swaggering egoisms just in the mood of the scutcheons invented for themselves by our own fantastic Kaffirs who ‘came over with the Conqueror,’ as ‘Cave, Adsum’ (‘Look out for yourself, me am about’), ‘Dieu et Mon Droit’ (‘God and my Right’), and so on. It lasted some time, but no one, save me, seemed to have enough of it, she, all fluttered with gaiety, laughing out anon at the names invented.

“After which each boy took up a ball of quartz (mill-stone) that lay at his feet; the crowd ran asunder; and she, at the platform’s edge, cried aloud: ‘Now, hamba — go!’ and clapped hands; upon which the boys started into racing. Then was agitation! vociferation! while the boys, handicapped with the rocks, ran in long files all round the awna, perhaps two miles — a cruel trial; and since they came home in a bunch, none well left, each resolved to win or drop dead, the excitement toward the end became ecstasy, the mob went mad. The winner, a tall fellow, all rib and leg, dropping his rock, darted upon the platform to fling his panting heart into her arms, she with shut lids, grave now, rubbing her face against his, our too motherly mother; then, patting his face, held to his lips a wine-cup, finally presenting him with spear and shield; and to the others she announced: ‘Well, you are men now; kill a lion, and quell a wife.’”

Afterwards there was a mopato function of young girls, burned and wealed, whose ordeal consisted in bearing burdens of great weight; then of lads and older girls; and so on, for four days. Early on the fifth afternoon Cobby, in a spotless shirt, made for the royal gate.

But again to be disappointed: for he met at the gate, entering, a group of State-officials, among them Dzinikulu, who pretended not to see him: and understanding that a council was about to be held, he went back to his park, to wait.

Lying on the ground in a grove, he was glancing at his thermometer at 89° — a heat so rare in the shade up there, that the doves in the banana-bush had rather ceased to roll that râles of their throat, and the canaries, subdued by the heat, had hushed their craze of jubilee till the evening cool — when he was aware of Macray, conducted to him by a sigodhlo-officer: “Hallo, baas! not laid eyes on you for five days”; and, throwing himself down in the grove: “Hot to-day — offer us some tyvala.”

As his face was already flushed, Cobby answered: “I understand that you drink quite a lot of tyvala! In a climate like this you will acquire cirosis.”

“What the devil’s that? — sounds like a liqueur. Leave me to my fate, inkoos — give a guest to drink,” he dropped at his length upon his back: “this ain’t bad here — for a time; on such a day, when the marrow of one’s back runs like butter, a young man’s fancy heavily turns to thoughts of love, to say nothing of a young woman’s, Mr. Tennyson — Souvent la chaleur d’un beau jour fait fillette rêver à l’amour....”

Cobby’s eyebrows lifted. “You speak French, Macray ...?”

“You may bet, baas — been all over the place. But funny existence this of yours and mine here! What’s the idea? What are we waiting for? I expected that by now the ravens of the valley would have picked out your eyes; but not a bit of it: we eat the lotus of ease, we live like lords at a lady’s expense — what’s her game? Are you being fattened to be eaten — or what? Had an interview yet?”

Cobby answered: “I am waiting to see Panda free, and then at once I set about returning to civilization.”

“Right you are! We two — and Sueela.”

“Who? You jest.”

“No, really, we take old Sue with us — Sue I call her, Susie-Susie. Seriously, baas, I seem to be gone on that nigger. Me can’t think of nothing else but you, Sue-Sue! And I see my way to abduct her all right. This is the very night of the plighting of our vows: we little two meet outside the town about eleven o’clock, and — —”

“What right — ? Better be careful! You break the law of the land,” Cobby said with a warning eye.

“Law of the land don’t trouble Douglas of that ilk, inkoos. And no one’s going to know, you know — Sueela’s too deep and fleet a Venus for that. I met her night-before-last in her mother’s grounds, and — —” he related the story of the arranging of the rendezvous, Cobby listening with a shade of displeasure on his face; and presently Macray, reverting ever to the subject of his success in love, became irksome, Cobby now wishing him away, that he himself might return to seek the Queen’s face. Finally, he bid Macray come some other day, and, on finding himself free, at once set off, once more to try his luck at an interview, the sun still high among clouds like pools of silver shuddering cooler in the middle, like suns with sun-spots shuddering cooler — clouds moving southward before a breeze that blew the troops of trees into choruses of commotion, cooling the afternoon with a wafture as of fans, and, far astray in a heaven vaster than the heaven of Europe, a moon that looked a cloud of the heaven of heavens.

After passing out of his gate, and southward down an avenue to the back of the Queen’s park, he was met by sounds of music, of singing, of outcries of girl-laughter, and he paused, again disappointed, for he thought that he recognized her voice.

On creeping near to listen, he saw a little orifice in the woof of reeds that filled the interspaces between the poles of the enclosure, and, lying on his face, he applied his eye to it, to spy if she was there.

He saw a glade in a thicket “rankly sylvan,” he writes, “with frond and fern, palmyra and wild date, wild coffee and orange, banana, castor-oil, all involved in whorls of convolvulus, of wild vine and the flamboyant blooms of numerous climbers, she on her face in grass, not far from a frog-pond covered over with areas of lotus and arum, and before her, alone with her, a bacchant dancing — Sueela; and Selim, the Queen’s steed, with them, to which now and again she gave a nut.

“I was spying at them some time. Until I was driven, or rather washed, away, I could not get myself to go.

“Sueela wore a moocha of cotton cloth, close-clinging like the Egyptian kilt, without any mantle, while the Queen wore a mantle of cotton without any moocha, her calves swinging upright as she lay, and here evidently was negligé and sweet-do-nothing — that day, indeed, being their monthly Sunday and nominal holiday, if all their days are not holidays. I think, though, that that might be a public good, if they dressed with a little greater elaboration — though I, on my side, had no right to be spying upon their privacy. Happily, the royal-motherly feet were clean and soft, and she obviously pays some attention to her toe-nails. The whole being of her is a thing good to eat with one’s teeth, fruit good for food, by heaven, and there I lay with her on the ground, near, near, yet hungry. She was smoking that long pipe of theirs, then from a bowl full of blue fruit (mawa) took one languidly to bruise it with her front teeth, then was gnawing nuts with wanton molars, half alough, casting the husks at an ibis, that anon by the pond cried out ‘Wal-wal-wal’ at her, while swallows swung down about her, magnetized like moths by her light and fire, and a lark, black and saffron, carolled above, and the green dove greeted her, in love with her and with lullaby, and it seemed to be in the greed of their heat for her that the monkeys rushed about the bush.

“Meantime, Sueela danced to song after song, some of which I recognized as songs hummed about the town — the up-to-date creations of the community, as in Europe they sing the latest things from the music-halls: and very characteristic, ethnographically, most of them are — the so-called ‘python-song,’ for example, which Sueela twice sang:

Touch me? Touch me? If me let you touch me, You’ll always be wanting to touch me. Taste me? Taste me? If me let you taste me, You’ll often be wanting to taste me. See me? See me? If me let you see me, You’ll run! and then you’ll run back. Smell me? Smell me? If me let you smell me, You’ll run and you’ll never come back.

“Then outcries of laughter! (The python is highly prized as a dish, here as elsewhere, but its taste, as in the case of the bloater, excels its odour: and always after the list of its effects on the senses, the same outcries of laughter.) Sueela’s instrument was attached to her body, a species of merimba (two parallel rods, connected by laths across, under the laths being calabashes to act as sound-boards), she thrumming the laths with drumsticks with a fluency of Paderewski, and certainly she dances like a grace this girl, though with a certain aggressiveness and fierceness of heat not native to the Graces. In figure she is the female of her brother, the executioner, as perfectly turned out, though taller (for a girl) — a being essentially special and herself — excellent in some way or other, thoroughbred — big-headed, big-faced, big-eyed, everything rounded and smoothed to beauty as in good sculpture, her head all horned, a broad parting disparting it at the back to the nape, and nothing can portray the raillery and roguery of her ogling, her sauciness and scorn, her feminine message. Magdalen is the name of her! or will be when she comes to repent of the sun and of her youth. Yet, I was pleased to see, all her motions were modest, save for some moments when her sovereign danced with her, they holding each other, Zulu-fashion, round the haunch, and then their bodies, challenging each other, jostled and jazzed a little, to the popular

Oh, rain, don't keep him back, Oh, wind, don't keep him long, Oh, rain, don't keep him back, For me feel like a breezy tree. Me feel, me feel, me feel, Me feel like a breezy tree, Me feel, me feel, me feel, Me feel like a breezy tree, they, in their feelings, moving their shoulders sensitively, as when a flea is on the nerve of one's back, and one works the shoulders uneasily. After which Sueela 'cut rattang,' as they say — though exactly what 'rattang' means I have been unable to discover: she jumps, coming down bent to the right, the right foot projected, with a lovely long concave from right toe to breast, left toes on the ground behind, wrists at ribs; then she jumps, coming down bent to the left, left foot projected, and so on, each jump very brisk and strict, definitely commenced, definitely ended, and at each jump she clucks the tongue. And now the song was:

Me wish my finger was a gun, Me'd shoot Mpanga as she run....

"I could not but reflect," Cobby adds in his somewhat heavy way sometimes, "upon the heartlessness of this utterance: for I happen to know this Mpanga, a poor cripple who goes selling nju beans and oil of cucumber-seeds for salads, who with every step of her right foot stoops sharp to the right. She never 'run,' poor girl, and if my finger was a gun, I'd cut it off, sooner than do her hurt. But such are the Wa-Ngwanya — a certain callousness of heart. I call them ‘the black French’ — intelligent, gay, gallant, bon ami, but hard au fond, lacking in compunction.

“The Queen, having danced a little, sat again; but presently rose again, now taking up a bowl, and, in moving toward the pond, muttered something close at Sueela’s ear; then at the pond filled the bowl. When I saw her lift it to her lips, I wondered that she should drink such water: I now know that the gesture was a pretence: for, pretending to drink, she stepped backward toward my chink, and, suddenly spinning, slung the water at my eye. Then fits of giggling!

“The chink was so little, that it must have required no little quickness of eye to descry the shine of mine; but, as I could not imagine that the colour had been detected, I was hardly offended, though much abashed. I ran a little away; then, making my way round to the gate, sent in a request for an interview.

“Quite fifteen minutes I had to wait in a very trying suspense; then came the answer: Not to-day, but to-morrow, I might see the Queen....

“I felt a species of relief at the delay! — strange. I crave and shrink; and no more know myself.”

XV. DZINIKULU MOVES

COBBY CONTINUES: “I then went back to my hut till the evening, when I set out for the funeral-wake of the sister of my friend Seshiké, the blacksmith, to whom, in wandering about town one day, I showed how to upset iron; for, though they have considerable skill in forging, they could not, till now, bend a rod in a sharp angle, not knowing upsetting. Now the tidings of it has flown like fire, even reaching to the Queen’s ear, I hear, and Seshiké, Rambya, and their fellow-smiths have overwhelmed me with presents.

“It is remarkable how their culture advances to a given point, and then abruptly falls short. The average Mo-Ngwanya is ‘better educated,’ as Spencer would say, than a Lord Chief Justice or a Chinese ‘scholar,’ has more (re al) knowledge — knowledge of things, as distinct from opinions — of geology, of the phenomena of soils, and crops, and stock, and metals: yet they could not upset iron! cannot make a screw-thread! cannot make sugar! Neither can a Chief Justice; but he soon would, if he was as educated as they; and many men can. Their sugar-canes they just suck; but have abundance of honey, which they hive in hollowed blocks within the woods, where one is pestered by the persistence of honey-guide birds wooing one to follow them to the hives.

“I made my way in moonlight down the awna, now solitary, and across the second bridge toward the East End, three different dogs fleeing from my ghost-face with growls — still: not flattering. Dogs, women, children: a woman may brave me till I am close, then, if alone, may suddenly take fright, thinking, ‘Oh, no, I’m off,’ and is gone flying, while the children, on seeing me, stand paralyzed, bawling out, or flee with screams.

“Eshowe being a garden-city, I found crowds of them spending the evening in front of their grounds, shouting banter, laughter, gossip across long distances at one another, and, as throngs of brats were everywhere, and dancings going on to drums and hand-clapping, there was no lack of clatter and action: and still after eleven when I moved homeward the dancings were going on in the moonlight. I saw two women quarrelling, who confronted each other in formal conflict, leaning far forward, with their palms planted on their haunches, and rapid as the hoofs of a troop of horses pattering their tongues acted together, like a pair of pennants waving away together in a gale. I still feel amid them the species of surprise which, on visiting France in my teens, I experienced at hearing everybody reeling-off French, and being as old and at home in their world as my mother in hers.

“At Seshiké’s, too, there was clatter and dance enough, complicated here with some drunkenness and a mood of moral laxity, to the accompaniment of that beat, beat, of the drum’s monotony, which, day or night, will not cease till the body is buried — this to scare away her ‘spirit,’ which is considered to be envious of, and unfriendly to, the living: and here it is that advanced Europeans are perhaps most in advance of the savage, he, like the ancients and our Puritan parents, living in apprehension of the cosmos — a very genuine jumpiness, and no fun — while we others have attained to serenity in the face of sun and thunder, death and hell and volcano — or, when we fear, it is another species of fear. Later we may be free of fear, and only love. But this sound of drums is of the essence of this town — everywhere, at every hour, one hears it going on somewhere, dumbly remote or booming near, like the beat of the bosom of the community.

“On arriving at Seshiké’s, I found, to my surprise, Sueela there, ‘scattering roses with the throng’; but very soon after I came she ceased to share in the revel, and became subdued; Seshiké, meantime, who was tipsy, celebrating my coming with endless fuss and gesture, I having to pretend to drink mead, and to touch the left shoulder of the dead, who lay within the hut with a ring of ashes on her brow, drink at her hand, an oval of candles about her, and three women who clapped their palms, and now and again gave vent to ululations, with their hands clasped on their heads.

“Then I sat on a stool before the hut, on the other side of the door being Sueela seated; beside the hut beat the drum; and before it two flutes tooting to perhaps thirty persons lewdly dancing and making merry.

“What made me stay was an inquisitiveness to see whether Sueela left ‘about eleven,’ the hour, as Macray had alleged, of her rendezvous with him.

“She, meantime, every few minutes was approached by Seshiké and others with flourishes of courtesy, was reproached for being sad, and was pressed to partake of palm-toddy, of groundnuts fried in cream, of masuka fruit in honey. She would not, however; and every time I glanced at her I caught the corner of her eye on me; so at last I said to her: “You are Sueela. I take it that you know me.”

“Her answer was: ‘Me not see you close before. You something like Spiciewegiehotiu!’

“With her eyebrows on high, the girl’s eyes widely ogle, and she spreads her unanimous ten fingers like duck’s toes, with a certain shrinking of awe, mock-babyish, as who should say: ‘Oh-h-h my!’ But her extraordinary eyes have many expressions.

“‘I like the Queen?’ said I. ‘Really? Not so pretty!’

“‘Oh, well,’ says she, ‘men are ugly things.’

“‘Don’t like them? Not at all?’

“She cut an eye of disdain, shrugging, and then she shrugged again, and shrugged again, seized in a disease of shrugging.

“I then asked her why she was there, to which she answered that the dead was her cousin; and I asked her why she was quiet, to which she answered: ‘Me not know. Girls such silly things.’

“‘In what sense, though?’ I asked her.

“‘They not know their own mind,’ she informed me. ‘They want, and they not want. Then they want something else. They toss in their sleep, they scratch themselves. The tsetse-fly sting them’ — a piece of natural history so indefinite, that I fled from my mental indeterminateness to the irrelevant question: ‘What are there tsetse in Wo-Ngwanya?’ to which she answered yes, at one spot in ‘The North.’

“I next said to her: ‘Well, you had better come home now with me’ — for I wished to shield her from any mischief into which she might put her foot with that absurd Macray; but she glanced sharply at me, asking: ‘Why “better”?’ and I understood that my phrase had scared her into a suspicion that Macray may have revealed to me something of her intrigue, so, in honour, I merely answered that it seemed late for a young girl to be alone so far from home. But her stillness and the reverie of her lowered lids showed that she was still suspicious.

“When I presently asked her if we should set out, she looked down, evidently meditating, at her beautiful fingers, like the fingers of the Venus dei Medici, but bigger; but then answered: ‘Me have to go first to my mother’s’ — and this I understood to be an untruth.

“She then asked me: ‘You see Spiciewegiehotiu to-morrow, no?’ and, on my answering ‘yes,’ she asked: ‘You done wanting to carry her off?’

“‘Not done wanting,’ I replied, ‘but done attempting, I think.’

“‘Yes,’ she said, ‘then we all be friends.’

“‘We, who?’

“‘You and me,’ she said in a low tone — I don’t know why she said it so low!

“‘That will be charming,’ I answered, rather too low, perhaps.

“I then saw her glance at the moon, and soon afterwards, suddenly rising, she said: ‘We meet again: me must go see ...’ and was gone behind the hut. ‘See’ what, Sueela? You did not say....

“I peered round the other side of the hut, and spied her feet fleeing through the back grounds, saw her pause to pry about, reconnoitring for spies, then saw her dart off with balancing palms across a narrow board over a brook that flows through the bush, and vanish in bush.

“But some moments afterwards I saw a shadow dash over the grass, gathered that she was being tracked, and ran to catch and warn her. But when I came to the stockade of the grounds, she had already scaled it, for, looking over, I saw her running along an alley toward Mustapha, her stallion, which was being held by a lad, and neighed as she came.

“Even as she reached him the horse was off, she vaulting upon him as lightly as a girl steps upon her bicycle and glides away; and, as I heard his gallop die away into silence, I saw a young man, all but naked, scale the stockade twenty yards from me, and pelt away after her.”

XVI. THE RENDEZVOUS

DZINIKULU WAS STANDING under the shadow of a motsuri, a gloomy tree like cypress, in a field of dourrha at the north-east corner of that water which lies under “The Elephant,” and he was eyeing a stretch of sugar-cane eighty yards north of him, when up there started to him out of the dourrha a snake panting with news: “She just gone into the canes. Sir Caray waited for her by the bamboo. She tie Mustapha to it. They in the canes.”

This was hardly said when another herald started up to pant the same news; and soon afterwards another.

Dzinikulu said to them: “Run back now. Watch all round the canes till she come out: then wait till she and Sir Caray separate, then tell her me waiting here to see her, and she better come.”

They ran variously away; and after waiting half an hour, Dzinikulu at last grunted: “Eheh, she come.”

Pelting Sueela came, paled, conscious of being all too late; scare and dismay in her!

“See me here, Dzinikulu,” says she standoffishly, panting, with expanded nostrils: “me can’t stop — me very late — Spiciewegiehotiu — —” “Sueela, you love too much,” Dzinikulu remarked.

“Who? Me? Oh, my mother, you got it wrong! Me meet Sir Caray to talk some politics — Spiciewegiehotiu tell me go — my mother tell me go. After the politics Sir Caray say ‘Kiss me’; me say, ‘No, your top teeth come out.’ Me not like him; me — hate him.”

She visibly shuddered, and Dzinikulu said: “Maybe you hate him now, but you like him well enough just now, Sueela, when you follow him into the canes. No good saying no — six eyes see you. Suppose me tell Spiciewegiehotiu?”

This struck her silent. His leer of guile, dwelling on her, could see her eyes dilated, her fingers stretched, her tall-looking form looking stretched in apprehension; till, lowering her lids, she just muttered: “You think me care?”

Now he gripped her shoulder, speaking close and pressingly: “No need to be frightened: nobody going to know. You and me friends from now — you in my power, me in yours — me to make you my head-wife when me sit on my father’s throne — you to help me and Sir Cobby carry off Spiciewegiehotiu.”

At which a fire of wrath and scorn shot from her eyes, but in so lightning a flash, that he did not see it; in the next moment she was smiling a tiny smile of guile, with downcast eyes, asking: “When Sir Cobby carry her off?”

“Me not know yet — me have plans — and me not fail, if you with us. So what you say? Me make your mother Chief Councillor — me make you Queen — hug you every day — make much of you.”

“You getting o-o-old!” she answered, ogling, with stretched fingers, in her shrinking way.

“Nonsense, not getting old: young man; wait and see.”

“How me know you make me Queen?”

He touched the ground with his palms, saying, “Me swear by ‘The Elephant.’”

“Swear you not let anybody know about me and Caray.”

“Me swear that, too.”

“By ‘The Elephant.’”

“You swear first you not tell Spiciewegiehotiu what pass between you and me.”

“Me swear,” she said.

“By The White Lamb Washed.”

She had one moment’s hesitation; then, touching the ground, swore.

“Now,” said she, “you swear about me and Caray.”

On which he, touching the ground, swore by “The Elephant,” and did not see the slyness of her smile — sly in her knowledge that his intellect was much more servile to sanctities and oaths than was hers; that he, afraid to break, would keep, and she, afraid to break, would break.

“So we friends now,” he said: “you with me and Sir Cobby: you say yes.”

“You think me can decide so soon?” she asked. “To-morrow night, if me send you a basket of mawas, me say yes; if me not send, me say no. Now let me go — Oh, my mother, me late, late, this night....”

They waved arms, as away she went darting through the dourrha, and presently to him, and to Macray, moving homeward, rang from afar the clatter of her stallion’s tramp.

At full bat she galloped all up the awna, and, as she sprang from her horse, tossed her rein at a groom, immediately to start into running up the avenue toward the Queen’s hut.

But the closer she approached it, the slower she moved — saw the opening closed; and only after several minutes of hesitation did she timidly rap.

There was no answer; and there now she stood in misery, suspended, wringing her palms, heaving the appeal of her eyes to the skies, breathing: “Oh, my mother, what a fool, what a fool, live in me!” All was still but that beating in her bosom, and the breeze's innumerable footstep trooping through the trees; and presently, still more timorously, she rapped afresh. But no answer: and after waiting through minute added to minute on the sharp edge and tiptoe of suspense, now she clasps her head distractedly, staring, saying: "My mother! this is Caray this night! no more Caray! me done, done, done with boys and men!" And now, crouching, her mouth at the round of door, she calls: "Oh, let me in, dear! Me love you."

No response followed at once, but some minutes afterwards there was movement within, the bar of the door was removed, the Queen appeared, stooped outward to look at the moon's position, and went back to sit on her bed, while Sueela, entering, stood near the doorway.

Nothing was said — Spiciewegiehotiu seated with her finger-joints at her cheek, looking judicial. But after some time she quietly asked: "Where you been?"

"You know me been to my cousin's wake."

"You straight from there now?"

"No. Me meet Prince Dzinikulu. He and me talk together. Me have things to tell you."

"You seen Caray to-night?"

"Me? No."

"Not laid eyes on him?"

"Caray? No."

"Swear."

"My goodness! me — swear."

Spiciewegiehotiu sprang sharply up, caught up a nut-candle, and went to hold it close to the culprit's face.

"What scratch your face like that? One, two, three — You been in the canes, girl?"

“Oh, my mother, which canes? Me? Oh, don’t think such things of me, dear.” Sueela’s voice of reproach broke, she covered her face, shed a tear.

“Well, then, tell me — what scratch your face?”

“Maybe it was that long-grass in Seshiké’s grounds. Me was sitting in the grass — —”

“Lie. If you lie to me, me kill you!” Up went her palm to slap, while the culprit buried away her face, presenting the elbow to whatever might come.

“Now the truth!”

“Haven’t me told you? Think as you like now. You only jealous, my girl.”

“What me have to be jealous for? You been with a man?”

“Yes, that’s it — think so, if you like!”

“They say you bad! They say you’re a strumpet! Are you? Tell me!” She stamped.

“Yes, me bad, me black — anything you like, my girl!”

“Trollop! They say Spiciewegiehotiu’s friendship not enough for you! They say you want man! Is that what you are? Answer!”

Sueela laughed out from under her elbow. “You only jealous! But that is foolishness. You think you love me more than me love you, Spiciewegiehotiu? You think so? Maybe me show you some day” — words which Spiciewegiehotiu afterwards recalled, and ever remembered.

She turned away, and presently in a changed voice asked: “You not even seen Caray?”

“Me tell you no,” sullenly the other muttered.

Spiciewegiehotiu drew her forefinger across her throat, saying: “Good thing for Caray. Me cut his head short off, if he touch you.”

Some moments more, and she said appealingly to Sueela: “You sure, dear?”

The other muttered something, and Spiciewegiehotiu now said: “People believe what they want to believe; maybe that’s why me believe you: but that not make it true. Next time me see you and Caray together, me know with one glance what’s what between you and him. If you not see him, what make you so late — long after midnight?”

“Me tell you me meet Prince Dzinikulu!”

Pause.

“Come on, kiss me.”

And, ogling, with outspread fingers, Sueela stepped stately; and cheek rubbed cheek.

“Who my friend?” asked Spiciewegiehotiu, asmile.

“You tell me first who love you?”

“You love me. Now you tell me who my friend.”

“You know.” And cheek rubbed cheek.

Then Sueela dropped upon her rugs, and sighed, while the Queen paced silent, wrapped in herself, with rather pressing steps.

“Me see Sir Cobby at Seshiké’s,” Sueela remarked presently, undoing her moocha.

Spiciewegiehotiu halted one instant, then, without saying anything, continued to pace.

And presently again Sueela: “What you thinking of now? You not curious to hear about me and Dzinikulu?”

“Tell me,” the Queen muttered, pacing still.

“Dzinikulu in with Cobby. Me say to Cobby at Seshiké’s, ‘you done trying to carry off the Queen?’ Cobby answer ‘yes.’ But that not true: for Dzinikulu offer to-night to make me his queen, if me help him and Cobby — —”

Now Spiciewegiehotiu halted. And at once her intellect seized, not upon what, to Sueela, was the main point — Dzinikulu's treason — but upon a by-point very embarrassing for Sueela. "And how come Dzinikulu to believe that you would not tell me this?"

"He make me swaaare not to tell: so he think me not tell!"

"How he make you?"

"My mother! it was in a dark alley — he and three men — they drag me off Mustapha — and Dzinikulu say, if me not swear, they hatch up a tale that they catch me with a boy. So me swoooore!"

"What you swear by?"

"By— 'The Elephant.'"

The royal toe tapped the ground. "You lying. You think me not know when you lying?" Then with tenderness: "Oh, why you lie to me, dear?"

On which Sueela, leaning forward, her face beaming affection, cried out in a distress of conscience: "Me love you!"

"You think me not know that? But you lying somewhere. Me think you meet Caray, Dzinikulu see you, and so could make you swear; nor he wouldn't make you swear by 'The Elephant,' he make you swear by The White Lamb Washed: and now you break an oath that you swore by me."

"My mother!" breathed Sueela, staring at her.

"Tell me now if that was it," said the Queen.

Sueela covered her face, shaking her head, crying out in distress: "Me tell you no! Me not see any Caray this night! Me wish Caray was dead!"

At which the Queen smiled, saying: "Never mind; maybe he die. As for Dzinikulu" — she paced again— "he tired of life, that man, he want to die: he must wait till me see my way to give him what he want. But me think he lie about Cobby: if Cobby tell you he done trying, he done. Me know Cobby."

Sueela looked at her with a perplexed speculation! “How you know Cobby? You only speak six words with him one night!”

No answer was made; the Queen paced afresh, wrapped in her cogitations. And presently Sueela: “When you going to marry Sandelikatze?”

“Never.”

“Me thought not. So what changed you so sudden?”

Spiciewegiehotiu laughed to herself. “That was foolishness! Oh, that was! Me only said it to please you and Mandaganya. Everybody laugh! You think the people stand such a thing?”

“You not care about that when you want anything!”

“Yes, me care. And me not want this.”

“So when you going to get married and know what a man is?”

“In six months.”

“Who you going to marry?”

“A king.”

“Which king?”

“Some king” — she shrugged.

“You not tell me everything you think about in your head!”

“What you mean?”

“Nothing.”

Spiciewegiehotiu paced on.

And presently again Sueela: “Cobby something like you.”

“Like me?”

“Eheh. Me see him close to-night. He very pretty.”

“You think so?”

“Eheh. You not think so?”

“He know a lot of things: me know that.”

“But nobody understand why you not kill Cobby! why you let him free, and have him here in the sigodhlo!”

“Oh, you too foolish. You not see all those things in Cobby’s waggons? Me could not even guess what they good for. Cobby will tell me.”

“How you know he tell you?”

“Me know. Some of them useful, maybe, like guns. It appears that white man know a lot. Already Cobby teach the blacksmiths how to make a rod thicker in the middle than at the ends. Cobby do us good — help in war. Me going to fight.”

“Oh, my mother. Who you going to fight with now?”

“Me not sure yet. Maybe with Sebingwe, but me think with Daisy. Me pick a quarrel with Daisy.”

“Poor Daisy. When?”

“Soon. This month.”

“But what you want more war for already?... Me think me know, though.”

“What me want it for?”

“Me think me knooow!”

“Foolish thing. War good. Only, so many wives to one man! — that what spoil it. Listen: me tell you now something me been thinking. Suppose me make a law — one man, one wife, no more. Then suppose me make war: three thousand boys fall in battle. So now three thousand girls will get no boy. But which three thousand? If a boy can only have one wife, he going to choose the prettiest, strongest, cleverest girl his lobola can buy. So three thousand of the least strong and clever girls will go childless. Then the average of the next generation will be so much stronger and cleverer: and in fifty years, with one wife, and a lot of war, the Wa-Ngwanya will become a nation of kings and queens.”

Sueela meditated on it. “Me see,” she said: “your eylosah (attendant spirit) always speaking things in your ear. But you think the people stand that law? My mother! one wife? And who to hoe the man’s fields, and weave his mantles? A man not like to pat every night on the same old pair of paps!”

“How you know what man like? Let the man hoe his own fields! — why not? Wo-Ngwanya man too lazy. You wait: me going to do it — when me see my way. If they say no, me say yes.”

“Isn’t that what me said just now? When you want anything, you not care what they say.”

“Yes, me care, if me not strong enough; if me strong enough, me not care.”

“And what going to make you strong enough?”

Spiciewegiehotiu tossed out her arm. “Victory! Victory on top of victory. The conqueror can do what he like.”

“Poor Daisy!” went Sueela, ogling with spread fingers, “and poor Sandelikatze! Then when you feel yourself strong enough to force the people to stand a white king, you make somebody king! And everybody to have only one wife, because he to have only one.”

“Oh, you fool,” muttered Spiciewegiehotiu, standing still, with an underlook.

“You think me not see into you? You say that they say me want man: you want man, too; and you going to kill thousands of men to get one man.”

Spiciewegiehotiu stood a minute looking at her, then on a sudden remarked: “Look here, me not answer you, you too foolish”; and paced anew.

And presently Sueela yawned vast, complaining: “Me sleepy!”

“Yes, poor thing,” said Spiciewegiehotiu, “go to sleep, you done up, Caray wear you out.”

“Eheh, white man rough,” answered Sueela, stretching— “think as you like, my girl!”

In another minute she was felled and slept, the Queen still pacing until the lights went out, the moon went out, then, lying, put out her hand, drew and took her companion’s, and so slept, and dreamt.

XVII. IN THE BAOBAB

THE FOLLOWING AFTERNOON Cobby presented himself at the royal entrance, nicely belted and combed, bringing a little looking-glass and a half-pound packet of sugar, to gain the good graces of the sovereign.

He was at once admitted, after depositing knife and revolver, according to etiquette, passed up the avenue, and, though his hands were clammy, to convince himself that he was not fluttered, paused to note that the avenue-statues were Egyptian in type; then on to the royal hut; but now heard to his right a voice that called out: "Me here."

On each side of the hut-door stood a baobab, and in the hollow of the one to the right, large as a hall in which forty people may sleep, he found the Queen seated, all among cushions and leopard-skins, in yellow, blackened with elephants, and in the black of her hair yellow flowers of ngotuane, a parrot on her lap, a stool before her.

Profoundly Cobby bowed, while she, cocking up an eye sideward at him, asked: "What you want?"

"First," answered Cobby formally, "to thank you for the favours I have of your hand; secondly, to present to you as a petty return, these little things; thirdly, to intercede with you for my man, Panda, still interned in 'The Elephant'; and lastly to announce the early departure of me and my men from your hospitable and charming country."

He then presented the things, and she regarded herself in the glass, meditating very gravely upon what she beheld there. "Eheh, this good," she muttered. And she asked him: "This made of tin — or of silver?"

“Of neither,” he answered: “quicksilver is the English for it — a liquid metal. This is spread on glass, which is made by melting sand in the presence of soda and lime, and permits light to pass through it.”

“Permits light,” she repeated musingly.... “Yes, but what light is? You can’t see it, you can’t touch it” — a question at which Cobby stood surprised, highly admiring the mind that so enquired.

“No,” he answered— “can’t see it: light is a force, and force is invisible. You must understand that the space between the sun and us is not empty, but is filled with a substance, which the force of the sun sets all atremble in waves or rays, like a pool when a stone is thrown in. Some of which rays are light-rays: and these, striking on the myriad bits of your face, fly off to the glass, fly through to the shiny metal behind, and fly off that through the glass again to strike into your eye: then you see as one whole the myriad bits of that face of yours.”

He smiled, but grave, grave, was she, her finger-joints at her cheek, the image of meditation. Silence. Then she asked: “And what that round thing is that you sent me?” on which he explained what a clock is, making her still graver. Then suddenly she looked down at the packet of sugar, asking: “What this is?”

“Taste it,” said he.

She put some on her tongue.

“Eheh,” she muttered with a nod: “it good.”

“That in English is called shoo-gah: not so nice as honey, but preferable, because it can be procured in far greater quantity — from cane.”

“Cane? How from cane?”

“The cane-juice is crushed out by a machine, then is boiled in large basins of copper; when it cools it is shoo-gah.”

“Machine? How you get the machine?”

“Oh, that is easily made.” And, imprudently, he added: “If I was going to stay longer, I should show your people how to make the machine, and how to cast the basins.”

All meditation was she, and suddenly, after a silence, she muttered: “Sit down.”

On which he sat on the stool, drawing it aside, for the light in there was subdued, the doorway into the tree-trunk not being wide. And now a kodak in his hand clicked.

“What that is?” she asked.

“A thing that makes a picture of anything in the twinkling of an eye — or any number of pictures. The picture which it has just made of you I will send you to-morrow.”

Her quick eyes reflected. “A picture like this?” — pressing open a locket hung about her neck, she held it toward him, adding: “A picture of my father.”

But Cobby said with surprise: “There is no picture!”

And now she glanced at the locket — the photograph was gone.

Her astonishment gave place to a paleness — of anger.

After a little she muttered: “Caray steal it!”

“Macray? No, there you are wrong, I assure you,” Cobby said: “such pictures are quite common and cheap among white men: Macray would never dream of stealing one.”

“Caray steal it,” she repeated, speaking rather to herself. “Me show it to him one night — he ask me to. Since then me not open the locket. He steal it. Maybe he tired of life. Or — why he steal it?”

Cobby, apprehensive now for Macray’s safety, earnestly answered: “Oh, take my word, he never did!”

“Maybe me know Caray better than you know him.” She smiled a little, scratching the parrot’s head. “Tell me now about why you come, and why you bring Caray.”

He leaned keenly to tell her. “It was for your own sake that I came to take you away, because in Europe you would be a far greater queen than here — with fewer subjects indeed, but far more skilled, and slaving for your pleasures far harder than any Mo-Ngwanya ever thinks of labouring for his own pleasures; indeed someone who is enjoying the wealth which is yours by law is at this moment a more powerful sort of monarch in Europe than you are here, or than monarchs are there; and I, being your cousin, and your natural guardian — —”

In a grave, low voice she mentioned: “Me your guardian, Cobby, not you mine”; at which Cobby flushed, and shut up.

“How you come to be my cousin?” she demanded.

“Son of your mother’s sister. We two have the same blood and heart-beat. Does something in you not know it?”

To this she made no answer, nor looked at the light in his eyes: but presently asked: “What the name of that someone is who enjoy this wealth which is mine by law?”

“He, too, is your cousin: his name is Douglas Macray.”

Now she started. “Same name as Caray?”

“Yes — just a chance. Your name, too, is Macray: Flora Macray: ‘Flora’ meaning goddess of flowers — queen of all the roses and lilies — queen of girls and of queens....”

He had her ear, but not her eyes, which were turned aside from him. She presently asked: “You know this cousin of mine?”

“I never chanced to meet him — no.”

“What Caray’s other names?” she next asked.

“Just Douglas Macray, I think.”

“Short ...! And what the names of the other Douglas Macray?”

“Just Douglas Macray, I fancy. We have short names in Europe, except among some aristocrat families, whose children have strings of names like Africans, their whole tone being rather African.”

“Me think me see something,” she muttered. “And what make you bring Caray with you?”

“I wanted a white man, and he offered himself.”

“So. Me see. That why he steal my father’s picture. But how you know me was here in Wo-Ngwanya?”

“Do you remember a man named Rolls? He told me of you, and come with me nearly to Wo-Ngwanya; but, sent with Macray in advance over the mountains, Rolls was killed by a lion.”

“Caray kill him,” she muttered at once to herself.

She then asked: “And it very far that country you come from?” and when he answered: “Thousands on thousands of miles,” musingly she said: “The world broad — na! and so many sorts of men and of beasts it breed and feed. Under the sunrise men and women busy living, and under the sunset. Some not eat python-meat, some not circumcised, some file their teeth away, some knock out their top teeth to be like oxen, some drop upon their back and waggle their legs together to say ‘how-d’you-do.’ Babisa traders come to me every year from Mozambique, Arabs from Zanzibar, and Pombeiros from where the sea beat that beach which is nearest to the sun’s going down: there Portuguese spend their days. They all different, and think different thoughts. Some bring calico, some cowrie-shells, horses, guns, seeds; we give them indigo, ivory of elephant and hippopotamus tusks, oil, dust of dalama (gold), which women wash from river-sands, with agates and garnets out of gneiss-rock. Me want more trade — far more: that will be part of your work, to make us large like the world, liberal and rich like the world. The world so rich, so strange! If a brook flow, it flow with music; if a breeze blow, it feel sweet, it blow with music; if the moon droop down, it droop in beauty. One evening me hear a little stream whisper so sweet, something seem to say to me: ‘Me-and-you: can the seven North-stars alter their form? maybe they alter some day: but you in me for ever.’ But all not good: corpses smell bad; old lions get toothache; old men get wrinkles. They say love tweaking sweet: but, if the girl get a child, it hurt her, unless she under fourteen. She not do any harm, perhaps; yet she rue, pangs trap her. Then she have joy again: the child smell good; she love it. But now and again it smell bad: she not love it for a minute; then it smell good again, she pardon and love it again, she gallop it between her palms, she laugh. So the world is. On the whole, it good.”

“Oh, yes,” said Cobby: “that is proved by the continued existence of the human race: for anon it is, on the whole, bad for an individual, and then the individual at once kills himself. Whether it ever is, on the whole, bad for any lower animal I don’t know; if ever it is, and the animal has no means of escape by suicide, then a deep wrong is in the world.”

“Yes,” she answered, “but it not argue with anybody — dumb! no tongue but the wind dumb, the sea mumbling, the thunder bumping. If you bless it, it answer, it babble ‘yes, me-and-you,’ but, if you blame it, it not care what you say, it go on rolling in its glories. When it want to rain, it rain: if you say ‘damn the rain,’ it wet you the same, no less, no more; when it not want it not rain, the rain-makers cannot make it. What kind of thing it all is? What kind of thing make it? White man know?” She peered suddenly into his face.

“No, of course,” Cobby answered: “only what you, and jackals, and archangels know — that there is Eternal Power, which shows some of its workings to our senses. To Power we English give the names ‘Energy,’ ‘God,’ ‘Force’; but these are mere names for convenience; what kind of being Force or Power is no life can ever divine: for when by God’s help we wink, or plough, or pick a flower, using Power, we have no notion how we do it — it is boundlessly too profound for us, in trillions of eras no living thing can ever come near to dreaming, for God is past finding out. We know something about Power, however — know that it is very powerful: it may be powerful without end; and we know that it is most adorable — our gaze can hardly bear the glory of the hem of the garments of the sun. Moreover, white men now have reason to believe that in time Power will be wholly good. You must understand that the bad smell of corpses, wrinkles, and so on, is very likely just a temporary state of things: for the high types of life, like lions and men, have not been long on the earth — men but for the twinkling of an eye, so to say — and are not yet adapted to the earth. Already men are so adapted, that they have got to like the smell of flowers, which dogs seem to dislike. In Europe pain in child-birth is abolished by a vapour which mothers inhale; so with toothache; wrinkles can be prevented by facial exercises, or cured by a simple operation of the knife. In Europe the principal cause of sorrow is now not wrinkles nor toothache, but poverty; but already our priests, or ‘scientists,’ as priests are called there, have proved that the cause of poverty is the fact that certain persons are considered by Governments to ‘own’ the countries of nations, out of which wealth comes: so our poverty may now soon be abolished. And so on. And this process of adaptation to the earth will no doubt work on interminably, for the earth is a bird of Eternity. You say that you hear that already love is very, very sweet: well, yes; and it will become ever more and more sweet — tweaking sweet, you said, like an eel twitching, and each instant of life twitching sweet, when the host of Life shall arrive at home, and God shall have wiped all tears from the eyes of Life.”

Leaning keenly toward her, he was looking at her with eyes which seemed to yearn to eat her, while she, like the ostrich, kept her eyes averted from that menace of being eaten; till, chancing to catch sight of a moisture of piety in his eyes, she looked kindly at him, their eyes met, and she then said: “You know a lot of things. You will tell me: and what all those things in your waggons good for.”

“Very good,” he answered; adding: “Let it be soon.”

“Why soon?” she wished to know: “that true that you want to go from me?”

“Oh, not from — with you,” he said. “But, anyway, I must go.”

“Why?”

“Well — but — I cannot spend my life in Wo-Ngwanya; have work to do; I being a priest in my country — priest meaning ‘elder,’ one who knows more than children, our priests (the real ones) devoting their lives to finding out new truths about the workings of Eternal Power. So I have to go to do this.”

At which she smiled faintly, saying: “Yes, you know more than children; but you something like a child, Cobby.”

“In what way?” he sharply asked.

“You soon see. You would not go, if you could.”

Words at which Cobby turned very pale, and half rose, crying out: “And could I not, if I would?”

With a forehead of rock, not looking at him, she answered: “What you expect? You come to take me; me take you.”

“My God,” he breathed in English.

“Yes, ‘my God,’” she grimly said in English.

Red rushed impetuously up his face. "Oh, this is tyranny, Flora Macray!"

"My name is Spiciewegiehotiu," she mentioned with a flush.

"Is it not tyranny?"

"Of course. Me a tyrant."

"Yes, over your own people! but I am the free subject of another sovereign — —"

"Ah! me laugh at the other sovereign. Let him come and fetch you, me chuck his chitterlings to the choughs. You have only one sovereign, Cobby."

"I am yours!" he cried aloud in a heat of imperiousness.

"What! You talk to me like that?" she called with a shrewish tongue, stooping forward to stare into his face.

And back he stared at her. "Yes, I talk to you like that. Now, what will you do? Bite off my head?"

She reflected on this, her eyelids dropped, and quietly she said: "Me not take off heads with my teeth, Cobby; and yours too big and red, and know too much, it give me belly-ache if me swallow it. But you not mean it! You not want to go! Cobby want to be priest to me. So stay — me treat you well — make you a great man when me see my way, you teaching us to make shoo-gah and other things, and helping us fight. Me just going to fight Daisy, and me want you to train a regiment of sharpshooters in rifle-firing, and be their captain. Our rifles not very good, but every day now we expecting a caravan of Arabs, and me have five hundred tusks of ivory to buy rifles: me and you stun Daisy deaf and dumb with sudden thunder."

But Cobby was not won. "I don't want to stun Daisy," he said: "I was led to consider myself set free, and now I find myself still a prisoner. I cannot stand it! I am free, free, free, and your master! By heaven, if you treat me with indignity, I shall manage somehow to throw off this ignominy of soul that has me in the gutter. You say I don't want to go, and unfortunately — unfortunately! — that is somewhat so — I am become your little dog, pitifully grovelling and sneaking to see your feet go by ... I like the walk, so rich in energy, in freedom and intolerance — the hips swing, the shoulders swing in counter-tune and antiphony — sister dear —— But no, I won't stand it! — I'd rather die — I divine the hardness and artfulness of your heart, and I am quite the wrong — Why, may I ask, is this war with Daisy to take place?"

He was now standing, and she, cocking her eye upward at him quietly replied: "Me have reasons, Cobby!"

"Well, I wait: tell me the reasons."

She smiled. "No; if me tell you, you think too much of yourself."

But he, not divining that part of her war-aims was to advance him in the State, misunderstood her meaning, and answered: "You see, you treat me with indignity. That will make a white priest vain to be admitted into the counsels of a negro Queen! But do you imagine for a moment that I would take part in the slaughter of many men without so much as knowing the right and wrong of the quarrel?"

Still she smiled. "There is no 'quarrel'; the quarrel coming; then me fight."

"Meaning that you will make the quarrel?" he cried out: "do you mean to say that a girl — so young — so fair — can bear to wash her hands in the blood of thousands —— ?"

Her forehead puzzled at him. "Men grow like grass," she remarked: "if you kill two, soon four spring in their place, and, if they have a ruler with eyes, the new ones better than the old."

Now, this truth was all in tune with his own mental habit, though all contrary to his moral habit, and at the contradiction in himself, he stood still more hot and cross with her simple vision.

“Grow like grass? Yes! True! But for a young girl — you will be a dear mother some day — you will rock a babe in your dear arms — —”

“Well, maybe, why not? When it smell good, me rock it.”

“Oh, fie — cynical. But there will be no rifle-firing, understand, by my training — —”

“Oh, Cobby,” she muttered with reproach, “you try my patience.”

“And you try mine!”

At which she laughed, asking: “We always going to quarrel like this?”

“Always! Always! — unless you do what I tell you.”

“Cobby, listen: if you think you mine, you live happy; if you think me yours, you get into trouble.”

“More threats! more indignity!”

“Me not threatened you before! Sometimes you talk wild.” Now she smiled. “Me think Sir Cobby in love. A lion worry him.”

“In love with whom?” he eagerly asked.

She shrugged. “Maybe with Sueela.”

“No, say it — you shall.”

“Sueela,” she said, smiling up into his face. “Maybe some day, if you very good, me give you Sueela. Me going to marry her brother, Sandelikatze. Perhaps you heard.”

“Ha! ha! ha! My sublime rival! My lily competitor!”

“But suppose me like him! Nice firm boy.”

“Ha! ha! ha!”

Now she flung her face frankly to him. “Oh, Cobby, you mad in love — a forest on fire — —”

“And you?” he whispered near: “you?”

Askance she eyed him, up and down, and down and up, with supercilious inspection.

“Well, now I am all surveyed,” he testily said: “what is my doom?”

“You think me weak in the head?” she demanded.

“No, I don’t think so — —”

“Cobby, a Queen know how to plan and work: if she not know, she not a Queen — she dirt.” With endless disdain her lips curled. “You go where my finger point, give up all thought of going away, with me or without me, and maybe some day you wash in joy, your belly go ‘Oh’ for fulness of the food of the gods. If you not do what me tell you, me say you get into trouble, maybe you die. No, me not think you die; no, not that. But, if temptation come to you, and you plot with anybody against me, you get into trouble, you taste the rage of my jealousy. Meantime, till the rifles arrive, you have all you want; live happy; play with the girls like Caray — —”

“You are to understand,” Cobby haughtily interrupted, “that there is no resemblance between Macray and me, except in skin.”

“You think me not know?” she muttered. “And, talking of Caray, me want you to tell Caray something from me: say me not want to kill him, because me see that he may be useful to me some day; and he can play with all the girls, say: but, if any Mo-Ngwanya girl ever shed a tear because of him, and me get to know, he finished, he done for. Let him know. Me give him plenty of goods to buy a wife or two, if he want wife. And now you and me have talked together: me give you snuff, and something to drink.” She clapped her palms. “Later we discuss more. When you want to see me, me let you. That please you?”

This she said in a confidence at which Cobby groaned “sweet,” but then at once broke out: “But the whole interview is unsatisfactory! — and not one word about Panda! When, pray, is Panda to be set free?”

She shook her head. “Never, Cobby.”

“What!... my God....”

“Or — yes — maybe some day, when me see my way. But not for a long time.”

“But why? Why? The man has done nothing —— Look here, I refuse to be free, I will go back to ‘The Elephant — —’”

“Cobby, you can’t, unless me send you. Think why me keep him prisoner — it is easy to see — —”

“No, I don’t see — —” he span to see Sueela enter asmile, looking mockery under her eyes at him, bearing a vessel and three mugs, the vessel bound round with strings to keep down a bung in it, which, when the strings were cut, rushed out, foam showering out of the vessel’s mouth.

But Cobby crossly refused the proffered cup. “No, I won’t,” he protested: “I am very offended,” — whereat Sueela pulled a long face and goggles of mock-awe at the dreadfulness of the etiquette, while the Queen, slinging a knee, looked keenly up into his face, saying: “Cobby, drink — me command.”

“Command away — it’s no good!” cried Cobby.

She reflected on the situation; then held out her hand. “Cobby can kiss my hand.”

And immediately he was at it, down on his knees like the Brahmin muttering prayer, pressing kisses on it here and there, on palm and back.

“Now drink,” she suggested.

And he stood up, grumbling, “Oh, well, I suppose — —” and took the mug.

And bows of ritual betwixt cup and lip were cut between the three drinkers.

As to the drink, “Never,” Cobby wrote afterwards, “have I tasted anything half so nice — nor, indeed, conceived that any flavour can be so delightful, the best champagne being very far inferior to this spiritual thing.

Cross and preoccupied as I was, I felt impelled to ask the name of it, and was told 'sorrel drink.' I now have it in abundance, for the next morning an area of jars came to me. She is rich and liberal; but she shall find that I am not to be petted and bought...."

No sooner had he drunk than he saw two gigantic bodyguards at the tree-entrance, and the Queen said: "They conduct you to the gate. Good health."

Half going, half lingering, he put out arms of appeal, pleading: "Will you have pity upon Panda?"

"Good health," she repeated, bowing him out; and headlong he went.

She then let herself lie on her face; and Sueela, looking down on her, presently remarked: "My goodness, he nearly eat your hand"; on which Spiciewegiehotiu's shoulder suddenly shuddered with chuckling, and she sat up, saying: "A miss is as good as a mile!"

Sueela then wished to know: "What you tell him about Panda to make him so cross?"

"Me tell him me keep the man in prison. What he can expect? He think me let him have a servant of his own to help him carry me off, or escape without me? But he won't want to run away and leave Panda behind, so that's another reason why me keep his Panda in prison. His Caray would be in prison, too, only —— Look here" — she showed the locket— "Caray steal the picture."

"My mother, why he steal it?" Sueela breathed, all in awe.

"It appears now," the Queen answered, "that the reason Caray not want Cobby to carry me to that country is that it is Caray himself has my father's goods, so Caray not want me to go to get the goods from him, and he steal the picture, which would prove that me my father's daughter. Eheh, that is it." "Well!" went Sueela, scandalized: "me kill the thief, if me was you."

“Not me,” said the Queen: “till the day Cobby forget his country, Caray one of my spies and bodyguards against Cobby and Dzinikulu.”

“But a thief —— ! Me wouldn’t have believed.... If you not want to cut off his head, circumcise the rascal! then he won’t be quite so cheeky.”

The Queen eyed her coldly aside. “How you know he not circumcised already?”

“My goodness! somebody tell me.”

“Who tell you? Maybe the sorrel drink get into your head, and now the truth coming out.”

“All right, keep on about that, my girl!”

Spiciewegiehotiu, suddenly lost in a reverie, did not answer; and presently Sueela, musing: “Cobby pretty. My God, he very pretty.”

The Queen said nothing, and presently again Sueela, musing: “Me wonder if Cobby circumcised?”

Now the Queen started out of reverie. “You better go and ask him! Maybe he give you a present you not soon forget.”

Sueela shook her face slowly. “No, not Cobby. Cobby a god. But tell me all he say to you, and you say to him.”

“Come, let us walk.” She sprang up, they passed out, and, with arms round waists, paced long the avenue’s moss in step, tall daughters of the gods together, walking with that length of ankle and lordly leg of Man, predominantly walking his planet at last.

XVIII. WAR-DRUMS

“THE WHOLE PLACE is now transformed,” Cobby presently wrote: “ordinary industry is cast to the winds, almost all work having become war-work, and something extremely like fever seems to have seized upon all the people, equally on fire being the eyes of the lad of fifteen and the man of sixty, equally they dance and stare and wave their arms: I call it ‘the dancing-sickness’ — all wheels in dance, a wicked and mad dancing, which means ‘Kill! Kill!’ Every day dreadful kerry-battles take place in the Square between regiment and regiment, with the Queen as spectator of cracked skulls, fractured bones, disablements and deaths, as in the actual battle-field; and from morning to night athletic exercises are the order of the day. This afternoon in the east of the town I found within one hour three different priests rousing crowds to frenzies of venom: Daisy was the enemy of Man! Daisy was the stink-cat, the man of sin, the ripper of women and children! At the name Daisy the lip spits. I saw two women quarrelling, and with a scorn which shrieked each hurled at the other the taunt of having some M’Niami blood, and being a dirty pro-Daisy. And in every direction the thud of drums dumbly thumping, thumping, and the tramp of marchers marching somewhither under some motive.”

The trouble (as understood by Cobby and the public) was as follows: —

Daisy had sent to Spiciewegiehotiu an embassy to request the hand of Sueela in marriage.

Spiciewegiehotiu had replied: “Very good. How much for her?”

Daisy had then replied: “Thirty head of cattle.”

This was wanton; this was picking a quarrel; this was war. Daisy was out to waste Wo-Ngwanya....

Now, about this time Spiciewegiehotiu had bought largely in rifles from a caravan, and when the quarrel broke out she had summoned Cobby to lay the case of Daisy before him.

On which Cobby, little suspicious as he was, had cried out: "It is hard to believe! You have as good as told me yourself that you meant to pick a quarrel with Daisy."

"Yes," she had said, "but Daisy not give me time: he pick the quarrel — you see, no?"

"Yes, I see — since you say so."

"So now you train the regiment, no? When we beat Daisy, everybody say you beat him, you bring luck."

"I don't care at all what everybody will say," he had answered, not fathoming her aims in respect of himself; on which she had shut up her lips with a resentful pressure.

But in the end he had undertaken to captain the regiment, nor was it until afterwards that it began to be whispered that Daisy's request for Sueela's hand had not been spontaneous, but had been suggested to him by an agent of Spiciewegiehotiu, on the ground that that marriage would cement the friendly relations between Spiciewegiehotiu and Daisy; also that Daisy had really meant to offer, not thirty, but three thousand, cattle as lobola for Sueela, but that on the night of the arrival of the M'Niami embassy, who were lodged in the sigodhlo, a pair of Spiciewegiehotiu's officers had given the embassy the diplomatic hint that wealth was no object in this matter with the Queen, who had other objects; that the embassy would receive in the morning from the Queen a basket of peaches — let them offer just so many cattle as there were peaches in the basket, and this would please the Queen. The peaches had duly come, as foretold — thirty peaches; but when at the Queen's council the same day the ambassadors had offered thirty cattle, Spiciewegiehotiu in sorrowful majesty had turned her back upon them, and without a word walked out.

And now much ado. The embassy had been sent back without an answer. Then ambassador after ambassador from Daisy, protesting that the three heads of the original embassy had been cut off for thus insulting Wo-Ngwanya, that he was willing to pay a double lobola.... But Spiciewegiehotiu's wound was too profound for forgiveness or listening. How could she now trust Daisy? Let Daisy draw his sword: her sword was drawn.

Thus fell out what the *Wa-*Ngwanya call "The Third M'Niami War": and all the drums rumbled.

Now, Cobby had a servant called Sansiwana who, while Cobby was eating a meal, often conversed with him; Sansiwana had a niece married to a M'Niami man; and one forenoon when Cobby came home from Black River, where he had set up bulls'-eyes for rifle-practice, he first heard from Sansiwana the version of the quarrel as commonly understood among the M'Niami: on which his face flushed with indignation at the consciousness that he had been gulled like Tom, Dick and Harry, and, instantly resolving to wash his hands of that war, he hurried away to see the Queen, at that hour at White River: and that way he went to intercept her.

As he passed out of his gate, he found waiting there an army-officer, who, profoundly bowing, placed in his hand a little square of wood, and went away without saying anything. Cobby knew him as an officer of Dzinikulu's brigade, and, on seeing an elephant, a boat, and the sun behind a hill, carved on the wood, he understood that Dzinikulu desired an interview with him at "The Elephant" after sunset.

He then went on out of the town and through the very sylvan scene within which White River winds, of which he writes: "It is not the name only that is a poem, but the river itself, tearing lacerated along through rocks, transacting its odyssey in long hexameter lines of froth and song betwixt forested cliffs and fairylands of frondage, spray of lofty palmyra-leafage, light-green of date-palm, gloomy motsuri, festoons of orchilla-weed, homes of flamingos, black geese, parrots, here or there a hut peering through. Not all Wo-Ngwanya huts are round, some being oblong, built upon piles, looking within their secret places of greenery so at home and old in the universe, that they produce a swooning sense of beauty and fitness which not all the buildings of Greece and Italy, placed there, could give: and I suddenly remember them, feeling that I have beheld them in sceneries of Heaven in the eras before I left my home to tour the suns.

"When I came to that spot where the river falls three feet in two falls between three rocks, I paused, taking my station under the shade of a mopane, the sun being pretty hot in spite of strong breeze. I could see no one, but, knowing that the bathing is under the two falls, I waited, till, after some minutes, I saw Sueela come out of bush on the opposite shore, and make across the water, anon skipping the rocks, anon wetting the bottom of her Egyptian kilt.

"All eyes and smiles she came, and when I stepped to meet her, says she: 'Spiciewegiehotiu say What you want? She say Her hair wet, and she not want anybody to see her.'

"I answered that I wanted to announce at once something in respect of the war, and was not thinking of her hair, which I should not look at at all.

"Me tell her,' says she, and back she walked through the forty yards of brawling water to vanish into bush.

“Then again she emerged, again journeyed across, and, spluttering sniggerings, says she: ‘Spiciewegiehotiu say You like giiirrrls! That why you come to see them bathe. But that very bad for you.’

“To this I answered: ‘Be good enough to tell that lady that there is no truth at all in this, since my only motive was to talk of the war.’

“So back she waded in formal embassy, a black Aphrodite through frothing white, and again presently in formal embassy wades back to say with spluttering of laughter: ‘Spiciewegiehotiu say Your hair raaad!’

“‘Really?... But in what connection is this announcement made?’ I demanded. ‘Do you mean to say she sent you all this way just to tell me that? Tell her I say I knew. Tell her I say hers is black.’

“With bogey-eyes aside on me, she answered: ‘Black hair not hot like raaad!’

“‘Hot,... You’re a goose,’ I said: ‘you’re a black goose.’ But this is an English idiom, and, ‘Why me like a goose?’ she wished to know; to which I answered: ‘Because you spread out your fingers like a goose, and quack nonsense-announcements.’

“‘They good to eat, geese,’ she remarks, her eyes cast down.

“‘Yes, and you, too,’ I absurdly said. ‘But ask that lady if I may see her.’

“‘Me tell her, and that her hair black’ — and back she paced.

“Then again she came, this time to say: ‘Spiciewegiehotiu say How long you going to keep her hiding in there? She say Go way, and she send for you when she want to talk about the war.’

“‘Well, I suppose I must obey,’ I said, ‘good-bye’; and in a habitual way I put out my hand, which she took with her face averted, and never was my hand pressed in such a spasm — she hurt me! I don’t understand why; then ran, as if chased.

“I did not at the time suspect that all this about ‘hair’ and ‘girls bathing’ might be deliberate chicanery; but the suspicion has since visited me that what I was there to say may have been conjectured, and an interview with me shunned, that I might have no chance of saying it.

“I went away, but not far, and from under a hut in jungle watched her go past with her enterprising gait within her circle of girls who giddily whispered together and giggled; then, returning to the falls and water-pool, I bathed there, wallowing with enjoyment in the warmth of the water in which she had washed, till I laughed at my nonsense, that water being then well on its way to the sea — a nonsense like the good Tennyson’s, ‘men may come, and men may go, but I go on for ever.’ ‘I what? Crude Victorian person, now — so muddle-headed, unsceptical, is the habit of the uneducated mind, unclarified and unhardened by the habit of science. Any individual drop of ‘the brook’ does not ‘go on for ever,’ but ‘comes and goes,’ exactly like the individual man, and the race, the brook, of men ‘goes on for ever,’ exactly like the brook of drops. So that we have contrast insisted upon where simile is complete.

“Pressed to do something, to say my say, at four in the afternoon I called at the royal entrance, knowing that her review of the man[oe]uvres was then over: but I ‘could not’ be seen. She had promised to see me whenever I wished, and the suspicion visited me then that there is a motive for this invisibility, that I am being fooled, and used as a tool. But I will not be so used; I will not take part in a butchery on the unjust side. Until then I had been doubtful about going to meet Dzinikulu, but now decided to go; for if by any means I can get out of this imprisonment, this tutelage and servitude, and get her, not over me, but under me, as is right, I grasp those means. And they may be nearer than I have imagined. When, on passing after dark through the thronged awna and out to ‘The Elephant,’ I met Dzinikulu, he represented his plans as far advanced, and his hopes in bloom. Our discussion was in a punt in the dense dark under ‘The Elephant,’ and I felt myself something of a conspirator, but see no other way out, except the impossible way of spending my existence in this place. Dzinikulu says he can depend upon half the elderly men in the army, and upon all his own officers; thinks the war our luck, since some chance is sure to present itself when the Queen takes the field; and advises me on no account to withdraw from captaining the rifles, since my presence at the front in a natural way is so desirable. I found that he, too, quite knows that Daisy is not the provoker, but the provoked; and I told him that, this being so; even if I go to the front with the rifles, nothing will induce me to captain them in battle. He also informed me, what I can hardly credit, that Sueela, too, is now on our side! he being in possession of some secret of hers, and she having sent him ‘a basket of mawas’ as pledge of her adherence: in spite of which he is chary of trusting her with the secret of any plan, unless it be necessary.

“It was after ten when we parted, and, on coming home, I found awaiting me a visitor, my Macray, distinctly tipsy, but still inquisitive as to my movements, as to the nature of my interviews with ‘Spicey,’ as to why I was put to drill the riflemen when he is the better shot — as he said — and when last I had seen ‘his’ Sue, who, he says, is lately shunning him. ‘You have no Sue,’ I told him, and then told him what the Queen had bid me tell as to his bringing calamity upon any Mo-Ngwanya girl, also of her notion that he had stolen the photograph, and I bid him beware; to which he answered: ‘Let her beware — who is she? I am getting fed up with this — my cigars are giving out — and if there is no solution soon, I’ll force one’ — I don’t know what he meant, if anything. He becomes insolent and intolerable; and soon I got rid of him....”

XIX. BATTLE

THE FOLLOWING MORNING Cobby again presented himself at the royal gate — surprised to find only one guardsman, who in turn was surprised at his request to see the Queen. “You not know the Queen gone?” he was asked; and discovered that she had left Eshowe at break of day.

Feeling slighted and tricked, sore and bitter, he was off straightway to find Ngdeiho, the commander of the army, passing in the awna through a teeming scene of war-business, swarms of horses, of oxen lowing, parks of carts, brigades at bivouac, regiments at breakfast; for the last contingents of the northern and western army divisions had come in over-night; and, in passing through it all, he saw marching southward and outward two regiments, whose movement represented the initial flowing of the host toward the front.

He was coldly received by Ngdeiho pacing in his park west of the awna, and when the announcement was made that Cobby, for his part, did not intend to captain his men in any actual battle, white teeth of all the warriors who surrounded the old general showed themselves in a sneer, the general himself languidly drawing his finger across his throat, hinting of danger there for someone. For the favours shown to Cobby, his elevation to an army command, were curious, perplexing and mal vus, especially in army circles. Of his own riflemen, though he had the admiration of some, the manners of others exhibited hostility in actual insolence: for the novelty of the umlungos (whites) had worn thin, and familiarity, owing mainly to Macray, had bred contempt, they little knowing what lightning and thunder is up the white man's sleeve, and the manners of the Almighty.

"You should tell a thing like that to the Queen herself," the old Ngdeihlo said, frowning.

"I have failed to get a chance," Cobby answered.

"Her Majesty will now judge the courage of the men of your colour," the general remarked.

"You are not to be cheeky!" Cobby promptly responded with a cocked chin.

On which general and staff eyed him up and down, with scowling, till Ngdeihlo pointed. "Be gone in time!" and Cobby went away, saying: "Let the Queen know quickly."

Scout after scout, meantime, was coming in: Daisy had taken the initiative! was being helped by Sebingwe! had invaded Wo-Ngwanya! was in greater force by some four thousand assegais! and fleeing before his dancing imps and impis were the inhabitants of the land. By three in the afternoon the great square of Eshowe was emptied, but for two regiments and Cobby's riflemen, who also were called "a regiment," though but seven hundred strong, most of the Wo-Ngwanya stock of firearms having proved to be old carbines, which, as they had lowered his average of smartness, he had cut out. And soon after three he, too, on receiving marching-orders, started out, Macray looking like Sancho Panza on a nag under his Ali's flank, group after group of damsels dancing mad darting out from the multitude to dance before the advance of his drums and standard, and clap their frantic palms; and down the course of Black River eastward the way was, he keeping in touch with a regiment which preceded him.

Meantime, somewhere in the eastern blue and infinity of the day, the Queen, within a group of ten riders, held at her eyes a field-glass with which Macray had presented her, and anon was fleeing out of the way of advance patrols of the enemy.

And so for three days. When, during the forenoon of the fourth, Cobby's battalion, singing the war-song, came up with the war-host, it was to witness war-dancing, and conflict imminent, the armies being ranked on a plain, with a horizon of hills which on the south were mountains, a river flowing southward through it, to tumble with a roaring and smoking into precipice that bounded the plain on the south; and on its west bank the Wa-Ngwanya had set up at intervals five miles of stockade.

Far to the east Cobby's glass could make out two villages, and, standing apparently in fields of millet before an edge of forest the front of the M'Niami army long drawn out; and while he looked, the old Wo-Ngwanya general, Ngdeiho, came cantering down the slope from the western hills to the host west of the water, to send out orders for the advance, on which his army began a barking of the throat and thorax that gruffed Ho! and Ho! like hundred-ton guns going off, tremendous, terrorizing.

Cobby, meantime, imagined that his decision to take no part in the battle had been duly communicated to the Queen; but, in truth, the old Ngdeiho, for reasons of his own unfriendly to Cobby, had said not a word to her; being, moreover, of an old school, and having a conservative dislike of rifles, he had determined to win the fight without them, since Cobby's revolt offered him the opportunity.

But, in fact, the rifles were a main part of the Queen's plan of battle; and, on spying from the hills the arrival of Cobby's riflemen, she had let fall the remark: "Daisy ought to have attacked two hours ago: now me have him."

The enemy being in greater force, she meant to surprise them at the height of the fighting with more frightfulness of rifle-fire uproar than they had ever dreamt of, and, their morale thus shattered, meant to launch among them a second astonishment of cavalry, which she had well hidden in forest.

The Wa-Ngwanya crossed the river at a trot, gruffing their rough grunts in rhythm with their trotting footfalls, and “not all the Uhlans and Gardes Cavalleries galloping with sabres waving into battle,” Cobby writes, “could offer a sight more gallant than that host of negroes careering with streaming head-gears, trailing kilts of tails, knee tails, elbow tails, with tufted shields, sheaves of spears sheening, many of them patterns of athlete manhood. And about a mile east of the river the armies crashed with a row which clearly reached us, which at closer quarters must have been, as old Marco Polo says, ‘like heaven’s thunder.’”

But it was not long before Daisy’s weight of numbers commenced to make itself felt; not long before, southward, he was attempting with some success a flanking movement; and just then a messenger from the western hills came racing down to Cobby.

He, lying in a little wood of wild coffee behind his battalion, who, too, lay about the ground, gazing at the battle, was suddenly conscious of a despatch-rider drawing up on his haunches to throw off the message: “Captain, the Queen say Attack now half-way between the centre and the south.”

Cobby sprang up appalled.

“Has the Queen not been told that I am not going to lead the rifles?” he demanded.

“No, she say Go now! Not stop to talk!” the messenger urgently shouted.

Meantime, many of the riflemen were crowding round to stare, while Cobby stamped a little about, pestered with weight of responsibility, at his wits’ end, until he said sharply to the messenger, “Fly, now! Say that I sent to tell the Queen days ago — ask if I shall send them forward under a lieutenant — fly!”

Amid a groaning of the men who heard it, the messenger turned and galloped, flogging his nag; and those round Spiciewegiehotiu asserted later that when she saw him returning, and waited, and the guns did not stir, she slowly turned pale to death, went faint, let her forehead drop down upon her horse’s neck.

Meantime, with every minute the Wa-Ngwanya were being involved in deeper distress and loss of blood, and the M’Niami, pressing forward, were presently treading upon enemy dead; rueing to see which, Cobby was keenly on the look out for an answer to his message, and when he saw two horsemen galloping down the hills, he, imagining that they were for him, called his men to ‘tention; but the horsemen did not come near him, steering their race for the forest in which the cavalry waited; and presently out of the forest in column of sections came tearing a storm of horses in staring haste, swept away between two lengths of the stockade, crossed the stream, and after darting past their own army, pounced howling among the host of foemen.

But though no little disarray and death resulted, the disarray was transitory — cavalry combat being, in fact, foreign to black armies. The old Ngdeihö had a prejudice against it, as had Daisy, nor had there been cavalry in Wo-Ngwanya before Spiciewegiehotiu, who herself employed it rather to awe than to slaughter. In general, the mass of riders could not contrive to cohere in the mêlée, and when his animal was speared, the man, finding himself isolated in a grove of iron, gave up the ghost.

All which Cobby saw with his heart in his mouth, feeling that, if she was defeated through him, that would be more than was good for his compunction; and seeing the sidling eyes of his men on him, and no answer coming to his message, he was thinking of repeating the message, when he became aware of the Queen herself sweeping down on her Selim well ahead of half a dozen chargers which rushed after her, she rushing down like a sharp shower to her army, to gallop past not twenty yards from him, with never a glance his way, her Selim's eyes wide, his ears lying flat back like a cat's, the battery of his hoofs thrumming the sod with a strong rolling of drums, she like a jockey wedded head-down to his neck, and, because of the horns that vaulted from her helmet, resembling a bull bounding head-down along, to butt and toss. And across the river-rocks she crashed, across the savannah, to vanish in the throng of champions.

Cobby in a sort of rapture, went red in the face, shouting after her "C[oe]ur de Lion!"

But Spiciewegeihotiu was of another type: not lion's heart, but man's head, nor valour, but discretion, being her trait; and though a rally did follow her advent in the battle-ranks, her object was not to rally, but rapidly to withdraw: for her eye, ever quick, simple-seeing, and sure of itself, had spied that the day was lost for her. She rode straight for the old Ngdeiho, screaming at him: "Why you not retreat?" and ere long the tom-toms were beating it.

Then she showed some lion's heart: for to the river itself she remained with her men in the thick of the retreat, sometimes hustled, harassed, prancing, an arrow sticking out of Selim's bosom like a bowsprit riding a rough sea. And in Parthian order the Wa-Ngwanya stepped backward and back, streaming with sweat of afternoon heat, white as black can be, with wide and snorting nostril, but still — in good order. And now they were at the river, soon to find themselves behind their miles of stockade and wire-entanglements of spiked mimosa; and then it was Daisy who pretty quickly was thinking of retreat.

Cobby saw the sovereign, looking very haggard, canter back up past his battalion, without glancing his way; and it was with a disquietude within him that he went out with the carts and stretchers of rimpi, whose Red Cross was crimson branches of (young) matchebela, he taking surgical instruments and anæsthetics, to stoop among the wounded on the stricken field, where he saw a scene of slaughter even now not over, for the hopelessly wounded of both peoples were speared by their own comrades, a scene that made Cobby so sick, that often he was hissing words like “that murderess!” “that cursed girl!”

He went back pallid, and there again before him near the river was the Queen on horseback in front of what was left of the cavalry; and though she addressed them rather in sorrow than in wrath, every head was bent before her. “Go back home,” Cobby could just hear her say: “me win without you; me not give you a chance to fail again: go back home.” As he drew near, she cantered away westward.

He now saw himself an object of scorn among all the Wa-Ngwanya: for the news of his refusal to fight had flown, his death was being foretold, and the man who bore him his evening meal threw it before him; nor could he explain the motif of his revolt, for that would have been very indecorous, militarily, politically; and alone — Macray having taken himself off somewhither to prowl after Sueela — he sat till late, watching a swarming army scene of flames and men, messages, hastes, neighings, lowings, drummings, a great going to and fro and maelstrom of utterance; then went to climb into a hut on piles within a spinny of palmyras nigh under the hills, a lonesome old room covered with a roof broken and bent by its own weight, on whose bumpy floor for a bed he flung himself.

But just before he slept, he started up, conscious, dark as it was in there, of some presence with him, and, snatching his revolver, he sharply asked:

“Who are you?”

“Cobby, my heart broken,” muttered the dejected voice of one seated near him.

“You!”

“Cobby, why you treat me so to-day?”

“By heaven! You? But did I not send to tell you —— ? If you have been shocked, whose fault? You have shunned me —— Yes, you suspected that I now know by whom all this slaughter was wantonly brought about, and, so that I might have no chance of resigning my command, you shunned me, imagining that when actually on the battle-field I should be impelled to obey the command to advance —— You little know me ——”

“But to-morrow you will, for me, no?”

“No, I will — not.”

Now she put her hand on his: and now there was stillness, he sitting there thrilled through and through.

And on a sudden he roughly had her hand to possess himself of her, on which she sprang sharp up, he after; she ran, he after; she dodging him to and fro, twisting like a swift, no word uttered, he working in an earnest dumbness but once to clap hand on her and rumple her by supremacy of muscle and summary pre-eminence of strength, and like dog and fox “at the death” they spurted, like a whirl of serpents doubling upon themselves, till for some moments he lost her, but then, alert of ear, heard her feet stealing, rushed upon her, and had her crushed soft to his body like a doll of rubber, teeth to teeth.

“Oh, Cobby,” she panted at him, “don’t — kiss me like that, me — tear you to pieces.”

He, handling her roughly, with sudden movements like convulsions of epilepsy, panted between feasts of kisses: “Murderess — gory hag — sweet as hell — well-beloved, by God — but cruel as the grave....”

And she, amid mixed half-pants, ranting half-words: “Oh, Cobby, you eat — —”

“Yes — food — —”

“Who you love, you madman?”

“You!”

“Oh, Cobby, a dog bite us.... Me he bite, then his red teeth poison you.... Cobby ... Cousin Cobby ... me show you own flesh and blood.... So, Cobby, now you fight, no?”

Like ice upon white-hot this fell upon him; and in the same instant they stood separated, his soul wounded with the pernicious suspicion that even her kisses were political, even her gales calculated, that she gave nothing, but bartered everything, her brain ever half an inch ahead of her heart.

“Would I not fight and die a thousand times —— !” he cried out. “If your quarrel was just, there would be no need for me to fight: I can shatter and abolish a hundred African armies, just so lightly as you brush off a fly! As it is, I will — not — —”

Now, to her mental habit both his boast and his moral motive were, of course, equally unreal and foreign, and “What!” she shrilly cried out with a stamp, “you say that after daring to kiss me?”

And in an instant, as in “the transformation of forces,” all that electromotive force of love changed into heat of quarrel.

“You put your hand on me!” he cried: “I did not divine that I was being tempted, in order to be bought. I will — not. There are under-officers who can command the rifles — —”

“Pooh, you must be silly,” she said bitterly, “if you not see that me want you to command them, and why me want.”

“No, I don’t see.... Why?”

“Oh, me go,” she muttered disgustedly, moving toward the doorway: “me done with you. Everybody cry out on me to kill you, but you go back where you come from — me let you when you want.”

“Good! Good! I am done with you, too. I am off home — I shall forget your long name.”

“That’s it!” she cried in a flush of quarrel, “you soon forget! and me forget even your short name! You go — no good staying now — Wo-Ngwanya turn you out — everybody say you ‘fraid to fight! Our men can’t stand that.”

“Ha! ha! ha!” he redly laughed, “how can you think it possible that I could get myself to care a little what ‘everybody says’? And how insolent of you to mention — —”

“You go! Me done,” she called over her shoulder just at the door.

“Come back!” he commanded in a rush and flush of mastery, and dashed after her.

Ten feet down she jumped, for some of those old ladder-rungs were missing; he jumped after her; she ran, he hard after. But, as there was no moon, and she flew straighter toward an end, he only came upon her when she had scrambled upon a horse, whose hoofs, as she galloped off, spattered grit into his face.

He then walked back through the palmyras with his forehead on his palm, and, as he arrived at the ladder, someone sprang up out of the ground and touched his shoulder — Dzinikulu.

XX. COUP D'ÉTAT

DZINIKULU COULD NOT conceal his elation at the event of the day's battle — Spiciewegiehotiu's prestige for unfailing victory gone — or shaken. The fact was, he told Cobby, that a large number of Sebingwe's men (north-west) had voluntarily flocked to join Daisy (north-east), thus swelling the M'Niami ranks, and Spiciewegiehotiu had bitten off more than she could chew! If the next day's engagement went against her, her star was in disaster. Anyway, everything was ready for the carrying off — Dzinikulu's all was staked upon it; let Cobby never be far from Dzinikulu during the next days.

“Good!” said Cobby, sore and hot against Spiciewegiehotiu, and again “good!” led headlong by the lust of going out of captivity, not alone, but having his captor captive....

“But not a word of anything to Caray,” Dzinikulu said. “Leave Caray behind; me soon send him home.”

“No, I am not going without Macray and Panda,” Cobby answered: “I don't understand why — —”

“Well, then, we only tell Caray at the last moment — promise me that.”

“Well, since you wish that. And I will wait south of the mountains till you send me my Panda.”

“You wait long, then. The man dead.”

Cobby stood dumb; Dzinikulu adding: “Last thing I hear before I leave Eshowe. Got belly-disease. Foul air. He dead at last.”

“Oh, my friend!” Cobby cried out, “you died upbraiding me! Oh, how hard of heart!”

“Eheh, she hard,” Dzinikulu agreed: “but wait — maybe her sun setting. Her day of doom dawn to-morrow.”

At the hour when this was said of her she, four miles southward, was pacing alone by the ravine’s brink, leading her horse, anon peering down into the abyss, deeply pondering; and four miles westward on higher ground Macray was lying in bush, gazing through an Egyptian doorway into the ruins of a temple never built by Wa-Ngwanya hands, at the far end of which was a fire under a pot which a girl tended, and dim beyond the fire Sueela seated on a tooled stone of the ruins before her mother Mandaganya, who sat higher on a heap of stones, at Mandaganya’s feet a little dog, shaggy like a terrier, called “Ronja,” which was always near her, and was believed to be “a sensitive,” gifted with intuitions still quicker than the witch’s.

Macray could not hear the words of their dejected speech, only its murmur. “She very grum and angry,” Sueela said: “me go to her, she not speak to me — she not speak to anybody. She say Go away.”

Mandaganya’s quiet eyes that interned within them a certain slumber and musing, rested on her daughter, as she remarked with some satisfaction: “Now she know white man frightened to fight, now she can’t help killing him, for to-day he show himself the enemy of *Wo-*Ngwanya.”

“No! you got it wrong,” Sueela protested: “Sir Cobby not frightened to fight — not he; he have some other reason.”

“She love him, no?” the witch asked, peering forward.

“Eheh.”

“Eheh, me think so. They in love with one another like cats fighting.”

“Danger in that man,” the witch said, with one eye shrinking from the licks of a snake that lay round her brows, a band of freckles black and red: “something hanging over her, and that man in it.” Now the dog growled a little, and uttered a woof — so to say; on which the doctress looked round, and suddenly asked: “Where Sanja?” meaning the cook-girl, who, having gone to gather fuel, had been pounced upon by Macray as a messenger, and now reappeared to say low to Sueela that somebody wanted her.

“Which somebody?” demanded Mandaganya— “Caray?” and when the cook-girl looked confused, “Better mind how you go,” the doctress said to her daughter with a nod and eye quiet yet weighty: “me show you white man, if it’s white man you want. Spiciewegiehotiu tear out your liver, if you go a step too far, and if she not tear it out, me tear it out.”

On which Sueela, standing up, cut an eye, saying: “Oh, me not care for him: me know a god; me done with men” — and, having walked away into the darkness, said to Macray, her back on the ruin: “What you want?”

“Susie-Susie,” said Macray: “my Sue. What the devil has become of you? Come on, let’s get into the bush.”

“No, me not going.” she said, bending toward him, brushing him from each palm with the other: “me done, done, done. Me not like vicious men.”

“No? Sure, Sue-Sue? Well, but me like vicious girls, you see, that’s why me dote on Sue. Look here, none of that!” — he gripped her bare arm, hurting her— “If you fancy you’re going to use me once for a lark, and then cast me off as you’ve been doing, you’ll find yourself up against the wrong man. I happen to want you, and I always have what I want. You dare try it on, and see if I don’t go straight to Spiciewegiehotiu and your mother, and tell them everything.”

A menace at which heart quailed, and laid down arms. At his raised voice the girl glanced nervously toward her mother, who, much more visible now than previously, stood Athene-big within the sheen of a fume, greenish, luminous, she then burning herbs and bdelliums to inhale the incense, and enwrap herself in a state of “trance”; seeing which preoccupation, Sueela took quietly enough the marital domineering of Macray, though in the expression of her eyes a dangerous something smouldered.

“You hurting me,” she mentioned. “How me to go with you when you see my mother there? To-morrow after sunset you see me down the hill there.”

Surrender — for the present.

“Very well.... Is that a bargain?”

“Yes.” At once she walked away inward, and, as she went, her lips met vehemently to spit out disgust and gall.

When she came again to her mother, Mandaganya stood astare with muttering lips, the little dog whimpering piteously at her feet; and, leaning an ear near, Sueela could hear the sybil breathe: “She conquer — she chuckle at their rout — Cow that toss the nations.... But beware of a tree — trouble, trouble — the heart cease beating ...” upon which the pillar that she was staggered, to collapse sideward upon the pile of stones, and lie quiet over the little Ronja, which huddled with shudderings under her.

Sueela then spread rugs for her mother, then picked a little supper with the little finger cocked aloft (this being considered chic!), then the long pipe, she clasping her knees, meditation in her eyes, then to sleep in fits; and before the sun rose was carrying out of the ruin her saddle of lamb-skin, to mount her Mustapha, and gallop a league nearer the front.

At the hut chosen by the Queen for herself Sueela was told that the Queen had gone abroad long before, and, riding on toward the river, she presently spied Spiciewegiehotiu among a number of men near the ravine; stopping to watch, she saw that a branch had been hacked from a tamarind tree and lashed to the tree's bottom, with one end projecting over the ravine's edge; and presently when an officer crawled along to that projecting end, the watcher's heart started to see him dash himself apparently down the precipice, the little crowd peering to see his ruin.

Then another went, and it was the same — he vanished; then Spiciewegiehotiu went — and vanished; and now Sueela, with a catch of the breath that laughed, said: "Oh, there must be a rope"; but, even so, when she peered over the edge, her toes went cold, the scene of steepness and granite crag was so colossal, grand, and cosmic, on so solemn a scale, making men seem mosquitos. Till then no mortal had ever thought of going down that gulf.

Sueela ran nearer until she could actually see the rope of ifé, but since bush here and there lay on the cliff-wall, she could not see Spiciewegiehotiu, who, going down with her toes on the rock anon, was now not forty feet from the bottom, when she halted to look down and call crossly to the two men already down: "Why you not move away from there?" for they, just below, like astrologers watching the ruin of the moon, were musing on the athletics of her descent, but now, at her outcry of protest, strolled with a sullen reluctance away; and "come," she said breathlessly the moment her foot touched bottom, and ran toward the sun — a rough voyage, all rocks and jumps and bush; on to where the river above came down, and changed to smokes that intoned, out of which they emerged drenched, to spurt on earnest, urgent, she ever ahead, losing never a moment, along the torrent's course, through a cañon anon so narrow, that there was scarcely space to step without wading through wet.

The sun grew hot, the going was hot, the two officers threw off karosses, anon tossed sweat from the forehead, but Spiciewegiehotiu was so constituted, that she could toil gaily along without heat or fatigue; and when three zebras broke from brake, and galloped away before them, her gaiety of gait grew yet gayer, her legs got wings, and “Na! my children,” she sang out to them, “we coming to something — me feel the breeze of my luck on me,” for the zebras meant an exit, which was what she was reconnoitring to find; and, as she went, she kept an eye on their spoor.

After two hours of it she was walking up a ledge with the river left well below on her right; and before long was peering out across the plain at Daisy’s army all to the west of her, and no sentries anywhere near the ravine, believed to be inaccessible.

This was what she had scented and sought: and back she started, making such haste, that long before noon she was back at the rope; and, on being drawn up, saw accomplished what she had commanded — an impi posted with its right on the ravine, and a large number of branches lashed to trees, carrying ropes that hung into the abyss.

As soon as she arrived she ordered an attack by all the army, except the rifles and the impi at the ravine — a feint attack meant to keep the enemy busy. By one o’clock Daisy had flung it back to its stockades, then himself retreated, himself seriously bleeding, for the Wa-Ngwanya had battled like devils. And again soon after two Spiciewegiehotiu launched an attack with the same orders, which had the same result; but now, in that hour of repeated defeat, to each regiment, as it rested, she sent out strychnia (orange-cider) and a message: “Spiciewegiehotiu say Daisy done. Still one struggle for you before sunset, and then you drink victory like strychnia.”

Meantime, even her own troops supposed that the impi posted near the ravine was still there; but all these hours the three rear-ranks of its four ranks had, squad by squad, been descending into the ravine with ration and weapon; of them two men only, having lost nerve, hurtled to death at the bottom; the others, fourteen thousand, having passed down the cañon, cast themselves upon the back of the M’Niami army in a moment when the sunset battle was at its hottest: there they suddenly came hurtling, like hosts of spectres hurled up howling out of the hole of hell; and never was surprise more wild, or fright more wide-eyed. The M’Niami army ran a rabble north-westward, like cataract-waters along the only path open to them, and cast no eye behind: the Wa-Ngwanya in the half-dark darted after.

Among the last of the pursuers, cantering in a troop of six horsemen, was Spiciewegiehotiu, who suddenly drew rein, laughed, and remarked: “Me weary,” for since daybreak, toiling constantly with brain and body, she had tasted nothing; and, as one of her six, a household-officer, carried a basket stuffed with foods and drink, soon the group was within the cave of a tree, where one M’Niami lay dead on his face with them, they seated round platters of wood on a skin, she carousing en bon camarade with her guests like a man-of-the-world among men, quaffing her liquor in a flush of spirits, all gossip and comment on the day’s events; ever she said: “Na! my children”; and when one fellow said, “Yesterday me ‘fraid the Queen get speared,” she winked, and snapped her fingers, remarking: “Na! my children, the iron that is to pierce Spiciewegiehotiu not yet smelted!” — till all at once all were on their feet, pierced with the iron of the spear of fear, the tree surrounded, Dzinikulu filling the opening that looked southward, saying dryly, with a leg cocked: “Spiciewegiehotiu, you mine: me send you back to your own country.”

Spiciewegiehotiu stood quite white, while half a chuckle, silly, hysteric, escaped her.

The brief twilight was done, but nut-tapers within the tree revealed her.

As Dzinikulu spoke, a clatter of hoofs was heard, and Cobby turned up in the same instant that two of the Queen’s six, having recovered their wits, made a dash to use their short-spears (stabbers), and die; and even as the Queen called to them “Stop!” one dropped dead in the tree-entrance.

On which Dzinikulu, pale, but master of himself, said: “Come, lady — nothing to fear — everybody treat you well. You come, no?”

She bent her head in consent; whereupon Cobby, outside the tree, bid Dzinikulu send now for Macray.

“Where Caray is?” Dzinikulu asked, and when Cobby answered: “Other side of the river somewhere,” Dzinikulu shrugged, muttering, “Big space, ‘somewhere,’” while Spiciewegiehotiu, with a conjurer-quickness, whispered to the nearest of her five: “Caray with Sueela” — which chanced to be true, though she did not suppose it true; but she hoped that, if one seeking Macray went to Sueela, Sueela might scent out what had happened.

At the same time Cobby said to Dzinikulu: “He won’t be far — let him know now.”

On which the fellow to whom the Queen had whispered volunteered information: “Me see Sir Caray go out to the ruin to see the lady Sueela, if you want Sir Caray.”

And now Dzinikulu beckoned to an officer of his to say to him: “Go, find Sir Caray. Say Come to Sir Cobby. If he ask why, say you not know. If he talking to anybody, wait till he done. If he with the lady Sueela, she on our side, but if she ask where the Queen is, better say you not know. You not know anything yet.”

And off the officer galloped.

XXI. SUEELA SPEEDS

BEYOND THE RIVER the officer discovered a servant of Macray who told him that Macray had ridden westward: and off for the hills he galloped.

The back of the ruin, whose front looked down on the cliff, presently appearing on the night-sky, he cantered up a bush-path toward it, hearing before him a man singing — Macray, who on his sauntering horse was singing aloud, “We shall meet in the sweet by and by”; and soon the messenger was saying to him: “Sir Caray, Sir Cobby say Come at once.”

To which Macray, “in drink,” answered: “What’s it all about? Not I. Let Mahomet come to the mountain, my boy. Tell him Sir Caray going to meet the sweetest lady in the land. Tell him — —” But now at a bend Sueela appeared before him.

She started at the presence of another with him, and started afresh when she heard the known voice of a Dzinikulu officer say: “Oh, you better: Sir Cobby say Come quick.”

“Sue,” Macray remarked, “they want to drag me away — not likely!”

“You come to see my mother, no?” Sueela said, for reputation’s sake, adding: “But, if Sir Cobby want you ...”

“Let Sir Cobby hang himself.”

“So where Sir Cobby is?” Sueela now asked the messenger; and when he answered: “Beyond the river,” her heart started, her wits quickened, and, standing at the shoulder of Macray’s horse, she asked: “And the Queen — where she now, Sintowe?”

“Me not know,” was the answer: “maybe chasing the enemy.”

But “not know” and “maybe” rang untrue; and in a moment more Sueela cried out “Oh!” in a tone of pain, and fell.

“Why, what’s wrong?” cried Macray.

“Oh! the horse stamp on my foot,” Sueela mourned.

“Oh, my Sue!” rued Macray, dismounting, “damn the half a horse,” and, as he bent over her, she whispered him quick: “Tell him to send Sanja to me.”

On which Macray said to the messenger: “You gallop on up and tell her servant Sanja to come with a bandage,” and, as the officer galloped off, Sueela eagerly said, “My foot not hurt, but me think maybe the Queen captured.”

At once Macray was sober and alert. “You think that?”

“Eheh. How Sir Cobby come to send a Dzinikulu man? Maybe when Daisy fly, she follow with only a few men, and Dzinikulu take her — my mother say she in danger. You go with this man across the river, then try to find out where she is, and which way they taking her; then gallop back to me: me wait for you near the river.”

“Right!”

“Now me go on up: you wait here for Sintowe. Maybe when he call Sanja, my mother hear, and, if she find me with you, she kill me.”

At once she ran, then when the messenger reappeared, went limping, seeing with him, not only Sanja, but, to her horror, her mother coming, a tower trotting, a board of a box in her hand.

As they met, Sueela, braving the peril from her mother, mentioned to the messenger: “He down there waiting for you”; on which the messenger cantered on down, and in the same moment the board descended on her head.

She collapsed upon the path, and like one chopping wood with a measured process, Mandaganya steadily banged the bent head, with humphs of the bosom that ever uttered “white man.” Up the doctoress heaved, and, as down she brought the board, out of her bosom sounded “white man”; and up it went, and down came, with “white man” — like a mechanism acting, until at last the excellent girl’s skull proved harder than the board, which split.

Such was the consolation which Mandaganya gave to an instep supposed to be crushed....

But now it was Sueela’s turn to strike; and, picking herself up with dry eyes, dryly she remarked: “You done? Well, listen to this: me think Spiciewegiehotiu kidnapped” — making Mandaganya faint.

Meantime, Macray was cantering eastward, his wits on the qui vive, but seeming easy and careless; anon he hummed; anon offered drink from a flask to the officer; and, east of the river, asked: “What Sir Cobby want me for?”

“He going from Wo-Ngwanya,” the other answered, seeing no reason to be secret now.

“I guessed as much,” Macray said. “He has got the Queen, then, has he?”

“You soon see.”

“I see already. Well, good job — I’m glad enough to be getting home. So how many men has Dzinikulu with him?”

“About seventy.”

“All mounted?”

“Eheh: they officers.”

“And which way are we going out of Wo-Ngwanya?”

“Along the foot-hills near the sea.”

“Sea” was his last word on earth, he dropping shot by Macray’s revolver, then his horse dropping; and Macray was racing back westward.

A little east of the river he met Sueela on her Mustapha speeding to meet him; and “They have her,” he said: “seventy horses ... taking her the sea way ...”

Her hands met wringing on her rein. “Oh, Caray, you do what me tell you, no?” she pleaded— “me give you all — if they take her, me dead, dead, dead. So you fly to Eshowe, no? The cavalry that she sent home — tell them to ride through the Lion’s Pass: maybe you catch them up half-way to Eshowe. Show them this ring from me: say Spiciewegiehotiu gone, gone, say fly! You change horses at Bundhlwana’s Kraal — come, me give you a guide” — and westward across the river they galloped together to the rifles, who alone of the fighting army were not out after the flying M’Niami; and, even while her stallion ran, Sueela was leaping down to a rifle-lieutenant named M’Pandiu, to pant at him her passion of tidings.

“But me have no orders — me daren’t move,” M’Pandiu in a torment of perplexity informed her, upon which, this M’Pandiu having been her lover in her twelfth year, she took him by the shoulders, half-kneeling, beseeching him: “Me good to you — me give you all — M’Pandiu — you will, no? — for me—” by which she achieved that within five minutes Macray was off, galloping westward with one of the riflemen as guide, and within ten she herself in the midst of a squad of fifteen riflemen — all who could get horses quickly — was galloping south-westward for the pass called Molimo’s (God’s) Pass.

Eastward, meantime, cantered the troop of seventy with Spiciewegiehotiu and her five, she on a horse not her own in the van with Dzinikulu, to escape the dust of the hoofs, for it was late September, final end of the dry season, and turbulent breezes from the sea turned the herd of hoof-beats into a whirl of dust which journeyed and journeyed; and with Spiciewegiehotiu and Dzinikulu ahead rode a little troop of officers, behind them Cobby on his Ali.

She had uttered no word to anyone, nor Cobby a word to her, in his nerves a shrinking of compunction for her, a prick of contrition. But, as on she travelled, the hilarity of the gale and of the flight overcame her grumness of pride, she threw away her helmet, taking the gale in her face and hair, and, touched with gaiety, occasionally made a good-tempered remark to Dzinikulu — always some comment on his conduct of the coup. “Why you not do it yesterday when Daisy beat me, Prince?” she demanded: “to-day when me victorious, and the people full of me, me think you run too much risk” — her intellect always preoccupied with strategy, with conduct, with the God’s truth as to what one should best do to gain one’s ends in any given group of events. And presently again she remarked: “Why you have all these men with you? Me shouldn’t have had half so many, if it had been me, or me should have had ten times more. They too many for some reasons, and too few for others.” And presently again: “That man you sent to bring Sir Caray ought to have caught us up before this. Me think Caray kill him, and then tell Sueela me captured. Why you sent for Caray? Me see six risks for you in that! If Sueela know to-night, me think you fail.”

“Sueela on my side!” cried out Dzinikulu.

At which she cast back her head, and laughed with the winds. “The trees pink, you think?” she asked: “people who reckon wrong die young, Prince.”

Some minutes afterwards the cavalcade stopped at a village called Masinka’s Kraal, where some provisions and forage awaited it on sumpter-mules; and soon was off anew through Daisy-territory, a granite country with reefs of quartz anon, and granite kopies, and frequent forests, and mountain on the right, a ride of gloom, until at two the moon rose, they now going south among hills of porphyritic granite, rich in copper, whence at one spot a sheet of sea appeared tossing in sleep under sheen of the moon, and Spiciewegiehotiu, peering at the scenery of it and the Florida on its rocks, drew up, and would not move on.

Presently after which the cavalcade was making westward over plain south of the mountains; while away to the west Sueela and her fifteen were finishing the descent of the mountains through a chasm formed by a vast dyke of trap, whence, as dawn broke, they spied the southern gateway of the gorge; and there, sending out a scout, paused. Almost without food, the men shared with Sueela a bag of groundnuts which she had snatched, giving tree-leaves to their nags.

It was broad day when their scout came tearing back, chased up the foothills before the gorge by three riders; upon which rifle-fire broke out of bush at the gorge's mouth, causing the three pursuing riders to bite the dust. But the news brought by the scout was already known — that Dzinikulu was on a kopie a league to the east and south, apparently waiting for something.

“Waiting, maybe, for Sir Cobby's waggons from Eshowe,” Sueela said.

Her plan now was (1) to strike terror, and (2) to gain time: so soon she had out an envoy, bearing a branch of embassy; and he, a hundred yards from the kopie, where he was met by Dzinikulu, Cobby and some others, uttered his message: “The lady Sueela say Why the Prince carry off the Queen like this? That was foolishness. The lady Sueela has 150 rifles with her, and Wo-Ngwanya rushing like a river to interview the prince. Let the prince send the Queen back quick, then the lady Sueela guarantee the safety of the rebels.”

Here for Dzinikulu was set-back in business. He swept his palm down his beard, glancing back at the Queen, who was walking round and round the kopie's top, her hands behind her, eyeing the flight of the clouds.

"Sueela lie," he said: "she only have a few with her: we soon kill them."

But now Cobby spoke: he was not there to kill; and there was dissension.

In the end the envoy was sent back with the threat that Sueela's handful would be killed.

And presently there came to the kopie another envoy with threats, and was sent back with threats; and then another. Meanwhile the sun was mounting for Sueela toward noon.

And now arose dust-cloud in the west — cavalry sent by Macray; and Spiciewegiehotiu, peering at it through her field-glass over one of the boulders that formed a parapet to the kopie, remarked to the Prince with her detached and disinterested interest in strategy: "It was too risky, Prince!"

And now on the kopie were speculative brows perplexed with crosses prospecting over the plain, and now bloodshed for Cobby, whether he liked it or not, life at stake for all, and woe to the conquered. Came and came the dust-cloud; out dashed Sueela and her handful, galloping, to meet it; and it was still forenoon when the kopie was within a ring of horses; spear, arrow and bullet going; man and beast feasting together on the taste of death.

The defenders, though they had some cover, were crowded together in comparison with the attackers, and, since on the kopie were but five firearms, of which Cobby's rifle was idle, the knot of kopie horses dropped fast: seeing which, Dzinikulu was for seating the Queen on a horse, and leading it round the kopie, so that the besiegers, fearing to pierce her, might leave off; but here again was veto from Cobby, and dissension.

"We all going to be killed!" exclaimed Dzinikulu in an epilepsy of debate: "you say no to everything!"

And Cobby, all blanched, answered, "She will refuse to be made a target, unless you bind her.... Would you bind her?"

“Yes! Why not?” cried Dzinikulu.

“Well, if anyone touches her, I fell him,” said Cobby.

She, seated in leafage under cover of a rock at the kopie’s circumference, could not hear what was said, but could see dissension, could see the slaughter going on among some of the horses, and the growing revolt of the others, and greyness of terror in every face.

During all which Cobby’s waggons turned up westward, halting some hundreds of yards outside the circle of attackers, to be abandoned by the Dzinikulu men with them, who, on seeing how things were, at once fled.

Upon those waggons dwelt Cobby’s glass: there was that within them which could compel and shatter Africa allied with Asia....

But the attackers were much the more numerous, were closing in, throwing surer: and disarray ensued, some of the mob of kopie horses going dog-mad, rearing loose to scoot down the steep, and range the plain in a lunacy of mutiny and freedom; in the midst of which Dzinikulu and two others in debate came to a decision without Cobby — to fly, taking Spiciewegiehotiu, through Daisy-territory, to the kingdom of Sabingwe (Wo-Mashenya), who had for the Queen an evil will. To do her then and there to death they feared — feared Cobby’s repeater, feared the frenzy of the people.

The Prince then trotted all breathless to Cobby to pant asthmatic: “The day lost! We fly with her — to Sebingwe — he treat her well — from there you take her to your country.”

Upon which Cobby, flying away to Spiciewegiehotiu with a wild white face, the Prince’s rasping breast trotting ponderously after, panted at her: “We make a rush-through with you — We can force you to come, remember, by Heaven ... Do you come?”

She did not answer, did not see, him. To Dzinikulu, looking up, she said: "Me come," and sprang from the ground.

And in some minutes she, with the Prince and two, and Cobby on his Ali, were clattering down the rock-side, a cataract of hoofs, whose impetus easily broke a road eastward through the streams of spears speeding to intercept, the presence of the Queen, whose rein the Prince himself held, acting as a shield to the fugitives on one side, the pursuers fearing to strike her; and as all the fugitives were much better horsed, they had won well ahead of the foremost of the pursuers, when they became conscious of a solitary horse, stretched and staring, hunting them, Sueela's Mustapha, Sueela like a monkey on its mane.

She had raced from the west region of the ring of attackers, passing not far south of the kopie eastward, braving the rain of spear and arrow that the kopie spat out at her, she pleading to her animal's ear, and soon was within a stone's-throw of the fugitives; upon which Spiciewegiehotiu, having spied that she had a rifle, shouted aloud: "Stop, Prince, or you all get shot!"

At the same time one of the two blacks with Dzinikulu, who had a carbine, fired behind, but wide; and in the next second Sueela fired, not at the Prince, whom she flinched from injuring, but at his horse, which faltered, pitched, and knelt wrecked, pitching the Prince forward among thorns of mimosa bush.

His two blacks galloped on, and got away eastward, Cobby was off southward; but ere the Prince could pick himself up, he was a prisoner within a ring of spears, while the Queen and Sueela, on foot, on each other's bosom, were looking, not at each other, but dumbly away at the sheet of spears aimed at Cobby by his chasers. "Me go stop them," Sueela suddenly muttered, on which the Queen pushed her a little toward her Mustapha, and she was off.

But Cobby was well ahead of all, and well horsed. He, in a redness of resentment at fate and the black man, had started out to get at his waggons — instinctively, to be in his citadel; and after making a large detour southward, then westward, a wound in his right calf, he lighted from his Ali upon one of the waggons well in time to get his little Vickers belted and pointed upon the oncoming mob of horsemen. Now he was lord of continents. He had thumbs on thumb-pieces to play them a piano-tune of quaver and semi-quaver, zip and zip-zip, but — did not; did not will to kill; and within three minutes stood a prisoner in the midst of a pretty furious troop of them.

Presently after which the kopie surrendered ...

And near three in the afternoon the Queen, making northward through Molimo's Pass with her tail of prisoners, was met by half her army darting to her rescue, bearing, too, the news that Daisy's great-place had been taken; and when, in the gloaming, she approached her capital, she was like a mote floating on an Atlantic of humanity madly dancing, howling hozannas, all the town of Eshowe with her war-host now swarming like many waters sounding about her, she seated uplifted on a waggon in the seat of Cobby's monoplane, little dreaming that the thing might fly away with her; and, riding beside her, Sueela, at whom she ever pointed, animated, laughing, as who should say: "She did it! dance to her!" and on foot behind her, tired to death, tied together, Dzinikulu and Cobby.

XXII. SUEELA WASHED WHITE

FOR DZINIKULU NOW was solitude in his guarded hut, till, five days after the fiasco of the kidnapping, he began to undergo due trial in the kotla, or square, the Queen keeping out of it in her hut, not herself sitting a judge. But by her the judges had been chosen.

Day after day half the square was packed, hanging upon the witnesses, a wide swing-round of feeling in favour of the Prince having arisen and spread, a wild hope that he might survive. He was Wo-Ngwanya; Spiciewegiehotiu, after all, a novelty out of the sea and the clouds, a being full of lucks and glories, but not the rank old Africa of God.

Men said now that the Prince had been tempted and led astray by the white man. And the question was, why was this white man, who, though so strangely favoured, had shrunk from going forward against Daisy, and had almost caused the loss of the war, why was he not there on his trial with the Prince and the rest, but kept smuggled away in "The Elephant"? Was the Prince by chance to die, and not he, the cause of all? That would be Justice! This was a sore and jealous point with Wo-Ngwanya, and the name of Cobby, though it stank, was in every mouth.

Then a rumour flew — none knew its source — that Cobby was about to be banished, but not killed, lest the king of his country, who was known to rule over huge hosts in the blue of the sea, should bring trouble upon Wo-Ngwanya: and the sowing of this rumour produced some diminution in the tumult of tongues.

But when, in the fifth twilight of the trial, the Prince and many others were condemned to death, a dumbness of awe and sorrow fell upon the populace, and a sense of resentment.

That night Dzinikulu in his hut attempted suicide; but failed to die.

And this only enhanced the emotion of tragic pity and shrinking now associated with the Prince. Some of the wizards, braving the resentment of Mandaganya, now afresh insisted that his death would be unholy, passionately a filth, a shudder, and spat out the notion; and to Spiciewegiehotiu came deputations — chieftain and headman from afar, General and Chief-of-the-tax, in twos, threes, tens: let her slay the rest, before all the white firebrand, but reprieve the Prince, last of the old Race. The first of these the Queen received quietly, heard silently; with the third she flew into a passion; the rest she heard with respect, weighing their words, without saying anything.

On the fourth day after his condemnation, at an hour when the dusks of sundown were already come, the death-drum sounded for Dzinikulu in the Square. Many people were then hoping for his reprieve; few were present. He was carried in a cart, so that it might not be seen that he could not now stand without support; and he was borne bodily to the block, moaning in pain, but quite composed to die. As his greying head fell, those present covered their faces, gave out a groan, and suddenly fled away in every direction to utter the story of his cutting off.

But he was no sooner dead than the rumour was being busily bruited that the Prince had been arm-in-arm with Daisy, and had meant to betray the army — a baseless rumour, doubtless; and his death had been so timed, that on the very day following arrived the war-indemnity from Daisy, multitudes of cattle lowing in the kotla, crass souls spattering cataracts of droppings, with profligacies of slaughter, and free feeding to render the populace gay and forgetful.

And in the following days they saw the beheadal of all the Prince's known confederates — a hecatomb of blood. No pleading could rescue, no plea prevail, Fate not deafer than the ear of the Queen. "Only the white man survive," Wo-Ngwanya said.

He, meanwhile, lay dark — and sick: fever! — perhaps from the arrow-wound in his calf, or from that sightless air, or from his mind.

This time he was alone in his room — that he might the better reflect perhaps; this time had no electric hand-lamp; when he was delirious, within and without darkness reigned for him, and his home was in the realm of the old Anarch Chaos.

Always his warders asked him why he did not send a message to the Sinder-ngabya (Guardian of the Sad): but he would do nothing but suffer.

However, it became known outside that he was sick. Sueela one night heard it at her mother's, and flew home with the news.

Yet it was some time before, lying in a vine-arbour, looking out at moonlight, she uttered: "Cobby sick."

Spiciewegiehotiu did not answer.

And presently again Sueela, restively: "How long he got to be in that place?"

Spiciewegiehotiu glanced coldly aside at her. "Why you ask?"

"You only hurting yourself, my girl!" cried out Sueela.

"No, me pleasing myself. Me warned him! Now let him suffer, and think. When me hit me hurt. It is cruel to punish and not punish enough."

"So you keep him in that filthy hole whether he sick or well, Spiciewegiehotiu?"

"Yes. You sorry?"

“And if he die?”

Spiciewegiehotiu shrugged.

At which shrug Sueela started, shrinking, breathing “My God!” and again the Queen’s glance dwelt with high eyebrows and icy eye-corners on her.

So the next day Sueela went to Mandaganya, and knelt saying: “Ma-Sueela, go to him! You go, no? Maybe you do him good.”

Upon which the doctress studied her under a puzzled frown. “Why you care like this?”

“You think me not love him to my heart?” the daughter frankly answered with a sob: “but not like another man — you not understand — Cobby a god — he very good, he very great — you hear how he cut off those three soldiers’ legs, and they not know! they not feel any pain! and now they hop about.... You go, no?”

And presently the mother said: “Eheh, me go, me go”: and the next day went.

To her no permission to visit was necessary: the doors flew open, the prison-men prostrating themselves before her presence; and, sitting with her little dog by Cobby’s bed, gorgeous reds of torchlight on her visage, she said to him: “You my enemy: you want to carry off my Queen; but you sick, me come to see you, me bring you medicine.”

Water sprang to Cobby’s eyes; he caught and kissed her hand.

“Why you not send a message to Spiciewegiehotiu?” the sybil asked, her hand on his forehead: “say Me burning with fever; say Let me out.”

He tossed for ease, moaning: “Never that — never that.”

“Spiciewegiehotiu good-hearted,” she told him: “but, if she let you out, everybody say: See! Dzinikulu dead, but the white man free, and — —”

“Is Dzinikulu dead?”

“Eheh, he well dead; no more Dzinikulu. They say you tempt him, but he tempt you: he well dead: me dance naked on his grave.... But tell me something me can do for you.”

He clung to her hand. “Oh, some light — quinine — my medicine-chest — —”

She asked, and he told her, how to discover the medicine-box, which two days later came to him; nor after that was he ever long without the solace of the shine of a torch in his night; and while Mandaganya was being rowed homeward through the gloom under “The Elephant’s” rock-roof she performed a spell with snake-bones for his benefit.

On reaching her home, where she found Sueela awaiting her, she reported that Cobby was truly ill: on which Sueela went back to the sigodhlo with a fixed lip, and in the deep night-time, seated naked on her bed with hugged knees, while the Queen paced the hut in a glum light, she ventured to break a silence with the statement: “Cobby very sick.”

“How you know?” asked Spiciewegiehotiu, half-halting in her walking.

“My mother been to see him.”

Spiciewegiehotiu span sharply to say: “What for? Tell Mandaganya mind her own business!”

“My goodness! he sick! You not care?”

“No! Me not care! Tell everybody mind their own business!”

“All right. But if a cow sick, they give it medicine. Sometimes of a morning ten or twelve people used to wait for him at the sigodhlo gate, and he give them medicine; but when he sick, in prison, nobody give him medicine.... Suppose he — die — —”

“Let him die,” said the Queen, with a vixen vindictiveness and fixity of lip.

Sueela cut a nod of menace. “Maybe he do; you better be careful!”

“Oh, he not going to die!” — Spiciewegiehotiu laughed a little.

“How you know? The Zulu, Panda, die there. Maybe he die, then — what? No more Cobby: the doves stop cooing, the winds stop blowing: you know you love him to your heart, Spiciewegiehotiu. And why you keep him there? Dzinikulu gone now: Cobby never again can attempt to take you away — he got no friends, no help. You say you always have reasons: so why you keep him there? You bring him out to-morrow, no?”

At which Spiciewegiehotiu flew into a passion, crying out: “Now, isn’t this too much? Don’t ask me again! — never. You think me going to give reasons?”

“Me done,” Sueela sullenly muttered, and shut up with resentment.

But the next day Cobby’s medicine-chest was sought for; on the next he got it; close upon which followed fruit brought him by Macray, who stooped into the room, saying: “What, baas, in again, you jail-bird? How long you in for this stretch?”

At once Cobby wished to know how it was that Macray, when sent for after the kidnapping, had failed to join Dzinikulu and him! To which Macray answered: “Didn’t know I was sent for — nobody came. If anyone had, I shouldn’t have gone. No ‘Elephantiasis’ for me, baas, thanks. I warned that fool of a Dzinikulu that he’d get his head off sure, and I warned you. I think you might follow my advice a little, inkoos: I know my way about.... I hear you got wounded?”

“Yes.”

“Well, it’s all to the good — the whole incident. You now see definitely that you can’t carry off the girl, and she sees that she had better send you away. We are to be ‘banished,’ as they say, though — why is the girl waiting? For you to get better, or what? I went to ask her, and she wouldn’t see me — damn her! I hate the white nigger like poison. She had better be quick, for my cigars are nearly done, and when they are, I start kicking, I make some sort of a bust-up somehow. I can't smoke this Wo-Ngwanya tobacco, and I'm not going to be done out of smoking for anybody. When I'm really hurt, I kick — I tell you frankly — I make a bust-up. So hurry up, baas! get well. Then we do a dart, you and I, and old Sue, and the waggons. Sue's mine now, you know, though she don't quite realize it yet. She and I plighted our troth in the canes one night — —”

Cobby moaned, Macray's presence proving an added arrow in the quiverful of quinine-and-fever arrows whizzing here and there within his brain. Great, however, is quinine; so that a week later he was on his legs, weak and wrecked, but pacing; and that day yet a visitor stooped for him into the room — a very young officer apparently, erect and gallant as a masquerade in cock's-tail and ox-tail and kaross of ocelot-pelt, carrying the long assegai and shield, whom Cobby did not recognize in that vague sheen of his torch.

“Well?” he asked when they were alone: “who —— ?”

She shrank aghast at his haggardness, breathing: “My goodness! you so sick?”

“Sueela?”

“Eheh. Why you not lying down? My God, you very sick.”

“Only very weak now. You come to see me! Secretly?”

“Eheh. Me dead, if anybody know. Me can't help —— Oh, why you so sick?” Now her face muscles convulsed towards tears.

“You dear!” said Cobby, with water in his eyes: “come to see me? You dear!”

“You think me could help?” — in a hoarse tone in her throat, her face averted: “you think me not love you?”

Swaying with weakness, he went to take her hand, and gaze contemplatively down upon her, saying: “Sueela, do you love me?”

On which she was passionately on her knees to him, smoothing his hands down and down, her fingers stretched tense, saying: “Oh, me love you too much — only me know.... Me going to beg you to give me three kisses — not now — some time — me steal them from Spiciewegiehotiu —— You will, no?”

“Poor dear. Yes, yes, of course.”

“You so good, so great. Only three — then all my life me not care what happen to me, me say ‘he kiss me three times.’ Not all the same day — one one day — then the next another day — then the last, last one another day. Spiciewegiehotiu not know: when me dying — my mother say me born to die young — when me dying me tell Spiciewegiehotiu ‘he kiss me three times,’ and she forgive me. But before you kiss me, me tell you something — who me to tell it to but you? me not good — me go somewhere with Caray, once, and with others before: me shamed! Now me done, done: that never happen to me any more. So you forgive me, no?”

“Yes! Yes!” Cobby answered with nods, “till seventy times, dear,” and lifting her up, kissed her cheek.

“That not one of the three!” she cried out, pleased, all shy eye-corners, leering.

“No, no, that’s not one,” he consented.

Then she said: “Now me make you lie down, and give you sorrel-drink” — she had gourd and cup— “and me get you out of this stinking den this day; if me not get you out, me tear myself to pieces” — an undertaking which, by an exhibition of no little cunning and skill, she fulfilled: for, on going from “The Elephant,” and on changing into her girl’s dress in the grounds of a girl friend, she hurried to Mandaganya, into whose presence she burst with a theatrical abandonment of despair, crying out: “Cobby dying!”

“How you know?” breathed the sybil.

Sueela poured out the falsehood that one of the warders had informed his daughter of it, and, “Oh, Ma-Sueela, quick!” she pleaded: “you go to Spiciewegiehotiu, no? Say He die! Say The dog yowl! Say Bring him out this day!”

Meditatively the doctress eyed her, remarking: “Me think you lying.”

“Oh, Ma-Sueela, you stop to think?” asked the excellent girl with reproach: “go! go now!” — and before long the doctress was off to do it.

Through which it happened that before sunset Cobby lay stretched in his lounge-chair in his old “guest-hut” in the sigodhlo, his old attendants about him. His enfeeblement being extreme, anon he dozed, and anon tore his eyes open to see the lights flicker at wind, and listen awhile to raids of rain on the door, and doze anew; until a little sound like an “Oh!” of shock roused him, and he saw Spiciewegiehotiu within the doorway shrinking with astonishment and shock at the sight of him lying there so washed-out, so languid, exsanguined; then she ran to him, and knelt with her arm round him, speechless, her cheek on his; and when he felt the streaming of her tears that wet his cheek, he himself wept plenteously, and, without saying anything, they wept so together, till she got out on the sound of a sob in a broken voice: “So you get well, no? now me near you. And now you do everything me tell you, no?”

“Yes,” he answered on a sob, “and you everything that I tell you.”

XXIII. SUEELA CHANGING SIDES

NOW, THE LIBERATION of Cobby and his reinstatement in the sigodhlo astonished everybody: but upon Macray it had a profound effect, the bitter suspicion now visiting him that there must be something sweet between Cobby and the Queen: in which case — what? Cobby might yet get her to Europe! and all Macray's fat be in the fire. If Cobby did not get her, she would keep Cobby, and, with Cobby, Macray. But Macray's cigars were smoked — an important fact; and weary now in general of Wo-Ngwanya, especially since Sueela had “turned good,” he was urgent to return to Europe.

Three evenings after Cobby's release he went to visit Cobby, to discover what was what, and come to some decision.

But outside Cobby's door he heard a murmur of voices in the hut, and, peeping at a seam between the door-boards, could see Cobby in candle-light on his lounge-chair, and, kneeling near Cobby, a young officer, whose posture of body and mind, whose face of affection, whose play of eye and hand, were hardly those of a young officer; and before long Macray was saying to himself: “Oh, it's she — the two beasts.”

This scene had the effect of a profound upheaval in the soul of Macray: accustomed to be deified and preferred, to consider the sun and the earth his, he was churned in his depths to a turgidness of jealousy, a venom of enmity.

Not a word of the murmuring could he make out, but there he remained, smiling over a viper's-nest of emotions.

Sueela had started at a little sound of his step on the moss outside, had sharply breathed “What that?” and, though Cobby had heard nothing, she had continued to hearken, hushed, eyeing the silence, then had remarked: “Oh, it very dangerous! Suppose —— !”

“Better not come again, then,” he said. “But I am glad you came, for I wanted to put to you this that I have been saying. Spiciewegiehotiu has afresh betrayed to me, not only that she will never go with me, but that she has no intention that I shall ever go, this talk of ‘banishing’ me being mere talk for some reason of her own. So here am I condemned to lifelong idleness and ripening. Of course, I can escape to-morrow: I can go through the air; but then I should be leaving Macray behind, and that I mustn’t do.”

Sueela’s expression was all perplexity. “How you mean— ‘go through the air’?”

“I can fly.”

“Fly.... Up in the air? Like a devil?”

“Or like an angel. But whatever I do, whether I stay, or whether I go, I shall be in equal misery, if I go without Spiciewegiehotiu, who is half of me, and where she is not I am a fish out of water. And what I do not understand is that you, who love her so much, and love me, too, should be opposed to her going with me. I can only suppose that you don’t conceive how much this would be for her good —— What are you staring at, black goose?”

“How you mean ‘fly’? Not up in the — air?”

“Yes, I tell you. You must understand that animals with two legs, men and birds, are meant, not only to fly, but, sooner or later, to spend their life in the air, spurning the earth. And when I tell you that Europeans can already fly, and when you see how very far Africans are from doing any such thing, do you not see, too, that that is not true friendship to Spiciewegiehotiu to be on her side in her refusal to come to Europe, where, being opulent, she would enjoy far vaster powers and delights, and be like a lark let out of a cage?”

She stared at him. “What you want me to do?”

“Nothing, dear,” he said: “only to be on my side in sympathy, so you should be, for her sake, and mine, too.”

“My mother!” she suddenly breathed, astare; then shut her eyes, shook her face: “if she go, me dead, me done. Without Spiciewegiehotiu me a rotting dog on the ground.”

“You would come, too,” he muttered.

“Me?”

“Why, yes.”

Her mouth half-opened in a sort of laugh like one astonished with happiness; but then, recovering herself, she shook her head, saying, “No, you not want me then. No. Me not go. Me stay and die.”

“Perhaps I should not now go without you,” he mentioned.

“No? Oh, you good!” — she drew her stretched fingers down his cheek; and outside Macray hissed at her.

“But,” she said presently, “why you not tell Spiciewegiehotiu that, if she go with you, she like a lark let out of a cage? Maybe ...”

“Haven’t I told her?” Cobby answered: “the girl’s deafer than the deaf adder.”

“She not realize.... Even me who believe everything you say ——— Why you not show her the different things you can do, then, when she see for herself, maybe — —”

This struck Cobby. “Well, there may be something in that. Yes, I will think of that.”

She then, after gazing a little at his face in a stillness, stood up from her knees, saying: "Now me go. You soon get well, no?"

He promised "Yes," with nods, looking up at her.

"If ever you want to see me, tell Sansiwana to whistle twice at noon at the back part of the park."

"Very good."

"So good health. Who love you?"

"You. Think over what I've said."

"Eheh, me think." She pressed his hand in a vice. "Good health."

She still did not go, but stood averted, a pallor now under her skin; and then ventured upon the murmur in a tone of huff and offence: "Me have the first of the three kisses now, no?"

"Come, dear, come," he said, his face uplifted to her.

In a moment she was down to him, and, her palms holding his face, her lids closed, laid her lips on his brow, led them muttering down, found out his mouth with a pounce of passion bound back by chastity, and suddenly sprang and ran to the door to vanish.

Headlong she went, seeing nothing, though Macray had only a little withdrawn himself from the door; but soon she paused, stood a stone, hearing rather than seeing him pursuing her down the gross gloom under the meeting of the trees of the avenue.

He gripped her wrist. "Got you! You obscene little beast." His eyes blazed outrageous fire upon her; he deluged her in a fury of abuse. "You dugout, you gluttonous gutter, you ogling lewd goat! How many different men a day for you, eh? Your blackness is the blackness of sin, they say you were black with sin at seven, you deep-dyed — —"

"What me done?" she asked pallid, yet with a quiet dignity.

He let go her wrist to box her staggering. “Think I didn’t see? You filthy — Come on, into the bush.”

Again he gripped her wrist, and her face had a momentary horror of repulsion, till she quietly announced: “Me not going.”

“Ah! — you dare. Resist one little bit, and to-morrow Spiciewegiehotiu hears all.”

A heat of enmity, as of braziers dully smouldering, reddened the veins of her eyeballs. “Yes, you get me into trouble if you tell,” she said, “but you never get anybody else: the same day Spiciewegiehotiu have you dead. She not have any fear of Cobby carrying her off now Dzinikulu dead: so she not need you any longer.”

“I see: I’ll remember,” he said to himself with a sinister meaning, adding: “Come on” — and dragged her stumbling.

“Where you taking me to?” she asked.

“Up here” — at the entrance to an alley.

“No, not there,” she said: “a hut up there — somebody come out and see. That other side.”

Now she led his hold on her wrist obliquely across the avenue toward a spot where she was conscious that a tree-stump stood half-buried in the moss; and since it was dark all there, his foot stumbled upon the stump; and, as he stumbled, Sueela by a feat of nimbleness was running free.

After her he dashed in a passion of action — down the avenue, then a dart to the left round the royal park over noiseless moss under darkness of foliage, through which anon the moon threw moving pictures that winced and wandered. But though his legs were longer, Sueela’s were fleeter, and she had left him well behind by the time she dashed to the park gate to gasp with wild eyes to the guard, “Me — Sueela” — she had snatched off her officer’s head-dress— “kill that wild beast — he chase me.”

On which two of them went headlong, with spears held ready, to meet Macray, while he, seeing them, whipped out his pistol to lay them dead. But his angel whispered him of danger there: and since there was still time for flight, he fled, was soon in hiding in bush, spied them dash past him, and before long got to harbour in Cobby's hut.

Sueela, meantime, was modifying her dress in an empty hut within the royal grounds; and, on going home, told Spiciewegiehotiu that Macray had met and chased her.

And Spiciewegiehotiu said: "So?"

XXIV. COBBY'S "BANQUET"

SUEELA HAD NO sooner left Cobby's hut, than Cobby, pondering upon her suggestion to show to Spiciewegiehotiu "the different things he could do," conceived the scheme of giving a big dinner, to exhibit to the Queen in what style she would dine at the Ritz and in the Riviera.

And when Macray, after being pursued by the two guardsmen, came in to him, Cobby asked what Macray thought of this concept.

"Splendid!" went Macray with an evil sneer: "but — I thought we were to be 'banished'?"

"No, it won't be done," Cobby answered.

"How do you know?"

Cobby shrugged. "Somehow."

"Then, let's do a bunk."

"We can't cross nine hundred miles of Africa without bag or baggage; and, if we have impedimenta, pursuit must mean capture."

"Why, though, should we be pursued?"

Again Cobby shrugged. "We should be."

On which Macray said to himself, "There is something sweet, then, between her and him"; and very irritably he demanded: "But when is this to end? Look here, j'ai soupe — or 'fed up,' you say in England — I'm fed up, I tell you frankly. I have nothing to smoke, man — I'm like a beggar that says 'can you give me a pipe of baccie, mister?'"

"Well, one must bear the inevitable," Cobby mentioned.

"Or blast it sky-high out of one's way," Macray muttered.

“No, not the inevitable,” Cobby said: “you can damn it, but you can’t blast it.”

“No laughing matter to me!”

“Nor to me.”

“Well, I’ll think it all out,” Macray said, strolling out.

And he proceeded to think in no good easy mood, but with his usual intolerance of obstacles to his wants.

“Thinking it out,” he was lying the next forenoon within thicket up White River on an ant-heap where he had acquired the habit of hiding himself away, to lie in wait and eye the bathing of the Queen and her bevy, the ant-heap, as usual, being an even lusher jungle of fan-palms, mimosas, proteas white-flowering, than the wild round it. He was feeling a need to see Sueela, who, now that he hissed at her, the more teasingly allured him; and there, deeply concealed, he lay when the Queen’s ladies appeared.

They ran, they prattled, they laughed, they splashed, they took the douche under the waterfalls; then were back, drying, dressing; then Sueela was climbing a marula-tree, with Spiciewegiehotiu underneath looking up, a marula some way from the troop of damsels, and hardly ten yards from the ant-heap.

Sueela picked and dropped peaches to Spiciewegiehotiu, then, seated on a low branch of the marula, chewing its peaches, spoke downward in a raised tone, continuing a previous conversation — about Macray. “You not need him any more. Why you bear with that man?”

Dreading the opening of Macray’s mouth any day, dreading lest his violence should contrive to coerce her converted nerves into a sin against her nobler love, she did not now wish well to the continuance of his existence, and was bitter, too, against him for his hooligan usage of her. “He steal your father’s picture, he use your father’s goods, he hate you, he Cobby's enemy, he lead three girls astray, he want to lead me, he chase me — Why you not cut him short? Me hate that man.”

Spiciewegiehotiu shrugged. “If you like ... maybe ... But look at those clouds scudding — the sky wide — water sweet, wind sweet — hear the river and the trees streaming — me like everybody to see and hear them, unless somebody's death do good to other people. Me have a score to settle with Caray, but there is something to his credit in it; maybe, but for him, Cobby and Dzinikulu — —”

“He do it for his own good, not for yours!” — Sueela was leaping down.

“Me know. Well, maybe ...” They were walking away: Macray lost the rest.

They left him there a devil, with a thought in him of Cobby's feast, and of how he might make a clean sweep then of all that impeded and hated him, to be off for civilization. He had not interfered with anybody, he said to himself — had been interfered with in his peaceable routine, first by that Master R. K. Rolls, who was well in hell, and then by that Master Cobby, and now by this black beast whom he had deigned to feel tender to, and this white nigger who so lightly doomed him to death for doing nothing. Or not for doing nothing? The theft of the photograph ... she knew of that ... knew the motive.... “All right,” he said, “war it is: the quickest lives. I do the killing, I think: no one wounds me with impunity....”

Three days later he received a summons to go to Cobby, à propos of the preparations for the feast, Cobby having already sent out cards of invitation to the elect — the bearer of the card telling what the card intended to say: for everything was to be in high style! and no little sensation and expectation was in the air at this event — a feast in “The Elephant”! one had never heard the like.

One there was who eyed the thing askance — Mandaganya; and she went to Spiciewegiehotiu to say: “What this ‘feast’ for? You go?”

“Eheh.”

Mandaganya laid her hand on the Queen’s. “Don’t go.”

“Oh, Ma-Sueela,” pouted Sueela, who was there within the baobab, “this is too much!”

To which the doctress quietly replied: “If you talk when me talking, me knock you down.” And to Spiciewegiehotiu: “Don’t go. Something bad going to happen. Me not hate Sir Cobby, but me dread him. He very wise; he make people sleep so deep, he cut off their leg, and they not know. Suppose he poison us all at the feast, or maybe carry you off asleep?”

Spiciewegiehotiu started!

“He not do that,” Sueela remarked.

“Shut your box,” the sybil answered; and, smoothing the Queen’s hand: “Don’t go. Listen, me tell you something: this morning me was picking herbs in the hills, and all at once this little dog run back to me with his tail between his legs. Me say to him: ‘What the matter with you, Ronja?’ He not make any answer, but when me say to him ‘Come on,’ he not come. ‘Why you not come?’ me ask him. No answer. There he sit; twice me see a shiver twitch him. And all at once a rock come clattering down from the cliff upon the path ahead: if we had gone on, we get killed, maybe; then when the rock drop, he come on. So me think to myself: ‘these must be days of danger, this month-end,’ and when we get home, me show him the card Sir Cobby send when he send the invitation. Ronja look at the card, he not say anything for a minute, then he sniff at it, then he back from it, and snarl. Don’t go.”

The two girls sat rather aghast.

“You go?” asked Mandaganya.

“Me go,” said Sueela.

“And me,” said Spiciewegiehotiu.

“Then, me, too” — the sybil rose, a grand being, to go backwards out, grovelling to the ground.

XXV. THE ENTRÉE

ABOUT THAT SAME evening hour Macray, summoned, was in the sigodhlo, all in good-temper now outside, saying: “Well, baas, what about this precious banquet of Belshazzar? Who’s to be the chef?”

Cobby answered: “You and I mainly. But the point is not the feast itself — these people here eat nicer things than rich Englishmen, and have those things much more lavishly than non-rich Englishmen — the point is the scientific accompaniments of the feast, the elegance and dignity which Science gives to life — the blaze of light — the music — —”

“But stop — where this blaze of light coming from?”

“Well, but, isn’t there the oil-engine, the dynamo, and our forty accumulators? Only I’m not sure how the rock holds nails! — we must drive in plugs of hardwood, I think. I’m having two arc-lamps in parallel, getting our six hundred watts from thirty accumulators, and the glow-lamps we’ll rig in a series system with the dynamo and ten accumulators, using every watt of our power. The lamp-glasses are mostly coloured — I got them so with this very object, to dazzle in case of necessity: it will be useless if we do not look elfin and superhuman.”

“I see, I see. Oh, we are being vain, baas of me! we are out to capture the ladies’ eyes. But why ‘The Elephant’ —— ?”

“Well, but,” Cobby said, “we can’t put the Ritz into a hut. That ‘Elephant’ rock-hall a mile beyond the prison — that’s the one I’ve selected: it has an alcove in which we can put our Primus and two stoves.

The main bother is the table! and a chic table-cloth — and we have only ten days: must start making trestles — —”

“And as to chairs?” Macray suggested.

“Oh, well, we must use stools.”

“They don’t have stools in the Ritz, isinduna — only footstools. These varnished stools here — when you get up off them they, too, get up a little, until they decide to part from you, and drop with a crash.”

“We’ll dry-dust ours.”

“And plates of unglazed earthenware — —”

“Oh, we have plates enough of our own — only eight guests.”

“Not enough forks, though.”

“Eat with fingers. It is only lately that the kings of England have forks: the Stuarts ate with their fingers.”

Macray rose to stroll out, saying: “Oh, well, God’s will be done, boys.”

“Come early to-morrow!” Cobby called.

“Damn you,” Macray muttered, stooping out through the hut-opening into darkness.

From the avenue he walked aside to the waggons to shed electric torchlight upon the medicine-chest, from which he took strychnine; and he had that day pressed out some milk-juice of euphorbia, a baleful bane, to mix with strychnine, in order to complicate and obscure the symptoms of both.

The next days were spent in pretty strenuous labour by him and Cobby and some blacks who aided them, for it was a long row or wade to the rock-hall, whichever way one approached it; and in the end the feast had to be put off three days.

On the last afternoon Cobby’s home-coming was watched for at the sigodhlo gate, whence he was conducted into the Queen’s hut, who, seated on the floor with Sueela, said to him: "They say you going to poison me, or put me to sleep."

"Do they?" says he: "but is this what you had to say? I am occupied!"

"Me been poisoned once," she said: "me not go: me 'fraid."

"As you please."

On which Sueela, shaking her head earnestly upward at him, said: "She not mean it, she not 'fraid."

"Yes, me 'fraid," repeated the Queen: "Mandaganya's little dog snarl at that card you send."

"Ha! ha! ha!"

"Oh, Spiciewegiehotiu," muttered Sueela with reproach in a pain of shamefacedness; and to Cobby: "She not mean it, me tell you! Go: you busy. We come to-night."

"May I go?" demanded Cobby.

"If you poison me, me haunt you," answered Spiciewegiehotiu.

"You haunt me now."

"Cousin Cobby. Red-head."

"Good-bye. Good-bye, Sueela. Start just at sunset." He was gone.

An hour later came from him to them garlands: and, garlanded, with Mandaganya and the Queen-dowager garlanded, and half a battalion of gardes cavaleries, they started out, cantering down a Square where, though it was raining, crowds had foregathered to gape and gaze.

Then at the "Elephant's" edge they found a punt all en fête with flowers, surmounted with an arch, out of whose leafage shot the sheen of three electric torches; this with the ladies in it was drawn forward by men wading; and, wading in the rear, stooping anon under the rock-roof, came the troop of soldiers, whom, with her usual prudence, Spiciewegiehotiu took with her.

But it was no short voyage under there in the dark, and Mandaganya muttered to the Queen-dowager: “Never in my life me go so far to get something to eat.” If anyone spoke, it was in a mutter, for there was that in the mood of the place that disposed the soul to a musing in unison with that moodiness of the lagoon, which the waders’ progress noiselessly wrinkled in coils of ripples sluggish like oil-waves waving loth, only less loth than the areas of lotus, arum, mosses, whose old opium repose the roamers’ motion anon broke or troubled; and languidly the back gave way as beneath the weight of the leagues of incubus, and into the gaze came a dreaming; until, after passing the region of the prison, they began to encounter anon a glow-lamp or two, hung from the rock-roof, gloating upon the water’s gloom, mute warders, unaccountable, like outposts of gnomeland: and now they were roused to outlook.

Then an opening in the rock-roof lit up: and they made their way up a tunnel rugged under the glare of rare glow-lamps. Here the Queen posted her guard; and the four ladies and the dog clambered on, till they got to a great rock-portal: and there at once an “Oh!” of astonishment, of awe, broke from their breasts at a scene of majesty which would have abashed Cæsar — nay, Hume, Cuvier.

There at the portal stood Cobby and Macray, excellently dressed in jackets and cravats, to shake hands with bows of state; and down under two triumphal arches gala with flowers and coloured glammers of glow-lamps, to the accompaniment of a most glorious music going on somewhere, they moved in a mood of Aladdin to a table gala with flowers and coloured glammers; and flowers in showers, and festoons of coloured glammers, were looped all about the walls of the hall, and above, shimmering, showering a chattering as of ravishment, the richer flush of arc-lamps.

It was a night of lights and sights. Cobby, seeing the depth of the effect created, sat pleased at the right hand of the Queen, she seated at the table-head, her back to the alcove, behind the curtain of which could be heard the dynamo's murmur, the oil-engine noising. The only failure was conversation, all sat so lost in stillness and stiffness. When soup was being eaten, Spiciewegiehotiu whispered low to Sueela: "It good — but he not give much!" and low Sueela whispered back: "Me think more coming." And this was so: many mickles making a muckle, the liquors, too, being numerous, port, sherry, cherry-brandy, each in its season for a reason: at which warmth the ice thawed in time, and there was talk and lightness of mind, at the Queen's left being seated Sueela, Mandaganya, then on his own stool the dog Ronja, paw on table, feasting, then the Queen-dowager; and on the Queen's right the General, the Chief-of-the-tax, and two quite humble men, smiths, whom Cobby liked (and of one of them, named Rambya, had an even extremely high opinion), beside Cobby and Macray, one or other of whom anon sped away into the alcove to see to this or that.

In the midst of which Cobby extended his hand to a box on the table, and immediately all the genii of astonishment were called and flocked. Behold now: a disc on top of the box begins to spin, and — by the grace of God! — out of it sounds "Woman is Fickle" from Rigoletto. Then those there knew music more teeming with some mood and meaning of the spheres than the strains of canaries, as much more teeming as the smart and burden of the psalm which may one day burst from earth to star will be vaster than our sonatas. And — Oh, joy! — see now how they move to the news that the Soul of Being is bliss and emotion of gavotte, jig, jazz, finger wagging, hand clapping, head wagging, body going, He dancing, they dancing, sons of His soul, remembering how that same melody and meaning was inherent in the Nebula in the era when He and they reeled red, the little hound, too, with yowling mouth, snout up, hailing Him that moves and makes.

“It come out of that box!” Spiciewegiehotiu definitely discovered.

“Something inside the box!” sang out Sueela.

And this was so....

After which yet another lunacy of astonishment ensued when, by just a touch of two switches, Cobby extinguished all that effulgence at once, causing all to jump up, then summoned it afresh with a touch: and it came.

But this was just before an entrée of stewed koodoo-kid: and with that entrée the banquet came upon wreck.

The attendants placed the ten plates in their places on the table: but Macray was away in the alcove.

Now, Mandaganya had arranged with Spiciewegiehotiu, and with all the blacks, except the two smiths, that nothing was to be tasted until tasted by her Ronja and by her; and at the entrée the little dog growled, and bristled, and would not taste: upon which the doctress sprang upright, and, striking the table with her fist, glared close across into Cobby’s face, crying aloud: “Me say this food poisoned!”

White sprang Spiciewegiehotiu, staring at Cobby; all went pale: only Cobby looked calm — glanced up to say to Mandaganya: “You might calm yourself: your statement is fantastic” — and went on eating.

A muteness of the tomb now: broken only by that chattering of the arc-lamps’ flush, the armature’s mutter and meditation spinning in the inner apartment. Cobby ate on, offended — no one else: for the smiths, who had commenced to eat, had ceased. And suddenly, after perhaps half a minute, Spiciewegiehotiu dashed Cobby’s plate off the table.

“Now, how absurd!” Cobby murmured, starting up.

At the same time the Queen on her feet said to a waiter: "Tell Sir Caray come to me."

But Macray was already outside the alcove, and in a moment was at her right hand beside Cobby.

"What you doing in there?" she asked him.

Smiling, just touched with pallor, he answered: "Seeing to things."

"But your food getting cold." She indicated his plate. "Sit and eat."

Their eyes met and lingered a little together, until, with a chuckle, he said: "What, does the Great-great want me to be poisoned? I heard an outcry about poison.... You eaten any, baas?"

Cobby nodded.

"Is it all right?"

"Yes, of course."

"Then, what caused the outcry?"

"The dog, apparently, didn't approve — —"

"The dog! Oh, I see.... Yes, that little beast, I know him — greatest charlatan and liar on earth — pretends he can see through a stone-wall...."

"So you see," Spiciewegiehotiu now said, "it not poisoned. You sit and eat, no?"

"Yes," said Macray, "let us all eat."

And again her eyes and his lingered together.

She said: "Me done; me not want any more."

"Nor I, for that matter," he mentioned.

"No? Oh, well. Go back to what you were doing."

On which, uttering a breath of laughter, he walked away back into the alcove, and she, as he vanished, took up a little goblet, threw some flowers out of it, put into it with a spoon all the stew that was on her plate, and placed it under the table.

There the feast, as a feast, came to an end: nothing that Cobby could say could induce to any more eating — he grieving at no sweets, no coffee, liqueur; but cigarettes were smoked; the conversazione went on; telephone-sets had been installed at opposite ends of the hall, and all spoke in hushed tones to one another across all that stretch; they sat amazed at a display of coloured flames, Roman candles, squibs, catherine-wheels, fickle crackers frisking; and it was late when, laden with presents, the Queen went away, taking secretly with her beneath her kaross the goblet of entrée.

All in a dream of midsummer night their minds reeled, and “There is only Cobby,” Spiciewegiehotiu muttered, moving homeward in the punt under the rock-roof. As when a young girl goes home dumb from her first opera, agaze at apocalypses of fairyland through all the organs of her fancy, and all is trance of novelty, of freshness and strangeness, and in all her posture and prospect revolution ensues: so were they; or as when America was discovered, a “new world,” and away in a whirl the imaginations of men went ranging in revels of reverie through realms of refreshment and festival, and a revolution ensued; or as when one dared to bore the aerial blue in a balloon, fairily rose and soared, ascending up into heaven, at last, in reality, the son of man before the beholding host of man, and all was renewed and broader and tall, and a revolution ensued; or as when one flew, and a revolution has ensued, and will soon ensue, behind every revolution a scientist, the breadth and boldness of some lone brow becrowned with thorns of thought: so with these moving bemused beneath that roof through dreamland. But by then the revealer of the dreamland, though he said nothing, was convulsed, in dreadful pain.

XXVI. SUEELA SCHEMES

THE SICKNESS OF Cobby and of one of the smiths (Rambya) could not be concealed. They were poisoned: but the diagnosis baffled Cobby, some of the symptoms being strychnine symptoms, some euphorbia symptoms, all obscurely mixed up.

To see the smith the Queen went a long way, and said to him: “Me know who poison you: you think me not avenge you?”

“Who poison me, Bayeté?” Rambya asked.

“Me not come to answer questions,” she answered, “me come to see you. Now you soon get well, no? Good health!”

Meantime, she had put a bung into that little goblet of stew abstracted from the banquet, and had buried it in her grounds; meantime, too, the rumour of it flew wide: one or other of the white men had done this thing — maybe both, Cobby being taken in his own snare....

And no vengeance taken! Sueela especially now expected the Queen to proceed immediately against Macray, but the Queen said, did, nothing; and the Queen now expected Sueela to be pressing afresh for proceedings against Macray, but Sueela said nothing — each for her own reasons....

In the case of Spiciewegiehotiu, the banquet had afresh alarmed and put her on guard against Cobby, she scenting Cobby’s object in going to so much trouble — to show her the glories of Europe, and allure her to trek that way. Cobby, then, was not done with thoughts of being off with her! And since, obviously now, Cobby had powers of which she knew nothing, and since Macray was one of her protections against Cobby, Macray was afresh precious to her.

In the case of Sueela, whom the majesties of the banquet had ranged quite definitely on the side of Cobby's desires as against the Queen's desires, she had conceived a scheme in which Macray would have to play a part, so did not at present desire Macray to die. Moreover, after the banquet, Cobby's statement had become more credible to her — that Cobby could go away "through the air," like a devil (or an angel), but never would go without Macray: so she now dreaded that, if Macray perished, Cobby any day might shake the dust of Wo-Ngwanya off his shoe, and vanish into heaven. This, indeed, would leave to her her Spiciewegiehotiu, her other soul; but this girl had now determined that Spiciewegiehotiu should go with Cobby, for Spiciewegiehotiu's sake, and for Cobby's sake.

"You not want me any more to 'cut Caray short'?" Spiciewegiehotiu at last asked her one day, with meditative eyes dwelling on her.

"Me 'fraaaaid!" Sueela answered, very deceitfully, very deeply: "suppose Cobby still want to carry you off? Why he give that feast? Maybe Caray still useful. And me not think it was Caray who poisoned the food."

"No? Oh, you too foolish," the Queen said, and said no more.

By that time Sueela in a disguise had twice visited Cobby's lounge-chair, to mourn each time to him: "My God, you just get well, and now you so sick again."

"I will recover," he said; "and I bear it gladly, for now the Queen may be coming with me."

She shook her head. "No. Listen: the feast fail — it was my fault to tell you to give it: it only make her want you more to stay here. She say 'If he can make those things, we can make them when he show us the way; see if we not make Wo-Ngwanya the wonder of the world.'"

Thus the effect of the feast was the opposite of the effect intended by Cobby, Spiciewegiehotiu, like Pharaoh at the miracles of Moses, hardening her heart at the miracles of Cobby; and with the rising of the sun upon that night of the fairies, fairyland lost its glammers for her, and got to be a matter for practical politics, her enlarged soul now starting to dream dreams of a new Wo-Ngwanya, far lordlier, introduced by Cobby; the mood of revolution took her: thoughts of war, of enormous dramas of transformation, of palms, campaigns, spectacles, splendours, Alexandrine transactions; and always she said to herself “war, girl, war, war.” This was to work and work in her....

“As the deaf adder stoppeth her ear,” Cobby muttered....

“She say she owe her life, she owe all, to the Wa-Ngwanya,” Sueela told him: “so she give herself to them.”

“And I owe my life and all to Europe: I give myself to it. If she will not come, I will die rather than remain here. I will constantly try to escape, I will hate her bitterly, I will kick and bite and fight till I die. Tell her: I couldn’t speak to her yesterday, I was so ill....”

“You ill still!”

“Yes: thank God that she or you got none of this bane that is in me into your blood.... How did it get into that stew? God knows!”

On an impulse she whispered: “Caray do it.”

“No, come, come,” he said peremptorily, “get that out of your head.”

“He do it,” she quietly insisted: “he want to kill me because me not go with him; he want to kill Spiciewegiehotiu and you because you keep him here; he not want to kill my mother and the others, but he so wicked, he not care — —”

“Be quiet, Sueela, you are displeasing me.”

She smoothed his hands, put her cheek on them, and shut up, for, though she knew how easily she could convince him that Macray was his enemy by merely revealing to him how Macray had originally warned Spiciewegiehotiu of Cobby's expedition, she was apprehensive that if Cobby got to know of this, he might go off lonely "through the air," without Macray, without Spiciewegiehotiu....

"Me not think Caray much a friend to you," she said presently: "so promise you not tell Caray what me come to say to you."

"Very good. What have you come to say?"

Smoothing his hands, on her knees, she told it: he and Macray were to escape with a cart, she, Sueela, with them, and five fellows upon whose friendship for her she could rely; then when they had gone a little way, the Queen was to hear that they were away, that Macray had carried off Sueela: in which case, it was certain that the Queen would fly in person to find Sueela, taking with her probably only a small body of men, since the fugitives would be but few; and, as Sueela knew of a spot in a pass where a few in ambush might easily master many, there Cobby's lot could kill the Queen's men, seize the Queen, and be away with her, while Sueela went home to mourn....

Cobby held his chin, speculating. "Needn't kill the Queen's men," he muttered, "... tear-gas ... and capture.... Good, good."

"You think it good?"

"Yes! We will! You — dear: both good and clever."

"But you look after me, no? You not let Caray get me while me with him?"

"Indeed not! Be very sure of that."

"And you not let him know beforehand why we do it? If you do, we fail! — he tell the Queen. Caray not want you to carry her off! Me know, me tell you so, you believe me, no? So you take away his guns from him when the Queen coming, no? And you give me one of those little guns for myself....”

She then went away, but the next time she came to him had each detail of the scheme completely planned; and the following night met Macray by appointment in her mother’s park.

Macray, at this time in an ice of anxiety for his life, apprehensive every day of what the Queen might mean toward him, and pining to be well out of Wo-Ngwanya, was torn betwixt delight and suspicion at what Sueela had to say: they were to escape! she with them, Sir Cobby to give her something to make the Queen sleep, and while the Queen slept, the cart and they would pass well away beyond capture.

“So who is it that you are running away with — Cobby or me?” he demanded.

Brazenly she smiled up into his face. “With you.”

“No lies! I saw you slobbering Cobby, you black Bacchant.”

“But you not see me go into the canes with him? My goodness, me not give you proof who me love?”

This solaced, this mollified; but then he burst out: “Why, I heard you begging Spiciewegiehotiu up White River to murder me! I heard you!”

“You heard?” — her hand on his shoulder, she smiling up close into his eyes. “You were there? — to see me bathe, no? Me have the best figure of all those girls, no? But you not guess why me beg Spiciewegiehotiu to kill you? She so suspicious: she think me love you; and me want to make her think me hate you: so me say ‘Kill him!’”

He pondered upon it. “Was that it? Really? But if you love me so much, why did you kiss Cobby?”

“But me love Sir Cobby, too: only different, not the same.”

“I see. And why have you shunned me as you have?”

Her eye-corners ogled him. “Because you not to touch me again, until you make me your waaif in that country.”

“Oh, Lord, I see — question of matrimony: what will the parson think? You’re an unbeliever, my Sue. Never mind, I forgive you — come, kiss.”

On which she drew a revolver from her moocha-girdle to present playfully at him, saying: “You see this little gun? Sir Cobby give me. If you touch me too soon, me shoooot you!”

But this did not deter, and when she saw him flush toward urgency, she took to her heels; nor could he come near to catching her.

She had already explained to him what was his part in the plan of escape: he was to get the cart and oxen, keep them dark at his domicile, and stock the cart with guns and other requisites, got in very small lots from Cobby’s waggons.

And this he did: daily entering the sigodhlo to get the things, and discuss with Cobby, whom he now found rather a cold baas, Sueela’s statements about him having left some impression on Cobby: and it reached the ears of Spiciewegiehotiu that Sir Caray was often at this time in the sigodhlo — a bit of gossip that caused the Queen’s eyebrows to rise a little.

And the Queen’s eyebrows could not but rise a little at Sueela, who was sleeping unquietly, who was hanging to Spiciewegiehotiu’s hand with a fresh anguish of friendship, gushings of love. One midnight, pretending to be asleep, she beheld Sueela seated abed, tossing her buried face, sobbing. And one noon she went seeking Sueela to the bottom of the royal park, having lately observed that after the return from the river-bath Sueela disappeared a little, and she wished to see what Sueela disappeared for. She could not see Sueela, who knew how to be invisible; but at the far bottom of the park through a knob-hole of the stockade, she saw Cobby’s back walking off: which thing also caused her eyebrows to rise a little.

XXVII. THE CAPTURE IN THE PASS

ONE DARK EVENING a week afterwards Sueela departed from the sigodhlo to go to visit some friends at a farmer-kraal outside Eshowe, having told Spiciewegiehotiu that she would be back long before midnight.

She duly visited those friends, but remained there only a few minutes, then flew, met at an appointed spot Cobby, Macray, and her five friends with the cart, and started off with them through wild winds, drizzle and darkness for a pass five miles distant....

It became midnight: anon Spiciewegiehotiu sprang up, glanced out at the rude night, and finally grew angry that Sueela did not appear....

An hour later she wrapped up her head, ran out into the rain to a near hut, and sent out a messenger, who galloped to the farmer-kraal to ask after Sueela, and galloped back with the news that Sueela had soon left the kraal; on which the Queen wrung her hands together, and dispatched the galloper to Mandaganya to seek Sueela.

But before he was back, an agitated man was led into her presence to recount how, coming home in the night from a mountain kraal, he had encountered the white men in flight, with five and Sueela — Sueela tied, grieving, screaming, in the grip of Macray! They, seeing that he had seen them, had chased him, shot at him, but he had dodged and escaped! — this bringer of tidings being a sixth friend of Sueela left behind to bring the tidings.

The Queen listened to it in a white silence; whispered only: “Which pass?” and “Who are the five?” then let herself down on her bed, where she sat staring as if paralyzed; but then on a sudden flew into a fury, sprang up, ran about, wished to tear out her hair, stamped at the messenger in a passion, screaming at him: “Fly out of my sight! Leave me!” then stood with her forehead on the hut-wall, quite passive some time, till she span to act....

The morning light came bright and stormless. There where Cobby’s party lay in ambush gadded gentle gales, gladsome like gas of champagne, to be quaffed by an organ more evolved and gladsome than the stomach; drops of dew — tropic dew — thronged all the bush with flushings of jewellery, drenching every movement made by jubilant green larks updarting, by canaries screaming greetings, and by the men who lay in greenery on a ledge twenty feet square, to which they had climbed twenty feet up an incline from a rock-corridor, very straight and very long, running through a realm of rock that climbed to the skies before them and behind them; and in a spelonké, or rock-hole, some distance off below them their oxen lay hid in thicket.

They breakfasted, then waited with agitated hearts. Only one of them had not known why they stopped there and waited! — Macray. But now he understood.

“Why do we stop?” he had asked at the stoppage.

Cobby had answered that there they would engage any pursuers with tear-gas, whereupon Macray, with a piercing eye of suspicion: “Pursuers! I didn’t know that there were to be any pursuers.”

“Well, but,” Cobby had said with a smile, “the man who encountered us after we started has, of course, reported it; it must be that we are being pursued by horsemen: so it is useless to go on until we have defeated the pursuers, as we may here.”

“Then why did you stop me from firing at the man who encountered us?”

“I don’t want any killing, Macray.”

“I see. Still, let’s be pushing on — come. There aren’t any pursuers, if Spiciewegiehotiu is under chloroform — as I understand. We have plenty of time to get well away, with our oxen fresh.”

“Spiciewegiehotiu is not under chloroform,” Cobby had then bluntly told him.

Macray’s left eye had gone small. “Sueela lied, then?”

“It may be that Sueela does not invariably speak the truth — —”

“No, especially when you put her to lie.”

Upon which Cobby had fired a box into Macray’s face.

Thus their friendly relation definitely ended. Macray, though he had snatched at his revolver, had not struck back, possessing, as ever, no little self-command: but he then afresh condemned Cobby to death, and the second death.

He could see now that he had been tricked; and, though himself a trickster, it envenomed him that others should be tricksters in respect of him.

Here, it was clear, was a trap to catch the Queen, Sueela being there, not in order to be with him, but, won by Cobby, in order to decoy the Queen to come.... He, however, quickly enough came to the decision that at the least danger of capture for the Queen he would kill in quick succession the seven with him, Cobby to begin, then Sueela....

But against the success of that plan was the plan of Sueela, who also had a revolver, she intending to watch, and at any movement of Macray’s hand toward his belt to lay him low. Moreover, after the breakfast, Cobby, in fulfilment of a promise made to Sueela, proceeded to disarm Macray, coming to where Macray sat apart on a rock to say: “I am sorry now that I struck you, Macray, though you were so very offensive. But you had better hand me over your revolver for the present.”

“What’s that for?” — Macray started upright.

“I have reasons — obscure, maybe — but — —”

“You be —— !”

Just in time Cobby had him covered. “Lift up your hands! Believe me, I shall not hesitate to shoot, if you are mutinous....” He took revolver, knife, Winchester.

And afterwards Sueela, who had seen this through the thicket, came to Macray to stand before him with lowered lids, and say: “Me think the Queen will come.”

“You do?” says Macray.

“Eheh. And me have something to tell you: me not want to kill you, but if you make any sort of noise before Spiciewegiehotiu and all her men pass this ledge, me stab you.”

Bitterly impotent, he smiled upward at her, saying: “My Sue, my black-livered Sue! we may meet again.”

The sun climbed up high, and then hid away his face with that fickleness of the days of the rainy season, breezes sougning now through rough seas of trees, bringing drizzles, breathing that delicious bleakness and chill of November reveries and memories. It was noon before Cobby, lying at the edge of the ledge, spy-glass at eye, spied a figure coming, pigmily remote, alone, on the road below. His heart started, ceased to beat, and, white with excitement, he breathed to Sueela: “She comes.”

A shivering seized Sueela. She whispered: “How many men?”

“I see none....”

“My God!” she breathed. Somehow this terrified her!

On plodded the solitary figure, and suddenly Cobby's forehead rushed red, he sending out at her the shout: "C[oe]ur de Lion!"

"Sh-h-h" — from Sueela in an anguish of secrecy, although the figure was evidently still too distant to catch any shout.

But presently all saw her, and every breast there quailed at her coming more than if she had come accompanied by squadrons of cavalry: some majesty of self-assurance, some spell of proper authority, was suggested in that steady stepping, that did not pause and palter like common steps — and some menace: for to their nerves she came, not as a bird to the snare, but as a judge. Cobby himself felt it, and the flush of his shout at her rapidly perishing out of his face, left it blanched; the five black men lay visibly affrighted; and Sueela, wringing her hands, lamented to Cobby: "Oh, you not get her! You not get her! We all ruined!"

"Nonsense!" answered Cobby, turning irritated upon her: "why not get her? She comes alone!"

"Why you think she come alone — on foot? She not looking for us — she know we here! That why she not bring any men, she not want them to be killed, she come alone to capture us! Maybe she guess all, all...."

"Well, suppose so — what then? She is powerless! When she comes I simply take her."

"Oh, you not take her!" she cried in an ecstasy of distress with a cry-cry face: "you think she come like that, and not have some plan? Oh, tie my hands together quick!"

At the same time Macray, lying on his face some feet away, called to Cobby: "Now you think you have her safe, don't you? But I'll bet you haven't."

Cobby turned sharply upon him. "Don't you want me to have her? That is why we are in Wo-Ngwanya!"

“Not a question of what I want,” answered Macray: “I only remark that you haven’t got her yet, and probably won’t, not if I know the girl. If you do get her now, she’ll be back in her pig-sty within two days....”

And on the solitary figure plodded, showing already her stretch of shin, then showing the rhythm of her hips’ motion and wilful shoulders swinging, like some trained pacer’s of “the films,” then the raising of her face in friendship to the spray of a rain fresh as the winds, and as the wild fresh thicket, and the wild fresh breath of the spirit of Being, then showing how the puffs of the wind kept fluttering the flimsy stuff, saffron and black, of her kaross, and showing at last with how grave and estranged a face she came.

To gas, or not to gas, her foreground: this was Cobby’s problem. He shrank ...!

When she was opposite the ambush, her pace a little slackened — involuntarily perhaps; but she did not look upward, walked on beyond: and now Cobby, springing to his feet, gave a signal, and all, save Sueela, streamed down upon her.

As she span to face them, Cobby, who was very agitated, ran up to her with the announcement: “Now, you see, I have you.”

She seemed not to see, to hear, him, but, eyeing the five blacks, said quietly to them: “You touch me, no?” and drew a knife from her moocha-band to hold at her bosom, to penetrate: and it was with wide eyes that they beheld a thread of red astray on her left breast....

And in one moment now was revulsion and revolution of emotion: to ten eyes welled ten waters — all young men with warm minds. “Bayeté! No!” broke in protest out of one mouth; one knelt with wrung palms; all put out their arms in shame-faced reproach to her, while from the ledge broke a shriek — Sueela's — who in a moment more was flying, tied, down the incline, wild of eye, toward that knife.

“So you not want me to die?”

“Bayeté!” one protested with parallel arms extended tense.

“Kneel down, then.”

“Nonsense! Don't be tricked!” Cobby cried out. “You are my men!”

Down, with brows bent to the ground, they knelt.

“Say after me: ‘Bayeté.’”

“Bayeté!”

““Our Mother.””

“Our Mother.”

““Live for your sons.””

“Live for your sons.”

“Very well: me will. Now get up. Me pardon Sir Caray. Arrest Sir Cobby.”

Upon which Cobby, who had no appetite for any more “Elephant,” and had tear-gas (non-poisonous) with him, darted into a run to get far enough off to cast a bomb and gas the lot of them, in order to be gone with her from Africa: but after him the blacks darted so sharply, that he had hardly any start: to gas them would have been to gas himself; and the thought that if he cast a bomb toward her in that spot, running the risk of slightly wounding her, he might gas the oxen also caused him to falter; and, as he faltered, he was caught. The men then besought him: “You may as well — she too much for us — we not get her” — and he walked back to her in the midst of them.

Having now unbound Sueela's hands, she tossed the cord to the blacks to bind Cobby's, an operation which Cobby permitted with a bitter smile of disdain, in which was some self-disdain, for, if he had gassed her from the ledge, and not shrunk and trusted to luck, the result might have been quite different; and to himself he said: “A fool is a man who is wise too late.”

Meantime, Macray, all asmile, was saying to the Queen: “Thanks for ‘pardoning’ me, Bayeté: but there is nothing to pardon. I was going off to my country, as I have a right to do, but I had no notion that a trap was being laid for your Majesty by Sir Cobby and that young woman, who wasn’t being carried off by me, but came voluntarily with — —”

“Tell her all your lies!” Sueela cried with a grin, glancing round from dabbing with a cloth the wound in the Queen’s breast: “she not believe!”

“Came voluntarily with Sir Cobby,” Macray continued quickly, “in order to decoy you into the trap. She kisses Sir Cobby. Her wrists have only just been tied to deceive you — —”

“Ha, ha, she not believe!” cried Sueela in triumph: “tell some more!” And to Spiciewegiehotiu: “This man hate me like poison because me not go with him; he hate us all, he want to poison you.”

“You lie,” Macray remarked.

“What!” cried the Queen with a flush: “you speak to Sueela like that in my presence?”

“Well, if it pleases you to be deceived, be deceived,” Macray nonchalantly said.

On which Spiciewegiehotiu’s eyebrows lifted, and she said to Sueela: “But — why you not call out to warn me before me come? Somebody had his hand over your mouth, no?”

“Yes, of course” — from Sueela.

Macray chuckled. “Yes, you chief of sinners— ‘of course.’”

The Queen looked from one to the other of them, thinking her thoughts, then decided to say to Macray: “But this is strange that you speak to Sueela like this. Me not like it, Sir Caray.” This she said finishingly; and to the blacks: “Now the cart.”

On which the cart, ready inspanned, was brought from the spelonké, and they presently set off northward, the Queen, who was weary being wedged uneasily among packages in the cart, Sueela trudging beside it, and, trudging in front among the blacks, Macray and a Cobby all an inflammation of rage and rancour.

XXVIII. SUEELA MARRIED

THE GOING WAS slow — steep for the feet of oxen; anon an off-wheel was on the brink of abyss; and the Queen was so uneasily seated in the cart, that before long she chose rather to trudge afoot. And presently Sueela, without looking at her, ventured upon saying: “You let his hands free, no? That hurt him....”

Spiciewegiehotiu’s eyes dwelt a little on her before the reply came: “Yes, go tell them”; and Sueela sped forward with the order.

Thus, with Cobby freed, they trekked that intricacy of rock-scenery until near sunset, when all were weary, and Sueela exclaimed: “My goodness, when we going to get something to eat?”

“We nearly reach Hyena Kranz now,” Spiciewegiehotiu answered, “and there we sleep till the moon come up” — this kranz being a mug of crag some hundreds of yards across, sky-high all round, its bottom rising toward the right, and thick with timber, save at the left (west), where there was some bottom all rock in front of a cave: and there a fire was lighted, meat, meal taken out of the cart, poospoos cooked, and a supper consumed that had no lack of music, for yonder to the north a cascade come darkling down the crag, like yard after yard of gauze and lawn measured off recklessly in a frenzy for customers without money, the two girls supping with a certain aloofness in the cave’s mouth, the men in a crowd round the fire under a dark sky ardent with stars — stars large like those sparks which parted from the flame to dart away whither the wind ranged, and strange like that aged charm of the cascade, like the cadences of that darksome psalmody of the winds within the palms.

Only these sounds, and the fire-wood spluttering: till all the men started at another sound — like a neigh.

“Where it come from?” they asked one another, and sat hearkening; but now could hear nothing but the breeze, the bruit of the waterfall, and the brawling of the brook that the waterfall caused. One sprang upright, saying: “We go see,” but Spiciewegiehotiu called from the cave-entrance: “Maybe it was a zebra: eat your food — don’t trouble”; and again all was noiseless, save the voices of the night’s silence.

Then after food they smoked, some taking small pipes out of holes in the lobes of their ears, and then disposed themselves to sleep, the cavern having two halls, both large, with a doorway between, in the inner of which the Queen and Sueela lay little and lost in rock on their karosses, and the others lay in the outer.

But Sueela could not sleep, because her head was heated and teeming with the day’s event, and because a hyena continued to laugh heartily somewhere in the kingdom and mood of the dark, and because water was dripping somewhere from the roof into a pool, and, drop by drop, haunted all the hall with a succession of echoes.

Now, the fire outside the cave’s mouth had been made bright to scare away wild beasts, and so Sueela after an hour, through the portal, saw Cobby go out soft toward the cart, saw him come back, bringing something, did not see him lie down again....

At this thing her heart thumped thickly. What could he be doing darkly in there in the dying half-light of the fire? She sat up to peer — could not see! could hear the men’s breathing — everyone seemed asleep but Cobby. And she wrung her hands, anxious, in trouble for him: for though the Queen breathed as in sleep, it was uneasy sleep....

So, after a long hour of it, Sueela levered herself soft, soft, to her feet, to go to him — to warn, to comfort, to kneel to him.

But as she stepped away in haste, her foot touched, upset, a jar of water ... on which back she scuttled to lie down anew, for the sound had seemed to trouble the Queen's breathing. Only for some moments, however: and soon she was up once more, and out, her heart in her mouth....

She found Cobby so bent over one of the blacks, that she had to touch him before he saw her; and now she put her lips into his ear to hint the meaning: "Come with me."

He whispered: "Wait."

After two minutes he stood up; went with her out of the cave.

And active and tactical as cat with rat the Queen was tracking their feet.

She saw them go past the glowing embers, cross a patch of long grass and mimosa shrub, and go into timber; and like a boa boring after a bird she bored her journey through the bush, ferreting after them in flames: the bush burned and was not consumed.

They stopped within a knot of fan-palms, and she could see: there was starlight, which gives one-fifth of the light of the moon, and there was some off-shine from the embers: but nothing could she hear of what was said! for a brook rolled near in her hearing, and they spoke very low.

Sueela's hand was on Cobby's shoulder, her face close up to his — she wished to know what he had been doing....

"Making them all unconscious," he told her: "it took a long time, I had to do it so gradually, to evade any outcry; but that one you found me over was the last: now I am going to do it to her."

"Oh, my," breathed Sueela.

“Don’t be frightened: it will be late to-morrow before they are on their legs again — I am now quite her master, and shall show her.”

But she clung to him, with “Oh, me ‘fraid! me ‘fraid! Better not — listen to me — You know a lot, but a man no good against her, she so artful: only some other girl could match her ... why you not leave it to me? Maybe later on me think out some way; but me ‘fraid — You make Caray unconscious, too?”

Cobby sullenly answered: “Yes, I decided ... Macray’s behaviour has been so strange and reprehensible — he must make his way home without me, I without him — —”

“But still — Oh, God, me ‘fraaid — Spiciewegiehotiu do something — she not go with you — not far — she run away while you asleep, she come back, she send horses to where she left you, she drag you back, she dog-rabid when she angry — maybe she cut off your head: if she cut it off, me drop stiff dead” — she drooped, kneeling, to his palm, of which she made a cushion for her cheek.

“No fear of that, dear” — he raised her up— “we shall be well away before we sleep; and while I sleep, you will watch her.”

She started! “Me going, too?” in a hoarse throat-tone.

“Why, yes — Sueela — of course.”

She tossed her shut eyes about with “Oh, don’t tempt me! — you not want me!

“Yes, yes,” he said: “of course, you come. She will not be happy without you, nor — will I.”

At that “I” her arms were wrapped round him, and in a transport her mouth found his — for a moment only: in the next her face was buried in her elbow, and a sob brought forth: “Oh, what a wild beast! Me never meant to do that. But that the second of the three, no?”

“Very good,” he consented, “since you wish it so; and one more is left. Now we go — come.”

But she shrank. “No, me not go! me ‘fraid ... Oh, you not hurt her, no?”

“No, no — no pain: come.”

“No, me wait here: when you make her unconscious, come tell me.”

“Very good” — he moved to go, and Spiciewegiehotiu was off, private as the night-beast stealing, but fleet, leaping the bush with high wide strides, bounding, but soundless. Cobby did not see nor hear her at all; and when in the inner rock-hall he bent over her sleeping-place, there she lay breathing as in sleep.

But in the outer hall she had smelled an odour — of chloroform — which she had smelled months before (in her hut on the night of Cobby’s arrival), and knew to be narcotic, for Macray had foretold her of it: and now when she smelled it a foot from her nose, she felt no inclination to inhale it instead of the heavenly air; so, startling Cobby’s heart, sudden and straight she sprang, asking composedly enough: “What you want, Cobby?”

He, in a revulsion of emotion from his shock and astonishment, had her snatched to his heart, ravenously devouring her mouth, panting at her: “You I want.”

And passively she took it; but, as soon as she could, still on his bosom, lifted up her voice: “Come! kill this man!”

“No, they won’t come,” he breathlessly uttered— “all drugged. Now I am your king. Will you do now everything that I tell you? Do you love me, your cousin, your king?”

“Hate you! King? Slave! So you drug them all, no? This is the thanks I get for letting your hands free, no? And you seize my body, you dare to kiss me, without my consent? For this by itself me sentence you to ten days in ‘The Elephant.’”

“Oh, nonsense.” he said, holding her close: “in ten days you and I will be far enough from ‘The Elephant.’”

“Kiss me again,” she whispered witchingly: on which, fitting her to him, he kissed her continuously; but the instant he stopped, “For that,” she said, “me sentence you to twenty days in ‘The Elephant.’ Now do it again.”

“Oh, no more,” he panted, “my heart will break on that breast of yours — Spicie — Cousin — Soul — secret of G od revealed to me — essence of Heaven — Come — no time ——— Do you come, or do I drug you by force? I should like to smother up your mouth, and break you to my will.”

She disengaged herself from him, saying: “Me come.”

“Come, then, come” — and, she following, he walked busily out, with some wonderment in him, though occupied with other things, that she did or said nothing as to Sueela — through the outer room, where she kicked one of the blacks to see if that would rouse him, and then remarked dryly to Cobby: “You think me silly, no? You think me not foresee that you might do this?”

Cobby said nothing till they were at the cave-mouth, when he said: “Now to get the oxen together;” on which with one hand she seized his sleeve, and, putting with the other hand to her lips a small horn hung on her hip below her tunic, blew a tooting.

The moon had just mounted up, cumbered in a jubilee of clouds and colours, transmuting the mood of the night as mightily as that tooting transmuted the mood of the wood, which was suddenly arustle with troops rushing: for Spiciewegiehotiu had not gone out solitary from Eshowe, though she had gone on solitary from this spot, in order to safeguard her men from the disadvantages of an ambush; now they came pelting, a stream of tails and feathers, to make hasty prostrations at the Queen’s feet; and, lost in astonishment, Cobby pretty soon stood a prisoner at a signal of her finger....

In the same moments came Sueela rushing, speechless, staring terrors; but immediately felt better when the Queen said: "There you are.... Couldn't sleep, no? Went out into the air, no?"

"Eheh" — her eyes dwelling, dwelling, on the Queen's face.

And Spiciewegiehotiu remarked: "The moon up: we go on."

"Fall in!" an officer now called out, and the troop drew up in two ranks on the rock-ground between the grass and the grotto, by which time Cobby had been dragged to be tied to the cart, he calling to the Queen: "You shall kneel to me!"

She waved her hand at him, calling with banter: "Some other day!" then at once turned to tell the officer about the six drugged, bidding him kick them awake; and when he had tried in vain, she said to him: "They all traitors, except the white one: so leave ten of your men with food to arrest them when they wake. Now the horses and the oxen."

All on horses, except four with the oxen and with Cobby, they now set off, the Queen and Sueela on their Selim and Mustapha: but the farther they travelled, the deeper into her feet sank Sueela's heart for affright at the Queen's silence. If she said anything, Spiciewegeihotiu answered short, and when morning dawned upon them she understood that that was doomsday dawning.

As they were now only a few miles from the town, a rumour of them flew, people streamed to view them, and Cobby had to endure no lack of scowls and frowns, prophecies of ill-fortune, one old woman pulling his ear to say: "Now she cut you short, my man"; even one of his smith-friends gave ungracious glances at his misery and ignominy and haggard aspect, though the smith, Rambya, boldly grasped his hand.

From the great gate of Eshowe they led him away westward to “The Elephant,” followed by that glowering ogle of Sueela’s grief, upon whom, too, the sword of doom was about to drop: for when, some way up the great square, they were come to the point nearest to Mandaganya’s domicile, the Queen, languidly waving to the throng, said to Sueela: “Now go to your mother, Sueela. Later you hear from me. You not to send me any messages.”

Like lead fell Sueela’s head, her fingers stiffened, her lips gaped, her stare gazed into the depths of hell; and, saying not a word, she turned her horse’s head, to walk it as woefully slow away as after the dirges and hearse of Hope.

Thenceforth another than Sueela slept in a hut with a Queen who did not sleep, who, of all the bereaved and solitary, was the deepest bereaved and lost in solitude.

Three days later three ambassadors of Wo-Ngwanya, sent to M’Niami, stood before King Daisy in the kotla of his great-place amid a crowd of councillors; and Daisy said to them: “Now say your say: me listen.”

Upon which one lifted up his voice and said: “Spiciewegiehotiu say to Daisy She want to strengthen the friendship at present reigning between her and Daisy: so she proffer afresh the hand of the lady Sueela in marriage to Daisy.”

Now, the good Daisy had “had some,” as people say, in respect of marriage with Sueela, and was not taking any more without due circumspection and care in stepping.... His heart started at that message! This Sueela had cost him much in kine, and fears in the watches of the night! But for that snatching off of Spiciewegiehotiu by Prince Dzinikulu in the hour of her victory, there might now have been no more Daisy, hardly any more the name of M’Niami. So, having banqueted the ambassadors and given them gifts, he sent them back with thanks to the Queen, and with the message that in a week he would despatch an answer....

Daisy was at present inclined to elderliness, and a man likely to be speedily subordinated and sat upon by Sueela, if he had the misfortune to marry her — a rather weak, rather ridiculous negro, who regarded himself as specially the protégé of God, or ghosts, or something, and “me protected” he ever said with half a laugh, “something protect me!” If there was an epidemic, or an accident, and he escaped, he’d exclaim: “Me preserved! something preserve me” — a truth certainly, but the absurd person never observed that it was true, too, of many men, and deer, and pompions, and potted meats — a tall man, a little knock-kneed, with a straggling beard, a tooth which projected a little upon the lower lip, coloured eye-whites — not very pretty. But, though so protected, he was wary: and, instead of sending an embassy, himself journeyed to Eshowe, to converse with Spiciewegiehotiu.

There he was well fêted, and quickly convinced himself that Spiciewegiehotiu’s object this time was really bridals, and not war. “While you and Sueela live, we friends,” she said, clasping his hand: “When you or she die, me add M’Niami to Wo-Ngwanya.”

Then, with a retinue, he went to see Sueela at Mandaganya’s, and back in high spirits hastened to Spiciewegiehotiu, who said to him: “You like her, no?”

“Eheh — she good — she a heifer — oh yes. Sullen, still, yes; but she soon love me. Better take the three thousand for her.”

“No, only the two.... So, Daisy, you not ‘fraid she scratch out your eyes?”

“Poh, no: she not do that.... Me protected! Something protect me.”

“So she go to you; you get her, Daisy. But you always treat her well, no?” — her voice broke, she turned from him with lips that quivered and worked.

The same evening came the doctress-mother suppliant, and fondled the Queen’s hands, saying: “Sueela say Spare her.”

On which Spiciewegiehotiu flushed. “Me told her not to send me any messages.”

“No, she not send! me come myself,” the sybil said hastily: “but she say She not want to marry, she only want you in this world.”

Up sprang Spiciewegiehotiu, angry, to pace. “Spare her? Spare her? Me marry her to a King! She and you not proud?”

“Yes, me proud! me thank you! — my goodness. But she sick — she got so thin — she not want to go so far from you — she say She rather marry a slave where she could see your foot pass sometimes — oh, how could you turn her —— She done something very bad, no?”

Spiciewegiehotiu’s head hung down, her gaze on the ground, full of a lugubrious brooding, and she muttered: “No, she not done any bad; it’s me, it’s me: me have a bitter heart.”

“But you not bitter for nothing,” the sybil said: “me know very well she done something: me think you catch her with a man — no? Tell Mandaganya; tell Ma-Sueela.”

But the Queen, at present very fickle in temper, said fretfully: “Oh, me tell you no —— Go away! Me not want to see anybody.”

Hence when, after Mandaganya had gone, Macray sent in a pressing request to see the Queen, she said to the messenger: “Tell him no: ask what he want.”

Whereupon Macray sent in the second message: Why marry Sueela to Daisy? He himself was ready to marry her instead: was the Queen willing?

“Tell him yes,” answered Spiciewegiehotiu: “tell him bring the two thousand cattle for her into the kotla”: at which the messenger grinned, and Macray grumbled: “the bitch!”

The next afternoon Daisy departed for M’Niami, to make ready for the week of wedding-feast and ceremony; and four forenoons afterwards Spiciewegiehotiu, after her bath, left her bevy of attendants, and worked her way with furtiveness, eyeings and lurkings, to climb a mound covered with mimosa, whence to descry the road out of the town. There she waited until cavalry cantering appeared, within which was Sueela; and “let her go,” she glumly muttered; but when the dust of it was no more visible, suddenly her countenance convulsed, and but that she stuffed up her mouth with a towel and bit into it, bitterly she would doubtless have howled aloud....

Alle das Neigen Von Herzen zu Herzen, Ach! wie so eigen Schaffet das Schmerzen!

Thus, anyway, with wailing, went the excellent Sueela away, to be lain with by the likes of Daisy, though to sit on him....

XXIX. SEBINGWE

COBBY, MEANWHILE, THOLING the glooms of “The Elephant” in his old room, got during two weeks no news of the external world, but then heard from the Collector of Messages, firstly, that Sueela was wedded, and then heard, what to him was like a burn, that the five men-friends of Sueela whom she had tempted to venture to trek with her and him, who then had forsaken her and him to kneel and plead with the Queen to continue to live, were now about to be executed for treason. Treason they had no doubt committed: but still he was wrung with compunction for them. “My God!” he exclaimed in pain, “is the girl a guillotine? Is she without bowels of mercy?” and indirectly through the Sinder-ngabya (Guardian of the Sad), being unable to send direct, he sent a message to Spiciewegiehotiu, proffering himself, since he was the cause of the fault and fall of those five unfortunates, to die in their stead, or in the stead of any one of them.

Twelve days later he received the answer: “Spiciewegiehotiu say You die the day she want, not before, not after”; and the official added in a confidential manner: “You lie low — not worry her: she cross like a thicket of prickly-pears these days. They say she not sleep at night, she find no rest, because the lady Sueela gone; and now war coming — —”

“War? With whom? War? What for?”

“Me not know. Maybe no war; maybe war. Some say yes, some say no. War with Sebingwe — if it come.”

“Heavens! — another ... But tell me — is there no chance at all of these five unfortunates being spared?”

“No chance: to-morrow they die. But everybody grumbling because they die before you; everybody waiting — your turn next they say. You lie low — maybe you not die. Some have it to say maybe you take the Queen’s fancy! Ha, ha, they a jealous, suspicious lot; and their tongues! Waw!”

Their jealousy and suspicion and tongues were to be given an impulse! for on the thirty-first day of his imprisonment, a few days after the execution of the five, Cobby, to the surprise and offence of all, saw himself set free, and in the kotla was followed by a mob that goggled and nodded at him with no good-will.

His liberators, under instructions to conduct him straight to the Queen, failed in this, he flatly refusing, saying, “No I have to bathe”; but, this done, he went — to find Spiciewegiehotiu like “a bear with a sore head!” — or a lion. “You not tired of ‘The Elephant’?” she asked, spinning sharply upon him.

“Yes,” he answered, “and of you, and of Wo-Ngwanya.”

This held her arrested. “You tired of me?”

“Yes, and of all your ruthlessness and wars.”

“Oh, me not want any long logic! Me only want to know one thing of you: you done now trying to carry me off where me not want to go?”

“Quite done,” he answered: “never again — you have my undertaking. Now I go alone.”

At which her lip whitened with spite, her eyes spitting fire. “Bah!” she bitterly said, “you can’t” — glancing backward at him, pacing the hut— “me drag you back by your red hair.”

“Be quiet,” he answered with the authority of a pride quiet, yet impassioned to pomposity: “you are speaking to a priest and king of kings. If I tell you that I can go, you are not to say that I cannot. It was my reluctance to forsake Macray that has held me here, but I am no longer reluctant — to-day I hear that Macray is even seeking to instigate the people against me. So when I will I go, having a hundred and twenty winged horses to haul me by a path that no hawk knows, and the hounds of your scouts cannot pursue their spoor. Be quiet.”

This again gave her pause, she standing rather agape — since savage and semi-savage intellects more or less believe every marvel they hear.

“Where you have these hundred and twenty horses?” she wished to know.

“Horse-power: in some cans.”

But this defied credulity — horses with wings in cans, potted horses with wings. And yet — having a trust in his statements, having beheld his marvels at the banquet, she half-believed; a half-belief which had power to make her pale.

She faced him to ask: “And, if you could go, you would go?”

“Yes; duty; work to do; duty.”

“Without me?”

“Yes.”

“Go, then,” she muttered, turning from him; and then she span to scream at him “Go! Go!” and stamp at him.

“Dear love!”

“Go!” she screamed again, glaring at him.

“Don’t be angry with me,” he now gently said. “Why are you so cross? You don’t look well....”

This broke her down. “Oh!” she cried out, running to him, and, her forehead on his shoulder, wailed: “Me want Sueela! Me want her!”

He felt her bosom bob sobbingly without any sound coming, and “Heavens!” he exclaimed, “then, why have you married her to Daisy?”

Her eyes fixed him with a glance, then dropped, she not saying anything, till she made the remark, apparently irrelevant: “Maybe war coming; Sebingwe — —”

“Yes, another,” said Cobby dryly, “I know: Sebingwe this time. Why, why, can you not live —— ?”

She interrupted. “Now you see why me marry Sueela to Daisy: partly why” — again she fixed him a little with that silent eye, saying “partly.”

“No, I don’t see — —”

“But you know that Daisy and Sebingwe friends? and if Sueela married to Daisy she not let Daisy help Sebingwe against me. Maybe Sueela not love — me; but she love Wo-Ngwanya mad: so now Sebingwe never have help against Wo-Ngwanya.”

“I see! — you artful being. Policy, policy, all is policy with Spiciewegiehotiu! and for policy she will pluck out her own heart, and the hearts of those that love her. But why, after all, fight Sebingwe? Why not live —— ?”

“Cobby, me tell you” — her hand on his arm— “me not fight Sebingwe: if we fight, Sebingwe fight me. You believe me, no, Cobby? Sebingwe fight me. Ten days ago me send an embassy to Sebingwe to ask him how it was that so many Wa-Mashenya fight in Daisy’s army the last time Daisy fight me? and me ask Sebingwe if he willing to hand over to me as slaves those Wa-Mashenya that fight against me. No harm in that, Cobby, no? You see, no? that me not pick any quarrel with Sebingwe. Sebingwe send me an insulting answer: he say Noh! he not willing. So, Cobby, you see, no? that it is Sebingwe — —”

“Quite so,” said Cobby: “Sebingwe had no right to let his men fight against you....”

She danced two steps behind his back.

“So, Cobby, if Sebingwe fight me, you fight this time for me, no?”

“You may be sure! — on condition that I find your account of it true: for you deceived me in respect of the Daisy-quarrel, remember — deliberately. But, if your quarrel is just, those who insult you insult me, and those who fight you fight the lightning. When I said that I am going from you on my winged horses, I didn’t mean that I’d go if you are in any trouble or peril: in trouble I am with you till the day of death, your trouble being my trouble, since somehow your blood is my blood, and your life my life.”

Their eyes met, and in his and in hers the same tear burned and quivered, by the work and miracle of that quick Spirit that erewhile whispered, Let there be Life! and Life quickened and quivered, burned, bled, yearned, yelled....

“Cousin Cobby ...” she held out her hand, and he held it, felt it, possessed it, flesh and bone, appropriating it sacramentally in his breast, until she shivered, and drew it, her lids drooping, and moved from him.

“Still,” he said, “there is no need for any war, I hope: things can be adjusted. Think, dear, of the waste, not of blood only, but of wealth and effort. They say the M’Niami people are still impoverished, while you here — —”

“Oh, war good, me know,” she interrupted: “it make stronger men and cleverer girls: and, if that cost dear, it worth it. If only the men had no more than one wife, plenty of war would make us gods.”

His eyebrows lifted. “Indeed?” says he. “Tell me: what makes you think that?”

“Me reckon it up; me see, me know.... War make less men, and so permit a man to pick out a better mother for his young.”

Dumb-struck stood Cobby and agape; as he writes in his diary of it: “Here was ‘a new thing’ for me. For though Darwin and that school, like her, were sure that ‘war is good,’ Darwin thought that the good must come through fatherhood — never somehow thought of motherhood — forgot that there are mothers, too — and, in arguing that the good comes through fatherhood, refuted himself (since the bravest fall), saw anon that he refuted himself, and was perplexed, though still convinced that ‘war is good.’ So I stood dumb before her, thinking in myself, ‘Dear me, had I to come to Africa to hear this?’ But by her theory war must be accompanied by monogamy; otherwise, after the war, the remaining men simply take more wives, including the riff-raff. Does this explain the stationariness of savages, of Asia? Heaven knows! Some time I must give the matter some systematic study.”

But instead of attempting now to deal with theory he returned to the personal, saying to her: “So, then, you want war?”

“No, no, no,” she hastily answered: “Cobby me not want war! — you believe me, no? Sebingwe want war. War good, me say, but me not want war — now. And suppose me want war!” she boldly added, “Cobby, you not see why?”

“No, I don’t — —”

“Cobby, the people not like you. At first they like you, but you make them not like you. If you fight for them, and win, they like you. And even if they not like you then, war — and victory — crown me with the power to live up to my dreams, and snap my fingers in their faces. Now you see, no?”

“Yes, but at what a cost — to other people!” he cried out. “Suppose that war, as you say, is ‘good’ for the stock: then, the forces of Nature may be depended upon to bring about war, whoever doesn’t want it; but is it not the obvious duty of the individual, for his part, to put forth all his effort to avert so much woe and waste of work?”

“Eheh — of course,” she answered with the shadow of a smile, eyeing a match which she had lighted: for, supplied by the white men with matches, she kept a box on her, and, miserly-spendthrift, would anon strike one as a fire-work, to entertain herself.

Cobby then asked when her next message was to be sent to Sebingwe; to which she answered: “Today.... His men here waiting....”

“And will you send a mild message? Come to some compromise — —”

She smiled to herself, then on a sudden, dashing down the match-end, pettish, pouting: “Oh, Cobby, me sad, me mad, me cross, me want Sueela! If me not have Sueela, me fight everybody.”

“What can one do?” cried Cobby.

“Me low, me mean, yes,” she muttered as to herself: “me have no pride; but — she gone — me not see her any more.”

“Why not send — — ?” he began to say, when, a sound from outside coming to them, she started, breathing “What that?” then sharply ran to the door to hearken.

A noise of voices brawling afar was brought her on the breeze, in whose embroilment after a minute her ear seemed to hear insistently: “Send the white men away!” — and she became deadly pale.

Then, running toward the hut from the avenue gate, she saw a guardsman all wafted backward by a gale that was trouncing the forestry like a rout of frocks tossed in profligate carousal; and he at her whisper, “What’s happening?” answered: “Bayeté! the people call out to you send the white men away; they press against the sigodhlo gate; Sir Caray on his horse haranguing them.... He say Sir Cobby soon carry you off from them, if you not send him away ... and they angry.... Sir Caray say you want Sir Cobby for — yourself....”

“The scum!” with a coarse contempt her countenance scowled; red rage rushed to her brow; and round about she ranged almost at a run, like one evading something which chases. “The scum! Me show them white men — war for them! If you not bleed them, they not believe in you; if you not kick and cuff them, they not love you. War! War! The scum! Me drench Wo-Mashenya in blood — me show them advising — —”

“I think,” Cobby ventured to say, “that you might comfort yourself with some calm.”

“Oh, dung to you!” she intolerantly retorted, slapping her haunch at him: “you think me care what you have to say?” and down now she let herself flop upon the floor like a child in a tantrum, her heels beating a tattoo, her face a painting of vexation; but then sprang up to scream in a passion to the guardsman: “Have Sebingwe’s embassy summoned to me! Me show the scum blood!”

“If I may venture — —” Cobby stiffly began to say.

“You not hear me say me not want to hear?” her flying tongue shrilled, she spinning upon him. “How long you going to stay here? All day? My goodness, you can’t leave me when you once see me? You think me have nothing to think about but you?”

With an elegant dignity Cobby bowed, and, without a word, turned and went out.

“Go home!” she called after: “you not to go outside the sigodhlo.”

“I go where I please,” he answered, chin up.

But half-way to the park gate he paused at the thought that he ought to do something or other to stop her from sending a message to Sebingwe in her then temper; and he went back to say: “If you will promise not to send to Sebingwe until half-time before noon to-morrow morning, I will bring you Sueela by then.”

This arrested her. “You talking wild, no?... You not get half to M’Niami by then.”

“I will, and be back. Promise.”

She stood with suspended breath. This interested her — both the extraordinary voyage, and the object of it — interesting both her curiosity and her longing.

“How you ‘will’?... And you think me want to see her? — that snake? that strumpet?”

“You said that you wanted. She is not a snake nor a strumpet.”

“How you know? You know her well, no? No! Me not want! You and she enjoy the voyage together, no?”

“I don’t — understand you.... Then, I won’t go. But please don’t see Sebingwe’s embassy yet — —”

Now she yielded to yearning, and said averted: “Go, if you like.... Yes, go. Me see if you come back by half-time before noon. Me not see the embassy till then; but then me see it, and send it back.”

“Very good, you undertake — good-bye.” He went quickly away.

XXX. IN THE CANES

CALLINGS AND NOISES of the populace beyond the sigodhlo gate were still distinctly audible anon, as Cobby walked from the royal gate to prepare for his trip; and he had not long gone when Macray, gaining an entrance at the sigodhlo gate, presented himself at the royal gate to see the Queen.

Macray was at present in a very impatient, a very dangerous and devilish frame. He had said to himself: “I want to go, and I’m going — free America!” And that day, on hearing of Cobby’s release, he no longer allowed himself to doubt that Spiciewegiehotiu must be “gone on” Cobby, and had no intention of ever letting Cobby go — for he no longer feared that she would ever go; and since she meant to keep Cobby, she must mean to keep him, Macray, who was her natural ally against Cobby. Hence his oratory from horseback, explaining to the mob that Cobby must be sent away. He had, moreover, a dread that Cobby, who was also impatient to be away, might now go off alone in his aeroplane, and, Cobby once gone, Macray understood that the shears would be sharp to cut short, for he was sure that Spiciewegiehotiu knew him, and did not love, nor had forgotten that stew which the dog would not touch....

Her he hated much more than Cobby, who had dared to slap, to lay hands upon his body with chloroform; her death would cut the knot of all his difficulties; and he now contemplated bringing it about, together with Cobby’s and thousands, probably, of other deaths, and this in due course of business, with that recklessness of Peace or Rockefeller, without respect or prick of pity.

But when he presented himself at the royal gate, though conscious of danger, he little dreamt in how dreadful a peril a phrase of Cobby's, lately uttered, had put him: for Cobby had undertaken to Spiciewegiehotiu never more to attempt to carry her off; and since she had a trust in Cobby's promises, her use for Macray was now wholly over, she now being as ready and prompt to slay as he: so that, as between her and him, climax and crisis was here, and he was unlikely on the morrow to scatter oratory upon the Wa-Ngwanya.

Intending to arrest him that very day of oratory, and reckoning that he would draw revolver when arrested, she welcomed his request for an interview; for, since interviewers left their weapons at the gate, to grant the interview, and arrest within, might be to save a life, or lives.

So it was some minutes before he was admitted; then, putting down weapons, as usual, at the portals, he went in. But at his knee, within the bagging of his knickerbockers, he had a small revolver for self-defence, if necessary.

Having offered a stool she said: "Well, Sir Caray, what you want?"

"Look here, Great-great," says he, "I want to go home: can I go? or am I a prisoner?"

Her answer, she having "spotted" the object in his knickerbocker-knee, was: "Prisoner? You go when you like."

"You won't be dragging me back, if I start?"

"No, no: me not 'fraid of Sir Cobby any more. You go."

Now, standing up, she paced the room once, never turning her back to him, while his thought was: "Why not get her now?" But he feared the people; and had neater plans. As to her affable manner, that little convinced him.

When she sat anew, she moved her stool between him and the door: and he noted this.

“Well, I don’t believe you mean it,” he said— “I’m frank. But, come: let’s do a deal! I want something, and you want something. I want to go, and you want Cobby. Now, you can’t keep Cobby, for he has means to go that you can’t dream of, and he will go, for he’s told me so. So, if I tell you how to keep Cobby for ever, and if you swear by ‘The Elephant’ to let me go, that will be fair.”

Unexpected matter for her. She could not quite conceal her keenness. “Yes!” she said: “that fair.”

“Well, swear,” said he.

“Oh, no — you tell me first,” says she: “then me swear” — scratching a parrot’s neck.

“Very good — I’ll trust you. Well, this is what I say: to keep Cobby, you must destroy his waggon-loads. Now, breaking up is no good, for, while you were breaking up half, he’d be off with the other half; and there are a lot of little spirits in his things, little but strong, which you can’t break up. So only fire is any good.”

She was silent, but bright were her eyes. He understood that she would do it.

Often the thought of breaking up had occurred to her, but inertly in her lack of certain knowledge; also she had had it in mind to learn first what the different things were “good for.” She had not thought of firing them: and it was the thought of Cobby, on his return, finding all his “winged horses” burned, and himself her prisoner for life, that lit up her eyes with that fire of spite and triumph.

But for Macray the question now was when she would do it, he wishing to be out of Eshowe then, there being that in the waggons which, with a blaze under them, would blow, not only Spiciewegiehotiu and Cobby, but Eshowe itself to heaven.

“Now have I deserved your thanks?” he asked her.

“Maybe — —” she shrugged, she smiled.

“You mean to do it, then. But — when?”

That evening she meant to, Cobby’s intended departure for M’Niami fitting in with so neat and sweet a temptingness; but, by nature, reticent, she merely answered: “Some time, maybe, me do it.”

“But tell me definitely.”

She shot a glance. “Why?”

“I think I’d like to clear out of Eshowe just then,” — he chuckled—“Cobby will be so madly angry, and he’ll guess who told you to do it.”

As he said this, he saw one of the swaths of hangings round the room move somewhat; and as she, too, saw it, and saw that he saw, the situation between them became thenceforth extremely tense and keen.

“No fear,” she answered: “Sir Cobby just going away somewhere.... Tell me: how long it take him to go to M’Niami and come back?”

“M’Niami? Four days.” He had now unbuttoned his knickerbocker-knee, and placed the revolver on his knee under her eyes — to bid her forbear and beware, to bid her be certain that of those who bit the dust she would be the first; and “Cobby going to M’Niami?” says he: “what for? Oh, I see — to bring Sueela?”

Now they were sitting tight on the qui vive — eye, ear, each nerve alert — leaning a little toward each other, each knowing that life was the victor’s prize, she with her finger-joints at her cheek, thinking on him, her eyes alight, active as cats on prickles to spring. As to the object of Cobby’s voyage she did not answer, but said suddenly: “Forgive me — you take some snuff, no?” — and presented snuff.

This a little nonplussed him: at once he fathomed her motive for having it, but not for showing it — unless it was the same motive with which he showed the revolver, to warn him? And he was nonplussed because unsure, and because sure that it was well to be sure, in such a war the victory being to him who thinks the greatest number of true thoughts per second.

“Thank you, Great-great,” says he, taking the box, and barely pretending to inhale, for he thought of poison in it; at the same time he let the snuff slip his fingers to the floor, having no desire to have it flung at his eyes.

“Oh, bad man,” she pouted— “spill all the snuff. That bring bad luck for you.”

“Clumsy!” he said: “forgive me.”

“Me forgive you.... So Sir Cobby can’t go and come back by to-morrow?”

“No, how can he? — unless he uses some of the little spirits.... He going to-day? Then now’s your chance to fire the waggons, while he’s gone. Why not to-day?”

“Maybe” — she shrugged, she smiled: and then she went “Tishum!” and cried out “Oh! ha, ha.”

“Ha, ha,” he laughed, and sneezed.

“Ha, ha — we both have it!” she laughed.

“Yes, ha, ha — —” like chums they chuckled with each other.

“And now,” he next said — for form’s sake, not caring at all— “it is for you to swear that you’ll let me go.”

“Yes, that fair,” she answered, standing up: “me go get a talisman to swear on” — and made a movement toward the door.

But she was his hostage there, and safeguard, against those behind the hangings; and jumping up now, with a flush of authority, he called out: “Oh, no, you don’t: here you remain” — and so crossed the Rubicon.

In that same moment snuff was fire in his eyes — tossed from another box; and into his darkness, even as he darkly shot at her, there flashed now a knowledge of the reason why she had offered snuff — in order that, if any thought of snuff was in him, it might be utterly lulled, in order that he might spill the snuff, and think her foiled at that point at least, and feel comfortable as to snuff, and be utterly routed and bound up by the surprise of the blinding lightning of a second box kept ready under her kaross; and when after his second of dismay and disaster he darkly fired at where she had been standing, she was lying at his feet, and in some moments more was soundlessly out of the hut, and flying to hiding.

But he, conscious of the direction of the doorway, had one leg out of it almost as soon as she; but there was seized by five, two of whom fell wounded before he lost the revolver, and the others, at that awkward spot, failed to take him. He was away into the wood, they pursuing, shooting.

Ecstasy lent him legs, extremity gave him sight, blasphemy gave him luck: he clambered over the enclosure, untouched, unnoticed, jumped — not far from the gate — and at a run got his Winchester before the astonished gate-guards could take it upon themselves to stop him; he got beyond the sigodhlo gate, vaulted upon his horse, and was gone as the swallow swings, hatless, wind-swept, to the bewilderment of the mob still populous in the square. But before he was past the market, he was being pursued by riders, firing at him, and thence to the great-gate he galloped firing backward with his repeater, seeing three pitch headlong, himself uninjured; then, trampling through the great-gate guards, made off, laying men low, over the road eastward, and so won clear away.

Pitiable, now, however, was his plight — his bridges all burned behind him; no compass; little ammunition; no possibility of crossing Africa without, no possibility of going back to get, until Spiciewegiehotiu, firing the waggons, destroyed herself, no hope else of getting out of Wo-Ngwanya; no hope else of living in it. Still, he was game; he hoped, he chuckled.

Some way out of Eshowe he was aware of a shouting in the town — yet another white-man amazement being that day in store for the mob, when Cobby, throbbing on his motor-bicycle, passed rough and rapid, spattering puff-puff, trumpeting, dragon-goggled, a streak of unreason, all down the awna, and out.

Backing into bush, Macray watched him come carrying on the carrier a black who clung like the drowning about him, blanched to his tongue; and within that bush a Winchester was lifted to lay low: for though Macray's enmity against Cobby was not constant and intense, as against the Queen, as against Sueela, yet, having shot many, and being shot at, just to shoot had become habitual, and a bitter amusement: so he might then have shot at Cobby, but for his knowledge that Cobby was on the way to fetch Sueela, and that by letting Cobby fetch her, by waiting a day, he would be even with Sueela, might even manage to ravish ere he smashed, ere he left her red. This was snuff and fun to him that, if he died, there would be society, for, as to Spiciewegiehotiu, he was sure that she would fire the waggons, and dance fandango and devil-dance with Eshowe in the air. He cantered on further, then, taking his nag into canes, lay in the glimmering in there to ponder upon his misery, to plot and to curse and to lurk, and cock his ear for the throbbing of Cobby's return with the girl, and for the shock and earthquake of the event at Eshowe.

XXXI. NIGHT-RIDE

AFTER A ROUGH passage, in the course of which he cast hundreds of kraals and huts and lions into dumbness of affright at the sight of a flagrant dragon flying with muttering through the night, Cobby's cycle-lamp invaded the midnight dimness of the sigodhlo of Daisy's great-place; and "my goodness" was on Sueela's lips, seeing him, and "eheh, me come," sleep still winking on her lids.

"But your husband?" Cobby suggested.

"Oh, he ... Me go tell him."

Whereupon Daisy was but briefly consulted, for he within some weeks had been adequately sat upon, and was a bottom-dog; and before long they were off, she with shut lids in bliss on the carrier embracing Cobby's body, bliss combined with a bicycle-terror which would have been greater but that she had witnessed the grin of arrival and delight of the guide brought by Cobby, and now left behind.

Wild was that night of flight for Sueela, an experience of teeming mysteriousness, and drama of vast darkness, dismal with winds screaming, mixed with myriads of trees streaming in retreat, series of drear sceneries receding, to be remembered in dreams for ever. It was no fun, however: no moon mostly; only stars wind-whiffed like hall-lamps, noises of many waters, sometimes the sharp wash of a shower, which passed, the road not continuous, never smooth; thrice the bicycle had to be hauled through the brawling and rocks of broad shallow waters, and where patches of pathless shrub meant many a jolt; there were hills whose descent meant peril of a breaking of brakes, and hills up whose incline the bicycle, a paltry thing of four and a half horse power, barely crawled, till they walked beside it: so toward daybreak, harassed and hot, Cobby stopped in forest on the brink of a river to eat a meal, Sueela seated very near him, but separate, incapable of eating, and once he, en bon camarade, put an arm about her, which she very gently and slowly removed, remarking: “She trust me with you.”

“Not without reason,” he answered: “you are a dear good thing, and I have a sister whom I do not love more than you.”

“You love me, no?” she whispered, stroking his arm distantly with fingers intensely stretched: “that enough for me — me could do without food and bed, and yet my belly full, if you love me. And you think me not pay you back? Me toss all at your dear feet — you think me care? — me give you Wo-Ngwanya — my land! — me love its old stones, and how it smell on wet days — me give it — and my mother — my brothers — my friends — they all say ‘traitress!’ — they spit on my name — she spit — me not care — me do it for you and for her.”

A sob: and he said “dear,” but added: “Though I don’t understand: how will you give me Wo-Ngwanya? and why will they say ‘traitress’?”

“Wait till me know if she fight Sebingwe,” she replied: “then me tell you.”

“She will fight, I think,” Cobby said, “if we are not there in time before she sends back Sebingwe’s embassy, for she is at present in a most morose and dangerous mood, owing apparently to her fretting after you. So with you it rests, Sueela, and I depend upon you to stop anything in the way of war, since there is no need.”

She smiled at him as at a child, without reply; and he said: “Come then,” springing up.

Then for three hours more they tholed the roughness of the trip, and now in sunlight were running down a bit of road with canes on both sides some ten miles from Eshowe, when a report of rifle-shot sounded out of the (south) canes on their left. The hill being steep, the pace brisk, neither was hit, but a second shot pierced the flesh of Cobby's left arm, upon which he lost control of himself and the motor, which dashed up a bank to the right, and collapsed over driver and passenger — luckily in bush and canes, which concealed them from yet another bullet; and with instant nimbleness Sueela on her feet had Cobby by the hand, haling him into the thick of the canes.

There they squatted some time, all ear and leer, mouse-quiet but for the little movements of Sueela binding Cobby's wound; and, "Who can it be?" Cobby whispered, to which she whispered back: "Sh-h — Caray."

Now another report — from farther in the canes than they, the shooter having crossed the road; and now with a flush Cobby shot his revolver: upon which he and she moved softly off to lurk within some other home of the murky world of thicket.

Other shots followed. The canes being a sea in agitation billowing under the blasts of the winds, the swish of local agitations may have attracted the aim of the gunman, whose roaming and mysterious gun bred not merely terror but a sort of awe, as though a ghost was gunning; and immense, moreover, was Cobby's dismay at the time going, the loss of so many lives involved in the delay, the object of his voyage to Daisy's frustrated, for already he was late for his rendezvous with Spiciewegiehotiu at Eshowe, and still a prisoner there in the canes.

Meantime, to each shot which smashed through the leafage a shot of his answered sharply back in challenge, he quickly shifting his position after it; and so an hour and a half passed, he having now one cartridge only.

After a monotony of twenty minutes he whispered: "I can bear this no more: going: you stay, until I bring a force of men."

"Me come," she whispered.

"Why? I forbid."

He kissed her hand, looked at a little compass, stole off toward the road, and had nearly reached it, when not far to his left a sound arose — a neigh.

Down he crouched, mouse-still, waiting, and presently again the neigh came from the same place.

He saw that, since there was a horse, if he could capture it, mount it in the canes, and dash out and away on it, that might be well: and on hands and knees he crept that way, keenly peering.

Presently he became aware of the breath of a horse, then saw it eating at the canes, and then, near the horse, caught sight of a man lying blanched and unconscious, a rifle beside him.

When Cobby bent over him, he discovered that Macray had been struck in the left patella; and now his shouts for Sueela began to sound through the canes, till she came brushing through.

Her nose wrinkled with repulsion at Macray; and when, after lifting, they laid him down, her stretched fingers shrank from off him, as if to finger him was filthy.

Having got him out of the cane and upon the nag, Cobby with difficulty fixed him by means of part of the nag's rein, and, after making fast the remainder of it to the motor, moved slowly on, towing him. But half-way to Eshowe Macray came out of his faint, and in a sick voice sang out: "Hallo, baas; hallo, Black Sue; where you taking me to? I don't want to go to Eshowe" — but got no answer.

As they entered Eshowe near one o'clock they saw the awna all populous, and from all quarters swarmed a multitude to gloat over the motor, to greet Sueela, to gape at Macray, and to call out the news of war declared in the awna at noon by the Queen, who had accused Sebingwe of malignity, flung down the glove, and sent back the Wo-Mashenya embassy with gage of battle.

Wild with excitement were all eyes, and it was with pelting steps to go to the sigodhlo that Sueela left Cobby near the market, he with Macray now going westward to Macray's hut, where, while he waited for the turning up of his surgical-case, he said distantly to Macray: "What in God's name have I done to you that you should shoot at me? I hope you haven't got 'malevolence-of-the-insane.'"

"Baas," Macray said from his deck-chair, "you struck me, you know, you chloroformed me. No man may take such liberties with me. But it wasn't you I wanted to get, it was that strumpet."

And he said again when the leg was being made a septic: "Where's the good, inkoos? There's been a rumpus between that Flora Macray and me: she'll have me dead before sunset."

"She will do nothing of the kind," Cobby answered, "for I shouldn't suffer it."

"Oh, you aren't a bad old baas ... But don't think you can stop her; the bitch'll have her will, if she lives."

Cobby but half-chloroformed him, and then, eating melons for a meal, hung on at the hut: for since his trained hands had no special training in surgery, he was flurried and nervous there, and made himself nurse as well as surgeon.

In the midst of which ministries, in rushed one of Macray's men to tell that some men were coming with a stretcher to take Macray; and in some moments Cobby saw five giants coming up the bush-approach to the hut: on which he stepped out to confront them.

One of them mentioned that they came to take Sir Caray to “The Elephant”; whereupon Cobby: “Oh, but that’s out of the question. Surely you know that the man’s leg is fractured: ‘The Elephant’ may kill him. You will be good enough to wait, until I see the Queen and explain.”

The negroes glanced at one another and grinned. “We not come to wait,” one said.

Cobby now flushed in his hot way, saying: “Oh, but you are.”

“We not.”

“You are — You have to do as you are told.”

Now from out of the hut sounded: “Baas, it’s no good!”

Of which Cobby took no notice, but said in another tone to the men: “How can you be so inhuman? White men are framed with the same infirmities and require the same mercies as yourselves. I will see the Queen — —”

“Come, clear out, Sir Cobby,” one interrupted with some roughness, “you make us cross.”

On which another flush rushed up Cobby’s forehead, and now, drawing his revolver, he said: “Whoever first enters this hut will be shot.”

Again the negroes grinned with one another, and now laid down the stretcher, while one of them went running out of the grounds through a crowd that had come in from the near street to see the thing through.

Then ten minutes of suspense — babble, jocularities, from the mob, expostulations from Macray, from the men, who pointed out that they were but obeying orders: Cobby stood, revolver in hand; and when the one who had run out returned at a trot with a body of some thirty, Cobby with his revolver marked a mark on the path, beyond which to put a foot was to be shot.

This made deadlock. The negroes grinned; none wished to be shot; none thought of retreat. Then one ventured to protrude a toe over the mark — pretending negligence; and Cobby saw it, and knew that it was not done in negligence, and did not shoot — as Napoleon would have shot, as Cromwell; but Cobby was not Cromwell — higher type, less efficient anon as to the special little end, enormously more efficient, in a more complex cosmos, as to the general business of living in a cosmos — Cromwell, Napoleon, being hardly so much as conscious of a cosmos, imagining that God is a Baptist, a Girondin; but He is an electro-chemist.

And then at once the frogs hopped upon the log — they rushed him; and he, having one bullet, could well have shot somebody then, but — did not. He was pretty roughly dealt with; and the only result — to the eye — for the time — of his intervention was that he lost a revolver, which he never got again. Accompanied by him, Macray was taken away, a pitiable enough poor man, come upon misfortune, and pretty obviously on the road to ruin. He was put into a punt at the edge of “The Elephant” pool where, as they parted, the two shook hands.

XXXII. THE WAGGONS

MEANWHILE WITH PELTING steps Sueela sped to the Queen's, and with keen expectancy peeped into the hut — no open arms there, only the new favourite, who started up to tell that Spiciewegiehotiu was farther in the wood, where some waggons were, and ran to show the way with Sueela, whose forerunning heart and sprinting feet outstripped her.

The waggons were in a glade shut within jungle, with them the Queen and four men, who were making fuel-heaps under them: and there stood Sueela, eager, suspended, a gazelle that grinned, a grace awaiting her welcome, until the Queen turned her head a little to observe: "Oh, you come."

"My goodness...."

"What you come for?"

"Come for? You not send for me?"

"Me? No."

Sueela, averted, eyed alternately the earth and the sky, and within her neck the world ached.

"All right, my girl ... What me done to you, Spiciewegiehotiu?"

"To me? You not done anything ... So you just come? You get here quick. You liked the ride, no?"

"Yes, me and Sir Cobby come tearing on a carriage with only two wheels, and no horses! Sir Cobby say the horses inside."

"Eheh, me hear all about it. Sir Cobby know a lot: but he not know everything."

“Oh, Spiciewegiehotiu ... So this is what me dream of all night, this is what me fly to ... Me go ... Good health.”

“Where you go to?”

“Me go back to my Kingdom.”

“When me tell you to? or before?”

“Oh, me not belong to you now, my girl!”

“Who you belong to? To — Sir Cobby?”

Sueela eyed her with a weighing underlook. “Me belong to myself. Me a Queen like you. You think you can treat me cruel like this? No, me not love you any more.”

“You ever loved me?”

“Oh, no, never! Never ten times more than my own—” here her voice weakened, and Spiciewegiehotiu, still averted, turned her head at her to say: “Yes, cry: you think, if you cry, me cry, too.”

Whereupon Sueela laughed across a sob: “You crying, my girl!”

And Spiciewegiehotiu, with working nostrils, laughed also: “Oh, you silly thing!”

Upon which their hands, magnetized, found out each other, and Sueela drew her. And presently Spiciewegiehotiu: “Come — You hungry?”

“Eheh.”

“Come” — and off in a flutter they dashed chattering, Spiciewegiehotiu calling over her shoulder to the men to go on making the fuel-heaps under the waggons, which she had brought over from Cobby’s park the previous evening, intending to burn them then; but, on learning the wild tidings of Cobby’s bicycle flying down the kotla, had paused, reflecting that that bicycle might be the very means of Cobby’s threatened escape, and that, if she fired the waggons at once, then Cobby, on finding out, might, in his “mad anger,” predicted by Macray, at once fly off on the bicycle: so she had decided to wait a day, acquire the bicycle also, then fire all.

“But you going to burn his waggons?” Sueela with a start asked on the way to the hut.

“What’s that to you?” Spiciewegiehotiu answered, stopping.

“Nothing! — my goodness.” But inwardly appalled for Cobby, and knowing that pleading would be useless, she added with a quick use of wit: “But you found out what all the different things good for?”

“No, me not found out; me neglect it ... Let them go. Me not want a subject in Wo-Ngwanya more powerful than his sovereign.”

“Me see ... But, my goodness, you not wait and find out first, and then burn them? Maybe some of them good for the war.”

This touched Spiciewegiehotiu in a tender spot. “Maybe,” she muttered, “me will see.” They went on.

At the hut-door the new Queen’s pet was expelled, and within the hut the two spent the afternoon in communion as in the old day, alone but for an intrusion of the sybil and the executioner-brother, until Cobby arrived hot on his bicycle, straight from bidding farewell to Macray at the brink of “The Elephant” lake, he entering saying: “So after all my pains there is to be this war.”

“Well, whose fault?” asked Spiciewegiehotiu, looking up from the floor: “Sebingwe’s! You say so yourself!”

“Oh, very well, keep on! Some day you will be defeated, and taste that flavour.”

She snapped her fingers. “Oh, me never defeated! If me defeated the first and second day, me look to it, and win the third. Even if you not fight with me. But this time you fight.”

“Well, I am not pleased. I begged you — —”

“Why you not pleased? You say you come back at half-way to noon. Me wait till noon — you not come — —”

“I was retarded. I come with a bullet-wound in my arm — —”

“Me know. Caray never shoot at you any more.”

“No, he never will, I am sure,” he answered strongly, “whatever chance he may have, for there are other forces than constables and rifles and rods of iron; and I come to plead for that poor man. He is not in a fit state to be in ‘The Elephant’ — I supplicate you to let him out till, at all events, he is well.”

Smiling steadily up into his face, she answered: “Me will see.”

“Good. When?”

“Soon.”

“Why not now?”

“No: soon.”

“Very well: that is a promise.... Well, Sueela? Home again?”

“Eheh,” says Sueela contentedly — and then sighed.

“What that thing is you bring her on?” Spiciewegiehotiu now demanded.

“It is called a bicycle.... Just outside” — he having brought it into the grounds from being mobbed and pawed.

“You show it to me, no? and all those things in your waggons?”

“Very well, some day” — an answer made ten times before.

“No, now,” she said.

“Very well, now.”

On which she sprang up, saying: “Wait — me soon come back,” and, running out, put finger on lips to Sueela, and flew to the waggons to tell the men to remove the fuel quick from under them.

Meantime Cobby was saying to Sueela: “Well, here you are safe — what a ride last night! winds, and forests, and solitary rivers wandering along; and then that ordeal in those canes. Aren't you sleepy? I am now."

"No, me could do it again to-night and to-morrow night, and not sleep," she told him.

"You excellent thing! And you have done her good already, I think. Does she love you just as before?"

"Eheh." Then she sighed; and suddenly covered her eyes to say: "But she not love me long."

"Not? Why?"

"Because me give her to you."

He stood over her. "How, Sueela? Tell me."

"Me take her throne from her: then she go with you. She think that, if she beat Sebingwe, victory give her the power to marry you; but she wrong: me know the Wa-Ngwanya — they not like you — they not stand a white King — not for long. And she think if she marry you, her breasts satisfy you; but she wrong: me know you; you not want to stay; if she make you stay, you hate her. She think she can work out what she want, but me sure she can't — even if she beat Sebingwe. So she not beat Sebingwe: me make Sebingwe beat her."

Cobby stood pale — scared! then, looking on the ground, paced once the length of the room, anew assailed by temptation. But he had undertaken to be done with any more scheming to force the Queen away, and he chuckled uneasily, making the lame, and not too true, remark: "I am afraid I don't understand...."

Sueela's forehead was dropped quite down; there just reached him from her a moan of "Wo-Ngwanya! my land!" and she raised strained wild eyes to say to him: "Then you love me well, no? Me do a lot, a lot, for you."

"Oh, Sueela, be quiet," he cried, stamping about with that energetic action of his elbows: "I don't — I won't — understand you. Daisy has nothing to do — —”

“Sh-h-h, she come back. And about your waggons, — listen: look after your waggons — —”

This in just a whisper pitched to reach his ear, but he, astonished, cried out “Waggons!” and then saw Spiciewegiehotiu’s face in the doorway looking from one to the other of them.

Some moments of dumbness followed, deeply awkward for Sueela, who had promised to tell nothing of the fate overhanging the waggons, till Cobby came out with: “Well, now, come, I will show you my wonders” — and stepped out.

He had made some steps down the avenue when the Queen with a sheepish half-laugh remarked: “The waggons in here!”

“My waggons?” He was all astonishment. “Why in here?”

For safety — she explained, now looking him straight in the face: rumours of menaces made by the mob to burn the waggons had reached her ears: so, for safety —

Cobby was very perturbed. “Why should they burn my waggons? What groundless people! They would never burn anything else!” — a statement whose significance Spiciewegiehotiu did not grasp, nor properly hear it, being now preoccupied over the motor that leaned on a baobab near the hut; and “come, show me!” she said; but now he was cross and sub-anxious, and, the teacher’s impulse failing, he merely made them get on, and, sandwiched between hams, rode them exclamatory up and down the avenue, a happy man as to woman’s arms.

Dismounting in a flush, Spiciewegiehotiu asked: “So where you put it now?” and when he answered “with the waggons, I suppose,” she made a secret grimace of glee. However, she now no more designed to fire, but to hide, it. “It good! It good!” she cried: “there is only Cobby.”

Thence they went to the waggons, whence fuel and fuel-heapers had now vanished; and Cobby languidly told what this or that was, but, in general, without effect on their intelligence, the objects having been invented by a different type, on a different plane, of Mind, and to attempt to explain them was as though a seraph ranted of astral mathematics to a man, and lalled. “What this is?” Spiciewegiehotiu kept on asking, but without gathering much fruit. When she pointed to an accumulator, Cobby could not begin to think how to tell of it: he himself could but little understand that manifestation.

Discontent that the waggons were there, his arm smarting, wearied out and sleepy, he was cross and short; conscious that he was wasting breath. “That in the cans is named petrol — these are named bombs — on this thing one can fly” — words falling like hail upon tin. But there was one thing which the Queen’s instinct and interest fixed on quick and keen — the machine-gun: just the word “gun” woke her alertness; and though he hesitated to explain or exhibit its action, as sudden darkness had now come, and she could hardly any longer see the business of his fingers, he shot the gun, to astonish her with those gushes of passion with which it spat and published its bullets.

At which Spiciewegiehotiu’s eyes also spat fire; she understood that it was “good”; and she decided then not to fire the waggons until the war was all ended, dreading that, if she fired at once, after taking out the gun, Cobby in his anger might refuse to use for her this victorious tool: she being sensitive as to offending him just then.

So there the waggons remained during nearly two weeks, doomed, but respited; and, meantime, during five days of storm-winds and wet-weather, all in the air was war, war: again the same fever and fierceness against Sebingwe as erewhile against Daisy; once more everywhere, every moment, that dumb music of the boom and rumble of drums that stubbornly bumped and bumped, movements of troops, a mood of revolution, of holiday, and hell-broken-loose, mock-battles, kerries, cracked bones in the kotla, blasphemous dancings before God, sex gone dog-mad, goggling, haggard, howling, while the nurseling's mouth turned down with rueing to cry, and the rueing eye of the old threw a look at the sky.

As to Cobby, he was once more drilling the rifle-companies, he being now the most miserable of men, fixed in the bitterest dilemma, knowing somewhere within him that he did not mean to lead the riflemen into fight, that this time again he was going to fail the Queen, and, failing her, must die of shame and meanness. Of Sueela he had seen little more, no more for any discussion, she having hurried back to M'Niami on the third day of her visit; and two afternoons afterwards Spiciewegiehotiu in a small squad of horse left Eshowe north-westward for the war, one of her last acts on departing being to dig up that goblet of poisoned entrée, which like foie gras of Provence she had buried, and to send it to "The Elephant."

XXXIII. THE BANKNOTES

LIKE A MAN in a bath far too hot for man was Cobby now; and his bosom was a moan. He had said that Sebingwe was in the wrong; had promised to fight Sebingwe; whereupon had come upon him Sueela with her scheme to defeat and dethrone the Queen, and, in the rush of the temptation of it, he, instead of stamping promptly upon it, had said "I don't understand" — though it was easy to understand; and before he could recover himself, Spicewegiehotiu had come back upon them.

The next noon he had hung about the back of the royal park, at a spot once given him as a rendezvous by Sueela — hoping to see Sueela, to forbid her scheme; but, as she had not appeared, he had sent to invite her to his hut, to which she had gone — accompanied by Spicewegiehotiu; and the next day had departed for M'Niami.

That she meant Daisy's impis to fight on Sebingwe's side was pretty evident, she relying upon Cobby not to fight against the troops which she sent into battle for his good — and, in fact, Cobby saw that, under the circumstances, for him to slay one of those men would certainly be murder. Hence the torment of the horns that tossed him — Sueela relying upon him not to fight as confidently as the Queen upon him to fight. Even after he knew of Sueela's scheme, after Sueela's departure for M'Niami, when the Queen had wished to be assured that he would use the machine-gun, he could discover nothing to say but "I suppose so."

She, noting the groan and agony in his manner, had pondered gravely upon him, vaguely troubled; for, a little before this, the doctress, with a forehead all crosses, and a bosom all forebodings, had been closeted with her, imploring her to postpone the war.

Cobby also had implored; had even said: “Suppose Daisy joins Sebingwe?”

But at this she had smiled. “That’s nonsense. What me have Sueela in M’Niami for? If one M’Niami man fight against Wo-Ngwanya, Sueela have off his head.”

Cobby had groaned; had said: “Still, Sebingwe and Daisy are natural allies, since you have made them equally nervous of your aims” — but he could see that, unless he revealed to her Sueela’s scheme “against” her (as she would say), revealed Sueela’s secret committed to him, no reason would cause her to pause — if pause was still possible, for rumours of forward movements of enemy bodies were already abroad. “And to be a party to her disaster!” he writes at this time, “for, unless I use the guns, there is no possibility of her contending against the impis of Sebingwe and Daisy together. And for me to bring her to grief and ignominy, to see her brilliant spirit broken, her glory gone, her throne torn from her, and then to say to her, ‘it is for your good, now come with me’ — lies and nonsense. Why is it for her good? Lies and nonsense! Our civilization is no doubt fated to attain to mountain-tops and sing a hymn, but undoubtedly at the moment it is a sufficiently repulsive bundle of rubbish, blood, and pus, with its lubber ‘nobles,’ its ‘lords’ and commons, the lords commoner than the commons, and the commons so common, with its little ‘lord-bishops,’ all starch and lawn-sleeves, whited to hide the tatters and lice beneath, bribed to bleat to the rabble their feeble blasphemies of Matabeleland — for not much money! offensive little men: she is quite right, I think, to like and respect a Mo-Ngwanya more than Macray; and it is because I want her — it is for my good — that like Iscariot I am betraying her to rack and cross, not for ‘her good.’ What shall I do? What, in God’s name, can a poor man do? If I had only known when Sueela was leaving, I might have ridden after, taken her apart from her escort, and bidden her give up the idea; but, being at the gun-practice, I only knew hours after; and to follow her on the motor would have been equivalent to ‘giving her away’ to the Queen; so I decided to send my Sansiwana, and at nine last night he started on my Ali for M’Niami with the message ‘Do not, I beg’ — a step of which the Queen is quite sure to hear; and done too late, I know. To-morrow she is off for the war, taking my soul with her; when I am to follow has not been told me; nor, so far, anything done as to Macray — I now doubt whether she intends to free him, ever, although I have again to-day begged, and again been given hope. Her abominable obduracy sets my blood boiling, and, if she falls, it is just that they that use the sword shall perish by the sword. She has mocked my admonishments and gone her way: well, let her: but, God, let me not once see those eyes weep, for I die.... Yes, I will fight Sebingwe: that is my decision now; but I will not — cannot — let a shot be aimed by my order at a man of Daisy’s....”

The following afternoon Spiciewegiehotiu left Eshowe, and shortly afterwards Cobby got marching-orders — unexpected, there being still several regiments bivouacked in the awna; but he was probably sent quickly away because Spiciewegiehotiu did not wish him to know then of the doom prepared by her for Macray.

Cobby passed beyond “The Elephant” that midnight, and camped in moonlight within sight of its western cliffs; but the following morning when all was ready for marching, he did not march — sat on a stone alone, smoking the forenoon away, though he never smoked till late in the day; saw two bodies of troops move past, and still sat moody, though under orders to be at a particular spot before sunset.

Another meal was eaten there; it was near noon before he moved; and he had not marched two leagues farther when a big man beating a pigmy mule was seen galloping in the rear to catch up the troop. He brought for Cobby a message from the “Guardian of the Sad” (Sinder-ngabya): Sir Caray was dying; wanted to see Sir Cobby. The Guardian of the Sad knew that Sir Cobby could not go, but, in compassion, had promised to send the message.

As when water is forced uphill, then with lavish wash at the first chance and turn hurtles into descent, so Cobby turned back at that call, this being escape and hiding-place for him, if but for a time. He announced that he was bound to go, would be back, put a lieutenant in command, sending a message to Spiciewegiehotiu as to why, and with a guide galloped off.

Before sunset he was in a room of “The Elephant” with Macray, who hailed him with, “Well, baas, here we are,” and did not look a dying man in the shine of two torches there, though shortly afterwards he was taken with a spasm (tonic), when in the passion of death he arrantly railed like an arch, until tonic merged into clonic, he then jerking himself like earthquake, with a working of the feet that beat together at the great-toes, trembling like trembling-bells.

This happened from time to time: but in the intervals he was lucid, garrulous, nay, gay, or mock-gay, anon, so that Cobby could not but recognize the gameness and invulnerable toughness wherewith this fellow confronted the gray and gulf of death, though already in his gullet, ever and again, a hiccup clicked, tinkling, piteous....

Cobby fancied that what he saw was tetanus, but Macray said: “The knee has nothing — hic! — to do with it! Knee was getting well; but this noon a new food — a stew — was given me — nice, too; and ten minutes afterwards I knew she’d poisoned me.”

“Shame, oh, shame, she promised ...” mourned from Cobby.

“It’s only fair,” Macray said: “woe to the conquered it is; I wasn’t smart enough. Whereas strength is what God honours in a lion, what He honours in a man is wit — cares nothing for the man’s piety, but applauds his wit — —”

“You know nothing of the matter,” Cobby replied: “the pious receive from Him joys which you do not conceive, hearing a voice sweeter than choirs of sirens.”

“Well, that may be so: joys to the pious, but to the witty He gives life, and if your pious lad isn’t smart enough, or slips where taxis are passing, He’ll cut him short off — not a theory, that — matter of fact. Hence I’m here, because she’s smarter than I, as I freely admit now. I’ve pumped the warder, and I think I’ve been poisoned with some of that very stew that I poisoned for the lot of you — —”

“That — you — poisoned?”

“Who else, baas?”

On which Cobby’s paleness rushed to red, he, in a voice tremulous with emotion, uttering: “Oh, you abominable villain, Douglas Macray!”

“Now, hark at this,” Macray muttered: “you might keep your hair on, inkoos. You and I aren’t so very unequal: you have a trained brain — hic! — and I haven’t; but, to make up, mine was born the stronger, I think. Why the horror? My uncle, James Macray, by some trick on slave-labour, which the so-called ‘laws’ create by recognizing the claim of some individuals to ‘own’ the earth’s crust, contrived to acquire seven million pounds’ worth of the limited wealth of a nation, to which fact was due the deaths of hundreds, or thousands, of men, women, and children: that’s a fact; if a man said to me, ‘I didn’t know that,’ I’d tell him, ‘Then, you’re out of it, old chap — born that way.’ You, anyway, know it, baas: yet you don’t look too wildly horrified at that slaughter of whites by the uncle in a white waistcoat, but are horrified because, in order to enjoy the seven millions, the nephew in a belt attempts, and fails, to kill just seven niggers, one white-nigger bitch, and, God forgive me, one good baas. Well, that's cant, of course: that's not scientist eyes, inkoos. So, if you — —"

"You the nephew of James Macray?" Cobby broke in, all lost in astonishment.

"Never even suspected.... Simple Simon, the scientist. We are cousins, baas: I have you here to give you the seven millions. Don't you remember how you used to ask me where the deuce you'd seen my face? You'd never seen it, I think, but had no doubt seen a photograph in some magazine — only with a beard. That Master R. K. Rolls spotted me at once that evening I tossed away those false teeth; and your belief in my story that a lion ate Rolls has made the ghost of that gentleman feel deeply aggrieved. No lion dined on that great hunter before the devil, but I dined. He attacked me on the way to Eshowe; and we were tied together on a ledge over a precipice, when I, jumping to a lower ledge, pulled him, cut the cord, and the immortal element of him vaulted straight to hell — didn't stop at the bottom — his body stopped — but his soul kept straight on down. Oh, Christ, another gripe coming ...!"

By this time, after each seizure and paroxysm, the dying man was being appreciably weakened, racked nearer to defeat; but it was not till the sun was glorious the next day outside that home of gloom, that his vigorous frame gave in to the antagonist in the last grim round of that ring and wrangle, and the agony lapsed into placidity. And all that time Cobby bided at his side. He told Cobby during the night that if "the bitch" (Spiciewegiehotiu) had followed Cobby to Europe, she would have found herself poor, since he, before he left Europe, had resolved that she should never enjoy the fortune, whatever "the law" ordered; so he had realized all that he could of it, nearly the whole, in notes of the Bank of England, Dresdener Bank, Bank of France, mostly £1,000 English notes, all which he had brought with him in a common cardboard box, and had lately buried hardly half a yard deep on the east side of the well beside his hut, together with the photograph stolen by him from the Queen.

“And you shouldn’t have it, baas,” he said to Cobby, “if I wasn’t sure that you’ll never get that bitch to go with you. If the dead can bring evil upon the living — hic! — I’ll bring it upon her: hateful cat, I never hated as I hate that cat. And tell Black Sue, too, to look out: if I can drag the harlot after me, I will, and we’ll have it hot down there. And you, too — you struck me — damn you for that, man; but then you stuck to me — elevated to disdain and aid the hand that aimed at your heart. When you defended me from being brought here, I thought ‘I’d like to be cultured and innocent like him.’ Now you are a king — rightful — not like me. This is the one kingly thing I ever did, to make you a king. Life! rum thing. I think if I had it to live again, I’d pan it out different. Science — you are right: that’s the thing: I’d train my brain to see God, and be blind to Maxim’s.... God, it’s coming — the deepness of this disease in me — you wouldn’t believe, all’s wrong in me — oh, won’t you give me the revolver? Cobby give — I give you millions, I buy it, that’s fair — you prig, you English thing, in spite of science — Ach, now I got it — by the frantic cross of — Help! hell!...”

It was noon before Cobby stepped out of “The Elephant” pool, and, instead of then at once hastening to overtake his companies, he, still skulking in this hiding-place from perplexity, decided to go to Macray’s hut, where he dug up the box of notes, only to bury it again; then at last with his guide galloped off for the fighting, knowing of a wild rumour then raging like fire through Eshowe that Daisy had invaded Wo-Ngwanya.

XXXIV. CALAMITY

THE ACTUAL POSSESSION of “a kingdom” — or empire, say — had an effect upon Cobby’s psychology. This wealth, Spiciewegiehotiu’s by “law,” had, on being so buried, been lost to her as much as if sunk in a ship, a misfortune which, once accomplished, no “law,” nor law-officers, can alter. Cobby had recovered it through being what he was: now it was his: and he proceeded to dream dreams. Now he could found and endow in England, now flout the lousy little scowlers at schools and foes of wisdom — was a king with king’s counsel as before, but now with six kings’ power. This subtly affected him — increased, for one thing, his greed to be gone for England, and to be gone not alone, but with another: for the lucky feel aggrieved if they still need something, and are not completely lucky, as Macray had attempted to kill several “niggers,” since he lacked cigars: so now with Cobby. The wings of his new power were an irritant and nuisance to him in that, having them, he was denied the right instantly to fly with them; it was a cross to him that his aeroplane could not take a passenger, so that like a shah of the air he might be off at once with Spiciewegiehotiu: for his seventh million erected him to a Sabbath serenity of establishment and majesty, and the fact that not she, but he, was the millionaire made a chemical change in his relation to her (though he would have denied), promoted him to a new dominance and authority, hardened his heart (though he would have denied): and whereas he had decided to fight for her against Sebingwe, though not against Daisy, he now decided to fight against no one. "Her own fault," he said: "if she must fall, she must: then to comfort her."

He made no great haste to "the front": after galloping some way through a gale, went slow....

That morning of storm the Wo-Ngwanya army, after crossing the frontier northward into Wo-Mashenya territory, had come into touch with the enemy; then had smartly marched back for Wo-Ngwanya: upon which Sebingwe, a lean colossus, with a renown for feats of prowess and conduct in war, had hotly followed.

There is a valley a mile wide, quite flat, lying within hills white atop with dolomite — hills east, west and south — and on it two woods within which are villages, round these being fields of millet, dark-green maize, groundnuts; and, flowing northward close under the west hills, the river Perihompya, a home of hippos: in which valley, called Spicieweija, or White Valley, Sebingwe caught up Spiciewegiehotiu, and a battle was fought.

Spiciewegiehotiu having there spent the previous day, her reason for advancing and then retreating, drawing Sebingwe after her, was that the battle-field might be one which she had chosen; moreover, since, to her astonishment and dismay, the rifles had not arrived, she desired to delay the engagement, and, awaiting their arrival, only engaged the foe when forced to.

The battle began about noon, Sebingwe, with his son, anon watching it from an ant-heap at the valley's centre, and anon himself speeding like the storm with an umkonto, or broad spear (for stabbing), on a frantic little horse which, with prancings and kickings like a rocking-horse, snatched him off into the throng of things; while Spiciewegiehotiu sat at the doorway of a hut built on piles in some timber nigh the southern hills, her feet planted on the back of her Selim, she munching nuts with her molars, anon calling something to a knot of men who stood close below her, anon using her field-glass, ever engaged in trying to keep her thighs modestly covered, for the storm wafted all below, as above its blasts wafted streams of green pigeons gadding, streams of black geese voyaging, from which far aloft noised down callings, voices as of laughter and roistering at the vastness of their hilarity, at the excess of their heaven, the milk of the Kingdom of their elysium; and down anon washed a shower, sharp and short, adding to freshness and strangeness of wind freshness and strangeness of water, during which the two war-hosts fought on in a home of “holy haze” of Homer, which the gaze failed to investigate.

Spiciewegiehotiu wantonly munched nuts with her molars, constantly covered her legs with her reluctant kaross, which, pegged to one leg, got fluttering free from the other in a frolic of mockery, she recovering a knee, it recovering freedom to stream and strum; and she sent messages to a group a few hundred yards nearer the struggling hosts; and she laughed a little with the winds, and with her staff of officers; for, accustomed since the age of twelve to watch and estimate battles, she was in her element, had a certain joy in battle, like a person employed with confident competence on work which in early boyhood was his choice and hobby; and, though annoyed, disappointed, perplexed, at the non-arrival of the rifles, she expected them, every few minutes throwing her eye to see the rifles come through a declivity of the southern hills to her right.

Sebingwe, for his part, had some rifles, and was firing them: so, though the Wa-Ngwanya were in rather greater number, for some time the struggle remained indecisive, until Spiciewegiehotiu gave an order in the midst of a storm of rain, whereupon a fleet of tree-trunks, cut down the previous day, rushed down the river, taking a regiment. To her the mind, or morale, of fighters was always a matter of high importance, she having no small confidence in the effect of astonishment and shock upon the mentality of men locked in conflict: nor in this case was she mistaken. The river having high sides, calcarious tufa on clay shale, with mimosa bush at its edges, the regiment floated a long way down before it was noted, and its advent upon the flank of the conflict produced, if not a rout, a profound result. When the rain-storm wandered off elsewhither, Spiciewegiehotiu, gazing through her glass at the struggle, muttered to herself: "Sebingwe done."

This, however, was not what she wanted — wanted the war to be won by the rifles and machine-gun: and now occurred in her a tug-of-war between two alternatives — to win at once — or to wait for the rifles, and have all as she had planned it. Estimating close and careful, her judgment held the scales; and on the jump of this pull of judgment hung her doom. At this time no sign of any danger from Daisy had arisen on her horizon — no tinge of suspicion of such a thing — or there would have been no indecision: she would pretty surely have whipped Sebingwe at once, and then Daisy, in detail. Still, she decided rightly: to fight out the fight now; but then in a minute went white at a fresh decision, dropped in an impulse upon her horse, and dashed off herself to the general staff, to order a retreat to be beaten.

It seemed to all that some fly had stung her! When all along the battle-front the Wo-Ngwanya drums began to thump retirement, everyone was surprised, none more than Sebingwe, who, already in retreat, readily enough permitted the retreat of his enemy, and quickly became pigmy northward.

Then two hours passed. The "doctors" were over the wounded, rank-and-file were setting up a stockade, the Queen with her staff was seated at a meal of goat on the ground under her hut, the sun at three o'clock flying white to treat with mobs of oncoming storm-cloud, when a horse bathed in sweat came tearing through the southern hills.

The rider brought the tidings that the army of M’Niami was marching upon Eshowe....

“You mad, no, man?” Spiciewegiehotiu asked him; and tasted no more food that day.

And she asked: “You see the rifles coming?”

To which he answered that the rifles were not far beyond the hills.

She stood up then to move slowly away into the wood in a world that had turned turtle, dizzied, incapable of belief, of disbelief, of any realization. Her lips breathed “Sueela” ...

She ran back presently to give an order as to two regiments left in Eshowe, to bid them rush to her, then again walked out to be alone.

XXXV. CRASH

NOW SHE SAW the rifles arrive, but could not descry Cobby; saw a rifleman making enquiries as to her whereabouts, and then racing toward her. She ran, calling to him: “Me here!” and before he could speak asked: “Where Sir Cobby is?”

“Sir Cobby not with us, Bayeté,” he said: “the Guardian of the Sad send to tell Sir Cobby Sir Caray dying — —”

Her eyes closed in pain.

“Then Sir Cobby go back. He say he come on later ... You hear, Bayeté, about Daisy?”

“Yes. Have you with you a kind of stand-up gun from Sir Cobby’s waggons?”

“No, Bayeté, nothing: only rifles.”

“Sir Cobby have with him that kind of gun?”

“No, Bayeté, nothing: only his rifle.”

“Oh, but you sure?” she asked with appeal.

“Bayeté, me sure!”

Silence; her gaze on the ground; then suddenly: “Why you so late?”

He answered: “Yesterday from morning to noon we not march; we stand still. Everybody wait: Sir Cobby not give any order.”

“Why he not give any order?”

“Bayeté, me not know!”

“What Sir Cobby doing all that time?”

“He sit alone on a stone and smoke.”

A rush of blood flushed her brow; she screamed at him: “Go way!”

Presently she let herself drop down within an old matura tree-trunk, where she sat paralyzed a long time, while messengers of Job on blown horses washed in foam, messenger after messenger, came upon her, to declare how Daisy was there or was there, was firing kraal after kraal with frantic licence, was driving the affrighted tribesmen into wildness of flight before his unbridled hordes, was twenty miles from Eshowe — not Daisy himself, it appeared, who was said to be sick, but his Queen Sueela, a Wo-Ngwanya damsel! who was in supreme command; and three Wo-Ngwanya headmen had thrown-in their lot with her, taking oath to make her sovereign of Wo-Ngwanya: so, they said, reported the droves of fugitives flocking to refuge in Eshowe....

Spiciewegiehotiu in a steady way for a long while kept on striking the tree-trunk within which she hid with the tip of one of the horns of her horned forehead, her eyeballs all distraught like the orb of the bison’s eye, like the bull’s, that, horning for fun and butting’s sake, broods with his orbs distraught; and afterwards she struck matches, match after match prodigally, watching them glow, or puffed by the gusts, nothing left in her but mechanism and mechanical action; but when only two matches were left she put back the box at her waist, and — leapt up to act.

The question with her now was: Did Sebingwe know? Daisy might be acting either alone, or in league with Sebingwe: if alone, if Sebingwe did not know, she might patch up a peace with Sebingwe, be off to smash Daisy, then be back like tempest upon Sebingwe.

At eight in the night an envoy of five left her for Sebingwe. She desired, she said, no more fighting, was tired of fighting, as Sebingwe could see for himself from the withdrawal that morning of her warriors in the thick of their victory: so for a nominal indemnity of five hundred, if Sebingwe desired, she was ready to be friends.

At midnight came the embassy back. Sebingwe had singed off the head-ring of one of its members, and had sent the message: He was willing to treat; but let the Queen come to him herself; and she must make every step of the way on her knees.

At which Spiciewegiehotiu flinched with a twist of the shoulders in protest, as from a blow; but some moments afterwards an arc-lamp, both hot and bright, arose in her eyes, a blighting pride; and “Ah!” she muttered, “it was Death made him say that, and he not know it: to-day he done seeing the sun go down.”

Her will now was to crush Wo-Mashenya quickly with the first blinks of the sun, then swiftly to turn about and burst in wrath upon M’Niami, wresting success out of the very mouth of calamity by mere dazzlement of nimbleness and incredibility of briskness. That night she did not sleep; neither, though her fighters slept well, did the fighters of Sebingwe sleep, she launching upon them no less than five separate surprise-attacks by small bodies, to keep them touchy and jumpy, and cause them to be seedy in the morning.

And before morning broke she had before her under her hut forty line-regiment giants and forty riflemen, whom she informed of the message which Sebingwe had sent her; and she said: “Me wonder which of you is to avenge me? — which one it is who is to kill Sebingwe? Me will love that fellow.”

But no battle began at sunrise, as she had planned: for Sebingwe, knowing that Daisy was pelting to his aid, fled to await him, and it was afternoon before the Wa-Ngwanya, hotly following northward, forced him to a conflict.

But by then he was behind a stockade previously built by him on the north brink of the Pirihompya, which, in that region, flows eastward: and in fording the stream, and in forcing the screen, hosts of the Queen's heroes reeled, as in the season when trees waste their leaves, fleets of the slain sailing away to sea with the waves. Nothing, though, could check the Wa-Ngwanya; this fight was for wife and child; they saw Spiciewegiehotiu horsed in the throng of it all, in peril, anon pointing a revolver to protect herself; and they fought as the tide rises, and as the reaper strides, the rifles reaping a rood of life, and the spears no pruning-hooks, but scythes.

Hell howling deluged and rushed the stockade, and thenceforth it was a case of crush, hand-to-hand battle, eyeball-to-eyeball stabbing, and backward stepping for Sebingwe, who himself quickly ceased to witness it when a steadfast wedge of twenty, having forged a way toward him through floods of blood, and having bulleted him dead through the breast, got at him like dogs, and angrily gashed his body to strawberry-hash: off then gadded his head through the throng for a flag, aloft on an assegai. When his son, Nasandhlwana, took the command, the Wa-Mashenya were already in pretty steep retreat, and from his horseback Cobby, who had but now arrived, saw with his heart in his mouth through darkling twilight and driving squall the sight of the Queen, horse and all, being swept forward, as it seemed, by the momentum of the sweep of her teeming men.

He was on the point of pelting that way, when he caught the noise of a spattering tramp of cavalry on sloppy soil, sounding louder and louder from the south, then a howling of a multitude of mouths, and now was aware of the legs of galloping nags making a palisade that came far-spread across the breadth of the plain, so that he and his guide had to gallop aside, flying from being rushed by this eruption of eyeballs, on all these horsemen's heads being a helmet of hide having a horn of the ibex at the front, and the roughness of their bawling, and the assault of their irruption, helped these horns to make them horsemen of hell; and on a tall horse in a group galloping at the back of the troop was a woman, whom Cobby, though he could not see, assumed to be Sueela on her Mustapha.

Ten minutes later they might have come too late: as it was, like the shock and rumpus of the archangel's trump came that irruption upon their enemy. Notwithstanding that they were but a van, that they were under two thousand in number, just the jump and wonderment of their coming won. Rot followed; and now rout: for at once the ranks of Nasandhlwana rallied; and, distracted, the Wa-Ngwanya scattered and ran.

The Queen being near a path, and divining with her eye in the half-dark that far and wide her army was squeezing itself into flight, as near her it was squeezing itself, trampling itself, every man for himself, she fled, or rather let herself be swept away by pressure along this path westward; and presently found herself bounding along a road with about forty of her own horses round her.

Soon, however, these were pursued, as they could see in the sheen of a moon just come up, to illumine somewhat the dreariness and gloom of an evening which the gale anon washed with torrents of rain; and when the pursuers proved to be M'Niami troops, the Wa-Ngwanya, who, though they hanker after M'Niami women, scorn M'Niami men, asked Spiciewegiehotiu if they should stop and fight to cover her flight; to which, glancing back at the troop of pursuers, she replied: "No, they can't catch me on Selim: you all get killed, if you fight," and the flight continued another minute, until some one of the M'Niami, firing a wanton rifle, shot a Mo-Ngwanya; upon which, with one thought, all the Wa-Ngwanya halted, threw their horses round, and flew to do and die fighting.

But Spiciewegiehotiu, hardly bothering to glance behind at them, kept straight on at the same pace, she cared not whither, not wishing for bed nor bread, only for some cave or shed within which to bury away her head, and throw her shame; and, seeing her keep on, Cobby, following after her in the M’Niami troop, threw his animal aside into wild mimosa-land to avoid the oncoming Wa-Ngwanya, then, galloping full bat, regained the road half a mile behind the Wa-Ngwanya, now fighting hand-to-hand with the M’Niami.

As she had not been conscious of his solitary pursuit through the bush, he rushed out upon the road hardly four hundred yards from her, on which, though he was under trees, she immediately knew him by his Ali’s hoofs, their ponderous roll prattling like drumsticks upon the mud, knew him likewise by instinct of the eye, while he through drizzle could distinctly see her hair heavy with wet hanging half-lax on her back, could see her lean to her Selim’s ear to bid him flee, and now could see her mouth wide with laughing when she twisted smartly to fire twice at him.

“Shame!” he passionately shouted at her, his head now down to his animal’s mane.

And a third time he saw her turn and fire her revolver with wrathful laughter, and now for some moments lost himself, then refound himself down on the ground, dismounted over his horse’s head, which had foundered, shot in the shoulder.

As he started up, a small squad of M’Niami dashed past him after Spiciewegiehotiu, who had vanished; and when he made an attempt to follow them, his horse went tame and lame. So he turned back, observing now vultures gathering like guests to supper from every direction of heaven, and presently saw some hundred bodies blocking the road, with their guns, assegais, kerries, and three lynxes among them, with a company of vultures crammed with man, philanthropists at a symposium that only the moon looked at, musing over that lonesome moorland. All the Wa-Ngwanya had apparently fallen in the fracas, half as many more of the M’Niami, and, lying dead among the dead of man and nag, Cobby saw his guide. Nags were everywhere neighing, and presently, as he went, he began to see them running wild, singly and in groups, fleeing from the big battle; and soon began to meet man — on foot — single — in twos and threes — teeming in groups and troops, multitudinous, streaming, fleeing from the stricken field, keen to be away anywhere, tearing along followed by their plumes and loose uniforms in the teeth of flaw and murky turmoil, bent beneath burdens of inclemency and immensity of adversity, but trotting steadily on and on, throwing anon an eye behind where hopelessness was, as before them homelessness; and with a sore in his bosom, with a hung head, Cobby moved slowly onward on a horse whose head was not less hung and heavy....

As to Spiciewegiehotiu, she sought shelter after midnight at the kraal of a headman named Moocrya, who pretended to be an independent chief, but paid tribute to Sebingwe. He gave her food, fodder, put her into a hut near him, and she, sleepless for two days, was soon swooning to sleep.

With one ear open, however. Before long she was conscious of noises, nocturnal voices — a party of M’Niami urging upon the chief the need, for his skin’s good, to give her up: so, her Selim being near her, she went stealing out, called him soft, vaulted upon him, and was off.

But she was hardly half-way down the kotla when, an alarm having been raised by a watch posted there, shots and horses were following her; on which she, not aware that they were under orders not to harm her, and were aiming at her horse’s quarters, caught at a limb of a tree in an impulse and clinging to life, though she longed to die; and the light was so dim, that they lost her, and, unconscious that she was in the tree, sprinted past her, continuing to follow the horse a little, until they could descry that it was riderless, and then stood at a loss.

Selim, however, revealed her — to his own undoing: for he soon came trotting back with neighs to the tree: upon which she, seeing them pelting for her, dropped upon him, dreading death less than shame, and, facing them, was away again for the gate, firing the final shot of her revolver.

Now, however, her Selim fell over her, pierced; and ere she could free herself from him, she was a prisoner.

XXXVI. QUEEN SUEELA

TWO AFTERNOONS AFTERWARDS Cobby, wandering solitary for Eshowe through forested hill-country on his limping mount, which limped constantly sicker, encountered a mob of Wa-Mashenya Tommies shouting song on their way northward from Eshowe, who informed him that they had met travelling from the west a party of M’Niami who had Spiciewegiehotiu a captive with them, and were conveying her to Eshowe, which was in flames.

Cobby’s eye lightened, and he flogged his horse to be on; but Ali could only go slow. Even here nags were to be seen which appeared to be runaways from the Battle of the Pirihomepya, but they all avoided capture, nor in all this part of Wo-Ngwanya, where all the hamlets had been abandoned, could he get a nag; so that he felt “my ‘kingdom’ for a horse,” and thought of rushing on foot to Eshowe — which, in truth, if he had known more, he would have done.

Eshowe, as the Wa-Mashenya had reported, was then in flames, and even from the remote end of “The Elephant” at eight that evening the ex-Queen was able to observe in the clouds the brown and frown of its burning. And it was through fires that she drew nigh to it — camp-fires of hosts of Wa-Mashenya, of hosts of M’Niami, regiment after regiment, of each of which, when she moved near it, she knew the name by the make and scheme of its shield — all this panorama of camp-fires, wafted by winds under the wings of a falcon of sparks and smoke bound darkling south from the roaring town, being imbrued with the luridness and wrath of a drama from Tartarus.

As for the people of Eshowe, these, as usual in such cases there, had all flung their all upon the altar of God, and gone headlong in flight to hide or die.

When Spiciewegiehotiu was conducted up the hot kotla, which was encumbered with soldiers, there on the platform at the top was seated Sueela in the stone throne, surrounded by about a hundred M’Niami; Mandaganya, her mother, not there; none of her own people; but among the M’Niami priests and heralds, who, some minutes previously, had been proclaiming her Queen of Eastern Wo-Ngwanya, she being barbarously garbed with a broad gaudiness, bedizened with ornaments of gold and stones, a Queen, enthroned, reclined, serene, smiling an evil smile, attired in a kaross long to the ankles, yellow with black elephants, a dress of Spiciewegiehotiu’s, and from her helmeted head vaulted enormous horns, upon whose reds and browns of ochre shone a crowd of torches brawling about her.

At sight of Spiciewegiehotiu she half started up, but then smartly sat again; and, beckoning to one of the captor-group to gallop to her, got from him the details of the capture before Spiciewegiehotiu, having been unbound, was hoisted off a horse, and stood before the platform. The two then looked at each other; and said Sueela, smiling: “Well, Spiciewegiehotiu? You see.”

Sueela had drunk blood, was fresh from orgy, and something or other in her air was very strange, debauched, and raw, across her forehead being scrawled, as it were, “Babylon, mother of harlots.” Just the fact that she had stabbed in the back her country, so beloved, that she was everywhere execrated, her soul in hell, had been the cause that she had broken loose, gone the whole hog, so that more had fled and bled and blazed before the march of her devastation than if any male had led the army of M’Niami, for at the drunkenness of the rumbling of the drums up in her blood had flashed the savage, flashing the eye of riot and rapine, and, mixed with the blood of massacre, had been quaffed other liquor, and liquor of lips, she, stark and staring, dancing distracted cancons in revels of shamelessness, shaking frenzy from her hair, demanding the man-in-the-moon and more-than-man to manage her. The burning of Eshowe might well have been averted by a word of hers; but she had done nothing: only the ground round about the sigodhlo — that spot, that cloister — holy of holies to her bosom — home of her youth — she had rescued and protected, as she could, the storm being from the north.

And revealing her teeth, sneering, she said with levity to Spiciewegiehotiu: “You marry me to Daisy, no? You see now. You not always clever! You not see everything! Other girls clever, too!”

A statue stood there the defeated Queen, hard, calm, marble, rain-streams rambling down the rampart of her face, her hair relaxed, and to nothing she gave answer, her gaze meditating steadily upon the other.

And Sueela, sneering, with levity: “Now you go to your own country, no? Me give you Sir Cobby. He mad after me, me can have him, but me not want him: me married; me good.”

No answer: Spiciewegiehotiu’s eyes now clandestinely estimating her chances of attack and escape.

And Sueela: “Where Sir Cobby is? You see him anywhere when he follow you from the battle?”

No answer: only Spiciewegiehotiu’s lip curved a little, shivered a little as it curved, she thinking of Cobby dead by her hand, having dimly witnessed his fall from his horse.

And Sueela, with sneering teeth: “You think me care whether you answer me or no? You nobody now, my girl. You soon go off to your own country, nobody care, me not care. You marry me to Daisy: now me Queen of half Wo-Ngwanya, of all M’Niami; me have other things to think about than Spiciewegiehotiu.”

At this point Spiciewegiehotiu, having watched for a chance, snatched the spear of the officer nearest her, and, leaping, was on the platform in rapid career to stab Sueela.

But a shout broke out, and she just failed by a foot, four soldiers throwing themselves over her, shaking her, pouring over her a coal-sack of French and tongue; and, panting and captive, she stood among them, till Sueela, leaping up drew a knife from her waist, and stood with her, saying to the men: “Go away — leave her,” and to Spiciewegiehotiu, sneering, revealing her teeth: “You want to kill me, no? But the spear too heavy: that why you fail; take this knife.”

She held it out.

“Me do it,” Spiciewegiehotiu mentioned, not taking it.

“Well, do it: here’s a knife for you, my girl.”

Spiciewegiehotiu took the knife.

“Now,” Sueela said, baring her breasts; and tense stood the spectators of it with staring eyes, while Spiciewegiehotiu eyed her up and down, down and up, with a malign eye.

“Nobody to touch her when she do it!” Sueela flung aside from her; adding: “Now, my girl.”

Spiciewegiehotiu’s lip was curved as dirt; but the stroke did not come.

“What, you not do it?” said Sueela with levity, with sneering teeth: “You ‘fraid, no? What you have to be ‘fraid of? ‘Fraid to strike your — friend?” — her voice on a sudden broke.

“Slut,” said Spiciewegiehotiu.

“Yes, me bad, Spiciewegiehotiu — eheh, me baad — but me not so bad as God and the devils think me.”

Now her face went aside to hide what welled in her eyes; at the same time Spiciewegiehotiu’s face convulsed one moment, and now, dropping the knife, off she rushed to drop from the platform at a point rather empty of men, and, dodging capture, was gone, all legs, devouring the ground, down the kotla’s length.

“What she going to do?” started out of Sueela’s mouth: “catch her!” upon which immediately a mob of people at full speed were in pursuit, and in a few moments more in pursuit, too, was Sueela, who, in leaping, threw off her kaross, and, using that extreme freedom and fleetness of her feet, was soon leading the stream of pursuers, and stealing surely upon the fugitive.

But she was chasing a fox: though the kotla was populous with soldiers, and Sueela thrice cried out “Stop her!” to people ahead, Spiciewegiehotiu, herself fleet of foot, dodged them in detail, as she could, the moon’s light being very obscured by the tempest and tenebrous mood of the night, and by that roof of smoke that rolled over all, so that all occurred as in some vault of murk and Orcus; moreover, when the ex-Queen, who, running south, had steered her feet east, too, rushed upon a bridge of “The Gut,” a big baobab close to the bridge hid her for some moments, and when the foremost pursuer followed upon the bridge, she was no longer on it: they saw only her horned helmet and kaross going down “The Gut” in the shine of huts on fire beyond: at sight of which Sueela cried out: “She going down ‘The Gut’!” and, seeking her, peering, the pack ran down the stream, which, in its passage through the town, is narrow and rapid.

But, in fact, Spiciewegiehotiu was going up “The Gut” after lingering a little in the dark under the bridge, and after swimming with difficulty a little up and across, to emerge in singed mimosa on the deserted east shore, up which in a purgatory of heat and reek she sprinted, until she got to the spot where the river runs under the stockade; and it was still with a sort of official shock that she saw no watchman there; whence she made her way up into the wilds on the brink of White River.

XXXVII. BELLADONNA

UP THERE SHE remained a long time, anon catching sight of parties rambling far and wide with lights to find her. It was after midnight when she went back to Eshowe, bent with fatigue, weary of being, in her fingers a sprig of a tree rare there, the deadly-nightshade which she had fled to find.

Slowly over the kotla her footsteps moved, unnoticed, M’Niami troops being addicted to liquor, and most of the slumberers drunk. After passing through the sigodhlo gate, where no guard was, she saw at the gate of the royal grounds two guards, prostrate dogs, with a gourd of strychnia liquor close, and her lip a little scorned the mood of the new governing. She passed up the avenue, her object now being to burn Cobby’s waggons before going along that path which she purposed: for, Cobby dead, as she thought, and she intending to follow that way, she did not want his belongings to be left in hands alien and profane; and as, besides, she thought that the Wa-Ngwanya in the North might some time rise and fight, she did not desire that Sueela, who had seen the machine-gun fired, should have it to aim against them.

Soft and slow she paced, could see that the hut was occupied — a slight escape of light at the door — but ventured to stop, and drop, and prop her heavy head upon that door, which she had known as home since the age of seven; where, seated with shut eyes, drearily she smiled at dribble beating her, at the bravura of that froufrou of breezes trooping with whoops through the multitudinous wood, as a woman whoops out with frolic when a flaw swoops-up her frocks: smiling steadily, as one may grin and grin and be a death's-head; no sob, nor salt in her tears of dribble; prepared to pay and bear, not having "seen everything," having committed what, to her, was the one Sin — faulty polity, wrong conduct, trust in others just because she loved them, and thought that they loved her, uncircumspect seeing, purblind business, infirm building; and then the destined tendency in events, star of disaster: hating herself and That which Makes, she disdained to make complaint.

She heard a word or two murmured within the hut, then stillness, then a word or two, and stillness; then, presently, the breath of a sniff close inside, then a "whoof!" sounded, and understood that it sounded from Mandaganya's little dog, Ronja: upon which she sprang upright, and was gone for the grove where the waggons were.

The night, though so wild, being still white, one could see: and after collecting into little heaps what was left of the leaves that had been heaped by her men under the waggons, she went to a shed into which the fuel-wood had been flung when she had run to tell the men to remove the fuel-heaps from under the waggons, so that Cobby might not see them; and from the shed she fetched armful after armful of wood to deposit in good order as fuel-heaps under the waggons.

After which, taking a match-box out of a little charm-box at her moocha-waist, she looked into it — two matches only.

And, cautious as she was, the wind whiffed out one: upon which she spread a bit of tarpaulin from a waggon upon a waggon-wheel that faced the gale, and, kneeling near behind, got a few leaves alight, flew to the fuel-heap near, and, using that magic of savages in lighting fires, soon had the fuel-heap sounding, fuming, sloping south, an opal flowing.

Bent under the waggon, she stood waiting for the blaze to get well going, before taking brand from it to make the other blazes, her eyes now lowered to rest on her sprig of belladonna, while a vitagraph of the story of her life unrolled itself before her memory — scenes from the Second and Third M’Niami Wars, her coup d’état and leap to the throne, the execution of the princes, the coming of Rolls, then of Macray, of Cobby ... she shrugged, and moved to get the brand.

But for some time before this, ever since his “whoof!” at the hut-door, the little dog of Mandaganya had been very restless, as dogs will be a little before being poisoned or blown to the clouds; and “What the matter with him?” Mandaganya had demanded of Sueela, with whom she was keeping vigil, all at a loss and in dismay and mourning over that homeless head of Spiciewegiehotiu; and at last when the little Ronja had persisted in scratching at the door, when she had let him out, and he had rushed off, then had come back to invite her with insistence to go with him, she, ever inclined to scent “second-sight” in him, went with him.

Now he gamboled gladly, and, nose to ground, soon had her dragged to the waggons, whereupon she, catching sight of fire, and nothing to explain it, for Spiciewegiehotiu had fled a little way, instinctively snatched up a branch, and dashed at the brands, to lash and shatter.

Upon which Spiciewegiehotiu, standing now outside that waggon, smiled and shrugged, muttering: “Even in this me fail.”

At the same time Mandaganya turned to the little dog to demand of it: “How you know that there was a —— ?” but now heard a twig snap under a step, glanced that way, and became conscious of Spiciewegiehotiu beyond the waggon.

A cry broke from her: “My darling!” — and she ran.

But Spiciewegiehotiu ran from her round the waggon, she after, crying out through the barking of the dog: “You run from me?”

“Good-bye, Mandaganya!” called Spiciewegiehotiu, laughing, popping some of the belladonna berries into her mouth.

“Oh, God!” Mandaganya gasped, all aghast, pursuing her round the waggon, having soon noted in the moonlight the sprig in her ringers, and known of what tree of groaning that fruit grew.

And back she doubled short upon the fugitive; but Spiciewegiehotiu doubled, too, stopping an instant to peep mischievously round a corner of the waggon, laughing, exhibiting how she crammed more of the berries into her mouth, then afresh was away.

And, “Oh, you wicked thing!” panted Mandaganya, trotting in heavy haste, all pants and gasps, and breasts in distress for breath; and when again at the next corner Spiciewegiehotiu stopped to peep, and laugh, and exhibit, “Oh, you spiteful thing!” Mandaganya gasped: “you not love Mandaganya? Oh, you ungrateful thing!” and so round, with doublings-back and dodgings, they rushed, and narrow escapes of Spiciewegiehotiu, and laughs, and pantings of the heart, till Spiciewegiehotiu stopped to lay her head on a corner, and was caught.

No syllable now uttered the sybil, but, getting firm hold, picked up and bore the girl on her powerful bosom, a moan sounding out of her mouth.

So Spiciewegiehotiu presently lay on her own old bed of skins betwixt the two roof-trees of red mopane-wood, she rapidly flushing, to pink, to red, to crimson, while a wild silence reigned, the sybil with fixed lips administering some one of the herbal simples borne at her girdle in little gourds, though, in truth, the globe held no hellebore that could now heal the hell of that heat and fever, or ward off the mortal hour — except morphia, the antidote of atropa, a fact of which, probably, the doctress lacked all knowledge; and anon that laughter of atropa, half-hearted, starting up exclamatory, languidly dropping off, as in languid mockery of the cosmos, started up from the unconscious form, and dropped off, while Sueela, revealing her teeth in a rictus of the lips, sat a picture of horror, her back propped upon a pillar, her fingers outstuck stiff, a downlooking craze in her gaze that gloated as on gulfs of destruction and groaning. Only one outcry to Heaven she made: “Oh, where Sir Cobby is? If he was here, he never let her die like this!” — she having no knowledge of Cobby’s halt horse, shot by Spiciewegiehotiu.

Only Mandaganya, after an hour, spoke: spoke on and on in a low tone, crooning over the crimson delirium and derision of the fever’s dreaming. “My lamb. No father, no mother, only me; lost in Africa; and she put up such a fight against it, and beat it; and now it beat her; this is what she was to come to; there she lie; my white lamb. Me bring forth fourteen sons, and me love them all, but only now me know, my God, how cruel a mother’s bowels can rue — my mangled lamb — poor mute ewe — if Mandaganya’s bosom could ooze blood that’d do you good, she’d drench you redder yet than you be, stretched there ... She laugh ... She laugh to pass out of the dirty world.... You wanted to be a Queen, no?” — to Sueela, with a nod— “Queen of Wo-Ngwanya, no? And this is what you bring her to. What sort of a Queen? You think you can put on her shoes, and rule men as she rule them? A little bastard like you? She pick you up out of the ditch, a little bastard, she clasp you to her breast, she tell you Me-and-you, and this is what you bring her to. Oh, high Heaven, that bella in her belly bite her bitter, but it bite her never a bit so bitter as the unremembrance of that bitter breast must have bit her. If you wanted — —”

“Oh, Ma-Sueela” — from Sueela, irritated to speech at last— “me not answer you! If you not know that me love Spiciewegiehotiu more than my own self, you mad! you mad! you mad!”

Up started the dreamer's laughter, half-hearted-exclamatory, and fainted away.

And quietly the sybil: "Don't you answer me back; don't you say 'mad' to me. Say it again, just to see what happen to you. Me owe you a drubbing as it is, my lady. You think me not hear about your carryings-on since the war started? You think so? If me was that fool of a Daisy me'd cut off your right leg, and then cut off your left arm, to balance you. You think — —"

But now on a sudden two wild eyeballs intruded into the doorway, and the light flickered upon the axe of Sandelikatze, Sueela's whole-brother, the executioner, who, though like his other brothers he had shaken the dust of Eshowe off his shoes, and was a fugitive, had stolen back to use his axe: and "where she?" started from his lips, as in darted his limber limbs.

Doubtless, if she had fled, that would have been her death-hour, but, as she never stirred, her unconcern may have somewhat perturbed his nervous pose, and the next moment he got a cuff on the jaw which sent him staggering, from Mandaganya, who said to him, "You mad, no?" and cast the axe out of door.

On which he stepped with stiff fingers to strangle his sister, but in the midst of a cataract of invective saw Spiciewegiehotiu, and now profoundness of ruth modified the mood of his rage, he rushing to kneel and moan and hold her hand to his cheek; and after half an hour he was induced to take himself away, his mother having made a rendezvous with him in a wood.

Then fifteen minutes more of that vigil over the dying, and then the eyes of Cobby, just arrived at Eshowe, were prying in, he at once conscious of atropa, the scarlet, the laughter ... And sore now his heart smote him and smarted, a lamentable outcry clamouring out of his bosom: "Now, Almighty God, help me, have pity ..." and in some moments he had her, trotting ponderously with her down the avenue for his hut, followed by Mandaganya and Sueela fluttering, and before long had her blood saturated with sulphate of morphia.

XXXVIII. REINSTATEMENT

THE VITALITY OF Spiciewegiehotiu rallied the following afternoon; and the next forenoon her eyes opened with sight, and saw Cobby alive at her side.

Then, laid in Cobby's deck-chair, she spent days of silence, smiling, pallid now, though the backs of her hands remained of that hue named by Herbert Spencer "impure purple."

She saw Sueela come and go, saw her seated on the floor with her head leant upon Cobby, her eyes closed, "clothed and in her right mind" at Cobby's side; saw Mandaganya come and go; let Cobby hold her hand; but made no remark; hardly replied to anything: none knew her mind.

But during the fifth forenoon, lying outside the hut-door, she suddenly wished to know of Cobby: "Why you bring me back from the dead?"

"Aren't you glad like us others?" he asked.

She shrugged; glanced up at the glorious day; said: "The sun good. But you think me going to live? Me down; me dead; me done. My friends fail me; they plot together against me; and me not suspect it — God take away my understanding."

Cobby gently answered: "What you say is very wrong: Sueela loves you with the whole of her pure soul, and the stupendous thing which she has done she has done for you, in consequence of my having persuaded her that that would be for your good, if you came with me to England. As to my failing you, I shall explain to you the fix I was in, and you will see why I could not go into battle against Sueela's men: then you will repent bitterly of having shot bullets at my life, which is your life, and of attempting to take your life which is my life.”

She shrugged. “Me down; me done. Me done loving; me done hating.”

“You don’t love me?”

“No.”

“Oh, but that’s nonsense; you do.”

She was silent; but presently said: “Maybe me live. The sun good. They have much wind in that country you come from? Maybe me go with you to that country. They say you save my life: now me your cow. Throw me into any old hut in that country.”

“No!” — he kissed her kaross— “I have decided: you shall not come perforce. I go alone — in a few days — dreadfully desolate, irretrievably bereaved — but I go, after having restored you to the throne from which I have helped to dethrone you.”

Now her eyes moved round to him. “Restore?”

“Yes.”

“How you —— ?” But now her interest in his statement failed, she letting her head drop despondently and, moving it slowly, muttered: “Me down. Maybe they rise in The North; but they never swear by Spiciewegiehotiu any more. Me down, me done.”

He put his lips on her hand, saying: “On the contrary, you are up — higher than you ever were. I only pray of you that in future, for my sake, in remembrance of me, you will not be always making war upon your neighbours.”

“Me?” she muttered, drooping, in that rueing tone of melancholia: “what me have to do with wars? Me done. War good; but it bad, it bad, for them that make it: it’s the sons that eat the wheat which the mothers thresh from the breasts they beat.”

“Well, if that be really so,” he answered, “war is worth the making, for man himself is of no importance, only the son of man. But since you do see that war is bad for some — for those very some whom it is the ruler’s business to protect — you will not now be too aggressive, and, as for the aggressions of others, I assure you that for the future no negro will ever dream of daring to molest or offend you.”

With fresh interest she sat up at this, saying: “You talk ... What you can do?”

“I have told Sueela of my decision,” he answered: “she will at once withdraw the M’Niami army, and Daisy will pay you a war-indemnity of a thousand. As to Nasandhlwana, I am now about to order him to withdraw, and to pay a war-indemnity of four thousand — —”

At this she laughed out a little, saying: “Nasandhlwana laugh!”

“On the contrary,” Cobby replied: “he will cry; his head will be waters, and his eyes a fountain of tears — tear-gas will make him sentimental ... Here comes Sueela: say something to her, for me, will you? Love her again, as she loves you and me.”

But to Sueela she had ceased to say anything, and when the next forenoon, which was bright and breezy, a spirit of life pricked her, and the whim sprang in her to go up White River as in glad old times for a bath with five of the sigodhlo Ph[oe]bes, Sueela was not invited.

Cobby saw her off from the sigodhlo back — not that he expected any peril for her, though crowds of rowdy troops were everywhere about; and after watching the bevy vanish into the river-bush, went back to his hut, whence he at once sent word in Sueela’s name to three colonels of Wo-Mashenya regiments near, requesting them to come to him.

When they had come, he, in the presence of Sueela seated near, listening, chin on fists, made them into an embassy to Nasandhlwana to bear this message:

“Sir Cobby declares to Nasandhlwana that he is a god.

“He can easily destroy Nasandhlwana, his people, his capital, his cattle.

“But since Sir Cobby looks like just such a man as Nasandhlwana is, he does not expect Nasandhlwana to credit him with being a god before he proves it.

“So, three noons hence, Sir Cobby will appear in the form of a dove, crooning cooings of thunder, above Kranampya, Nasandhlwana’s capital kraal.

“But Sir Cobby is a god who abhors to destroy, unless he is disobeyed. So he is not going to destroy Kranampya, only to destroy so much of it as to show that he could destroy the whole, if he chose.

“Therefore, at that hour the population of Kranampya must evacuate the town, assembling somewhere well outside it. Whoever stays within will die, as all the horses, and kine, and dogs, in it will die. Nor must anyone enter it for some hours after Sir Cobby has come and gone, or he may die. And, as for those assembled outside the town, they will all begin to weep bitter tears, as if all their mothers had died, and some few will be slightly wounded.

“At once after which Nasandhlwana will make haste to withdraw all his men from Wo-Ngwanya territory, and to send four thousand chosen cattle to Queen Spiciewegiehotiu as war-indemnity, and as recompense for the wanton wrong done by Sebingwe, his father, in permitting men of the Wo-Mashenya army to wage war upon Queen Spiciewegiehotiu in her previous war with Daisy.”

The three colonels, having heard it with their ears, sat there astare, three different pictures of scare. Blessed is he who hath not seen, and yet hath believed! and blessed were they.

“Now, pray,” Cobby said to the one in the centre, “repeat to me the message.”

And that one began: “Sir Cobby say to Nasandhlwana — He God! He come from Heaven! Angels his servants! He can — —”

But he was interrupted. Five wild-eyed girls, gasping, burst in, competing in screaming: “Sueela! Spiciewegiehotiu — they steal her!”

All sprang upright, Cobby quite white, none black, to gather presently from the girl’s gasps that a gang of some thirty, just as the girls had dressed after bathing, had burst from bush, snatched up Spiciewegiehotiu, and dashed off with her on mules — north-westward....

Cobby’s heart was rent: she still not well....

Who were those men? Were they M’Niami? Were they Wa-Mashenya? The girls could not say.

“They not M’Niami!” cried out Sueela.

“They not Wa-Mashenya!” cried one of the Wa-Mashenya: “They go on mules! They Swingoni!” these Swingoni being tribesmen rather wild and degraded, semi-independent, but paying some tribute to Wo-Mashenya.

But Cobby at once suspected Nasandhlwana, at any rate of connivance, reminded by the event that Sebingwe had once proposed marriage with Nasandhlwana to Spiciewegiehotiu, that Nasandhlwana had desired white, and a white fist Cobby banged at the three Wa-Mashenya, telling them of woe to Wo-Mashenya, if she was not delivered up within five days. “Go! tell Nasandhlwana this with the rest.”

“Wait, me give you my Mustapha!” Sueela cried, running out with them; and one on Mustapha flew forerunning the others.

Then followed two days of care for Cobby, he now alone, for, since the aeroplane had to be inspected and prepared, he had been unable to go with Sueela, who had dashed off with cavalry to track the ravishers.

On the second gloaming the aeroplane stood ready at the top of the kotla with a guard of M’Niami round it, and half the night, and all the following morning mobs were filing near to peer at it, all the awna being populous to its bottom: for to farthest M’Niami and Wo-Mashenya the fame of that strange carriage of Cobby’s with only two wheels in tandem, and the mad steeds inside, had flown, and it was now assumed that this must be that motor-bicycle, or some other kind of a like thing. But when, an hour before noon, Cobby walked out to it, bounded upon it, the rough row and power of it now fretting every ear, the propeller spinning a mere nebula and remnant of visibility, then were wild eyes intent, the mouth hardly now robbing from the eye the time to toss a remark aside, or to moisten the lips with spittle; and now he was dashing over ashes and cinders down the length of the Square, as many thousands now fleeing with screams from before his career as were darting with howling after him, everyone looking to see him go scooting out where the great gates had lately stood; but when, somewhat before he got half to the market, all at once God took him, and fluttering triumphant he reigned on his throne in the air, then there arose and floated to him a drone of many adoring, and many were felled.

It was the same at Kranampya, a kraal in a charming vale, all orchard, maize and palmyra, and white blossoms of baobab, whither he had twice before ridden; and, knowing precisely its compass-point, he arrived before noon, spied its folk crowded two miles outside it, and, flying low thrice over it, dropped one high-explosive bomb, four “mustard” gas-shells (dichlorethyl sulphide), and four chlorines; then into the nest of kneeling people laid a few “egg-bombs” of tear-gas to make them mourn a little because of him; and in a little while was taken out of their sight.

But he came down badly, not in Eshowe, but in a meadow, smashing his chassis; and there in that meadow the monoplane remained, as its wreck may there remain for many a day, a monument of man's mentality immensely more monumental than those remains of ancient "civilizations" which at various places confront one in that country.

XXXIX. THE SWINGONI

WHEN COBBY WALKED back into Eshowe he found Sueela now there — speechless for grief, she not having succeeded in tracking the gang of ravishers, though she had now discovered that they were, in fact, a gang of the ungoverned Swingoni.

This was soon confirmed by urgent messengers from Nasandhlwana asserting that the guilty ones were Swingoni, who had thus turned to their purpose the turmoil and disturbed condition of things, their motive being to beguile Nasandhlwana into purchasing the white girl, for they had sent him an offer to sell her at a certain spot, and Nasandhlwana was then starting off with half an impi, first to win Spiciewegiehotiu of them by purchase, and then to exterminate them. As to the other demands of Cobby, these were being met.

Such was the message: but for Cobby and Sueela to sit still and wait upon Nasandhlwana's activity was impossible; therefore, having ascertained the proposed route of Nasandhlwana's party, they started off to come up with it on the motor-bicycle.

They came up with it the same night; and two nights later arrived at the rendezvous given by the Swingoni — a mountain-road, where, in a grove, four gods of wood stood under four marulas.

When Nasandhlwana had had drums beaten, a drum within the grove answered, and soon two Swingoni appeared, who arranged the details of a meeting to take place the next day between their chief and the King on the brink of the lake beneath.

This lake could be vaguely seen gleaming remotely below in moonlight, a river-like pool, leagues long, though hardly four hundred yards across; and it was almost known that in the village beyond this Spiciewegiehotiu must be.

So, to be nearer to her, Cobby and Sueela, after the bivouac and a meal, rode down on the motor, some four or five miles, sometimes with tense brakes, to the lake's brink, it being then late toward the midnight of a mild night, benign, sanctified, sighing as in satisfaction and fulfilment, its little breaths brindling that brand of brilliance which bridged the lake's breadth, treading-water within that brand, like rabbles of bathers bathed in beatitude; and for over an hour they two stood there holding the motor, alone, as it were, in the world, though a roof or two looked out through wood across the water; both hushed and mournful; and with a low brow she muttered: "You go — and without her. So all me do me do for nothing. And now she not love me any more."

"Yes, she loves you," he answered, "and will soon forgive fully. She is not quite well yet."

"She in Wo-Ngwanya, me in M'Niami, you gone where the sun set, everything ended. Oh, my, me not want to live; me die: my mother say me born to die young."

"No, no" — he patted her — "you are still a child: life will unfold for you new interests. She will borrow you often from Daisy, and some day I may be driven to come again to see her and you."

"It too far," she mourned; "she and me wait, and you not come. If you come, you find me bad. Me bad now. You not — know — what me done since the war. When me close to you me good, but a devil in me."

"Nothing of the sort," he confidently answered: "you are very good, and dear, and pure au fond. What you imagine to be a devil is God, who is all in all, and nothing is but Him. Look, the moon, that's He in beauty; and the man-in-the-moon, that's He in buffoonery. And He some day will be perfectly good, I think; and meantime, when He is good, and when He is bad, is perfectly working ... What have you done since the war?"

Her head bent. "Me go crazy, me untrue to you, me dance at you, me spit at you ..."

"Oh, fie: and at poor Daisy?"

"Oh, he — Eheh."

"Well, then, I am cross. All that is so undistinguished ... But never mind, forgive Him in you and yourself in Him till seventy times, and ever afresh be trying to be pretty and princely. And when you achieve, that's He succeeding in achieving, and when you fail, that's He succeeding in failing."

"Me remember ... Me love you too much! It not love; me adore the dust you've stood on. And you go ... you go ... To-night me tell you good-bye. You owe me one last kiss."

"Yes, the third. But why to-night?"

"Me not know. Something make me want it now."

Now he put an arm round her, saying: "Very good, come — my dear."

On which, taking his face between her hands, she kissed him long, continually, solemnly, kissing his soul, conscious of the moments, and of long time to come in which those moments would not be; then cried out "Oh!" and succumbed to her knees, still holding him.

When he had raised her, they stood side by side in silence, looking over the trail of light on the lake, and that pretty tripping of the ripples within it, like treaders steadily treading water, while the warbling, and warning, of a wedrigo (accent on "go"; sort of owl) sounded out of wood near on their left, until Sueela breathed: “My goodness, that wedrigo ... sure token of death ...” and then again breathed: “What that is coming there?”

Cobby also saw a black object blotching the blaze of the trail on the lake, without comprehension; but in some moments more Sueela, who was of an extreme keenness of sight, cried out, even as she rushed from him to plunge into the water: “It is Spiciewegiehotiu! She escape!”

This was so: and before the two heads on the lake met Cobby heard shoutings on the further shore, then saw some thirty canoes, full of pursuers, spurt off ...

Highly excited, drawing his revolver, he fired at those in the line of light.

This, however, although he emptied his magazine, did not stay any of them, and madly on they came paddling, gaining fast, and presently raining at Cobby arrows which these Swingoni poison with the entrails of the caterpillar n’gwa: so he was soon hiding behind the bicycle, until he hurried with it to the girls, who emerged on the shingle some hundred yards in advance of the Swingoni.

“Fly — they kill —— !” Spiciewegiehotiu panted at him, she herself starting off immediately for the timber near.

“No, come! come! the motor!” he called, running some steps after her.

But that might have been well, if he had not interfered; for it appears that she, not aware that help was near her, had carefully concocted her escape, had been conscious that she would be chased, but still had been confident of making safe away within the timber.

He, however, knowing nothing of her plans, could hardly have helped interfering: and she, seeing him and Sueela in a peril which each instant grew while she and he stood arguing, darted to the motor, which immediately started, she between Cobby’s arms, Sueela on the carrier.

One minute more and the savages were splashing up to the shore, well left behind, but not affrighted from flying after that marvellous cart that carried off their prize, nor frightened to shoot, since Spiciewegiehotiu, whom they did not want to shoot, was quite covered by the other two.

And presently, with loud mouths of discovery, they found themselves coming closer to the motor, which, thus loaded, was now only slowly moving up a steep foothill of the mountain; and soon nearly ceased to move.

Whereupon the air became thick with missiles, Cobby coaxing the motor all he could in vain: and the fact that at that hill-top, not far, was deliverance, and the fact that the whole misery was unnecessary, since the men were willing to sell their captive, added to the affliction and prickly-heat of his fix. He even contemplated surrender, but dreaded being killed before the meaning of the surrender could be understood; and now Spiciewegiehotiu called out: “You get shot! me run” — making a movement to dismount; but Cobby’s elbows instinctively nipped to hold her under her cover, and in the same moment he was aware of a whisper somewhere that said: “Good health!” the motor now leaping onward, Sueela gone.

When he flung a glance backward, he saw her running, struggling forward, but backward from him, he fast abandoning her....

What in the world a man should do now he did not know. All the ruth that was in him, all the God’s pity, groaned and rued. To dash back to her on foot ... but Spiciewegiehotiu could not manage the motor.... To be with either was bitterly to abandon the other....

As for Spiciewegiehotiu, not having Sueela’s actual experience that getting off sometimes made the motor go, she did not at first know what had caused the motor to spurt forward, but very quickly realized in some way that Sueela had leaped off; and immediately a scream: “Sueela! Make it stop!”

Cobby now thought of stopping to wait for Sueela, the ground here near the hill’s brow being not so steep, but when he now peered round, it was to see Sueela down on the ground, and the foremost group of Swingoni almost upon her: so, seeing the needlessness of imperilling Spiciewegiehotiu and himself, he shrank from stopping — though, in fact, if Spiciewegiehotiu had been shot, it would have been by some random arrow not meant for her, she being wealth to the savages; and over the hill’s top they swiftly went, Spiciewegiehotiu in a flush of rage beating upon his face, shrieking, wriggling in his grip to be free, he crying to her: “It is useless!” she in a scarlet fever of passion still screaming at him: “Cobby, let me go!” But on, downhill, he bounded, till after a while their fight capsized the bicycle; and when she started up to fly back, he caught her, and they fought, they by this time being quite out of sight of the tribesmen.

Spiciewegiehotiu flopped down upon the path, clasped her hands on the top of her head, and bawled: “Sueela!”

Only when Cobby represented to her that Nasandhlwana’s force was near on the mountain, that Sueela might be merely wounded, that something might yet be done, did she consent to go on with him.

But when near morning he and she — for she would not be kept away — and with them the King himself and a posse of spears afresh reached the spot, it was to see the body of Sueela decapitated, her hands hacked off, for the savages had gnashed; and when the posse crossed the lake at a drift to take vengeance, the village was still and dead, the slayers fled.

Thus Sueela met her death there: it had all happened in three crammed minutes of impulse, accident, and catastrophe; and the moving Finger, having writ, moved on.

XL. EN ROUTE

TO NASANDHLWANA, AS to all, Cobby was now, in fact, “a god”; and it was with a squad of Wo-Mashenya cavalry that he, on the motor, and Spiciewegiehotiu, horsed, re-entered Eshowe.

There already Spiciewegiehotiu saw everything changed; the foreign regiments all withdrawn; coming for her along the country-roads, shuffling with brush of shoulders, both bull and cow, in crowds, in monstrous mobs, trotting with rowdy knock-knees, and orbs distraught, and horns transformed to the oddities of form to which the Wa-Mashenya warp all their horns; and flocks of Wa-Ngwanya on all paths, thronging back to their abandoned kraals, thronging out from Eshowe to welcome Spiciewegiehotiu with shoutings of frenzy, for throughout Wo-Ngwanya like loosened effluvia had flown the news that Cobby was “a god,” godlike beyond doubt, and on their side, their Queen’s knight and might, and not they were defeated, but Nasandhlwana was defeated, and M’Niami: and they were coming, had come, again, singly, in multitudes of groups, grinning pilgrimages, gay of gait, so that now every wood round Eshowe was full of brisk fingers picking withies with which to rebuild; and in very few days a new Eshowe stood there.

But Spiciewegiehotiu was stone — showed no elation, her face blanched like marble; she hardly spoke; only, suddenly, as she sat astare, she would clasp her hands on the top of her head to bawl: “Sueela!”

Of which sorrow of hers Cobby writes: “I have heard her say many gross things, as was to be anticipated, but, such is that gift of grace which she has from Heaven, I have hardly ever seen her do anything gross and ugly, until now that she shows this negro grief. No, here, I admit, she is not pretty, her mouth opening oblong, as she bawls 'Sueela!' the whole exhibition having that indecent aboriginalness of the motions and emotions of children and lower animals; but all the more heart-breaking for me is this tribulation because of its naked and shameless sincerity; and something in me, too, screams 'Sueela.' ..."

Sueela's body, brought back, was taken to Mandaganya's singed domain, that the Queen might not see it, and there, on the third day after the return, was buried in the presence of Daisy. Two hours after which, while Cobby was busied about a waggon with six negroes who had eagerly agreed to go three hundred miles with him, he now making final preparations for the trek, a deputation of councillors, having Mandaganya for their spokesman, approached him, to beg him not to go, but to wed the Queen, and be their King.

Now, no protest so far had come from Spiciewegiehotiu as to his preparations — no prayer to stay — nothing. And this deputation surprised him.

"How do you know that the Queen would wed me?" he asked them; upon which one of the councillors winked at him; another cried out: "That all right — na!" and he understood that now Spiciewegiehotiu was moving to hold him.

And though he knew that she would not now burn his things — for he had observed the fuel-heaps under the waggons, and had given her to know that that was a good thing for her and for the sigodhlo that she had not accomplished her will — yet he now felt a misgiving, a fear lest she might be at some scheme to keep him.

“Now, Mandaganya,” he answered, “this is not fair. You know that I am not going eagerly, but because I must, because I, like you, am a priest, an elder, knowing more than children, and having duties to do. And you but make harder the doing of what has to be done when you ask me not to do it.”

She bent her head; and they left him.

The next day everything was ready for the departure: but, for the heart-break of parting, he delayed still three days, spent mainly with the Queen, to whom he showed the uses of many things which he was leaving with her, he meaning to go with only one waggon; and she made no prayer that he would remain, being now all shut in herself, dumb, sullen, anon muttering the name of her dead friend.

But on the afternoon of departure an uproar arose which Cobby afterwards believed to have been engineered by her....

It was somewhat before sunset; his six were awaiting him with the waggon in the Square, he having been in the royal hut an hour to say good-bye, when the populace began to clamour at the sigodhlo gate, got in, or were let in, got into the royal grounds, or were let in, and came roaring in thousands up the avenue, clamouring: “Marry Sir Cobby! Make Sir Cobby remain! Make Sir Cobby King!”

In the midst of which Spiciewegiehotiu suddenly flung herself before him, holding him, saying with an imploring face: “You stay, no? They call you a god, they want you for their King. You stay with them and me, no?”

Cobby groaned. “Ah, how pitiless of you, to make it so bitterly difficult for me! If you see me leaving my soul behind me, do you not conceive that I go because I ought, and must?”

“And you think me live?” she cried to him: “Sueela dead — through you: you not always act right! You think me live? Three days after you gone me stiff dead!”

A flush of resentment rushed up his face. “Oh, shame, to attempt to hold me with such a statement! But even that shall not hold me. Understand that I go.”

“What! You say that to me? Whether me live or die?”

“Yes! I say so!”

Upon which up at once she sprang in a flush of passion to rush to the door, to throw it open, and to shriek to the people with the shrill tongue of a shrew: “Go way! He care nothing about you and me! He not want me! Go way! Go way!”

Then she crashed the shutter into its place afresh, and went to stand with her back propped upon the wall, all pallid now, he walking about with pocketed hands, dumb, wrung with sorrow.

And presently he stepped to her, held her shoulders, touched each of her cheeks with a kiss, she like an image which is kissed, while a breath that trembled and broke rose in him in a struggle to utter “good-bye”; and not till he was well in flight from her did she make one step to restrain him, but then stopped, and dropped down, staring, while he with a bent body fled away for the gateway, sobs now gobbling out of his god-forgotten solitude.

So he went away; but during the next days made but slow progress, lingering within Wo-Ngwanya, bidding a repining good-bye to its rills and wilds and winds. A garnet in a fragment of gneiss that rolled down a roadside hill to him he kissed before dropping into his pocket; he picked up a sprig of grass, of indigo, a francolin’s feather, to drop into his pocket for parting’s sake, his heart aching.

Anon he would say droopingly to the executioner, who had proffered himself with enthusiasm to be of the six: “Well, Sandelikatze, my friend, how do you say that she is faring?” to which Sandelikatze would ever answer: “You not fret: she get over it. When anybody once try to die, and not die, they not try again.”

On the second evening they turned into Hyena Pass, and on the third evening were still no further than that Hyena Kranz where the cavern is in which Cobby had chloroformed Macray and the rest of the sleepers, and had been arrested by the Queen’s men dashing out from ambush. There they stayed the night; and he, listening to the cascade expatiating to itself on its special case, lifting his eyes to the scintillating bit of sky visible within the theatre of cliff, sat for hours at the cavern’s mouth, smoking, thinking of how in that near thicket Sueela’s lips, sealed for evermore, had kissed him a second time of thrice, and he had twice wildly kissed the Queen in the interior chamber, to be sentenced to those thirty days which he had served in “The Elephant.”

All his six were asleep in the exterior hall when he walked into that interior hall, to sleep on the spot, as nearly as he could recall, where the Queen had slept, or pretended to sleep.

And presently he slept — not for long, wakened by the ache of the weight of that solitude that lay upon him, and for life would lie, feeling now, as not before, how really the being of his cousin had become an ingredient of his blood, and how grievous without her, as without serum, was his disease. He groaned in the dark; but did not harbour the impulses that spurred him to turn back to her kisses.

And again he slept, longer this time; but this time had a nightmare in which he seemed to be fighting with a cheetah, which floored and was choking him — till he woke: and now he found that some forearm was over his throat interfering with his breathing, and somebody asleep near him.

He sat up, could see nothing but, groping warily, felt a face ... hair.....

And now fulness of love overflowing flooded his soul, exultancy, extravagance of gratitude, a broken-hearted lowliness, he dropping back to sob on his face a long while, steadily but soft, so as not to wake her.

XLI. AFRICA

“SO YOU HAVE come?” he said to her, seated beside her in the morning light.

She shrugged, she smiled a little, hugging her shins. “Eheh, me come.”

“You love me?”

“Eheh. And you, no?”

“Eheh.”

“So you come back now with me, no?”

“Ah, now, don’t start that again ... I am all in heaven! I love God! And you?”

She shrugged. “Eheh.”

“So you actually come with me ... I can’t, I can’t, realize it!... But what in the world have you done about the Government?”

“Me proclaim Rambya King. Me get Mandaganya to consent.”

He clapped his fingers. “You sagacious thing! You wise nut!” — this Rambya being a nobody, a blacksmith, but noted for strength in the head. (He had been poisoned at Cobby’s “banquet.”)

“And what,” he asked, “do the people say about Rambya?”

“They trust in me. Most of them say yes.”

“Good, good.... And how did you come?”

“Me come on a horse to the top of the pass, then me come on alone on foot. The town come after me; me order them back; they lift up their voice and bawl ... But they not love me more than me love them.” Now her countenance convulsed, tears flowed down her stony cheeks, till on a sudden she chuckled, leaping up, saying: "Come, let's get away before me run back."

That evening they were among the foot-hills south of the mountains, where, seated on a stone with her, holding her thumb, looking over plain and wood that rolled away to the frame of space, he said to her: "We two shall need, I can see, to be extremely distant and discreet with each other, during this great trek."

"Why so?" she wished to know.

"There are reasons. One is that you are going to a land of a good many handsome and gifted men of your own race, and I think it only fair to you that you should see these beforehand, so as to make a deliberate selection, before I rivet you irrevocably to me."

At which she smiled a little on him, with something of motherly pity, saying: "Poor Cobby: you something like a child. Cobby soon see."

"I mean it, though," he said: "you, too, will see."

"Yes, me chiefly, poor me ... As to those handsome men in that country, me will love them only with my eyes, Cobby; Cobby me love with my backbone, no, Cobby?" She touched his knee, and his being flushed to hues of emotion like the vacuum tube flushing to chromes of beauty at the first stroke of the pump.

That night, however, and several nights, they slept within separate coverts, until they were suddenly abandoned by their six companions, this taking place on the sixth midnight.

On that sixth day, during the rest following the midday food, the whim took Spiciewegiehotiu to be given instruction in the use of the machine-gun, which Cobby had considered needful to bring with him. "Show me how you do it," she begged him; so he got up, deposited the gun on the ground, and, sitting before it — one of the little Vickers — exhibited how to thread the belt-tag through the feed-block, how to drag down the crank-handle once, and once again, and then let her thumb the thumb-pieces, and be shaken by the shocks of its strong agitation, as it threw out a few bullets.

Her verdict, as she stood up from it, was: “It good”; and then she wished to know: “But where you get the cartridges to put into the belt?” upon which he pointed out the small-arms ammunition-box in which the cartridges were, the six Wa-Ngwanya being spectators at the exhibition: and there the incident appeared to end.

But in the silence of that night Spiciewegiehotiu rose up, stole through bush to Cobby, assured herself that he slept, then went soft and woke the Wa-Ngwanya, led them to the waggon, and again, slowly, showed them how to load the gun. Two then took the S.A.A. box, one the tripod, one the gun, and she walked a mile with them northward to a spot where, they having now dropped prostrate before her, she said to them: “Show Rambya how to shoot the gun.... Tell him me say again me will be hoping in that country me go to that he soon add Wo-Mashenya to Wo-Ngwanya; but he better let M’Niami alone till Daisy dead.... Tell him me say Good luck ... Get up, my sons, let me kiss — —” She could utter no more.

So it was with opened arms that Cobby hurried to her early the next morning to exclaim: “The men are all gone!”

“My goodness!” says she: “they run away?”

“Yes, what in the world shall we do now?”

“Oh, well,” she said resignedly, “me-and-you, Cobby. Me know Africa: we get through. You drive, me your voorlooper, no?”

But Cobby was all in dismay; and in an hour another outcry from him: “The machine-gun is gone!”

“Gone ...?”

“The men have stolen it!”

“My goodness!”

“We may bitterly regret its absence before long!”

“Never mind, Cobby,” she said, her hands on his shoulders: “we fight with rifles, if we have to fight. Me-and-you, Cobby; me-and-you, no? Me give you a kiss.... That something like a machine-gun, no, Cobby?”

He called the oxen; they walked on.

And with many a care and scare, and with many a scrape and escape, they trekked many days — or say wended, one of the early incidents of the journey being their bursting into a belt of tsetse, out of which their cattle emerged infirm and collapsing one by one: whereupon, abandoning waggon and goods in uninhabited country, afoot they two confronted the realm whose name is Immeasurable, Innumerable, Immutable, Unimaginable, the Egyptian Sphinx, the Pan of Africa. Once north of the Sabi, once north of the Limpopo, they fought formal battles, with Spiciewegiehotiu as commander, the second struggle going on several days from a kopie on whose granite top was no water, they then naked save for a rag that might as well have been cast away, and haggard with a hunger which the “cabbage” scooped from the roots of leaves of the dwarfpalm hardly appeased.

But, tattered, famished, parched, chewing anon morsels of the soft wood of baobab to win a little moisture, reduced to the elements of being, brutish in need, they still were not savage nor brute, and Spiciewegiehotiu got still a sense of the god’s gesture when, on the top of that kopie, or where they halted in some darksome covert under vaults all informed with stars, she saw him conning the altitude of Alpha Andromedæ, remarking Alpha Eridani, connoting the slope of Canopus. “Me think me never to understand how that box tell where we are,” she would say; and would add: “There is only Cobby.”

Nor was that other box, of cardboard, so guarded by Cobby, less astounding — how thousands of cows could be crowded into that petty space. “This paper is money — cowries, as it were,” he told her, in English now — they lying one night within a limestone bunk behind bush, invisible to each other, thunders sounding outside, the drought now done, the rains of April puddling, the floods descending— “money is not wealth; how much money we two have! yet how little wealth: bread, butter, boots, is wealth: anything desirable for itself, acquired from Nature by work, i.e. by using Force or Power, and moving something by God’s help — that is wealth; and money represents wealth in some places, since it fills little space.”

“But it mine, this wealth!” she cried: “how you say it yours? How Caray can give it to you, if it mine?”

“Well, he did. It was buried — lost to you. Then he gave it me.”

“But how he could? My father’s wealth!”

“No, not your father’s; his “by law”; but fantastic laws are to be laughed at. Well is good, or God; wealth is goods, or God, or Power, or Force; the effect of Force is motion; and when Force moves anything, ‘work’ is said to be done, as when a planet flies, or a stone drops, or when by God’s help we wink, or plough: so wealth or goods belongs to workers who move things by Force, or Power, or God’s help, to acquire them from Nature. But your father could not have moved enough things in hundreds of years to acquire seven million pounds’ worth of things, and the laws that say that he did are laws made by lubbers, ‘lawyer’ minds, men who, not being trained in thought, cannot think, who, in so far as they are not scientists, know nothing, but are like children, who cannot build, but play at building, making sand-mounds, not houses of men. Anyway, there is no you and I. We will call the money yours, and I will spend it for you.”

“Oh, but no,” she muttered, “we call it yours, and me spend it for you.”

He answered: "It may spend itself in the rains close to our skeletons. Still fifty miles before the Limpopo."

It was soon after this that she generated him in their second (Limpopo) battle, she being, moreover, a great gun at game, and had, moreover, a singular knack in catching fish by different tricks, sometimes with nothing but her hand, a trick of the wrist, or a baobab-shell affixed to a stick, catching jack in the upper branches of the Zavora, barbel in the Limpopo, a knack that four or five times gave them life where game was lacking, and where no kraal, lost in the dark heart of the vast of some haunted forest, was wrought to sorrow with all their poverty and forlornness.

Yet, even in fever regions in the rains of April and May, their health remained excellent, and if Cobby anon desponded, not so Spiciewegiehotiu, who, in spite of her grossesse, was not often tired, never perspired, and when they got to the granite country, craggy with quartz outcrops, bordering upon the northern Boers, the girl-child to which Spiciewegiehotiu gave birth in a deserted village, in which not a dog was still visible — a girl-child to which they agreed to give the name "Sueela" — presently gave evidence of no little vigour and grip on life, in spite of its parents' training in trepidation and privation.

Thenceforth, the tokens of civilization now commencing to unfold themselves before them, the faring became merrier. Clothed now and comfortable in stomach, the three reached Pietermaritzberg; and at Port Natal Spiciewegiehotiu, although yonder in the North she had often watched the rotting Florida cocked on its rocks, widened her eyes one night at sight of the lines of lights of a liner, a street of dream and mystery on the sea, built by the Divinity that builded the sea and the bee's crib, and still trickier builds and trickier, increasingly....

THE END

The Young Men Are Coming! (1937)

The Young Men are Coming! was first published by George Allen & Unwin in London and The Vanguard Press in New York in 1937. The publishing house was established in 1926 after the Garland Fund provided the company with a grant of one hundred thousand dollars. The Garland Fund was a left-wing institute that gave over two million dollars to radical projects over the course of the 1920's and 1930's. The Vanguard Press aimed to publish socialist classics and new radical works at an affordable price. Unsurprisingly, the company came under the watchful and censorious eye of the 'House Committee on Un-American Activities' (HCUA) in the 1940's, but ultimately survived the investigation and continued as an independent publisher until the 1980's.

Shiel dedicated most of the final decade of his life to crafting what he believed would be the true translation of The Gospel of Luke. He completed the work, but it was never released and a large section of it was lost after his death. The Young Men are Coming! was Shiel's last published novel in his lifetime. It is a challenging novel that explores ideas about social reform and upheaval through the tale of an alien from Jupiter.

SHAKESPEARE

TO

JOHN GAWSWORTH

I. PERPLEXITY AT PENPOLACK

THE TELLING OF the singular thing that befell Dr. (Oscar) Warwick — if it is singular — anyway, the extraordinary thing — may best be commenced by an extract from the Supplement to The Penpolack Advertiser, dated Saturday, February 23rd: for the local narrative in its local vernacular seems more intimate than the narratives given by the big newspapers. (This “Supplement” is a little leaf printed on one side by a press which leaves out a letter or so in each third word; and Penpolack is a townlet on the North Cornwall coast, well out west).

The Supplement, then, (published on Saturday), says:

CAREW’S CLAUSE YEW

The uprooting of this yew during the night of Monday last remains as hopeless a mystery as ever. Throughout the week knots of people may have been seen contemplating the fallen giant in Carew’s Clause, asking one another the same question — what convulsion of Nature could have been the cause of the tree’s fall. And no wonder: for Carew’s Clause yew-tree has long been one of the landmarks of this Hundred, it might be said of the Duchy, since many a picnic-party from far enough away have taken their pleasure in its spacious hollow. The tree is even said to be one of the three in the Kingdom that were flourishing in the era of the Druids, and we have the authority of Mr. Cory ton, our respected townsman, for stating that the tree bade fair to hold out yet another hundred years. And now all of a sudden Carew’s Clause yew lies low. At the peep of day on Tuesday, the 19th inst., a labourer named John Boscawen, passing by the clause on his way to the quarry, missed the familiar sight of the tree, and then to his amazement saw it prostrate, its roots exposed to view, and a great round grave in the ground where the yew had stood: in the graphic language of Mr. Coryton, “it looks as if some giant’s hand had grasped the yew, and dragged it up like a carrot”, and how to account for the phenomenon surpasses the wit of man. But for the regretted and mysterious disappearance from our midst of Dr. Warwick on that same Monday-Tuesday, some explanation might possibly have been forthcoming from so eminent a scientist anent this most curious event: as it is, it is impossible to understand anything of the matter: the tree that we long saw standing we now see lying — that is all we know of it. Needless to say, there has been no wind to speak of, nor does it look as if the yew had been struck by lightning (though there was something of a thunderstorm that Monday midnight — in fact, two), nor has the tree been blasted by any kind of explosive. It is reported that a curious dent in the sands near the tree was noticed on the Tuesday, a dent some hundreds of yards long, of the same shape “as if you pressed a brick slantways into dripping”, to quote John Boscawen; but any connection between this and the tree’s tragedy is hardly to be imagined. Suggestions have been made in the parish that the tree was dug up by some malignant hand, or dug up to get some treasure anciently buried there; but these hardly seem to come under the head of practical politics. Inspector Trelawny and others who have examined the roots deny that the yew was dug up: in fact, it would have taken a good many to “dig it up” within some hours, the roots being as big as the tree itself; and who among us could have had any malicious motive anent this inoffensive old giant, the pride of this parish? — the suggestion of malice seems nearly as fantastic as the other suggestion of “treasure”. The truth seems to be that the yew's uprooting is due to some curious fit or sneeze of Nature, though of what character this sneeze can be we must confess ourselves at a loss to suggest; and we can but express the sympathy of the borough with Mr. Frederick Carew, Snr., in the loss of this venerable old tree.

So much as to the yew; but the perplexity of Penpolack that week-end by no means ended with the yew: for it is clear that two other things still more puzzled it; of which two here is one:

DR. WARWICK'S DISAPPEARANCE

We regret on going to press to have to say that we are unable to throw further light on this matter.

For the past eleven years we of Penpolack parish have had living in our midst, like one of ourselves, a philosopher of the rank of Darwin, Kant, Spencer — Dr. Oscar Warwick, F.R.S.; and the parish, like the universal world, has been touched and appalled at his most queer disappearance; if the parish is rather less agitated than the rest of the nation, that is only owing to the fact that the honour attached to the Doctor's presence among us has become a little stale by habit. Morning and evening we have seen him going for his walks in his Inverness cloak, showing white locks of hair under his wideawake hat, with his oak-stick, and his old dog, "Guncotton", (so called for his loudness, in youth, and his fluffiness). Shall we ever see him that way again? He always walked up of a morning through the town, then down to the beach by St. Aubyn Lane; and, as he reached the beach, Mr. C. E. Couch, of St. Michael's Farmhouse, would set his kitchen-clock to seven past seven: for he knew that at that second Dr. Warwick's foot would touch the shore. From that point the Doctor would walk on westward to the quarry, where he would start running, and would run as far as Devil's Cave before you come to Penclew Point — the cave in which his hat, and his cloak all blood-stained, have now been found. Two or three who have chanced to see him at the end of this run say that the running seriously “took it out of him”: but that made no difference to Dr. Warwick — he must have his daily run. Let us hope that he may yet be seen running, many a day, between Polsnear Quarry and Devil’s Cave.

His disappearance, however, is wrapped in a sinister mystery. The discovered facts, so far, are as follows:

On the Monday-Tuesday of his disappearance Dr. Warwick was alone in “Caerwent” house with his old servant, Miss P. Collins, more familiarly known to us as “Pruie”: alone, we say, for last week Mrs. Warwick (or “Dame Felicia Warwick”, as her official title is) had gone to Bristol to attend the Annual Conference of the General Federation of Trade Unions. This distinguished lady, who is known to have been associated with her husband in some of his discoveries and theories, and loyally gave up to him the fame, while doing much of the work, wrote four times from Bristol to Dr. Warwick between the Friday and the Monday — marriage in this case, as we know, being an ideal thing, a most intimate and beautiful union of two congenial geniuses.

The one child of Dr. and Dame Felicia Warwick is their promising and tenderly-loved son, Mr. Ivor Oscar Warwick, aged twenty-four, at present the engineer-in-charge of the electric-power works at Bermondsey, London. Many of us know him well by sight, it having been his habit to come down to spend his week-ends with his distinguished father and mother, as he did on Friday evening of last week. He left again for London — he declares that he left — he was seen to leave — by the 3.17 up-train on Monday afternoon last. But between the Friday and the Monday, on this visit, Mr. Ivor Warwick did something new, which we cannot omit to report: he called upon Sir P. Borlase St. Aubyn, and asked Sir Borlase for the hand in marriage of the charming Miss Patricia St. Aubyn, whom we of this parish have so much admired on horseback, and indeed on foot. Sir Borlase St. Aubyn now declares that to that moment he had not known that his daughter and Mr. Ivor Warwick had even seen each other; and we are able to gather that the young gentleman's advance was rejected with some resentment on the father's part. We fear, too, it must be mentioned that in that interview Mr. Ivor Warwick threatened to have his way, whatever the young lady's father might say. That was on the Saturday afternoon at three o'clock. On the following Tuesday night about nine Miss "Paddy" St. Aubyn was found to have vanished from her home, no one yet knows why or wherefore, for Mr. Ivor Warwick is declaring himself as innocent and astonished in the matter as any of our readers.

Mr. Ivor Warwick, we say, was seen to leave Penpolack at 3.17 p.m. on Monday last; Dr. Warwick was thus left alone with old "Pruie": so that the rest of the story is Pruie's. Pruie says that the Doctor retired to rest as usual on Monday night as ten-thirty was striking, the Doctor's life being timed by a ship's chronometer such as have detached escapements, and never lose or gain a second; and Pruie herself was soon afterwards asleep. But she is a light sleeper, and at about two in the morning she was awaked by the Doctor's stealthy step on the stair, then heard him first fumble about a little below, then go out of doors. Never before had any such thing happened at "Caerwent"; and, as anything out of the common in a household so ordered by clockwork was (naturally) alarming to her, she lay listening spell-bound. In about ten minutes, as she thinks, she seemed to hear a most queer sort of laugh somewhere, and then a curious kind of roaring row outside, "a tearing, breaking row", as she describes it. This seemed to come from Carew's Clause, and, Pruie is convinced, had something to do with the uprooting of the yew-tree. This row held her still more spellbound; but she was going to get up to see, when she distinctly heard Dr. Warwick come indoors again. Then, hearing nothing more for three or four minutes, she crept out to the stair, standing ready to run back, but listening; could see light in the drawing-room below; could hear Dr. Warwick open a book-case in there, and distinctly heard him say in a very choked and agitated tone of voice “Thank you, My Lords”. Then again after some seconds she heard him say “Thank you, Sirs, thank you, thanks”, then after some seconds more, “Thank you, My Lords, thank you, thank you” — and, hearing this queer talking, always in the same words, “thank you, thanks”, and no one there to hear, her “head seemed to turn”, as she says. As she stood in this condition, clinging to the rail of the stair, something or other gave her a new shock, for she insists that she suddenly heard “inside her head” — though here it is not so easy to follow her seriously — she loudly heard “inside her head” something utter the words, “this beautiful moon” — words which somehow (she says) affected her mind most powerfully — not exactly with fear (though she felt sure that a ghost was close to her), but with some sort of most powerful emotion, she says: so much so, that she has not been able to “get the words off her mind”, and they still “make her shed many tears”. The next thing was that she heard the old “Guncotton”, the dog, give one yelp in the drawing-room, as if hurt; she then heard Dr. Warwick moan in a low tone in his throat, with much emotion, “The dear ones!”; then, “thank you, My Lords, thank you, thanks”. The next thing was that, somewhere, all at once, she heard a most peculiar sound — a sound which (she says) it is impossible to describe— “something like singing, yet not exactly singing, but very, very pretty” — which lasted two seconds or so; and the next thing was that she heard the Doctor go out of doors again, this time leaving open the French-window that he went out by.

She has neither seen nor heard him since: for by the time it occurred to the old woman in her agitation to run to a window, the Doctor must have turned the corner of the garden-hedge, and was gone.

All this, of course, makes rather curious evidence: but now comes the part of Pruie's evidence that is so curious as to be well-nigh incredible — though, for that matter, she seems so certain of what she asserts, that it is difficult to see quite what to think in the matter. She says that after waiting anxiously till 3 p.m. the next day for the Doctor's and the dog's return — for the dog also was missing all day — then talking to Inspector Trelawny about the matter, then wiring to Mrs. Warwick at Bristol that the Doctor had not come home, she was sitting in the kitchen about 5 p.m., when she heard a sound of furtive footsteps which flew up the stair. Now, "Caerwent" stair is just outside the kitchen, so she was able to rush to the kitchen-door in time to see a young man "in a straw hat" just vanishing at the stair-top. And who was that young man? The old woman insists — is sure — that it was Mr. Ivor Warwick. And yet there are said to be many proofs that at 5 p.m. on Tuesday last Mr. Ivor Warwick was in his power-station in Bermondsey, London. So there is something strange here. Pruie heard the person above rush into Dr. Warwick's laboratory; and, though very unnerved, she presently plucked up courage to go up, and tap at the (locked!) door. There was no answer. She called "Mr. Ivor", and there was no answer. By this time she knew that "Guncotton" was in there with the young man of "the straw hat", for the dog had whimpered at the door inside. Then she tried again, saying this time "Mr. Ivor, do you know anything about the Doctor?", and this time a voice within— "the voice of Mr. Ivor" — answered in the words, "Pruie, it is all right, you make yourself small". Could all this have been dreamt? Pruie herself admits that "make yourself small" is not at all like Mr. Ivor Warwick's way of talking. Anyway, she then went away, and for three hours (she says) kept a sharp watch inside the kitchen door, but finally fell asleep in her chair, wearied out no doubt after her troubled night and day. When she opened her eyes it was nine in the night, and she then found that she was alone in the house, the dog, too, gone, as at this hour Miss “Paddy” St. Aubyn was gone.

The next (Wednesday) forenoon Dr. Warwick’s cloak and hat were found by some boys in Devil’s Cave, the cloak bloodstained, with two rents like stabs in the breast. It also transpires according to the evidence of Mr. John Gwennap, of “The Stores”, Boscawen village, that at about 3 p.m. on Tuesday a young gentleman with a dog, and without a hat, offered him for sale a diamond, which he bought for £10, and has since found to be worth £700; the young gentleman then bought a straw hat, some ham, and half a loaf; and it cannot be denied that the young gentleman, as described, was very like Mr. Ivor Warwick.

This is all so far known of this most strange affair. Meantime, Dame Felicia Warwick has arrived at “Caerwent”, and the search for Dr. Warwick, for the dog, and for Miss St. Aubyn is being vigorously prosecuted.

So much as to Dr. Warwick; but, if The Advertiser’s editor was puzzled at the uprooting of the yew, and at Dr. Warwick’s and Miss St. Aubyn’s disappearances, even deeper, one fancies, must have been his state of mental helplessness in the face of what follows:

DREAMINGS EXTRAORDINARY

Monday night last appears to have been set apart by some of our fellow-townsmen to dreamings of a rather extraordinary character. The moon that night was at the full, but whether this fact had anything to do with the phenomenon, or whether Mab and all her fairies were abroad that nightlong is beyond our divining: we can but give the facts as they have been given to us.

It is mainly on the statement of our respected townsman, Mr. "Harry" Killigrew, Jnr., of Killigrew Bros., Builders, that we report the following:

On Monday night, or rather in the small hours of Tuesday morning, Mr. H. P. Killigrew dreamt that he found himself scouting in some most wondrous country, and there, somehow or other, there occurred mightily to his mind these words, "My God is in his gauds at the Organ". Now, we all know how powerful are the emotions which overcome us in the shadowy atmosphere of our dreams, but the emotion of this particular dream seems to have been something out of the common. Mr. Killigrew awoke — in tears; or rather was waked by Mrs. H. P. Killigrew, who had noticed his emotion, and had herself awoke from a similar vision. The emotion (as Mr. Killigrew gives it) appears to have been an experience of unspeakable happiness, of the deepest peace; but though the sensations of the dream remained with him through the Tuesday, to such an extent that, like some young lover drunk with love, he could give his mind to no business, he said nothing of the dream to anybody until the evening, when he attended a committee-meeting of the C.E.M.S. (Church of England Men's Society), of the local branch of which Mr. "Harry" Killigrew is the hon. treasurer. It was in the vestry, after the meeting, that, in conversation with the Rev. J. D. Tarring, Mr. Killigrew gathered the singular fact that both the vicar and Mrs. Tarring had the previous night experienced a dream of the like delightful kind as his own, accompanied, like his own, with certain words that somehow occurred to the mind in a most fervent and passionate fashion, the words in this case turning out to be these, "Music is the name of my Love, Who teaches dances to my heart, step-dances to my heart's heart". Being more and more astonished at this matter, Mr. Killigrew mentioned it to Mr. T. C. Robartes, of the Coal Wharf, on meeting him in High Street after the C.E.M.S. meeting, only to hear that Mr. Robartes had himself had a like dream on Monday night! And what were the words that had occurred in Mr. Robartes' dream? they were, "My Love is in His jewels at the Organ" — the identical words (very near) that had occurred to Mr. and Mrs. "Harry" Killigrew! Surely there is something unusual here, taking as accurate the facts handed to us. And this is not all: for Mr. Robartes further reported to Mr. Killigrew that he had heard from Miss "Meg" Lee, of the Almshouse, that she also had experienced a dream of this kind, with like memorable words: the words in her case being, "I will wail to the winds of this world 'I do love you, will you be my wife?'" — and these (apparently) absurd words had to such an extent suffused the old woman's bosom with emotions of love, that all day Tuesday she had been sitting at a window of "the House" with her brow to the breezes, having never previously supposed, she says, that mere wind could be so lovable, and could make one feel so holy and happy.

On learning these remarkable facts, Mr. "Harry" Killigrew set himself further to investigate the matter; and we give below the results of his enquiries between Wednesday and Friday evening at the hour of our going to press:

So much as to dreamings in Penpolack: and one may as well add the last par with which The Advertiser's supplement closes, as it is somewhat droll:

SCUFFLE IN A PUBLIC-HOUSE

At Penpolack Police Court on Thursday, John Vincent, a labourer, was charged with assaulting John Eliot at the Horn Inn during the evening of Wednesday, the 20th inst. P.C. Taylor deposed to apprehending Vincent after the affray, which ended in the discolouring of an eye of Eliot, better known as “The Old Bard”, so often to be seen “touching the harp” in the High Street. It would appear that “The Old Bard” (in his cups) had broached the theory that it is Dr. Warwick himself who has eloped with Miss “Paddy” St. Aubyn! upon which Vincent, also in his cups (though lately converted by Hogan and Dowdy at their revival-meetings at Penzance) had begun the attack, roused to action by the eccentricities of genius of “The Old Bard”. Vincent was fined five shillings...

II. THE DOCTOR

IN ORDER TO explain the things that so perplexed Penpolack that week-end, let us go back to the previous week-end, when Mr. Ivor Oscar Warwick arrived at Penpolack (on the Friday evening).

As he stepped down the steep street from the station, a breeze from the beach in his face, the young gentleman had a book in hand, and, as he grasped his father's hand in "Caerwent" garden, it was with "My congratulations, Sir, on 'Life as a Form of Motion': I have found it interesting".

The Doctor's gong of a voice answered "Faint praise, Sir".

And Ivor, smiling: "Well, it may be my way to mean more than I say, Sir; I will say, then, very interesting".

"Come, that's better!" — a bellow— "we shall have you in a state of enthusiasm soon. But you haven't read it all already?"

"Been sticking to it, Sir — finished it in the train".

"Train, Ivor" — with reproach— "trains are not for reading in! A train I regard as a church on wheels in which to worship That through which the train journeys".

"Well, no doubt, Sir. But" — now his voice dropped— "my mother, Sir".

"Hearty and comfortably lodged; speaks to-night on 'Women as Breadwinners'; sends best love to her 'own boy'".

"My mother" — a mutter, as they now moved into the house — strikingly alike, rather tall, the son less tall, a neater sample of the same article, the same dark hair, brown block of face, the father's eyes having a kinder humour than the son's mood lacked.

In the drawing-room Ivor's eyes ranged round to take stock of any tiniest change in that chaste arrangement of chinās, etchings, realm of a lady of daintiest tastes; then, as the aged Guncotton was still thinking over rising to greet him, he began to call the dog, but was stopped by a gong-voice, "Don't talk!" — the Doctor now having stethoscope-tips in his ears, hearkening to his heartbeats: so Ivor sat silent; till he asked "And the stomach now, Sir?"

"Bad."

"And the nights, Sir?"

"Baad!"

Ivor sighed. "Time for another trip, Sir. Your last to Penzance ended abruptly".

"Yes, and was the cause of a severe cold in the head".

"Indeed? That was kept dark from me, Sir".

"Your mother considered it needless to tell you. It was so, however. Hogan and Dowdy were holding their revival-meetings, the town was congested, so I took lodgings with a woman whose demeanour did not quite please me; and I had hardly been half-an-hour in the house when I learned that she had been divorced. I couldn't countenance conduct so unsocial, so, though it was nine in the night, I decamped — with the result, I say, of a cold, whose sequelæ are still with me".

Ivor patted Guncotton's head, saying "Hogan and Dowdy, by the way, are now urgently converting London. Remarkable man, Sir, that Hogan: one of the master-men, a tone of Napoleon, though a hundred-per-cent American. On Tuesday evening I went in a troop of four, as most people are now doing, to hear him at the Albert Hall, and found myself unable to sneer at that square block of muscle, his face... ‘Come to Jesus!’ is his word; ‘come this minute’. ‘Come’, he says, not ‘go’: such is the man’s egoism, hunger after power, for, of course, ‘come’ means ‘come to me’, ‘behave as I desire men to behave’

“Well, well, a worthy person no doubt”, the Doctor murmured, “and if —” But now a knocking was at the hall-door, and soon Pruie was in with a visitor’s card.

“Who is it? What does he want?” the Doctor muttered over the card.

“Sir”, Ivor said, standing up, “it is a journalist, come to interview—”

“Keep him off me!” — up sprang the Doctor.

And Ivor in an intriguing way: “It is about the raising of the school-age, Sir, and I am rather responsible, was approached about it in London—”

“Keep him off me!” — walking quickly, with his wilful swing of one arm— “I have already said my say on the subject, I will have no traffic with spendthrifts of time—”

Now the son threw up his fingers and hurried out to utter words of comfort to the journalist. When he returned the Doctor had resumed his seat to muse anew with the stethoscope in his ears; and when Pruie now began to bang the gong, Ivor, who lacked the faculty of dining unless “dressed”, grasped his bag, flew up to his room. He was soon down again, but had now to undergo the criticism of those narrow eyes of Dr. Warwick, who remarked “It is astonishing, after all I have said, Ivor, that you still cling to that costume, with one thin vest and shirt to cover your chest”.

The son vented a breath of laughter, saying “Really, Sir, your intellect is like a Nasmyth hammer that indifferently smashes a mass of slag, or fondles a watch, your dogmas ranging from stars to shirts”.

“But I deny”, the Doctor replied, “that stars are any more the object of the philosopher’s intelligence than are shirts... I ask you, Ivor, to go straightway, and put on one of my woollen shirts”.

“Woollen shirts” — a mutter from Ivor, with embarrassed eyelids: no movement to obey.

“Ivor, I suggest this to you” — from the Doctor.

“After dinner, Sir, since you insist” — and now the two pairs of eyes, long, narrow, looked with steady strength into each other, until all at once the father turned and went hurriedly like one in retreat, muttering “Come”.

Then to table, where, in honour of the visitor, were pheasant and claret — not an everyday thing at “Caerwent”, where Economy, as to time and mites, was monarch; nor now did the Doctor, with his radical habit of life, drink wine or eat bird, though, as to his radicalism, the talk during soup brought Ivor to remarking that it was being observed in London circles that the intellect of Dr. Warwick was more and more exhibiting a conservative twist: whereupon the Doctor exclaimed “Let me not be classed with any of those parties! On the one hand a class-interest too preoccupied to cast a side-glance at the good of the social organism, and on the other a foreignness to scientific thinking. Why, you cannot drive cows to town without science — without a knowledge of the truth about cows. Is it any wonder if I tend to what you term ‘conservative’?”

“And my mother, Sir” — from Ivor— “is she with you in this?”

Dr. Warwick’s eyelids dropped, as he replied “Your mother and I, Ivor, are ever with each other”; and, glancing at a clock, he added “She should at this moment be on her way to the meeting”.

“So I was thinking, Sir” — from Ivor; then: “I invite you, Sir, to toast my mother with me in a glass of claret”.

The Doctor bowed. “I will do so”: and when he had let out of a decanter three drops, to fill up with water, the two glasses jingled together; they bowed; the name of Felicia Warwick was breathed between them; they drank: and, the ceremonial over, sat mute some moments, with musings on the woman they loved.

“You do well, Ivor”, the Doctor then said, “to adore the name of that good woman, for from her you get all your goods — your erect skeleton, your cellular aristocracy, and careless physiology; from me — nothing”.

“Oh, Sir, surely”, Ivor replied with shy eyelids, “from you I have something of my — intellect?”

Whereat the Doctor glanced quick at him with gaping lips, then “Ho!” his lungs guffawed, and again “Ho!”, like gongs and guns going off at the vanity of youth, while Pruie, too, wrung her hands in dumb merriment, a ray twinkling out of her eye’s tail.

Afterwards, in the drawing-room, the father and son talked of the new book, “Life as a Form of Motion”; or the Doctor, sipping acid milk, dropped some anecdote of this or that illustrious man; or the son bowed some Schubert from his mother’s ‘cello, while the Doctor, beating time with closed eyes, frowned over the fire, that skull of his looking a true thunderbolt of thought, a vault of baldness, or rolling country mowed by the scythe of time; till ten-thirty struck, and he was up with “to bed!” The next (Saturday) morning Ivor was early down to accompany the Doctor in his walk and run; but, on seeing the old man with a shawl over his cloak, the young man could not help saying “Do you really mean, Sir, to go up through the town like that?”

The Doctor looked surprised. “What, are you not aware that the thermometer fell two degrees during the night?”

Bitterness was in Ivor’s silence: for part of their way to the bay was visible from St. Aubyn’s Hall, and bitter was the thought that a pair of eyes there might chance to spy that shawl. He passed out with his father, remarking “One of my first cares, Sir, must be to make you a present of a hat!", and up they went through the town, then down St. Aubyn's Lane, whence the Hall's clock-tower was visible, to emerge upon a reach of beach, where rock-masses, and purplish shell-work, and lines of surf attacking, like lines of cavalry dashing, ravish the eye.

By eight they were back and at breakfast, but it was not until three, his father's napping hour, that Ivor contrived to start out for St. Aubyn's Hall, carefully dressed, rather pallid.

And soon he stood confronted in a book-room with Sir Borlase St. Aubyn.

Sir Borlase, a spirited knit figure, military, still young, flogged his leg with a hunting-crop, impatiently granting the audience; and Ivor's task here was trying; but, without losing ease and chic, he reached a stage at which he found himself saying that it was not without the goodwill of Miss Patricia St. Aubyn herself that he —

"What is it all about, Mr. Warwick?" Sir Borlase broke in with the throat of some prison-governor or omnipotent colonel, gram, vigorous: he had, in fact, been a corps-cavalry captain (23rd Hussars), had killed perhaps half-a-dozen men — was not unused to killing — and now was a "captain of Fascisti", intimate with Dinka, the would-be king.

Ivor said "My attachment, Sir, to the person of Miss—"

"Well, I'm damned".

"Oh, not yet, Sir", the young man muttered, flushing now. "I was about to say—"

"Wherever did you meet my daughter?"

"In Devil's Cave, in a storm—"

"And on the strength of that, just because your father happens to be an eminent — Father know anything of this?"

"No".

“Your mother?”

“Well — yes”.

“What’s your income?”

“Nothing almost — for the moment: £275”.

“Well, I’m damned”.

“Not eternally, Sir, really. If you will let me tell—”

“Go away, Mr. Warwick!” that crushing larynx cried, “and admit, as you go, that you have permitted yourself to be guilty of a piece of quixotism”.

“Since you say so, Sir” — Ivor stood up: “still, the end must be as I wish it. Believe me, I never abandon a—”

“Nonsense, Mr. Warwick! Good day. And better see to it, Mr. Warwick, that you do not again address my daughter against my will”.

“I don’t undertake”, Ivor called back over his shoulder; and went.

III. TRIPPERS

BUT HE WAS reluctant to flout the will of his love's father, and all that afternoon was in a trouble of thought as to his tryst with her that night; however, not seeing any way out of keeping it, at eleven he was standing solitary in the shadows of an orangery behind the mansion — standing, pacing, prying, aware of dancing going on in the house — sounds of tango — some moon-glimpses sometimes prevailing against a heavenful of vapours, oozing through in hues of opal. He muttered “Come!”, and after a while saw her like a white swallow hieing, jumping tomboyish some terrace-steps with a hop-and-a-skip to finish, holding out her hand to slap a tree-trunk in running past — fresh from her début, a plait still slapping her back when she cantered, she being a crack rider, daredevil, had won prizes at gymkhanas, at Olympia, and jumped fences at Tunbridge Wells, a flushed girlhood, frank-faced, clad now in a satin that hugged the little curves of her figure, a little Marie Stuart coronet adorning her forehead, orchids at corsage; and now her lips are murmuring on his, and now a hurry of half-phrases uttered, rapture of interrupted prattle.

“This is henceforth forbidden”, he began to say, she saying “Such a job to steal out!”, and he: “Dear of you!”, and she: “Did you bring the golf-balls from London?”, and he: “Yes, and forgot them at ‘Caerwent’ — forgive! I have been troubled about coming: your father—”

“I know of the interview! There have been pained silences and a parent's resentment since!” — her phrases uttered gallopingly to an end, till the next phrase struck her and arose to be galloped through— “Well, we can run away! like René Robartes, and it ended a week later with everybody weepingly reconciled. For I do like you; and those who like me have to learn to like you too. See! I managed to smuggle out my box of buttons — only show them to chums — was showing them to Violet on Friday — Lady Violet Vyvyan — but we had rather a quarrel — over you: I asked her, Oscar, if she thought you handsome, so she said she thought your face too solid a type, then I said she had not properly seen you, and it led to words, though she likes your chin. Can you see? — this one is a Uhlan's button — this is a Spahi's — got it last week, a gem — this is a 2nd Black Watch—”

Ivor's lips dived to her hand, where they now sat on alabaster within a bower. “Paddy! I love you for your liberty from sin, your true purity of spirit!”

This struck Paddy silent a little, until she gravely remarked “I hope that girls are all that people suppose them”.

“And for your frankness I love you! your immaculate frankness of character”.

Paddy pondered it. “Well, I suppose that one is frank enough; but don't think, Oscar — girls are like milk that curdles when kept—”

“I am still ‘Oscar’, I see! That is rather my father's name—”

“But if I prefer it?” Paddy gravely asked: “Violet likes ‘Ivor’, and I ‘Oscar’, since we differ on principle. Let me! will you?” cuddling his hand, prying up into his eyes.

But all the time Ivor's sense of right was in a state of unrest: he presently said that, though the day would come, it might be months before he again spoke or wrote to her. As to the new make of golf-balls with X-rayed core-concentricity, since he was staying this time until the Wednesday to see his mother's home-coming, he would bring the balls at eight on Tuesday night, put them on the sun-dial, and, if Paddy was then at a window, they could fling a kiss.

Now Paddy was sad. She muttered “So we don’t run away?”

And Ivor: “Paddy, you are not serious”.

“I am”, Paddy answered: “girls are no longer filial serfs. Papa would suffer four days, but is it not rational that one should suffer a little four days rather than two, awfully, four years?”

Kissing her fingers, Ivor replied “You expect me to be wildly pleased, but I am not really. All you Paddies are so badly educated! — intellectually, morally; until lately you even had little physical education: so that everything greatly good in you is due to your own innate goodness of grain, not to training. Your gadding careers of golf and gallop, your luxury, your unconsciousness of such a thing as discipline—”

“Thanks, Oscar”, Paddy drily replied: “but do you know what you are doing now?”

“What am I doing?”

“Copying the Doctor”.

On which Ivor, taken aback, blushed, chuckled uneasily, stood up. And presently they kissed for the final time in that epoch of their lives, promising heart to heart to be constant, and he watched her trip from him among the tree-trunks like riches which take to themselves wings.

That was on Saturday night....

The Sunday he passed in his father’s company, only stealing out awhile to lurk in churchyard leafage, and spy at his sweetheart leaving the church.

On the Monday morning once more he accompanied his father’s walk and run; and it was on their homecoming over the shore that a conversation took place on the new book, “Life as a Form of Motion”. This book (stripped of its technicalities, mathematics), may be described as a conservative reassertion of the Newtonian absolutes of space and time: it states that in an infinite void in which was nothing but “a stone” and “an eyesight” — no ether, no “frame of inertia” to which motion could be referred — there would still be a “real” difference between a state of rest and a state of motion in the stone; and though the eyesight could not be aware of a difference, realities are not affected by the eyes that see them. Here Warwick, like Maxwell, boldly says “the error of Descartes”, yes, and boldly says “the error of Maxwell” as to Maxwell’s statement that “‘state of rest’ has no scientific meaning”. For Warwick, rest is as absolute as space, motion as absolute as time. And he advances the doctrine that motion is an evolution, the aim of “Substance” being speed of motion: and since Life is a later-born mode of Substance than Light, and since “thought” is the trait of Life, so, by way of thought, Substance is destined to move swifter than Light, or already moves swifter somewhere: for it was natural when locomotion began in animals that the part of the animal foremost in progression — its head-part — should acquire a sensitiveness, being in direct contact with the environment; and natural that, with that sensitiveness motion would quicken, then with quicker motion intensified sensitiveness, then still quicker motion, and so on, till the brain evolves into the organ of omnipresence. As to the Einsteinian statement, based on is good enough the increase of inertia with velocity, that the velocity of Light is a cosmic maximum, this Warwick dismisses as a statement too hastily made, apart from the “phase velocities” of de Broglie and Schrödinger, which far exceed the speed of Light.

But Ivor Warwick that morning shook the head of an engineer, saying “To me, Sir, I confess, the notion of living things moving by mechanism quicker than ether-waves is an impossible notion: for me, where, if v is more than c , you have an impossibility”.

“Well, but, Ivor”, the Doctor replied, “consider what you are doing — using the algebraic word ‘impossible’ in the sense of the everyday ‘impossible’. Can the square-root of minus-one be impossible in the everyday sense, when a branch of mathematics founded on it is found true? We scientists have lately been enticed into making some untenable statements — such as that an electron is not matter-having-a-charge, but is just a charge; yet it ‘has mass’, which we define as ‘quantity of matter’; so we say that an electron is not matter, and is matter. Again, a gas when cooled contracts per degree by $1/273$ of its volume — at 0° : so — 273 is called the Absolute Zero, for at — 274 the gas should have disappeared, to become a minus-gas; but the thing isn’t true: Onnes has got to within one degree of — 273, and there was no prospect of disappearance. Or again, to say that the mass of an atom at the velocity of Light is infinite is to say that its mass at rest is zero, that the mass of a sun at rest is zero — which is nonsense. No, let me not be like a frog squatting to argue that the telegraph is an impossible thing to living beings! It is not for men to decide what is possible to high types of Life. Consider the swiftness with which Life on this globe is already beginning to move — men now commencing to shoot themselves into the air on a kind of kite, their first brutish notion of an air-boat. After one little million years! — one click of the clock of God. Is it not, then, froglike to deny the likelihood that after another million God will have cut the string that ties men by the leg, like hens, to the sun? How, then, must it be with those systems where Life of a high type is five, fifty, million years old? They send out swift wings. Sceptic as I am, I state positively that with the sons of such the maw of Space is at this moment populous”.

“Odd, then, Sir”, Ivor replied, “that none of them have ever dropped upon us down this way”.

But the Doctor: “It is not odd; and I am astonished that you imagine it odd. Look at this, lately sent me by the Astronomer Royal” — he produced a photograph of some puddle of suns— “in this gulf of suns a dwarf-G like our sun is gone out! and only God’s eye could find this globe. Moreover, numerous as worlds are, the universe consists little of worlds, consists of space, in whose darkness worlds are sparks far scattered. It is not odd, then, that such trippers do not appear before us every weekend — though we ought not to assert that such feet have ‘never’ walked our earth. If three such trippers are now alighting in some outlying region of China, Africa, and are seen, we may never know, no record would be kept; or they might alight in Cumberland, in London at night, and not be spied: their trip to earth would probably be flitting, for, familiar with earths in the condition of this, their interest in such faulty fauna as men and monkeys might not be much. And, even if seen, they might not be perceived to be living things, they’d probably bear no resemblance to moth, or hydra, or flying horse, or aught that ever entered a man’s heart to fancy... And yet I don’t know: in the bibles of old tribes we find persistent stories of visitants from the skies alighting to while away a noontide at some nomad’s tent-door, infusing rude rules of duty into the barbarian’s brain. What if such a tradition, orally handed down, arose from some actual visit made to men before the invention of alphabets? Be that as it may, what I am sure of is that some day, ages hence or next month, one such tramp will surprise the eye of some child of Man”.

This talk about “tramps” and “trippers” lasted through breakfast, and after: but in the midst of it — to their dismay — arrives a wire summoning Ivor to London...

It was urgent — from the Works — a fault in the water-circulating plant — the generation affected — so that Ivor now found himself deprived of seeing his mother on the Wednesday, or Paddy at her window on the Tuesday evening. As to Paddy's packet of golf-balls, he had decided, in deference to her father, not to communicate with her any more at all until he had floated an invention as to which he cherished money-hopes: so now he finally decided to give the golf-balls to Pruie on the sly, to deposit for him upon the sun-dial, "at eight on Tuesday night": Paddy, spying Pruie do this, would guess that he had had to go away. And, after telegraphing to his mother, he left Penpolack that (Monday) afternoon for London.

But Pruie absent-mindedly put aside the little box of balls on the sideboard; and after dinner that night the Doctor saw it, questioned her as to what it was. When she looked confused, he the more insisted, and in the end she lost her head, saying, in her loyalty to Ivor, that she had to put the packet on the sun-dial at the Hall on Tuesday night— "for Mrs. Warwick"! letting slip truth and untruth in the flurry of her two impulses to reveal and to conceal.

"For Mrs. Warwick..." the Doctor muttered, utterly puzzled; and Pruie, who knew that to Dr. Warwick an untruth was a horror, persisted in the fib, reaffirming it with urgency, until she nearly believed it herself.

"I cannot understand it", the Doctor said at last... "Stay, I will myself lay it on the dial"; and while Pruie threw up her eye-whites, the Doctor put the packet in his pocket.

It was still there when at ten-thirty he sipped the last of his acid milk, bid good-night to Pruie, stepped up to bed.

Above he looked some moments musingly into his wife's room, then, in his own, after winding his alarm-clock, and taking from a little cupboard, painted white, stuck on the wall, his quarter-grain of sulphate of morphia to swallow, he stood before his mirror five minutes, practising smiling — for the ridiculousness of a thing never had one pin's influence upon Dr.

Warwick's will, if to practise the thing was rational in his eyes; and, knowing that the muscles by which one smiles show a special tendency to degeneracy in age, there every night he stood at his mirror with tremulous lip-muscles, desperately merry. Then to bed.

Soon, though, he knew that this was to be one of the "bad nights" — his cauliflower at dinner not quite soft-boiled. Moreover, from half-past eleven to twelve a tantrum of thunderstorm thumped and stamped, lightnings standing at his side in his midnight privacy like flying visits of Michael, thunder bumping — no sleep; still none when it had ceased; many times he had to sit up, pestered with dyspepsia, payment of his life's toil for Life in science, he thinking anon of death and the grace of the grave; and the voice of the great deep grieving noised in his ears, and the Hall-clock, mocking him, sounded the hours, mile-stones of the night.

At two he stood up — a thing new to him: but the thought had come to him (from somewhere) to try to walk-off his sighings; and there he stood dressing himself, little enough dreaming of the stupendous messenger of change even then impending upon his life, flying to him, as lightning flies, through the immensity of the night.

Then, candle in hand, down he crept, stealthily, not to rouse Pruie; below put-on hat, cloak; examined barometer, thermometer; drank, in the drawing-room, half a glass of water; and, leaving the candle-gleam there, went out, the dog at his heels, Paddy St. Aubyn's packet of golf-balls still in his pocket.

Out there the garden made fragrant the warm gales from the sea — aloë and camellia flourishing rich in it (in February) amid a redness of rhododendron; everything still save the sea and what little winds serenaded the rhododendrons' reverie.

He paced down a lane made by two hedges of euonymus — his own garden-hedge on his right, on his left the hedge of Carew's Clause.

This lane led immediately to the beach, where he started to walk westward on hardish sand under cliffs which stretched away to the end of conception, some boulders tumbled about their base, their summits gay (by day) with masses of samphire, with lichens, within which sea-fowl lay eggs; though grim now, frowning.

An islet lying black in the bay, a jetty lying black, some lonesome boats moping on the sands: these the eye could spy, and the sea, the cliffs, the sky...

A sky covered over now with cloud like snow all in flakes, an apocalypse of clotted milk, the skin of Naaman, the leper; and in the very centre of all that, like the key-stone of a vault, the moon, reigning supreme, slow moving, like a lady pacing her estate in a musing mood, now ghost-white, now silver-white, granting transfiguring glories and glimpses to the midmost mass of the dome of snows.

The Doctor's eye adored. How high the moon seemed! How hugely higher she was than she seemed! and it was well, he said in himself, to have lived a little, and to have beheld a little, and to have been permitted to picture dimly a little in one's soul some traits of the greatness of this glory. Yet that pageantry of God was hardly any longer the passionate paradise of romance in which as a young man he had rambled over these very sands and crags — he began to recognize that fact. Something more and more ailed in him, failed in him. He was growing old — was old. As he strolled, his meditation was of the grave.

How foolish, too, he felt then, was the notion which he met among some scientists that Life, as it climbs to higher types, must become unemotional, all light and sight without warmth! — foolish, because bliss, toward which

Life, as it acquires science, moves, is. itself an emotion, and because perception, the mother of bliss, is itself bachelor and barren, if unmarried to emotion: for, if it is the truth of everything that everything is wonderful and lovely without end, and if wonder and love are emotions, how without emotion can the truth of anything be perceived? how? since light is the child of heat, and gloom and death and cold old suns go together? Ill, then, is it with the aged brain that lives on, chilly seeing, when the brazier in the breast is trembling toward its embers; and blessed then is death for men...

But as the Doctor walked on with thoughts of this sort, all at once it was as if some unutterable thing impended upon his being, so that he found himself stationary, expectant, waiting, without being able to say what it was he was waiting for. Count, however, six ticks — and now a sound, not loud, yet distinct. It resembled the tremblement of a tubful of bees buzzing on the breeze — somewhere above and behind him; and, spinning, he peered on high to see.

A bit of the moon was visible, and Venus, too — or what he took to be Venus — in a nook between two mounds of cloud; but Venus nearer the moon than he looked to see her, and in two seconds Venus immensely more luminous than he had ever seen Venus. And, if Venus should be hurled to earth, not in the least increasing in size to the eye as she hurtled nearer, but increasing in brightness by millions of times, until the eye in offence and pain penned itself up tight, pierced by that spear of light, so it was with Dr. Warwick then.

It all seemed to happen to him in the dazzlement of three or four mad moments. As he was squeezing his eyelids tight, to hide his sight away from that blistering bright, he felt his left little-finger “asleep”, with a tingling that in three ticks had spread up his left arm, thence to swarm all over him; the old man then began to stagger — as when, one’s leg having “gone to sleep”, if one ventures to bring it down to the ground a little, the whole thing goes tingly like strings trilling: so, after a temporary struggle with his legs, down he dropped, the dog also prostrate with him.

At a sound of something which slapped the sea, a splash, he anew opened his eyes, trying to rise, and now knew that the dazzling light had vanished, as his paralysis, too, had vanished; but now quite near in his ears was a sound as of machinery thrashing in drowsy action; and in the midst of picking himself up he was aware of a whimpering coming out of the hound, aware of a palace now standing on the sands, partly amid the sea-foam — and, hardly fifteen yards from him, two living things.

The instant his eyesight lighted upon them the certainty pierced like a spear of ice to his nerves that people of earth they were not, and a whisper left his lips, “Why, what is it my eyes see this night?”

IV. FROM NOTES OF DR. WARWICK

THESE “NOTES” (MEANT to be read by himself alone) would fill two books, so that nothing but the scrappiest fragments can be given here, except in respect of his interview with a certain “egg”, which is very interesting, since new truths are made known, so that it is given in more detail.

They seemed to be on fire (he writes), pouring out flame and smoke of every colour of the rainbow; but this, I soon understood, was only their hair and clothes, which were so light, that, though scarcely any wind was stirring, they were like fires in a hurricane, wildly whirled — I could see, since they were luminous, and there was some moonshine, mixed with an offshine from the mansion; nor was I incapable of observation, for my knees, though weak, were not weak from fear, of which I could feel little, for I found myself knowing something of their thoughts, knowing, for example — half-knowing — that what they were after was a handful of sand of some special quality; and this commonplace fact, too, I knew of them in a mood of emotion belonging to starlight and the hollow of the heaven of heavens.

I saw both of them pick up sand, look at it, drop it, before their eyes rested an instant on me and the dog, then, apparently finding nothing in us to interest them, darted off to Carew’s Clause yew. But the old fogey felt himself a sort of host, I suppose... [At the date of these Notes we find Dr. Warwick not only writing thus slightly of himself, but actually sometimes writing of “the old fogey” as “he” instead of “I”: this, later, will seem natural to the reader.]... felt himself a sort of host — representative of Man! — and stepped toward them in welcome, saying “My Lords, if you will deign—” upon which their eyes were anew flying from the yew to me, the bigger one now flicking something from his hip toward me, and straight it came, as if attracted by some magnetism in me, to flop upon the top of my forehead, and fit and stick — a thing like a plum, with a cup cut out of its tip, they also having such plums on their forehead-tops (as I saw after) — an object which I have named “psychophone”, though I might as well name it “osma-phone”, since it intensifies the sense of smell, perhaps to the canine extent, perhaps more, and I have found it associated with wavelengths between heat-rays and wireless: anyway, I could now know that the big one said mentally to me “Speak with the mind” — a communication received by me, not as an impression of telepathy, but so definitely somehow, that I knew that, if he had said it in English, then he would have said “speak”, not “talk”, “the” mind, not “your” mind; and instantly he was done with me, to look anew toward the yew.

In a moment more the yew strained, wrenched its roots out of the ground, sprang and crashed, with that row of sounds which Pruie, too, now awake in “Caerwent”, was aware of (as the papers tell): for the bigger one (less big than I) had in his hand some object resembling a watch of gun-metal, with which presumably the uprooting was done, this watch being one of five hung at his right hip.

He then bowed himself down before the littler one, caught her up, and like a ball of fires of all colours flew over Carew’s hedge into the hole left by the yew; to be back within some seconds, letting sand or marl drizzle from their hands — found unsuitable, no doubt — the big one now again darting a glance at the Doctor to say to him “Pray, come to your dwelling”, and now, after again bowing down to, and catching up, the little one in his arms, was off like flying fire to “Caerwent”, looking like a comet as they soared across the two Carew’s Clause hedges which form a corner, uttering then a sound not unlike nightingale-laughter, while the Doctor ran along the sand after, hearing clearly in his head and in all his heart a voice that said “I will say to the winds of this world I do love you, will you be my wife?”

I can’t help laughing — the old fogey’s legs could hardly carry his haste and cloak and cargo of pants, he trampling with stumblings in the insubstantial sand, throwing up his eyes to heaven, wondering how Felicia Warwick would have acted, if present! But I felt a sense of no little relief when they left me there a little, the stress of their presence being pretty intolerable to Man, as when some rumpus of guns or some organ’s grumbling causes an unease within the eardrum, as when the vigour of a train’s vibration is raving near past one’s brain, and its gravitation perniciously giddies, dragging the feet to desperateness after the magnetism of its momentum.

However, he made haste, and there, on his entrance, they were in the drawing-room, without having asked where the house was, the big one now saying mentally to him “We pray to be shewn a desert on a map”, he answering aloud “Yes, My Lords, thank you, thank you”; whereupon the big one again said with some emphasis “Speak with the mind” — possibly because my every breath blew the flame of them about; and, since a French window, too, was open to zephyrs that wildly whiffed them, thrice I saw his nakedness, and twice hers — the big one having only one garment (from breast to knee), and under his feet soles of something like copper-plate — how kept-on not evident — while the little one’s feet were soleless, though she was voluminously clothed in a smoke of opals, in thistle-down, spider’s-web, if the filaments of down or web were fifty times flightier than they are, and were dyed in iris-fires: not that the stuff was thin, I think, for it was not pellucid, but was a fluff woven in some loom of moon-pigmies, a gossamer, a phosphorus-glow, woven, I think, of their own kin's hairs, fifty of which, I divine, would be as fine as a spider's filament. That hair! Out in the moonshine I had imagined that their heads were huger than elephants', they looking like sketches in the papers of celebrities with globes of head stuck upon pins of body; but, in fact, their heads were hardly double the bigness of Man's, the rest of the bulk being a tubful of that hair, which, slightly lighter than air, had a tendency to flow upward and backward from their breaths and movements, though, occasionally, burial might overtake their faces, as burial overwhelmed Pompeii. Nor anywhere else than on their heads and eyes would a microscope detect a hair — a fact of which I am sure from the aspect of their skin, which resembles the centre of a fire where it is white-hot.

But though similar in texture, dissimilar in colouring were the two tubfuls of hair, the prince's being a flow of gold-light flowing like a flag of light, his tunic, too, a flow of gold-light, while the lady's hair, like her garments, was of all the gauds of gardens, daffodil, poppy, violet, light-coloured, illumined, not like splashes of petrol spilled, whose colours, reflected from single films, are impure, but like opal-strata colours, strata of chlorate-of-potash crystals, visionary like visions of the sun's spectrum that come to visit one's window-sill some splendid day in May, and the eye, delighted, smiles — each hair, it appears, having several sheens along its length (like the peacock's), the mass constantly glancing, fickle, each instant shifting to some new view of hues — the sex-differentiation of the two being more marked than in Man, the male's head higher than the Doctor's shoulder, while the female's hardly reached to the male's shoulder; and the male's fingers, on which something like finger-nails were visible, were longer than Man's, especially the thumb, while the female's were of Man's size, and had no sign of nails; the hands of both shewing certain stains, blemishes, like hands fresh from the work-bench or laboratory; nor had either of them toe-nails, the big toe of both being bigger than Man's, though their feet seemed littler. The male, moreover, was all unadorned, save for an object big as a penknife, covered with something pink (like plush), which lay on his chest — an object which the Doctor afterwards conjectured to be a magnet; but she, on the contrary, was gorgeously adorned, like some mango-tree impurpled with birds of paradise, which stands aburn in some sunset-flush that floods it — a jewel on her forehead, on each thumb, on each great-toe — artificial “jewels” apparently, since full of motions, of fires tumbling, eruptions rolling on themselves, belches of sparks and flashes — alphas sparking across to betas, or striking zinc sulphide, I fancy; and her eyes struck me as still more wildly alive in flight than his, her forehead erected to a still loftier upliftedness, having scribbled across it “this way to the Temple of Intelligence”: and indeed three times in my brief intercourse with them he yielded to suggestions of hers...

I can't help laughing — that old soul's shock when she, stooping, threw up her opal-smoke of flimsies behind with quite a womanly gesture, to let drop something out of her upon Felicia Warwick's drawing-room carpet, he then opening the book-case to get the atlas, but seeing with the tail of his eye. His modesty's eyebrows! alarm for the carpet! Ah, those old Victorian fogeys, they tickle me to the roots of my soul — that old Carlyle, Ruskin, Matthew Arnold — even, on the higher plane, Darwin, Spencer: ach Gott, brilliant, yes, but ridiculous in moral posture — the impurity somehow of their prudery, the sin somehow of their stiffness— “made in Laputa” should have been stamped upon their chimney-pot hats. When Darwin had to tell of a baboon's amorous emotions toward young women he told it in Latin. Now, how offensive to an untainted mind. He! the essence of the scientific spirit — how deeply infected must have been that nature with the leprosy of Puritanism. But what timid people! Afraid! Of what? Of nothing special! Just afraid! — result of centuries of slavery, of landless men, and that craven puritanism, “God-fearing”, which followed quick upon the grabbing of England from “this happy race of men”. But, then, courage, gentlemen, after all! Oh, come, courage! I can’t help laughing! Animo! Avanti! Forward the Light Brigade, Light-bringing! Charge for the guns! — don’t you know. Years he delayed before he plucked up courage to state that his theory of descent included Man too. What a thing! I can’t help laughing! He! so what must the others of them have been like? And I the worst of them, I think! — refusing to stay in a lodging-house because the woman was a divorcée, “catching a severe cold” through it, too — I can’t help laughing — good job, served the old beggar right. Like that Dickens: for ‘damn your eyes” he wrote “bless”, or sometimes for “damn” they dared “d — n” — the dull souls. And it is not laid yet, that seventeenth-century corpse that walks: Hogan-and-Dowdy! Bentley told me to-day that three million copies of their hymn-book have been sold, in England alone, within three weeks — such “hymns”! That Hogan — a force! More than Napoleon, I think — in ambition, in vim, in business ability. Napoleon failed to invade England: Hogan has done it. Having saved the soul of America, now he is at us. Isn’t going to trouble about the soul of France — too ‘cute a nut to throw away time and money like that. There was a Revolution in France, dukes were butchered there, the slave’s posture and habit half-abolished there; but he enjoys himself in England — saves our souls hundreds at a go, with just the airs of some Rockefeller of Wall-street, with a stretched-out arm, “compels us to come in”. Oh, brother Hogan, we two are likely to come to blows, I think: one planet not big enough for us both. For I, too, look, am out to save the soul of America, and England, and France, and neither your debaucheries of emotionalism nor my own carnal debaucheries shall be allowed to bar me: wait, the Young Men are coming — well started, catching on; on Sunday the 5th my second lecture at Steinway Hall on “How to Get a Truck from Elgin to London”. And that old chap that “I” was — I can’t help laughing — a philosopher, yes, but all infected with puritanism, morally a villager. And he had a second shock when the prince picked up what the princess had dropped out of her to kiss it, and stick it at his hip; then I saw that it exactly resembled the negative carbons of arc-lamps — was, in fact, pure charcoal, ashless in combustion (as the egg said), and is used by them for making diamond tools. She had done it as pigeons do in just a tick, as indeed all their activities are alerter than birds’, they appear to be living in a fever, breathing an atmosphere all oxygen, walking in the midst of some urgent furnace, their life a rage of flame, like prairies on fire; and they sigh — aye, something of unease in that bliss, I could see, as though the burden and surfeit of Being was a bit too much for their mortal bosoms, he, in a fickle visit to the window, looking up to say “this beauteous moon!”, and they sighed — it was too much for them — I could see; and she, fevered, tossing for ease in that hotbed of her hectic heaven, tossed out of her “Music is the name of my Love! who teaches dances to my heart, step-dances to my heart’s heart” — emotions which I now know to have been potent enough to diffuse their fume of V-waves to people asleep, even in Spain, Sweden; aye, and though they were never one second quiet, yet, thrice, in some instant of less unquietness, I saw come into the eyes of one or other of them a lost stare, a down-gazing gloating in their iris’s glow, that stared as in craze and daze, like eyes that have stared down into the belly of the pit of emptiness and been amazed — quite a human look of lunacy: and in truth nothing in them more surprised me than their resemblances to men: the expression of their faces, though strange as Pan and ravishment, not so alien to my eyes that I needed the passage of any time to see in it beauty's self, and music's self, made visible; in their eyes the spirit of fire, Sirius spitting gleams of green mixed with sparkings of carmine — pride, I think, being the main trait of their expression, a pride benign, old-established before this earth dashed out to join in the universal dance and joy of circling. But greater still, may be, than their resemblances were their differences from men, their skin being like films of porcelain behind which some flame is shining through, so as when finger-tips at a flame are inflamed to a living pink — especially their necks, within which either my senses or my imagination seemed to detect the circulation of a flame; their legs, too, (the thighs), markedly longer, stronger, than Man's; their hips more swinging; arm shorter, the short trunk all lung apparently, their breasts swelling out, out, like bellows, with every long-drawn draw of breath; and that length of leg steps toplofty-like, toe-pointed, steep as some conceited toe gone adance in the gavotte, the little princess appearing tall, exalted, princess of some star afar, the airs and graces of the company among whom their figures moved to music-of-the-spheres being such as human speech could never tell of, so that the eye, seeing, fills with tears of desire, and again and again my throat was groaning “the dear ones, the dear ones..”

I can't help laughing — just as the old chap's agitated hands had discovered the atlas, and he was moving from the book-case with it, he could see rising to a crisis on his sofa their love of that Hand whose designing in the Night-silence had finally wrought them to their height of fineness, they now all involved in a storm of admiration, feeling, I suppose, that same carelessness of the old soul's seeing as when human lovers dote and do in a field, careless of the seeing of sheep; and afresh his decorousness was surprised — though he should not have been! since he had already seen in their glances and gallantries a reverence without end, an admiration ever shivering on the edge of rage. Anyway, there they now were, fused in a typhoon of union, intolerant of dualness, bent upon being one with what was framed so fair; and I was turning to avert my eyes from their plight, not to witness the manifestation of springs so fundamental, when they vanished from me — or nearly vanished, for I could still see a spectre of luminosity like a streak of phosphorus-sheen wheeling round and round the room, up near the ceiling — so swiftly wheeling, hundreds of revolutions a second, that nothing of them but that spectre of their hair's flame could the eye divine; and so for two, three minutes of stillness, the old man now feeling his feet rambling about some paradise, as when at Jove's and Juno's love the universe flushes to love, suffused; in the midst of which suddenly I heard them speak — or sing, say — one voice like the cuckoo's in quality, one more like the wood-dove crooning, something like this seeming to come to my ears:

She: With a woola, woola, woola, He: And a wolla, wolla, woo, She: And a yoola, yoola, yoola, He: And a yolla, yolla, yoo; nothing of the meaning of which reached me, nor, I think, of any of their mentations restricted to each other.

When they reappeared, separated, and descended, the old man was at the side-table lighted by its candle, bent over the atlas, seeking the Sahara, the leaves crackling a little in his ataxic hands; and was now aware of the instruction "Come".

On looking round, I saw her rush her thumb down the two sides of her nose in a flying gesture, indicating my wrinkles to him, I feel sure: for at the same time she nodded toward Guncotton, which was cringing in the corner near the scrivania, and her meaning, I could see, was "both afflicted with the same senility": whereupon he, with an off-hand negligence, directed toward the dog one of the objects resembling watches which hung at his hip. A little noise of crepitation followed like grit trickling upon a table's polish, and Guncotton gave out one yelp, as if shot. He then at once sprang to his feet, to stand with his legs stiff, spread apart like a trestle, his neck bent, gazing with steady attention downward, as if expecting a mouse.

At the same time the Doctor was advancing toward the pair at the centre-table with the atlas open, bowing, saying aloud "Thank you, My Lords, thank you", meaning nothing special, when the princess said to the prince "Success seems likelier on that biggest moon of the big planet", whereupon the prince made an obeisance; then, letting his eyes rest on me, said to me "Shall I destroy you? It is improper that your race should know of us". "Thank you, My Lords", the old man let slip, adding mentally "I shall never divulge it: your Majesties may rely—"; whereupon the prince: "Pray, come with us, bring the book", and, after again going through an obeisance to the princess, he caught her up on his arm, and all in a gale of hair and garments was gone.

After them pressed the old man's steps, unnoticed by the hound, which still stood there by the secretaire, stiff as death, staring down as at some mouse-hole, wrapped in trance apparently; and down the lane the Doctor trotted, to come out on the sands; but now saw no one; yet felt himself guided, and trotted on along that façade of the palace which faced the cliffs — the palace being a seraglio built of what he fancied to be glass of some prismatic kind, but afterwards found to be diamond, the architecture Moorish in suggestion, four-square, the length of the façade which faced the cliffs, as of the façade which lay in the sea, stretching like streets, the distant regions appearing petty in perspective; over it a multitude of domes; with many a turret stuck-on, château-fashion; no windows visible, but the whole honeycombed with holes big as a shilling, some much bigger, the air in the house not gravitating through these holes to globes, because, as I gather from the egg's law of gravitation, the house becomes more gravitating than the globe. Anyway, there these holes were, perhaps helping to add to the whole its aspect of a decorativeness that was baroque, the fabric looking in the moonbeams a fabric made of rainbows and of a sadness of lunar musics, "made without hands".

V. WHAT THE EGG TAUGHT

ALONG ITS CLIFF-FACE the Doctor's steps trotted, he not without some apprehension now as to what they might intend to do with him — take him away to some other sun? never to restore him to home and friends? But he was without any power to stay his steps, and presently reached an orifice, coffin-shaped, in the façade, inside which he found the prince, alone now. As I stepped within, the prince stepped to tie round my neck a ribbon attached to an object such as he wore on his own chest — a bar covered with plush, my bar afterwards proving to be a magnet; and of the things which I witnessed that night this tying struck me as among the most wonderful: the quickness with which that knot was accomplished — with a neatness that was complete, nay, dandified. Every action must occupy time; but really this action seemed to me to be immediately completed.

At the same time it was said to me “Pray, be not afraid”, the prince then pressing inward, followed by the Doctor's trot, along a boulevard of moss under four rows of fruit-trees, Christmas-trees rich with jewellery of fruit, until they arrived at a round place, or well, of diamond, about the size of Piccadilly Circus, surrounded on the floor above by a balustrade, up which well the prince ascended, bathed to his heels in his flame of hair, the Doctor taken with him: by what force taken I cannot say; I had again to say to myself “here apparently is action-at-a-distance”; and I was paralysed as by curare — muscularly, not nervously.

We alighted beside the balustrade of diamond in a heavenly hall, perhaps twice the size of the Albert Hall, the whole a jumble of diamond-hues blushing in the four or five moonlights that somehow suffused the house.

In this hall were two other beings: one of them, a huge being, seemed a mist or spirit moving round about the dome — some evenings ago I saw in the sky a cloud of gauze, touched to greenish, that reminded me of him — his left leg hanging straight, his right thigh cocked horizontal up like a climber's climbing, and, in between, sheets of chiffon streaming in streaks and reeks of mist, his little wings, too, consisting of whiffs of flimsy cast out, like arms cast up; his face horizontal by nature, upraised, staring straight aloft as in prayer, nor did all that storm of mist consist of aught artificial like vestment, it was all himself, and consisted of leaves — leaflike things of mist — his left foot being like a tree-root sticking out beneath that profusion of leafage, and I believe that it and his leaves feed direct from atmospheric C02 and H20, his race having evolved in former eras from trees, his lips not being for eating, but for singing. And, in addition to him, there was another — on the floor, remote among the iris-sheens, yet my eyes shied instantly from the sight of her, while I whispered “Oh, no, I mustn't see that!”, for like a tigress she sprang upon my consciousness, like an apparition of Life itself — twice the size of woman, stout, white-brown, nude but for a veil that, hanging from half her hips' breadth, drizzled to her knees; and unbearable was that sudden sight of her vitalness, as of a thousand lives stuffed into one, of her wild eyes, her attacking attitude — a being large and sharp, armed with strong authority to draw sword of justice, and execute judgment among the nations; and she, too, had short wings, so that I classified them both as oviparous mammals, and pterodactylous.

As my eyes shied from her, the prince said to me “Pray, sit behind that hanging” — a coffin-shaped hanging of beads, like opals beaded; and, as, moving toward this, I looked back, I saw the prince pass away through a vast coffin-opening far off in the hall's wall, followed by the sharp lady, whom I name "the angel", as I name the cloud that circled-about "the bird-tree".

Passing now through the hanging, I found myself in a round room of one of the turrets stuck-on, hardly as large as my "Caerwent" study; and it was dim in there, in spite of five little lights of different tints — crimson, green, indigo — that gave out no radiance, being like the local glimmer of glowworms, with some X-ray trait, for they exhibited my finger-bones — these shines lying round the edge of a basket, made of something resembling phosphor-bronze, that rested on a tripod, beside the tripod being a species of chair; nothing else visible there: so, as I had been bidden to "sit", I assumed that I should sit on this chair, though it was so high, that the old man in his cloak had some difficulty to climb into it; and now, having climbed, he found himself close beside the basket: so that by the glowworm glimmers he could now see within the basket the billows of something green — gauze, moss, cotton — and on this stuff a ring of roses as big as bowls, that looked blue, within that ring being an egg, less big than an emu's, that had on it a plum, or "psychophone", like that on the Doctor's forehead.

He now let himself drop at his length upon this "chair", and, hand on heart, panted there awhile, until a sighing of the "bird-tree", sighing nigh, spurred him to lift himself to peer out through the bead-hanging. But those sighs! and those eyes! sighs of willows in a wind, and pine-woods sighing, that windily uttered "Ah, hala, ha, la", and ever again "Ah, hala, ha, la" — fires of sighing which reached the ears not only when that restless patrolling of the air ranged close, but from afar came the echoings and ache of them, haunting with noises all the hollow of that enormous hall: so that "here", I thought, "is Love in trouble"; and I thought of congresses bethroning cosmic altars, the being having somewhat of priestly in his aspect, sphinx-priestly, because of his head-dress maybe, his breadth of brow being bound by the band of a kefie, or Arab head-dress, of an unearthly purplish, which fell spread-out over his shoulders; and priestly was that sphinx-smile of his sphinx's-lips, blank like the Absolute that inhabits the everlasting Dark, its lines as nicely defined as if carved from emerald — the whole face vaguely greenish, irradiated by some greenish ghostliness of glow, bathed in the ghost of chlorophyll or emerald, as of one who has fared through the gates of death; and the throat so thrown back, that the profile was horizontal, rapt in a stress of trance, a long stretch of line lying between chin-point and neck. I observed, too, that his left foot was rootlike, birdlike, but the right was a hand — in addition to his wing-hands — a thing for which I could not but praise God, so often in my workshop have I yearned for a third hand, when I have had to help myself out with my teeth or chin; nor did his pinions ply at all, being vestigial, I think, no longer for flight, being quite unable to bear up that bulk, however light the bulk. And those sighs! that out of his heart of hearts sighed “Ah, hala, ha, la”: aye, the God that he flew like a moth about was a bit too much for him — I could see; and those eyes, whose lids veiled their meditating, until he lifted them a little to sigh “Ah, hala, ha, la”, and then I saw two moons of furious phosphorus.

And steadily round he tramped about the Lamp of his infatuation, save when, with that nimbleness of his, he twisted to alter his path a little and avoid a ball — for all round the hall, forty feet aloft, ran three rows of mouths like trumpet-mouths, in each of which was a ball of what seemed steel, one or another of which would suddenly decide to fly out of its trumpet-mouth across the hall into some other mouth; and, if the ball in that other mouth was not yet out, the new-corner would wait a moment in the air until the other decided to fly out — an intercourse transacting itself everywhere with an incalculable business and intricacy: otherwise nothing was in all that spaciousness of hall, save what was certainly a work-bench, this (not far from my den), being at a place where the circle of wall was flat for some thirty feet; on which flat piece were tools of diamond hanging, a prismatic mass, and, lying on a table of steel (?) beneath them, a confusion of tools mixed with diamond-crystals, with filings, drillings — one machine looking just like a human power-drill, another something like a lathe that has no mandril, another like a dynamo that has no armature; and there were three piles of charcoal-sticks like negative-carbons, such as the princess had dropped from her at “Caerwent”. But what most attracted the eye at that flat spot was a pair of lights in some chamber beyond, which lights constantly flashed past that flat part, vanished, and flashed past anew — shines of a blueish hue like sulphur-sheens, dimly perceived through the thickness of the diamond wall, like shines watched through oiled paper: and these shining apparitions gave an impression of being living things, of the bigness of Man, given up to a madness of dancing.

To them several times the Doctor’s eyes were drawn awhile from that burdened bird-tree that circled and sighed, while perhaps five minutes passed; and then he was aware of a being flitting toward him athwart the hall, a little uplifted above the floor, a being like the two “dear-ones”, with a flame of hair that flew behind, he bearing on his right palm a slab of diamond that had on it a kind of biscuit together with half-an-egg of diamond standing in a zarf or egg-cup — this half-an-egg being full of milk: bearing which, the being brushed through the bead-hanging, to bow low, to proffer the food to the Doctor, and to utter to him something like “wolla, wolla, woo”. But something of lower in him, something of non-natural in the right of his eyes to see and be, half-informed the Doctor that this was no direct product of Nature, but an attempt, and a failure, of the “dear ones” to make a “dear-one” at their chemical table; none the less there broke from the old man’s lips a hearty “thank you, My Lord, thank you!”, to which the manufactured soul, bowing, answered something like “yoola, yoola”, as who should say “do not mention it”, and immediately was sailing away in streaming flames of hair, like a man entranced.

The Doctor then proceeded to eat the biscuit, which, wherever he broke it, bubbled out along the break into a lot of little globes, glistening, black, like globules of ink-dew, like boiled currants, some pigmy as pins’ heads, some big as pills, all very transitory, active, popping into collapse for new dewes to exude and pop, their acid taste suggesting a very strange place to the palate’s fantasy; and mixed in the milk was a something, a honey-dew, whose name he little knew, though pretty soon he knew from its whisperings within him that it was made of the aromas of that same lotus of the Lotus-eaters, which let a man once eat, it shall be well with his soul. He wished that there was more of it.

Even as he finished that feast, he was conscious of a broil of waters outside the house dribbling with a showery briskness, like a chaffering of sparrow-crowds prattling: so, conceiving that this was sea-water dribbling back into the sea off the palace, which was leaving the sea, and at the same instant seeing the bird-tree hurry away out of the hall, he got down off his chair, in order to gaze abroad, feeling a little guilty indeed, since he had been bidden to “sit”, but now made bolder of soul by that milk, and unable now to sit still, and not see.

To see, he found in his turret-wall several shilling-holes, and three into which he could put his head: so could see the breast of the Bristol Channel moving deliberately away, with moonshine brindling its billowing; and soon, as when steam-pressure is increased, could see it quicken speed: on which his mouth murmured aloud “I journey; holy, holy, holy; Lord God Almighty; heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy glory”. At the same time he became conscious of a voice of bells chiming the song of the solitude of the voyage with a forlorn noising, which constantly chimed “me, fah, soh”, and “me, fah, soh”, “me, fah” short, “soh” long drawn out, in tones sweeter far than ears on earth have heard — seeming to come from some remote distance outside the house, or seeming a dream of the eardrum merely, or seeming but the music of the labour of the universe, that, like a musical-box, in the process of its labouring ever vents bell-tones and dulcetness of lullaby — a noising more Orphic moody than those voices of awe given out from insulators on telegraph-poles, that like souls call soh, and like souls wawl doh, all a squally wet day of Autumn; nor did this sweetness cease one moment from haunting that humming inherent in the eardrum’s hollow with the monotony of its cosmic noising, save when it was lost a minute in screams of music which every three or four minutes pealed out somewhere shrieking, rose, soared to tragedy and distraction, then fainted, failed; then the treble of the bells telling the meaning of their lamenting to the secret eardrum; and presently again screams of sweetness pealing, outcries as of crowds of syrens gripped to their rueful wombs with pangs of travail, clamouring their calamity; then the bells, the bells of heaven, telling their me, fah, soh, and their ah, 00, mm, to the tune that the Buddhist’s bosom moans and moans when the mood of Nirvana moves his heart, and he moans it with doting, and more moans it with obstinacy, obsessed, rocking his body for very revelry of soul: as now the Doctor, too, with the wind of that ship’s voyaging in his hairs, and that solemn milk in his veins, found his throat moaning, and still moaning with doting, the old ah, 00, mm, and ah, 00, mm, and ah, 00, mm, and me, fah, soh... until he stopped a little in his astonishment at the streams of meteors through which the ship was now speeding, the speed having now increased from some dozen miles to perhaps hundreds an hour; and still the wind of its quickening was rising; a sea of clouds now down below, flooring a hall, all roofless, of stars and darkness; and now crowds of meteors streaming down, that in three minutes became a rain of meteors — only a petty proportion of those in the upper stratosphere, it appears, ever reaching the lower strata to be seen below: and wild was presently the sight, everywhere those lines of fire diving into the sea of night— “noctis signa severa” — flags of fire that the gallant planet flies in her flight, a conflagration of straws garishly mixed with fireflies and with moths of light that toss their pinions to perdition in millions — one crashing like shrapnel upon the palace; then they were dashing fainter, through nitrogen now; and now through hydrogen; some seconds after which, suddenly the wind of the ascent was done: the old man understood that he was “in space”; and, from the sights that presently met his eyes, could see that the steed he backed had passioned and was gone, its bands forgotten.

During two or three seconds his weight so vastly increased, that he was far from being able to lift his hand, until something mysterious was done to set him free. Meantime, the palace had vanished from him, his body vanished, all vanished but a blueish little mist of something that moved and moved round about him, so that he felt himself a spectre, not upheld by anything, dwelling in endless emptiness; as to objects outside the house, he could watch none long, because the house was waltzing in its winging, subject to some wheeling motion; but he could still judge that the speed now must be at least triple the speed of ether-waves, with so swift a shrivelling did the whirling rims of the earth and moon, which for three ticks filled the universe with confusion, shrink and waste away, reeling deep away into the pit of distance; and now he saw the sun a sovereign, within three minutes to see it sixpence, within seven a day-star dwindling wee away — sights that the eye perceived by light-rays not overtaking but overtaken.

And next he was gazing back at a tangle of three crescents, red and angry, that for some instants loomed, filled the universe, melted, wasted, as when pats of lard pass away in pans (these three being Mars and Mars' moons, which were then "in opposition", and on the way to Jupiter in opposition too). Then such a star-light as passes understanding, the constellations fixed like candelabra that never twinkle in any wind, but burn bright, to turn to twilight that blackness of the tabernacle of Him Who inhabits eternity, Who in twilight sits wise and still, and twilight is His lonesome home; the bells of the abyss ever telling within the ear their me, fah, soh, the soul of the old man moaning with doting his ah, oo, mm, and me, fah, soh, and ah, oo, mm; and now, somehow, moons — a multitude that ever loomed and melted, full moons, new moons, remote and close, an archipelago of continents — fragments (probably) of some planet that had exploded in that zone — he passing so close under one of them, that he could see smoke, hear sounds, from some mountain's bowels rumbling, and there he had the uneasy feeling of standing feet-upward — outcries of choirs now pealing, crowds of syrens griped, griefs which shrieked wildness of sweetness, as now came dawn, drear dawn breaking, with warmth, with fierceness of heat, with whiteness of light, wild instants of affright, as beneath his feet appeared a sunlike region, which in an instant rushed forth to fill the field of Being with a blistering brilliance, while a crash of wrath, heart-shattering, thousands of thunders' hubbub, blustered about him, as down to the floor he tumbled. It lasted only so long as when one lifts one's palms a little from one's ears in some clamour, and claps them back, after having heard a burst of hubbub like a bung that bursts out; yet for some minutes he lay stunned, hearing still some bumps and rumblings of that thunder: this was Jupiter, so that some species of atmosphere must surround Jupiter, hundreds of thousands of miles deep; and, if Jupiter, then the sun, millions deep, in which case Mercury may enter it at perihelion, this causing that shift-forward of his orbit's long-axis, as well as the Einsteinian refraction of star-rays that pass nigh the sun.

But there in the neighbourhood of Jupiter the speed must have slowed down, since it was some minutes before he felt the ship touch land, and through the bead-hanging could see the mariners come back into the hall: whereupon he scrambled upright, to clamber back to sit, as bidden.

Thence he saw the "Caerwent" two vault the balustrade of the well to descend, followed down by that bird-tree: so, as he inferred that they were going out to get sand, he again got off the chair to gaze out at this strange territory, which he guessed to be Moon I, of Jupiter. But he could see little more than that he was on some desert, its billows so mountainous as to bound his outlook to an acre of dismal air; and, more to increase that region's moroseness, even here could be heard certain rumblings — of Jupiter's thunders, he believed — which remotely boomed like guns going off somewhere within the gulf of Being; rumours, moreover, of sea-billows booming remotely on some shore seemed to reach the ear, and to reach the eye a shadow afar, a grandeur of crags, among which, to the left, some Vesuvius reigned — a rufous fuming there; and, to the right, low down on the horizon, a drowsing eye, another moon, a crescent looking ten yards in length, but blood-red, uttering no radiance, "making darkness visible", surrounded by clouds of tar and by tar-rainbows, like an eye "blackened" by a blow, when it glares blood-red through a wreath of negro rainbows; and when some life — some flying horse that cawed, some ore, or raucous cormorant — flapped past me on its business into the darksomeness, I mourned with woefulness "O, home of shades and unhopefulness of soul!", for this moon, like our Luna, rolls once only in a revolution, that portion of her globe being given over to glooms.

But I had not been eyeing three minutes into that benightedness when I was surprised by a wireless, and heard in me the words, “Well, I have had sweet sleep, and sweet my dream: for I dreamed, mark you, that I was embraced with the female of some little race like the Zwiffs or the Ohms. But in the midst of bliss I was awoke by the thunders of some sun”.

Upon which the old soul, astonished: “Am I addressed?”

There came the answer, “Who, then, are you? I have been hearkening to you; but your thoughts are hardly formed in firm terms”.

To that the old man answered “I, My Lord, am of a family called ‘Man’, my home being a planet orbiting close among the rays of a sun whose name is ‘Sol’; and the planet the men of my race name ‘Terra’. But who, My Lord, are you — and where?”

His answer was the question, “This is not your Terra?”

And I: “No, My Lord: this is some moon of a planet far enough outside the path that my Terra treads”.

Then he: “You have not visited this moon before, I think?”

“No, My Lord”, I answered: “my father and my mother marked the stars as sparks afar, nor ever left the earth of their birth; but I am better than they this day”.

Nothing was then said for some seconds, till he: “As to ‘who’ and ‘where’, here I am — the egg — in the basket. When, then, did you enter the vessel? And do you go with us to the Event?”

“I entered this palace twenty minutes perhaps ago”, the old man said, now mounting again into the chair— “bidden hither with my atlas by two who have plenteous heads of hair, and seek a sand among the spheres. But as to the ‘event’ you mention, of this I know nothing, Sir”.

Now from within the speckled shell came out “Those were the Zwiffs that bid you — myakamus! The Ohms you would not be permitted to see; but they may be spied as flying lights through the wall of the hall: for they have long been dancing, will long be dancing, this day”.

“Yes, Sir, yes”, I said, “I can see — I can see — lights that fly as in dance”.

And he: “They can see by heat-waves! And that will please me to see them dance, myakamus! — if ever. Anon they spin as spinning-tops which cuts of a whip chuck askipping: joy is the whip which cuts them skipping”.

To this I answered “Yes, Sir, yes: this I can conceive. But as to you, Sir, when will you be hatched to behold the universe?”

And he: “Soon. But how tell you when? Your ‘twenty minutes’ said to me ‘twenty little intervals’, not how little. But tell me the two masses, and that Terra’s orbit”.

This I now told — our diameter, specific gravity, mean distance, telling that “kilometre” means a thousand Zwiff paces, and how often we rotate in a revolution: from which he must have got the square of our velocity in his own time-units, and so our year and day: for at once he said “In eight, then, of your days, myakamus!” (What this “myakamus” meant I never discovered: something like “amen”, maybe, though sometimes it seemed to mean merely “pish”, “pshaw”). “I shall then see the suns! for only such things I now spy as my mother in teaching me pleases to shew in a shine which is dingy; but then in white light I shall see the might of life in her eyes, the Zwiffs, the Ohms perhaps, more clearly hearing that melodious roaring of my father’s throat. But even now I can see not ill in a lightsome place: so now lift me, you; you have hands; and take me into that lighted hall awhile: for my father and my mother are elsewhere, and no one may know”.

I can't help laughing — this put the old man in a dilemma! for, shy of refusing, he was yet reluctant to put his foot into anything unorthodox — and the tone of the request had been pretty stealthy: so he decided to reply “Well, Sir, you see my position... And, if I dropped you? For though this moon is of less mass than my Terra, gravity within the palace is practically a constant, and your weight may be considerable”.

It was now that I noticed the ghost of my finger-bones and his skeleton in those glimmers of glowworm that surrounded the egg, for I had bent eagerly over in “speaking”, fearing that he might be offended at my scruples; but not he: he was a good easy fellow — his tone of soul anon reminding me of a boy, anon of the frivolity of the nightingale's garrulity, and soon again of the mourning-dove mourning. He had a zeal in teaching, a species of pedantry or pedagogy that belongs to boys of a bright type, like my old schoolfellow Barnes, who went about asking us “Can you spell ‘Chedorlaomer’?”; through which pedagogy my egg presently got himself into hot water, which is bad for eggs: for he revealed to me secrets of Nature which it was improper for him to blurt, and was overheard. As the mariners were absent on the sands quite twenty minutes, during that time we two became good friends, I presently finding myself speaking easily with the psychophone, nor was I long in discovering that, chick as he was, here was an intelligence markedly above Man's; aye, and profound enough has been the result of those utterances of his upon my soul. Cosy we were in there, we two; and, ah, God, how dreamlike now to me, like a dream teeming with some mood of opium, and musings among deep-sea reeds, was that communing within that nook. But I will put on paper while I may with some freshness of memory the things which he said to me... As to being lifted out, he did not resent my wariness, but said “It would matter little if you dropped me: but, then, you would come under my mother's wrath; which is sharp".

I now said "Your mother, Sir, I think, is a being with wings, such as we men have some conception of, naming them 'angels' — forgetting, however, the probability that angels lay eggs".

"Yes! she is my mother", he quickly said.

And I: "I am only astonished, Sir, that so small an egg should be laid by so large a lady".

"High type, small egg, myakamus", he remarked; then: "And you have seen my father?"

I answered "No, Sir, only the Zwiffs, your mother, and a bird-like—"

"He is my father", he said.

And I: "Well, I am astonished, Sir: can your mother be the wife of one so different in type?"

To this he replied "Not his wife — his wife's wife. My father embraces, but cannot impregnate, my mother — her ova are not quick enough; but he impregnates his wife, who then is set wild with desire till she impregnates my mother — But only to speak of this inflames me: let me not speak of this. With you are two sexes, I see, but some planets have six: for many are the modes of heaven. But on all the forty planets of our sun sex is threefold, we being Baramomahs, and our home, far remote from this arc of stars, is a planet — larger sixfold than that of yours — which wanders about the star Bolbia, he appearing from hereabouts, my mother says, as one among six, dim-eyed in a mist of distance, averted from these worlds in preoccupation with their own affairs: and that Baramomah of Bolbia is my mother's home, more beloved by those who know her mountains and groves than a thousand globes that roll, round her swinging two rings of little moons of different hues, and, so swift her spin, they visibly wing, those fires, so that her skies fly wild at night; and swift of wing, like her, are her offspring, and strong their voices in song within her forests. And at Baramomah arrived the Ohms in this their mansion, to invite my father and my mother to witness with them the event that impends in heaven; but they left my father's wife behind: and in this bark of the Ohms my mother dropped me from her in some region of the heavens half-way between our Bolbia and that star whose name is Hossom, whereto the Zwiffs return from wandering, their blissful birthplace: for the Ohms yearned for the company and comfort of the Zwiffs on the way to that event; and at twenty-five times the speed of light we sheared the ether to reach that Zwiff-sphere, which is a sphere in what seems from hereabouts a coronet of suns, lying nigh to a barrow or box that has a handle; and thereabouts, four orbits remote from Hossom, orbits that home of the Zwiffs, whereto their eyes lift in the vast of Night when, far away, their ships rip the paths of space; and three rich moons roam round that sphere, one of which their throngs flock to occupy in Spring, on one they live in Summer, moving to the third in those months when fruits turn purple; but to their Zwiffa they return to abide when through winter nights winds repine within their pine-woods. But as for the Ohms, no more have they a dear home of their own: for down upon Ohmor, their dear sphere, moved at last an old moon that, bombarded in her path, had spent energy of revolution; at whose approach Ohmor's crust, disrupting, broke-up in flames in a day of tribulation and everlasting darkness of disaster: she with that moon, and with a rabble of planets and their moons, moving to troop toward Bowkham, like a crowd of cows confused which run with slouching — toward Bowkham, their sun, set in that very coronet hard by a barrow or box that has a handle, which coronet is enriched also by the Zwiffs' Hossom: so now in frenzy of dreadful revelry down into Bowkham's bowels of combustion tumbled, as comets outspreed, that mob perniciously, as when moths pitch into perdition — O, days of break-up beyond conception, O, days of God... And now far scattered among the stars the Ohms are, sojourning lonesome in strangers' homes whenever their wherries rest from roaming the realms of heaven; yet, as you see, they dance and are glad: for, long, long ago, from those eyes that they lift their God has wiped all tears”.

Now he was silent awhile, till I asked him “And what, Sir, is the nature of that event in heaven which the Ohms are tripping to witness, bringing with them the Zwiffs, and you the Baramomahs?”

To this he answered in a confidential way “They call it ‘improper’ to reveal truth to lower types, for each type, they say, should reach science by its own road, unaided; and though these my words are turned furtively toward you, it may be that I am being overheard by instruments of precision. Yet I may venture something: for we two are well met here in this snug hour of our lifetime, I lying sluggard, with gossip, an egg penned in this home of gloom, you ‘Man’ of some planet, come somehow upon me for company, you, too, still in the shell, unhatched into that larger day which is lit by all the suns. Know, then, that that event is a meeting of two old suns, which, even as I speak, quicken their zeal to meet, and speed their wings, having already flashed into freshness of rapture — not remote from here it will be, one hundred billion miles — so from all quarters the lords are swarming with their instruments to witness it; and in the fume of nebula that is forerunning that fury of rendezvous the Ohms intend to bathe, for from bathing in it eight seconds they expect a certain rebirth and virtue, though, if in eleven they fail to rescue themselves from it, they shall for ever perish. But of yourself tell something, your morphology, your knowledge, that I may know you better”.

To this the old man answered “I, Sir, am a placental mammal, a biped, wingless; not far advanced, alas; and many to this day are the pains and strains of my race, and many the tears we weep”.

“Nevertheless”, was his answer, “hope you without fail in that blessed Hand which is among you, to bring you out one day to astonishment and song, in Whose Will is our Well. Before I dozed my mother told me that we were at a little planet rich in sap, on which Life will quickly commence to thrive — within five million years, she said; be this your comfort: for that planet. I think, was yours. But how much do you know? No doubt you can — express the energy of a particle moving with simple harmonic vibrations?”

“Oh, yes, Sir”, the old man hastened to answer: “that we can do”.

Then he: “Can you — make the alkaline earths, the inert gases, the metals?”

“No, Sir”, I answered, “that is far from men”.

“Why far?” he asked; “you already have some advancement in cosmography, know the gravity, distance, size of your Terra — How did you find the size?”

I now explained to him how, by triangulation, measurements of base-lines, with theodolites going, zenith-sectors, we contrive to find the earth’s size. This, though, affected him with what I took to be a chuckling, after which he remarked “But all that must occupy many of your days! why not do it in a few of your minutes?”

Upon which, astonished, I suggested softly to him “Sir, will you not tell me how?”, and he, after answering “Oh, it is improper!”, did tell, leaving me feeling silly at the simplicity of the thing. This was his way: Observer A, at a, observes a star (or sun) on his meridian, then observer B, at b, on the other side of a length of water, ab , whose length is known, observes the star on his meridian at an interval of time, t .

If θ is the angle at the earth's centre subtended by ab , then $\theta : 2\pi :: t : \text{a day}$; this gives θ , i.e. gives $\frac{ab}{r}$, so r

(the earth's radius) is known.

When he had told this, says he "Can you" — halting in quite a boylike way— "sum the p th power of the m th n of the r th order of polygonal numbers?"

I answered "No, Sir: the natural numbers, yes — not the polygonal".

And now he: "Do you know — how solar systems come to be?"

To this I answered "I think so, Sir: for we men have a 'nebular theory' which supposes a disc of mist in an incoherent state under a reign of heat; this is spinning: so its rim splits into rings, which contract, on cooling, into planets; the central mass becoming a sun".

But he asked "Have you, then, no moons with retrograde motions in your system?"

When I told him "Yes, a few", he asked "How, then, does your 'nebular theory' account for those?", and when I had no answer, he said, to my dismay, "You see, then, that that is not a good guess... Tell me this: what is gravitation?"

"Well, Sir," I said, "we do not know why gravitation is, but we know that, for some reason, every particle attracts to itself every other: and this men name 'universal gravitation'".

"Myakamus!" says he, "every particle?... How, then, is it that particles have not attracted one another into a single world eternities ago?"

When to this, too, I had no answer, he said “Stay: do you know that two currents of electricity in two wires attract each other, if flowing in like directions; repel each other, if flowing in unlike?”

“Oh, yes, Sir”, I hastened to say, “our schoolboys know that: we call it ‘Ampère’s Law’”.

“But”, says he, “is not a ‘current of electricity’ a motion of electrons? And is not everything electrons? So that everything in motion is a current of electricity? and your Terra is an electro-magnet, since her rotation round a core of iron is as if current were flowing in wire round the iron? So, then, things are polite: two things moving alike attract each other for road-companionship; moving unlike, make room for each other, shying out of each other’s way; not moving, neither attract nor shun. Did you not feel your weight increase after the palace started into speeding, until its gravity was regulated? Is not your weight on Terra due to your motion being quite like Terra’s, and would be more, if her motion was quicker? and animals on big planets can lift a limb, since bigger planets go slower? and a sun and a planet attract each other because both are moving alike on the sun’s course? yet do not crash, inasmuch as the planet is moving unlike, on an orbit, an inner planet moving fast round, to repel more, an outer moving slow round, to repel less where attraction is less? and a magnet attracts a magnet when motions of electrons in both are in the same direction, repels when otherwise? This, then, is the law of gravitation: that like motions attract, unlike repel, owing to a kind of politeness, complaisance, laziness, or least action, implicit in matter. So the rings of that nebula of yours would not contract into planets: for, since the opposite arcs of a ring spin unlike, and repel, the ring would split into pairs, myriads of bits, meteorites, as those rings that roll about the home of us Baramomahs. So this is not how solar systems come to be: it is a question of sex”.

“Sir, you say sex?” I said.

And he: “Yes, sex is inherent in things — suns that have a female diathesis being usually bigger, those having a male diathesis being denser. Shall I tell you of Og and Mog, whose conflux is that event which the lords are flocking to watch? Yes, I will... Og is male; Mog is female. Think of them as both moving upward through the floor, attracting each other; think of the doorway as westward: then Og is being attracted from West across the floor, Mog from East across the floor. They had got to be old-M suns, they two, gone cold and gloomy, long lone with God; here were the eras of their meditating and dreamy memories of early eternities; but for some thirty million years they had been subconscious of each other, and had yearly been drawing nearer... And while they are yet a great way off, Og sends out to Mog a voice — a species of speech between existences so inherent as suns being no fancy, but a reality — Og, I say, utters to Mog a call, ‘I have long been conscious of you... If we met?’ And Mog, with modesty: ‘I also may admit that I am not unaware of you. But you, a Power like you, do you do such things? as do the little meteor fly-by-nights?’ And Og: ‘Stronger than I is Law... If we met?’ Meditation now in Mog; dumbness of some millennia; till there comes from her ‘I am at present somewhat loth, reluctant: I have other calls, other thoughts of heart, and hungers after a path, My Lord, that no goshawk knows, nor the Hunter’s Dogs have nosed it. Then, a long habit of continence... Still, things are not unattainable: sue me to you, woo me to you, lick me, tickle me, and perhaps — perhaps’... This Og does; and presently it is nearly agreed; they can be said to be engaged: by Heaven, their steps quicken on the hills... After yet a millennium Mog calls ‘That Who moves us be our witness!’ And Og: ‘And offspring may He grant to our travail, and long lead them, dealing leniently with them on their voyage to completeness of joy; and in His Will be their bliss'. 'So let it be', Mog calls, 'amen. Behold, I come quickly, with singing'. 'And I also', Og calls, 'with song'. By now they are hot, are no longer balls, both having disrupted in combustion at some point closest to the other where gravity dragged strongest, there to be drawn out and out; whatever spin either once had being now arrested; her form now is a pear with legs; his form now a rod sticking from an apple, rod of metal-vapours — gold, lead — the radiums, uraniums — settling at the rod's very end, as heavy dregs settle by gravitation; the pear hotter than he, softer, lighter flying, owing to his more of mass that summons her; at the pear's tip a crater, whence a river of ions is streaming toward him, and, if I could make a drawing of them, you would at once remark a resemblance to the electrodes of an arc, she the anode carbon with its crater gaping, he the smaller kathode with its (almost) point: for she in her fierce career is a current, millions of amperes more than he; and all between them are her atoms, ions, giving her two hips, two legs, of vapour, opened, faintly luminous; vapour repelled from him, as comets' tails from suns: for, if two things are attracting, some of their motion must be opposite, involving repulsion: from a sort of memory of which repulsion in the loves of suns it is that come reluctances, scruples, in the loves of living things; and soon her crater becomes a tube, owing to the pouring forth of the heavier elements from the crater's centre. So now they are close: a dumbness pervades Heaven's depth; put your hand upon your mouth; what the heart is far from fancying is about to be. If they are still sixty thousand miles distant, count six ticks more, they are sixty miles distant, and already there is mixing betwixt the nimbler troops that forerun tripudiary: out now to him, as from her eyes of desire, strike ten thousand lightnings' frightful light; cruelly ten thousand times ten thousand thunderings drum grum some moments — her momentary gruff roar of hungriness; in another half-a-tick she has him snatched far in her heart... And now may That Who designed them help them in that plight, and see to it, for it is touch-and-go with them; in that billionth bit of a minute He must be busied with billions of mathematics, and be charioting their ravaging with a shivering wrist: for it is rough love, and no fun, they rend each other dreadfully, and do not spare; she especially, in her intensities, will send him from her maimed and lamed. The coitus is soon over: for though he strikes her right in the centre of her crater-tube, the direction of his stroke is not exactly in the line of her axis, they both being still under the influence of other astral attractions: so round now, the instant he digs her, he begins to spin and giddy her, she him, and glib as butter they go areeling, as ball-bearings that go reeling sing-a-song, as spinning-tops that go reeling asleep, breathing a snoring. On that little obliquity, then, of his coming all will henceforth depend: if on a clockwise curve he has come, things in the world-system now at birth will eternally be counter-clockwise; if counter-clockwise he has come, things will be clockwise.

The instant, too, that he enters her, friction checks the speed of their denser front-parts, but hardly checks their flimsier back-parts, which continue their onward flight, his through him into her, hers through her to meet, impede, and mix with his: this while they are still east-west; wink once, though, and already he has her reeled several degrees — counter-clockwise, say — she ever rushing on, he rushing on, piercing her deeper, pouring ever, she pouring, trillions of loads of it per tick; and so until he has her tip pointing south, when, withdrawing, he is free of her; and away they go, he on his eastward way, she, pregnant, westward away, presently getting again her pear-shape, disfigured at the love-struggle. How far they will now travel apart you can calculate, if you have data as to mass, energy of meeting from infinity, coefficient of viscosity, of friction: an ae~kt. Out westward, then, she dashes, until at his drag her speed fails; whereat a thing quickens within her inwards: for that flimsiest stuff which has rushed from him into her little wishes to hark back with her when she hankers back, but fights to fly on, pressing to-and-fro within her, imprisoned by her spin, becoming a cylinder or eel of flimsy within her, its less flimsy elements gathering as a nucleus near her centre of gravity: which nucleus may be half-inclined to hark back with her, but before it, behind it, lie millions of miles of flimsier stuff, rough to be free, which will be as dynamite to the nucleus, mightily explosive at the decisive moment. Now, then, is the struggle: she tugs, it tugs; and now her hour is sore upon her, sudden heart-pangs of travail, throat-roarings, rueful throes: till out, with rough eruption, it leaps an eel, reeling counter-clockwise like her reel, bestial but impudent, grotesque but egoist, wriggling, grinning, ecstatic, there in the face of star and galaxy and the moody gloom: an eel, or two, or three, or more, a litter of eels that reel: a planet and its moons are born... The planet consists of nucleus-and-flimsy exploded at west, the moons of flimsy only, after-births, not true explosions, just oozings shooting through the tube-wound torn by the nucleus-explosion, oozings stopping before south, to start anew after north. You may expect, then, a great regularity in the distances between a planet's moons, because they are born at similar intervals; and you may expect outer moons to be bigger, because born later when her speed is less, when the flimsy shoots keener, sooner, longer, between north and south at every succeeding rotation — though an outermost last moon may be small, consisting of all that is left of the flimsy; and, if a moon consists only of what oozes between north and west, its motions may be retrograde, for what oozes there reels clockwise; and, since what oozes between west and south reels counter-clockwise, moons consisting of both jets will spin slow, the two jets checking each other's spin. But all spurt serpent-like, as eels, lizards, lancelets, to evolve similarly in millions of æons, turning next into birds surrounded by wings of flimsy, like suns' coronas, their axial diameter longer than their equatorial, as in young suns, in birds' bodies; and next, no longer sunlike, they become globes stuck round with four stumps of limbs, to which their wings have shrunk, this lending to them a square look; and in the end the serpent, the bird, the trunk with limbs, becomes a spheroid, its axial diameter less long than its equatorial, a skull with temples... But now Mog is hankering back, since her motion across the floor does not affect the continuity of her motion, and Og's, up through the floor, to which parallel motion their mutual attraction is due, as two dogs run long together, to grow fond, before coitus: so she hankers back; but hankers also toward the thing that is born to draw her heart-strings; and the mother fights some time with the wife. But she cannot tarry yearning in the nursery: Og is coming, summoning, she knows his moan, 'Come, my own, my spouse, my sweet one', and after a little lingering, wistfulness, wheeling in dance her feet trip eastward to the tryst. Not long wheeling! no leisure for anything when the fever, seizing her, sweeps her to fierceness, his pull on her tip soon ending her spin. Still, the vis of the spin persists, so that she does not come full-butt at him, but holding herself reserved, averted, her crater pointing always a little north of east: whence it is that living females say no, meaning yes, inheriting it from this little difficulty and diffidence, flirting aversion, of a sun coming to love: so again Og reels her, and again they separate, she now, again pregnant, to east away, he now to west. And so they go on, meeting following meeting, each separation briefer as to space though nearly equal as to years, having some isochronism of the pendulum, Mog like a censer swinging, swinging, offering to God at every swing's end a whiff of incense. If, though, the first meeting is not so full-butt, Og does not go on eastward after it, nor Mog on westward, but both turn back after revolving round their common centre-of-mass, their paths thenceforth being a series of ellipses, of which their centre-of-mass is a focus — ellipses which continually shorten, at their apsides on the same (east) side of the centre-of-mass all the planets being born. Anyway, the whole is sexual: no solar system can come of it, if the meeting is between equal masses: one mass must come faster, softer than the other, in order to receive and carry off the planet-stuff, difference of parent-masses being the main factor in deciding the size of planets; and since this difference is less after each tryst — he parting with mass at each — you have the law, ‘outer planets big, inner little’. But, then, opposed to this is another law, ‘inner planets big, outer little’: for since the energy of the meetings is less and less, her spin becoming less intense, there is more and more leisure for flimsy to flow: so a planet tends to be bigger than those before it. You have, then, two opposite laws: and their consequence is that the sizes of planets proceed in series: first the first law operates, and a big first planet has birth; then the second law operates, and a bigger has birth, then a bigger still, a bigger still... but this debauch so exhausts him, that down with a crash rushes the size of the next-coming planet from biggest, not to big, but to middle-sized; whereupon again the second law operates, and you get bigger middle-sized, biggest middle-sized... and now again, the first law operating, down with a crash rushes the next-coming planet to little, and, if there is room for more, to bigger little, biggest little... The one next after the biggest is usually exploded by some approach to that bigness, so, if the mother is then thereabouts, the explosion, kicking her, raises the energy of the next meeting of parents, enhancing the meeting’s damping effect, lifting a little a graph of dampings-against-meetings, so that now the graph becomes two parallel, instead of one straight line. Draw a graph of your own system, and you will see — the damping-factor being the ratio of amplitude-of-excursion to next-following amplitude. The dampings of the first two meetings will be much the same, meetings between thin gases, but now the graph will spring upward, then will come down and down in one straight line or two parallel, to spring upward again at the final meeting when the two cores graze. Then when there is no room for more the two spouses coalesce, never more wholly to separate, their two-and-fro motion still continuing with the pendulum's periodicity in a perpetual coitus, the friction of it causing that persistence of the heat of suns, causing periodic eruptions of sun-spots, magnetic storms, variable stars, and other phenomena of suns: so now his arms have her, and now for many a millennium in Heaven let her fatness pamper him, her paps satisfy him”.

When he now stopped the old man said “But how, Sir, am I to thank you for telling me this?”, to which he answered “Why you should thank me is that it is considered improper, and I risk being reprimanded. But you, tell more of yourself: do you know what that mist is which lies flushed over the night-sky, and is like a skipper skipping, as when bipeds skip with skipping-twines?”

To this I answered “I think that I know, Sir: that mist, or ‘milk’, men make out to be the rim of this our system of suns”.

“Yes!” he zealously said, “you know something! There, some day, some son of Man may stand, and see this region of our system a mist”.

And I: “Can it be, Sir, that any life of this region ever aspired to fly so high, the distance being some fifteen thousand light-years?”

This he did not at once answer, but then answered “There is a planet, not far, whose name is Falpalav, famous in this our galaxy, since the gallants of that planet have gained that galactic tract, there to see astral things; and down from that zone to this visitants of old have roamed. But on Falpalav no type of this part of our galaxy may land, for the lives of that globe, known as ‘the Gylfens’, have acquired mines on mines of science, and, mining up science like ore-of-life, are potent above fancy, having power to shatter a planet by a shout, and at ninety-five thousand times the speed of light they sound the deeps; or so, my mother has told me, is the rumour throughout heaven, she frequently sitting there where you sit to teach and bespeak me; but from an excursion to scale the gates of yet a galaxy those adventurers of Falpalav turned back for very vertigo, agaze, bedazzled: for no less than eleven hundred galaxies can be reckoned by us of this; but we must believe that there are billions somewhere: and my mother asserts that there is one thing which the Worker can never finish — never through eternity can erect an intelligence worthy to worship Him. But tell what more you know: do you know — in what way Life climbs?”

To this I answered “Well, Sir, of that I know something, men naming that process ‘natural selection’: for those less fitted to an environment die out, while the fitter, surviving, transmit their higher qualities to their offspring: so life climbs”.

My assurance of the truth of this was so inveterate in me, that his reply quite upset me, for he said “‘Offspring’? No, ‘fit’ and ‘high’ are not the same; in a low environment ‘fitter’ will be lower: so, since by this process Life may sometimes not climb, this is not the process, for climbing is a law of Life, which at all times is climbing, though bothered, the tricks of God being every time efficient, intricately simple, easily done, sweetly neat, complete in luck, infinite in wit: and underneath His signature. Think of a planet trotting round its sun: the embodiment of monotony! What wit could ever have invented an event in that inveterate tread, tread, treading? God’s finger pats the planet, to tilt it a little to the plane of its orbit, gives it a spin: simple! witty! Infinite variety now: Summer, Winter, Day, Night, no two days identical for ever: and underneath you see that signature— ‘God’. So with the trick by which Life climbs”.

“And, Sir, what trick — ?” I did not project “is that”; checked myself.

“Oh”, he said, “it is improper... But, then, this is nothing much, and we two such cronies within this cosy nook of existence: so I tell this, to strengthen your Terra’s trust. You first tell me this: what is the Divinest of qualities?”

To this the old Victorian answered “Well, Sir, I will say that a certain goodness is; as a friend of mine, now dead, a poet, wrote in a young woman’s book ‘Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever”.

But this, I could see, offended him, for he said, “No, he was a fool: let your folk know this. For I know what he meant by ‘good’: my mother says that many a young planet is kept backward by that same baseness. You can easily divine that what types so low conceive to be good is certain to be mostly bad, good and bad being but slightly discerned in millions of years by even higher types. By ‘good’ he meant cowardly, God-fearing, timid of an idol of his mind, which he savagely imagined to have some likeness to the Divine. But cleverness is goodness, goodness is cleverness. For consider: if you eat what is bad for you, ignorant of the truth that it is bad, and you have pain, is not this ignorance the type of all badness, bad meaning painful, good meaning pleasant, all bad consisting in not knowing truth, in nescience, all good consisting in science, in knowing truth: now, cleverness is a quickness in seeing truth, in doubting what is untrue, and being sceptical, in seizing what is true, and being inventive: a quickness as to truth; truth being the good of Life, the only good. He should, then, have written ‘Be clever, sweet maid, and let who will be good — what I call good, which is bad’. For this quickness is the answer to my question, ‘What is the Divinest of qualities?’ Tell me why quickness is the Divinest of qualities”.

“You tell me, Sir”, I said to him, “believe me, I listen with the keenest ears”.

And he: “Well, to know what the Divinest of qualities is, you have but to remember what Divinity is. What do men say that God is?”

“We say, Sir”, I answered, “that God is the Eternal Power that creates, upholds, permeates, or is, the universe.”

And he: “Well, without doubt. But how many words! Why say ‘eternal’? Force is essentially eternal. And why say ‘the Power that’? Are there, then, other Powers that ‘uphold’ what is outside the universe? No; there is nothing outside. Say then, ‘God is Power’, ‘God is Force’. And, though no thing or person will ever divine why Force is, or what Being that can be which is neither a thing nor a person, does not every person know this about Force, that Motion is His associate? So that quickness is the Divinest of qualities, since more of Motion of Force, of Divinity, is in the quicker wing; and whereas omnipresence is the trait of Force, and quickness is a pressing-toward-omnipresence, quickness, then, is like Divinity. Every life, I say, knows this: I can actually remember that when I was only a morula, before ever I began to gastrulate, I understood that Motion is, that Force is, and in the dark of some Nirvana’s womb darkly I mused within my heart, thinking ‘There is Motion; there is Power; Power moves: Power is adorable’... Quickness, then: and now you see why that ‘natural selection’ of yours is not reliable for the climb of Life: for some environments, being low, slow, undivine, make for the survival of the slow, as when larvæ lie unseen on tree-trunks whose bark they resemble in colour, their survival depending on their quietness; or as when in societies of a low type a planet’s crust is supposed to be ‘owned’ by individuals, and all the others, being born landless, are born slaves, who, unable by habits of thought to detect the cause of their slavery, strive to evade slavery by becoming rich at society's expense, the slowest then acquiring riches, and surviving".

"But, Sir", the old man answered to this, "on my Terra, where are just such societies as you describe, men have come to think quite otherwise, that it is the quicker, not the slower, who acquire riches to buy land for their families, and survive".

"Yet be of good cheer", he answered, "for your race will presently awake to truth — you, meantime, taking care to disbelieve each thing which they believe, until its truth is proved. It must needs be the slowest who acquire wealth at Life's expense, for they do it by being more obsessed than others by the illusion of self and self's importance in the Life-sea, their eyes being bunged-up with the belief that the drop is all, the sea nought, not to wallow an instant in which nonsense is wit's quickest feat: and what is opposite to quickest is slowest. Even a dog, indeed, may see for a moment that God is more than what he calls 'I', but the sense of self is so deep-seated, that, even for high lives, it is not easy to be constantly conscious of its folly. Those lads of Falpalav are said to have no sense of self; and the Zwiffs are known — How old do you suppose that those two Zwiffs are?"

I answered to this "They seem to me, Sir, to be beings of twenty-three, twenty-five, years old".

But he: "Oh, no — they will be dead before they are so old: they look old only because of emotions and toil in thought, but they are no more than seventeen, or so. And as soon as they see that during three weeks they do not doubt something, invent or discover something, they will kill themselves, seeing that by a merry routine of deaths and frequent births Life's climb is spurred to fervour: so they retire young from life, though there are among them certain 'Keepers of Records' who, because their memory is found serviceable, have lived some thirty thousand years, and still are as youthful as these two. So you see how little the illusion of self deludes these wits, who instantly see the truth of the sea and the drop; to them Society, Life-Force, God, being everything, themselves nothing: and this is presence of mind, omnipresence, this is cleverness, quickness of wit”.

“Yes, Sir, I see, I do see”, the old man hastened to say: “and tell me — do the Zwiffs, who so fling to death their life of delight so young, expect a persistence of their personalities after death?”

“After?” he said: “quaint question... Why ‘after’ more than before? But that is atheism, such a notion! — is a doubt that Force is omnipresent: for, if there is some place or state where personality, or anything, persists, there God cannot be: for where Force is, Motion is, and Motion is Change, and what has changed is different: a different thing cannot be the same thing. But God is everywhere, is He not? Motion is everywhere, Change is at each point of the ether: so that nothing persists, save Change, Motion, Force, God, Who is all in all, and nothing is, no one is, but Him. If you return to work at a machine after sleeping an hour, is it now the same machine? or is it another machine? It is convenient to speak of it as the same, convenient to speak of ‘I’ and ‘you’; but while you slept half as many billions of changes have occurred in ‘it’ as ‘you’ have been billions of persons, as ‘I’ have been trillions in changing from an ovum to a morula, to a blastula, to a gastrula, to a cordula, to a craniote, ‘I’ being but a spot where God is specially active and changes flow fast, as a river is a spot where drops follow drops, its ‘personality’ being an appearance merely. If you say ‘I am here now’, is that true? each syllable of it is untrue: now is no more now while you are saying ‘now’; by the time you finish saying ‘here’, you are gone wild miles from where you began it; as to ‘I am’, one person says ‘I’, another says ‘am’. So, if ‘after death’ one could still say anything — quaint notion! — one could only say then ‘that old illusion of mine as to the persistence of personality is still with me, I see, and death has not quickened my wits’. But, though you see this, you hardly half-see, I think, for it cannot be easy to such as you to realize that what seems so perfectly certain as the fact of personality is but a fancy, though you will realize, if ever you see millions of ants swarming, or of lords, as I expect to see lords at that Og-Mog event that impends: then you will see that an ant is just a place at which Life-Force is acting, and as a personality has no reality; but Life is a reality. I have sent to you the idea ‘ant’: do you know what an ant is?”

The old man answered “Oh, yes, Sir, we have ants on my planet”.

Then he: “And I lately sent you the idea ‘cow’: do you know what a cow is?”

“Yes, cows, too, Sir”, the old man answered: “we have cows”.

“You know, then”, he said, “that ants are little beings who have great big brains, and cows are of a clan which have tassels attached, and, having two stomachs, chew much. Now, in heaven, ants, my mother tells me, are highly admired, are regarded as the archetype of a high type: for, though they cannot themselves be called ‘high’, since God has deprived them of hands — else they would now be where I am, in a mansion of the heavens — yet they are constantly at toil for God, their lives given up to Society, having apparently as little sense of personality as the Ghymens of Falpalav are said to have, or the Zwiffs: but cows are the archetype of a low, or slow, type, for whereas they also are always working, churning with their jaws, it is ever for their self, or they work as serfs for some other self: of which cow-type are those who, succumbing to the lure of some opportunity offered them by the law of probability, pocket riches in the chaotic environment of raw societies; and, if we conceive that in the hour of death the wit of clowns so dull is smitten to a species of quickening, we can hear them thinking then within themselves: ‘To how slow a sloth did my teachers teach me sloth of soul! for I have spent myself in pampering a phantom, and, believing each show to be real, each hearsay to be truth, have as much forgotten God as though, not He, but ‘I’ was real; nay, the drop has gone against the river, and it is not odd that I was so reft and fretted, never once smelling the smell of that Rose among the roses, nor my mouth has ever drunk from the cup of carousing: for what a cow was ‘I’”.

In some moments that now passed without intercourse the old man hearkened to those rumours of what he assumed to be Jupiter’s thunderings, so remote and morose their rumbling, and afresh now could catch a sound of pinions flapping slow and large outside somewhere within the dismal dark. He was now about to ask what, then, is that “trick” through which Life climbs, his inquisitiveness as to this being so keen as to outweigh his sense of the “improper” in seeking to ferret; but (fortunately for me) the egg spoke before me, and presently told of himself what I had been going to ask; for said he in his examiner manner “When I said a ‘low’ society, what did I mean?”

To this the old man answered “Since ‘high’ means quick, Sir, ‘low’ must mean slow”.

“Truly!” he said— “slow; unchangeable; uneventful; cowlike: a low society, then, is one in which some of the folk are not engaged on science, on doubting and discovering, on truth: for science is the good of Life, the only good; but some of the folk are engaged in working to earn a livelihood, or to earn riches, working, not for Society, but for themselves, like cows: so that all that luck in science, that luck in discovering and doubting, which is special to each of these workers for self, as to no other life, is lost to Society: lost all the eventfulness and elation of their inventing! And in such environments the climb of Life could not but be balked, since such environments exalt the slowest lives; but Life wriggles free by that trick of God through which, in spite of all, Life is at all times climbing, this trick consisting in quickening Life at its spring, continuously: for in conception it is the quickest spermion which spurts into the ovum, the multitude of other spermia which run the race perishing; and the individual who originates from that quickest spermion has spermia whose average o quickness is as high, the quickest of these being quicker still, inheriting a stress as well as a strength: and so on. In this way the physical quickness of Life is continuously heightened; and since the ovum's quickness increases step for step with the spermion's, so, too, does the psychic quickness of Life increase continuously: for since Life is female, and Mind is the trait of Life, our mind, is from the ovum, from our mothers”.

The old man's fingers were now quivering, and keenly he said “Yes, Sir, yes... But I do not see... I see, I quite see, how the spermia tend to quickness; but, as to the ovum's quickness, this I do not, do not, see... Pray, forgive my eagerness, Sir, in this—”

“Nothing to forgive” he said— “the fault is mine, since I thought that you would see... Well, you know that the ovum is a globe in whose crust are tunnels, and through some one tunnel she admits one of the spermia, which are little heads with whips of tail that they work to spurt with, spurting upon her keenly in streams, exactly as meteor-streams hurl themselves desperately upon a planet: for they know well that for the slow is death, and life the prize of the spry, as she knows well that quickness is her only hope: for, foreknowing their approach, she has ejected her nucleus, except so much of it as one intruder can infuse, and if two intrude (as two hundred sometimes do), the penalty is death for her: so that sharp, sharp, she stands to shut up her other tunnels against the dashing gang of gallants the instant that one is within. You see, then, a continual striving toward quickness at the very spring of Life”.

I answered to this “Yes, Sir, I see, I see, that the ovum, too, must be quick; but still, no, I do not see — I confess — why she must be quicker, continually: this, I confess—”

“You are agitated”, was his answer: “consider, and you will see. For suppose that two slow things run a race: then, the race lasts long; and since, all that time, the difference in speed, even if slight, is acting, the winner is likely to win by much: and after he has arrived someone at the goal has time to do something before the loser arrives; but suppose that two quick things run a race: then, the race is brief; and since the difference in speed, even if much, has not much time to act, the winner is likely to win by little: and someone at the goal must be quick to do anything before the loser comes. You see, then, that, as evolution quickens the spermion, so, step for step, it must quicken the ovum; which is why one type does not usually impregnate another, the reason not being chemical, but mechanical: for the spermia may be too quick for the ovum, overwhelming her with numbers, or the ovum may be too quick for the winner spermion, nipping him in her haste in his entering. And not only is the speed of both continually quickened, but the rate of the quickening is quickened, acceleration taking place. Through a million years that quickening may be invisible; but it is going on; and suddenly every eye can see it flying — species arising — dividing — aspiring—”

On this the old man, now seeing the truth and some of its river of results, broke out, “Truly, Sir, did you say that the tricks of God are intricately simple, easily done, sweetly neat, complete in luck, infinitely witty, and underneath His signature! Truly, Sir, did you say this!”

And he: “Myakamus! It might not have been so! And blessed be His Name!”

As he was making this remark, the mariners who had descended the well were ascending again, and I observed that the bird-tree, the egg’s father, turned a glance our way; but at once they went away out of the hall, and I said nothing of their coming to the egg, who was then saying to me “But tell me something of you men, for we two are friends, and ‘Terra’ means ‘of good-omen’ in my mother’s tongue. Tell whether you have not had some Divinest man among men?”

To this the old man answered “Men differ, Sir, as to who that Divinest was: for some say one Galileo, some one Christ, some—”

“But some wight who died for Life: they are the quick, the Divine!”

“Well, Sir”, I said, “Galileo did this, giving his life to science, of which he is called ‘the father’; and our scientists in general give their lives for Society; and that Christ is believed to have been one of a kind of men named ‘vine-gods’, and to have died for Society”.

“What kind of men”, he enquired, “are these vine-gods?”

And I: “Ancient men, Sir, and savages, from seeing greens grow on graves, everywhere got the notion that the flesh of men, freshly buried, causes vines and corn to thrive: and vine-gods are men who gave themselves to die for the tribe, that their flesh might be buried, to rise again in vine and rye”.

Scarcely had I uttered this when out he broke, “Well were they called ‘gods’! Well! Well! for there was quickness! and O, God, my Maker, grant me one day so to die, O, God, my Maker, for Thee, O, God, for Thee!

.. But strange race of Man! which cannot sum the powers of the polygonal numbers, yet is blessed with blood so noble! O, Divine vine-god Galileo! O, Divine vine-god Christ!”

I now said “In truth, Sir, it is no uncommon thing for men to die for Society: we have wars, in which many proffer themselves so to die, not for Life, it is true, but as vine-gods for their tribes”.

And he: “Divine! Divine!”

Upon which I asked him “Do you say, then, Sir, that you approve of War?”

“Surely!” he warmly answered. “High societies do not war one with another, for that would be laughable, since War is due to an illusion of self in nations; but in societies of a low type anything, anything, is blessed that incites a life to die for Society, to see that the tribe is everything, his life nothing. As to the slaughter of millions of men, of ants, of lords of heaven, that is of just so much importance as the death of one spermatozoon, or one whiff of a wind: of importance only is God, Force, Motion, Change, Eventfulness, Progress, Evolution, increase of quickness in wit and motions, the Climb of Life, the Drive of God, Life’s love for God, which is Life’s joy. Was it not this that your Galileo said? and your Christ said?”

I answered “Galileo said it by his life as a vine-god, Sir, and Christ, if he was a vine-god, by his death. As to the words of Christ, we possess no certain records; his chief utterance is said to have been this: ‘Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself’

But this disappointed him. “Neighbour... Well, but that was village-wit. Neighbour! Why love him? He should have said ‘Do not care whether you love or hate, kill or save, him, since he is of no importance, unless he is an inventor, as thou art of none; this thou shalt do: thou shalt love a thousand of thy neighbours more than thyself, and for a million shalt live to die — not for their sake! but for Life, for a sun, for God, Who gave thee life: for among a million is much luck in invention, which is the good of Life, the only good. Perhaps, though, he meant to say ‘Thou shalt love thy neighbour, not as much, but as little, as thyself — as little as I, a vine-god, love myself”, in which case there was wit in his dictum. But until lives arrive at being what we term ‘high’, their words have a certain wildness, lack of exactness”.

I now asked “And when, Sir, is it that lives are termed ‘high’?”

And he answered “When they are free of ills arising from lower types of cells. As societies begin to be civilized when they cease to fear ills from fierce beasts, so societies of cells begin to be ‘high’ when they cease to fear ill from lower cells, like bacteria: for then their (nucleated) cells have arrived at a quickness of disposition high above that of the (unnucleated) microbe-tribes. It is now millions of years since the Ohms felt pain, and into the Zwiffs also no foreign life could enter and live, the combustion of their food within them being so thorough, that the charcoal which they drop is ashless, and is used for fashioning the choicest tools”.

To this the old man answered “Yes, Sir, of this I know something by experience: and it is easily seen how, when digestion is so complete, the act of expulsion would tend to become a display and shewing-off, instead of a shyness, as in lower types. I now see on the workbench near us a heap of such carbons as the Zwiffs drop, with many diamonds scattered... But how, Sir — ?” I hesitated here.

So he: “You desire to know how tools of diamond are made from charcoal? You do not know this?”

The old man bent lower over to say, “No, Sir: did I know this, I should have much power among men, since such stones on my Terra are very rare”.

On this he said to me in a tone of secrecy “Steal some, then: no one there; no one will know. And you wear garments: tuck some among your garments”.

If he had said “take some”, that old man’s lust for pennies might have led him the tenth of a step toward temptation; but “steal” — ah, no: non-Victorian, “stealing” — that kind of stealing; and he answered “Why, no, Sir, that could never be done”.

Upon which the egg, in the tone of one who whispers: “Do as I say: steal some. You fancy that stealing is wrong, because your morality is of a low tribal type, and is stronger in you than your intellectuality, as morality always is when it is of a tribal type; but stealing is of no importance when it is from one or two, as stealing is, when vilely it is from Society, from Life; and I tell you to steal, not only that what you steal may empower you among men when you tell them what I say, but because I see from all your tone that stealing could not but do good to your soul. Steal some”.

But the old man: “Sir, you now bid me do something so foreign to my second-nature, that the thing is beyond all possibility. I pray you, then—”

“Oh, well”, he now said with a certain boyish nonchalance, “if you will not... Then, make some for yourself, to empower you: nothing is easier”.

“Yes, Sir, I — listen”: still closer over him the old man leant.

And he: “Well, enclose charcoal in a vacuum, or pack it in some vessel; then maintain it for ninety minutes at five times the melting-point of platinum; then plunge into alcohol at the freezing-point; that is all: that transforms the crystals from a hexagonal to a cubic lattice”.

“Yes, Sir”, the old man answered, “but, alas, the highest temperature of us men is the electric arc — hardly above the melting-point of platinum — alas. If I but — knew—”

And he: “That is little to tell, myakamus! we two being friends and conspirators in respect of Terra. You can get high temperatures by several methods—”

It was at this moment that doom overtook him — and me — the old man having been so intent upon what was being told, that he had not noticed anyone's entrance into the hall, until he felt himself hoisted as by a crane into the air, paralysed in every muscle, borne outside the hanging, and there lowered to the floor under the breast of the bird-tree, who now gave out the word, directed toward the egg, but heard by me, too, "Improper!"

As for me, I was down, bowed beneath that power, for my knees had yielded to the streaming strength of a presence that was not less than terrible to bear, the smell of his breath resembling a tempest of ozone loaded with odours of mayflowers; and, with those veiled eyes on me, he spoke to me, though I did not clearly receive — perhaps was too agitated. I gathered, however, that the egg's mother was pleased with me for not lifting the egg, and for not stealing, since probity is better than theft, even theft from one only; and I distinctly got "Be not egged-on by that egg to become a thief" — I can't help laughing, it would have taken more than an egg to get that old Victorian to become — But no laughing matter then! I knelt there overwhelmed, eyeing aside at his root-foot, till he said "Take", and diamonds (from the workbench, I suppose) rained over my palms to the floor. He then took two tools from those hanging on the wall, and, after vaulting awfully aloft, passed out of the hall, having set on fire a cloud of echoes that sighed his "Ah, hala, ha, la".

VI. YOUTH

I HAD FILLED my trouser-pockets with crystals, and now was stooping to accumulate the troop strewn over the floor, when I was aware of a grumble of the egg, sullen, saying to himself “I told him almost nothing”; now, too, I was aware of a message from somewhere, “Bring the book”, upon which I again passed through the hanging to get the atlas, saying to the egg “Goodbye to you, goodbye, Sir”, to which he answered with some sullenness “God give you good”; and with sorrow I was gone from him. He may have been “improper” — in more senses than one; but ah, he was an egg good in parts. I imagine that his comparison with a censer swinging of the Mog-sun’s goings to and fro, offering to God at every swing’s end a whiff of incense, must be the grandest metaphor that ever entered into the heart and proceeded from the lips of the living; and profound, I know, is destined to be the effect of his utterances on this “Terra” of ours: for still the ovula quickens, quickens, within the oviduct; and one day, lo, truth prevails.

As if some guide was at his side, the Doctor, unconscious whither he went, but convinced that he went well, now began to wander about halls of the palace, like one who walks in sleep, and sighs, seeing things of the deep-sea with the whites of his eyes, and his lips speak asleep. He came to a stair which, though prolonged, had only three steps, and hollowness between; but when he stepped upon the topmost, it sped with him down to the second, and returned up when he stepped upon the second, which sped with him down to the third, and then returned. He now found his feet straying within a sylvan scene, tree-boles stout like oaks, with streamlets, bowers, a moon above floating through clouds that drizzled like real clouds; then, this over, he found himself small as a flea in a hall which was all a scenery of machinery heaped high and wide, that made a humming of meditation something like the melody of dynamos humming, and among it living things of some type or types, for high aloft he spied one fly across, and, remote on the floor, saw another who eyed a dial-face; then he was in a hall hardly less vast, surrounded, all of it, by organ-pipes of diamond, enormous columns some, others small, a crowded gaudery, like a thousand organs of gods, all forming one appalling organ; and next his steps led him along a very long corridor, within the sides of it a multitude of piston-rods of every size plying in-and-out, some swift, some slow, pistons of some alloy of steel, green-looking, and they were magnets, some at least, for, as he moved among them, the magnet on his bosom swung to and fro; and now grew on him a music of lutes, and anew he had the emotion of one moving among the perfumeries of some paradise, exactly as when, fifty minutes before, the Zwiffs had embraced at "Caerwent": so, on coming to an oval opening into a room, he remained there, his face turned from them, after seeing them embraced on a species of circular switchback which whirled with undulations to the surgings and swoonings of the music which its motions made, making them puff's of vapour in the flutter of their hasting hair and fluff of clothes; till he heard himself summoned and entered.

This place, though fairy-soft, was yet a laboratory, with bottles, fires, a smell of spicery, chemicals, and, inside that circle of the couch of downs which whirled about and wormed, venting by its working sounds of melody, was a table of sapphire or lazuli, upon which the Doctor, after spurning through a gangway in the whirligig, deposited the atlas, and, standing between the Zwiffs, pointed out the spot in Britain at which they had landed, then shewed the Sahara, and told what the “ro” in the scale-of-miles means: upon which he was bidden to sit in a species of seat near an oval opening opposite the oval of his entrance; and at once the two went away.

He understood now that their quest of sand had not been successful on this moon, that he was about to return to Earth, to Penpolack first, and thence a known number of ten-miles to the Sahara: so he sat expectant, looking out upon a balcony that was a foot above the sand, and, beyond, saw a moon — another than the moon glowering upon that far part of the argo where the egg lay — this moon full, remoter, duller still; and again, as he lay gazing at its face, he was aware of weighing for ascension, of setting out for heaven, for immediately anew in his eardrum’s dream was bleating that rumour of the treble of bells, telling their me, fah, soh, and their ah, oo, mm, which climbed thrice, chiming, to commence afresh, and climb chiming thrice, in sweet routine, with mania of melody, he, with that milk’s sanctity within him, lifting a languid finger up to drop, and up to drop, his head dropping to right, and dropping to left, his soul seduced to communion with the emotion of some music to which the universe moves, and now shrieks of music screaming out, ceasing, and now streams of meteors streaming, and now he’s off: increase of his weight some moments, as before; invisibility of things about him; that moon falling appallingly upon him; and soon a typhoon of fire and light — Jupiter flashing past, a momentary doomsday; and Mars soon; and a “Cold of Space” which touched him there; and now the sun rushing down, Son of the Morning falling, shewing up rims of our moon and Terra stretched, reaching out and out; and now afresh meteors streaming; and presently a ray of light that the Doctor’s eyes cannot stand, striking from the palace down upon Penpolack townlet.

“On again getting up out of our atmosphere”, he writes further, “we were again away, I now seeing (or seeming to see) the earth’s flight whirling, a sight mightier, wilder, than I had ever conceived; and in perhaps four seconds we were once more within the atmosphere, to descend in some minutes upon sand.

“I ventured then, emboldened may-be by being at home on my own, to step out to the little balcony, and thence could see the Zwiffs and the bird-tree emerge thirty yards from me, to hurry off across a Sahara not half so mountainous as the sand on that moon of Jupiter, so that I could see a scene of it reaching southward; a patch of palm-trees like shadows afar; and, shadowy to the east, a reach of cliff, over which just a tinge of opal flushed, as though some other moon was swooning there to its setting. I knew then ‘the beauty of this moon’, as the Zwiffs had said, and the fairness of the veils which she spreads for her reveries, veils sprayed a little with tinsel of star-glints, like garbs of the Indian’s bride, right overhead now being the Great Bear, paled, but ever there, and fair, and, paled and fair overhead, that ‘Crown’, home of the Ohms once, and still of the Zwiffs, whom pretty soon I could no more see, for at some distance veil on veil wound themselves round, shrouding everything within shades of nonentity.

“And they had hardly vanished in those shadows when I saw what caused my heart to start — a pair of beasts — leopards, I think, they were — creeping on their bellies within the black of the shadows which they cast on the sand, heading in the direction that the sailors had taken, so that I stood hesitating what to do, whether at my own peril to run and tell them — or what? for, unused to send mental messages, and confused, I forgot that their invisibility could be of no consequence as to their hearing; but ere I could reach any decision, they reappeared, I then hearing on the little breezes sighed by the night’s heart that bizarre tinkling that I conceive to be their laughter, and immediately afterwards could see the beasts creeping in their rear. I sent out then an outcry, then a mental telegram, but got no response, and they advanced, tracked, until well within twenty yards of me, when the leader beast, letting slip a sound of greed and glee, bounded to devour; whereupon the lord, who had his lady in his arms, spun round, to toss her from him upon the back of the beast, which dropped in its mid-spring, and then, surprised no doubt, went running wild about, roaring, trying to bite her behind his shoulder, she with instant agility having twisted round from facing his tail to facing his head; and her hair, as he raced with her, was streaming behind with her raiment, while the tinkling of her delight reached me distinctly. The she-beast, meantime, twice vaulted to seize the lord, but dropped perpendicularly in the mid-spring, as though a wall stopped her vaults, then made paces away, her mate at the same time being somehow made to stop and drop, for the lady to alight — though he was not dead, for presently I saw him get on his legs and race off.

“The lord was then on the point of taking up his lady again, when he paused at a noise like organs vaunting that burst out upon us all — as to the cause of which I was at first uncertain, but quickly determined that the bird-tree was singing: indeed, I could dimly see him where he had perched on the edge of the cliff to the east, had there hurled his dreadful face to heaven, and had let that burdened breast of his burst into vociferation. If it had been upon the dome of St. Paul’s that he had vaulted, and the muscles of his throat had thrown out that roaring, then it would have startled the ear of Barking east, of Ealing west, as perhaps it startled the heart of some Arab nomad, brooding lonesome by some pool, into supposing that some seraph, resting in this desert on his way, was overtaken with a craze of adoration; and oh, my God, if it were but possible, that yet once again, somehow, somewhere, I might hear the hubbub of that wobbling, the long, long, wallowing in honeys of that hymn; but my ears have heard it once, never more in eternity to hear it. Tenor it was in quality — a scream of tenor pealing through it, and yet it was deep in timbre, too — well, I have heard it once. And its thoughts also I heard, though I am not certain that any words in any tongue were uttered, and though those thoughts were far beyond my grasping: for I got the impression of an adoration in hieroglyphics, a glossolalia of astral mathematics ranting, except when at this or that instant he descended to my level of sympathy, as when, lower, he melodiously moaned ‘but to love Thee, this is bliss, to die upon Thee, this is life, this is life, this is life’, moaning it with the persistence of the sea on some morning of storm when a hoariness of rollers pour infuriate, roaring their droning over the shore of shoals at Porto Rico, and the universe consists only of a roaring droning and an eardrum hearing; and when his wobbling throat throbbed on, and obstinately long throbbed on, wallowing long in song, I saw the lord toss up his arms, calling lamentably out, I now down on my knees by the balcony, overpowered, as the lady-Zwiff, too, was down, wound about her mate’s knees, when out of those mazes of melody came forth ‘the pulses of these suns shall slow, but for ever, and then for ever, Thy sea shall flow, shall flow, Thy billows no end shall know, shall know, shall know’; nor was I aware when the oratories of that solitary adoration stopped, for its rays were too strong for Man, I coming back to myself only when the lord and lady vaulted the balcony — she, to my astonishment, then patting my arm where I knelt, saying to me ‘Well-named “Terra”! which in a certain language signifies “good-hap”: I have for you a message from a great lady. Pray, come within’.

“But when the old man followed within, they were gone from the room, and he sat anew on the seat near the oval that opened upon the balcony, feeling elevated at that patting, understanding that they had happened, on his planet, upon the sort of sand that they sought. But when within three minutes he saw the desert dropping away from him, he had a pang, gathering that presently he'd be down again in the old townlet, and he was gashed now with a regret and jealousy that it was not granted him to sojourn ever, forgetting wife and child, in the home of this family, ruminating with them at their board on the mood of their ambrosias. But this was not to be: as soon as the palace was out of the atmosphere, and back anew in it above a floor of black cloud that had gathered over England, the two Zwiffs reentered the room, and, halting near the inner oval, the lord called me to him, saying 'Be not terrified by the thunder: we clear away some clouds, to see', whereupon a hubbub of thundering broke out underfoot, he, while it lasted, gazing at a glass on which was an image of clouds working, his fingers meantime turning what seemed a micrometer-screw; while the lady, with quite a new-born affability toward me, said in a language which thunders cannot drown 'Farewell. I bear you this message from the egg's Mother: that she sets a detector to resonance with your rays: so, if in an emergency worthy of her notice you, having-on your psychophone, send out your soul in worship to her, she still journeying in this eastern region of worlds, your wish will reach her.'

"The old man was bowing down before this deigning when the thundering stopped, the lord now stepping busily from the moving picture of cloud-rack to say to me 'Farewell. Divulge no knowledge of us. Step outside' — touching the magnet on my chest, which had gone askew; and it was now that she, for the second time, flicked her thumb down each side of her nose very quickly, semi-secretly, meaning without doubt my wrinkles; upon which he rushed to a shelf thronged with objects and dashed back to hand me a kind of phial, saying to me 'Drink some drops to-morrow'.

“But, as I was taking it, she moved her face slowly at him, saying ‘too potent for him’; and he then, after looking at her a moment, flew anew to the shelf, to fly back with another phial, which he handed to me, saying ‘Drink, if that other brings trouble. Come!’

“Again bowing down before the lady, I put the two phials into my jacket pocket, on top of a packet which was there, this packet afterwards proving to contain golf-balls for Paddy; and I went after the lord toward the balcony, my heart now all at once bounding into my mouth at the appalling thing that now impended upon me...

“At the oval opening he stood aside, saying, as I stepped out, ‘Be not afraid’, then went away, while I, the moment I was out, felt myself frozen, my blood bounding to my head, ears humming, the atmosphere at that altitude very rare; and I was about to rush back in, but now found myself paralysed, and in the same moment was gripped by some vigour, lifted, given to the vacant air.

“I think now that this cruelty was inflicted upon me because it was not now far from dawn, and they thought it ‘improper’ to descend and be beheld; but in the first moments I suffered, for not all my nerves were paralysed, I was aware with pain of the dazzle of a ray that burned from the palace to the earth, of a dripping of blood from my nose, of being shrouded in cloud and drenched; but no terror: I felt indeed as completely safe as when my feet reached land; upon which, as the paralysis left me, I tottered three steps, and dropped upon my face.

“I was at Penpolack; and yonder in the sands was the dent made by the palace; but no sign of palace or of ray could my gaze descry aloft: they were gone on their way”.

Wet though he was, the Doctor had no thought of going home now, Mrs. Warwick being away, but stepped lost about, saying in himself “Felicia!

Felicia!” impatient to see, but perplexed as to how much he should tell her, from whom he had never yet kept anything private — and how explain the diamonds? So, his mind teeming with that dear wife, and with the vision of the night, which commenced already to seem a vision merely, mutely he moves now over the shore in the shout of the ocean under the moonshine, pacing away westward from home, scarcely knowing what he did, whither he went: until he came to Devil’s Cave, at the mouth of which, standing among rounded pebbles and scrub, he leant his back; and now got from the pocket that had in it Paddy St. Aubyn’s golf-balls the pair of “phials” that had been given him on high.

More like tubes than phials: about a finger long, a quarter-inch in diameter, made of diamond, as their glints and ogles shewed, and at the bottom of each a little column of liquid, one an inch long, one a quarter-inch; but as both liquids were of much the same colour — a blue of iodine — he could not now decide which was the right one to drink; nor was he decided as to the propriety of drinking, knowing nothing of the results; and he stood questioning himself whether that would not be well to “put a case” to Dame Felicia Warwick first, then, having heard what she said, act as she should suggest.

But, on looking longer at the liquids, he could see that the longer column moved anon, with the impulses of a thing of life, disquieting itself anon, deciding to spur itself to ferments and insurrections, working with troubles of bubblings, surgings of purple rushing through its blue — a thing that so interested and seduced the Doctor, that soon, his heart fast knocking now at his ribs, he was letting the liquid drip upon his left palm to drink: for, because of a ball that ran within a canal, the liquid only flowed when the tube was tilted in a particular way, and then drip by drip; and though his palm smarted at it, in an impulse, when six trickles had dripped, he licked it up.

It was as if he had swallowed fire: horridly it scorched all his gorge and vitals; and, holding his throat, he rushed to and fro some seconds, coughing, retching.

At once, too, he was drunk; stumbled; tumbled upon his palms; tottered into the cavern to prop his back upon the rock.

And, little by little, he stiffened, not his limbs only, but his liver and heart and soul; after ten minutes stark as death he stood there, looking at — himself before him.

“Himself” — so to say: for, two yards from his eyes, standing, smiling, nude, lewd, was a young man remarkably like the young man that he had once been, though more animated; and we may say that the young man “was himself”; but, in truth, the young man called “Warwick” had been not only another than the old called “Warwick”, but the twain were strangers, more foreign each to each than a young Englishman to a young Tahitan, an old to an old: and eye to eye the pair stared in a place and state that has no name, the Doctor having no more competence to look a moment elsewhere, to see, to think of, anything else, than he had to fling England to the galaxy: still, fixed; as rapt as the dead are in the tetanus and trance of death; the old man Judging the young, outraged, offended, tempted to become the young, but reluctant to let himself go from the bad habit of himself, the young man confident, steady, looking own upon the old as upon a dead dog or rat by the roadside, too arrogant to trouble his lips to say pfft to the old stinker; until what was left of the old man found its will overpowered, tripping, led astray to side with the devil, as when finally a girl, yearning, says “well, I will, to-night”, and then all’s up with her.

Hours his stare must have remained bound to that apparition, before, set free from that strait-jacket of rigidity, he fell and slept a little: for the sun was up when he was roused by the loud mouth of his hound “Guncotton”, left old by him at “Caerwent”, staring “as at a mousehole”, but now young, bounding about; and crazily now round the cave Warwick’s eyes, as they opened, flew; then, lighting upon the back of his hand, that had long been snakey with veins gone sclerotic, saw it all smooth, new-made: and now he knew — youth! — knew it, too, by the rabble of larks that darted, brabbling carols, out of his heart...

So up now he sprang and ran — out of the cavern — spinning, silly — new-sprung from the womb of Being, but looking silly in the old man’s wide-awake hat and cloak, his lips silly, drawn stiff in a chronic sort of smile, a rictus of astonishment, his eyes wide in an urgency of hurry and flurry, like one whose nightshirt is on fire, and he scurries to find vessels to quench it; and all at once he was off like a dart, storming up the cliffs by a rock-path which was as much perpendicular as horizontal, the old cloak brabbling backward, Guncotton barking in front — one of those sheep-dogs in trousers of tow, a shagginess of whitey-brown wool, their eyes looking out through prison-bars of tow, ears tipped with black, but he having only one ear so tipped; and up they flew — no “motive” — no fort up there to take — just to fly with child’s-delight, though that path was hardly steep enough, long enough, to ease their joy; and still at the top through heath they rushed along, the dog’s forelegs anon jumping upon some stone, imploring that it might be thrown for him to dart after, and when a stone was being pitched his gullet let slip one shrill of glee, as he rushed; until, for want of infinity of wind, Warwick stopped breathless on an eminence between the sun and moon, that with equal step ascended, descended, as at the ends of a see-saw, the moon old, like foam wasting, staled, consumptive with holes, away, and like silvered senility with hollow eye-sockets, the sun a youth, full-blooded, the two working with that eternal alternateness of birth and infirmity; and between them the sea, gilt, jiggling, with a Scotch jocosity of toe and heel, which flings aloft two fingers to snap, and doggedly jigs, the sea-surface tinged purplish in those patches which show the visits of shoals of pilchards; hosts of gulls floating on nothing among the crags; madrigals of thrushes going on at the freshness of the heaven of the day; and a tarn up there hidden within heather, within bilberries, buzzing with bees that fumbled about beneath its margin's furzes and purples, and down in the hall of the tarn's large heart a mirage of the morning's hall wrought without hands; into which the hound dashed, to shrink his shaggy trousers to pegs of leg; and when Warwick gazed into that glass he saw that rictus of his lips, saw his crazy stare, and, what was pretty incongruous with his face, a bush of grey hair under his hat at the back, though, when he just touched it, it came away in tufts, as when a donkey moults, and, on taking off his hat, he felt a down that had sprouted already over all the bald top; as to his eyes, bright they flashed and darted with the ardour which rioted in Carmen's; a flush of peach brushed now that brownishness of his cheeks; with those lips it was a sin now not to kiss and kiss while they were nice. As for a wrinkle — no sign: it was as if his face had been picked up and lifted back to the place at which it had been fashioned taut, from which place it had fallen lax: so no need now to "practise smiling" any more; his need now was to practise nonsmiling. But the main transformation was down in his soul and core, in his quickness and wing, the spring of his power to see and sing: and down now with an outburst of sobbing he dropped to his knees, sobbing grievously aloud "God, I can only adore, and give myself to Thee, what else have I to give?"

But he understood that “himself” now was something worth “giving” — a young man with an old scientist’s store of acquirement, beside what of over-man wisdom the egg had given, beside what his whole hour among those argonauts had given — argonauts that now in the sunlight seemed mere freaks of dreaming: yet real was that shout in his mouth, that hair sprouting, the old hound there bounding about, and, like babies’, his fingers had a craving to go to rub his gums, which irritated, new teeth pushing there to pierce: this was real; and he cast out his arms to the star-spaces after those argonauts, hardly knowing to what azimuth to cast them, asking “Where are you now? far enough; yet hear — dear ones! — the thanks of a heart”, his “dear” now meaning all of them, even that formidable bird-tree, but with deepest fervour he loved the egg, who, at its own peril, like a conspirator, had given him hints for Terra’s good — hints some of which “the old fogey” had not heard without a certain reluctance and reserve, since the spring of his being had been too staled, not quick enough, to take-in instantly truths so full of youthfulness and spirit; but instantly the young man could understand and see; and, thinking of them, living still with them, he walked and walked, exalted, in haste, his head bared to the morning’s airs, stalking tall, as one advancing to attack and trample down the adversary; and he was swinging in this way down the mountain-side toward Penarm village, his face to heaven, his lips gently letting out the Zwiffs’ lilt “with a woola, woola, woola, and a woola, wolla, woo”, when a woman who passed on a cart with market-stuff looked so at him, that he looked at his cloak, and now noticed its blood-stains — blood that had dropped from his nose upon it in the rare air-strata above.

This determined him to concoct a murder of the vanished Dr. Warwick, a memory of his family now entering his head — without any trace of parental affection now for “his” son, and, though the old reverence for “his” wife, idol of his life, touched that gaiety of his face with a shade of gravity and gentle regard for just a second, in the next he chuckled at the imagination of ever again going to bed with that elderly lady: ah, no: that lady was his maiden aunt. What he was out for now was to stir up and spur the girls of England, as Hercules did to girls, to fix his signature on them, and sling his ink, the girls of England and of New England, of Turkey and of Cuba; and, then, the men, too, the young men, for already in his head had turned-up those words “the young men”: war on the old; war on those of the young, too, who had old souls: anyway, he meant to be meddling now with men and women, and said to himself “Ich fuhle Muth mich in die Welt zu wagen”, as restless now with energy as a spiral spring which a shock strikes, and it will not stop shaking itself, feeling a force tingling within his sinews that could kick this globe like a football a few feet nearer goal: the way of salvation he knew.

So back now he rambled over the mountains, then down the rock-path toward Devil’s Cave, a question as to Mrs. Warwick now occupying him — whether, in leaving her, he could not scheme to increase her income: for, mingling now with his glee at newness of being, was a sense of wealth, too — greater wealth than anybody’s, probably, many of those stones in his pockets being bigger than any Koh-i-nor; but he could see no way of making her wealthier without setting her quick wits to suspect that it was “he” who had done it; nor was he much concerned: “she’ll be all right”, he murmured; and, since she would certainly not suffer so much at his being murdered as at being deserted by him, he chuckled, as he stabbed the cloak, and left its blood-stains, with the old hat, there on the cavern’s floor...

“Love thy neighbour as little as thyself”... baptized and reborn that morning into this gospel of the egg, he commenced to practise it.

But it was reluctantly that he parted with those bloodstains — with anything that was evidence of the reality of the night's riot of happenings; and when the penknife with which he stabbed the cloak chanced to touch that object slung about his neck, and he now found this object to be a magnet saturated with magnetism, this pleased him — real this, too — real the psychophone, the two tubes of liquid, which he took out to look at anew in the cave; and when he saw the youth-giver still greater in quantity than the other, a lewd craving took him to drink a little more of it for a lark, to see what the devil would happen then — a craving that afterwards was ever tempting him: but for the present he restrained himself.

It was then almost ten o'clock, and off with his mad dog he went again, indefatigable, to gad, to find himself by eleven on Tintagel Chase five miles away, where, on spying a little she-ass wandering solitary, which with shaggy jaws of rags gnawed her gorse forage, and thought her thoughts, he chased her, getting to recognize in this race, what he had already recognized in respect of the hound, that he now had a knack of reading the mind a little, of foreseeing which way the ass would shy; and he could enter into her mentality, as into the dog's, whose mood of mind was in quite another clime and moonlight than the ass's, the dog's concepts of sizes, distances, vaguer, its view of the universe more synthetic, the ass's more analytic; and this knack of cognizing mentalities, without the psychophone, abided with him some days, before it slowly faded away. Aided by which, and by the dog's noisy generalship, he presently contrived to capture the ass, and, springing upon her for a ride, was gone like a grig riding a fly; but, as he had no skill in riding, she quickly had him on the ground white as a miller with her hairs, all that gorseland now loud with the dog's mouth, and with gongings of ha! ha! ha! ha! that guffawed from the man.

Meanwhile, a wild hunger was feeding on his vitals; but it was three o'clock before he could find time to lend his mind to this a little, he being then near Boscawen village: so into the village he entered, to go to "Gwenapp's Stores"; and it was in front of the "Stores" that he saw what caused him to frown that merry day — a board that had on it

HOGAN AND DOWDY AT

PENZANCE

Come And Be Saved!

Instantly he was visited by an instinct that he and Hogan would not be getting on well together on this globe; and, devoured with hunger as he was, he remained there gazing at this thing some minutes, frowning, thinking...

As he had no money, he picked out his tiniest diamond, to sell within the "Stores", "foreknowing from what drawer Gwenapp would take the £10 to pay me". Thereupon he bought a straw hat and some grub that the dog and he gobbled up on the height above Boscawen; then tired out, having rambled forty miles, dropped asleep in heath.

Night-shades were falling when his eyes unshut; and now thoughts of what-next occupied him. London called — he'd be off by the 8.40 up-train from Penpolack; and if, meantime, he could steal unseen into "Caerwent", he would get his radium-clock, get the trite little microscope of his lifetime, the little apparatus of Perrin by which "he" was now counting Brownian movements, and perhaps find time to analyse at once a droplet of that liquid...

Away, then, he went, to arrive at "Caerwent" after five: all quiet there; night darkening; so, after prying about the house, in he darted.

But in spurting soft up the stair, he was sighted by the old servant, who, supposing him to be Ivor Warwick, presently rapped at the laboratory door (which he had locked), to talk of the Doctor's vanishing; whereupon he ordered her roughly off, deciding now not to take microscope or anything away, lest that should betray him to Dame Felicia Warwick, of whom he said to himself "Sharp as a needle, she"; and in there he remained for hours, chary now of venturing out, bent under an acetylene lamp, with microbalance, microtome, staining-fluids, sweat damping his forehead, bent upon the analysis of a c. millimetre of that galbanum: as to which he says "its action is upon the glands, ductless and pancreatic; that is ascertained: has distinct amylolytic characteristics of pancreas, and affinities with internal secretions of thyroid, thymus, and suprarenal capsules; but I found myself in the presence of a super-chemistry that eluded me: more complex than plasm; iodine obviously its basis, yet by no reagent could I get any trace of free iodine: found myself saying 'organic iodine, this' — nonsense; and though, evidently, there is a welter of radio-activity, only the vaguest uranium and radium traces (emanation and F) could I get". Over which pin-head of liquid he lingered until eight o'clock struck at St. Aubyn's Hall, then stuck lengthways on the "phial" a label marked Poison, to safeguard the elixir, and, while stooping at the keyhole listening for Pruie, he scribbled, too, in pencil, on the label "Three drops kill"; then, hearing no sound — for Pruie had dropped asleep — he whispered sh-h-h, with an admonishing finger, to the dog, and was gone.

Still forty minutes before the train: so he went down to the beach to wait there, and down there was putting the elixir into a pocket when he again came across Paddy St. Aubyn's packet of golf-balls, which so bulged his pocket, that he was now on the point of tossing it off him. But Pruie, to keep Ivor's secret, had told the Doctor that "it was Mrs. Warwick who had handed her the packet to place on the sun-dial at eight”: so Warwick now, in his habit of servitude to her wishes, instead of tossing the thing away, walked up St. Aubyn Lane, stooped through the lodge-wicket into the park, and after a while discovered the sun-dial on a knoll.

Now, Paddy, knowing nothing of Ivor’s recall to London, was, as prearranged, on the look-out for Ivor with the packet; so, as Warwick deposited the packet, she, looking out of jasmine which embowered a bow-window at the house-back, sent her voice soft out to him: “I am here, Oscar!” — for she liked to call Ivor “Oscar”.

Upon which Warwick in joyous astonishment twisted toward her — his Christian name on those pretty lips instantly waking in him six moonshiny Juans serenading; and that way he pried — no light in that room, but the moon, just rising, shewed: he knew her, had frequently seen her riding; and though, reading her mind, he now understood that it was Ivor who must have handed the packet to Pruie, that Paddy must be Ivor’s pretty, little he recked, here was a girl sent from God: so toward her he stepped agaze, and under the shadow of a yew’s branches, which were upheld by chains, he stood looking up in suspense of breath, on the qui vive, as when one sees a meteor, and leans to peer.

Which approach was a pleasant surprise for Paddy: for Ivor had told her that, since Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, her father, objected to their friendship, he meant, for the present, to refrain from her; and at once with her pretty grin she threw down to him the whisper, “Where did you get that hat, Oscar? Lovely night for an elopement!”

Elopement... Warwick had not hoped for this: but, then, this was his lucky day. And suddenly he: “Yes! Lovely night! Come on, you! Come on! We’ll do a scoot, we two!”

But since the tone of this, the very phrasing, was most unlike that chic and strict young gentleman, Mr. Ivor Warwick, Paddy was afresh surprised in her subconsciousness, and sent down the answer, “Playing Romeo, Oscar?”

“What do you say?” he sent up — the hearing not very distinct, night-winds sighing yoolaloo within the yew’s Isle-of-sighing.

And she: “Sh-h-h! Only play-acting, I said”.

“I am? Play-acting? Then, the moon is! the winds don’t mean what they say! Pretty you look there: the moonlight hits the hair and nose, the pearls and satin. Do you love me, you? You have gray eyes!”

“What’s that you said last?”

“Sh-h-h! Gray eyes, I said, you have!”

“Just discovered it? But you don’t mean it! — I wish you did”.

“Mean what?”

“About eloping”.

“Rather! Mean it? Listen to the sea — do you suppose it doesn’t mean it when it moans? Rather! Only we must be quick—”

“I say, Oscar, what a lark!”

“Ha, ha, ha, ha!”

“Sh-h-h! I think you have been dwinking, as Violet pwetends to say. Is that why you have that hat?”

“That what?”

“Sh-h-h! That hat!”

“Yes, but we must be quick: the last train—”

“Oh, Oscar, do you mean it?”

“Now, Sweet, don’t I look — ? Sweet thing, come!

Blessed pet! dear blessed pet! come to me!”

“‘Pet’ — no, I don’t like ‘pet’”, the fastidious Paddy murmured, with a stir of her nose at Victorian things... “So what has changed you? On Saturday night you lectured me for just suggesting it”.

And he: “That was soppy! Yes, you may find me changed: I have been drinking — six drips; had a dream!”

“A what?”

“A dream I said!”

“Is it that that’s made you poetic? But I don’t like ‘do a scoot’

“Yes, but we are wasting time, you silly! We shall be caught — something is going to intervene! Come, Sweet Love! I’ll build you a palace, we’ll fly to the Pleiades”.

“That will be nice! Will you love me a lot? Will you buy me a horse? They say you have no money”.

“Yes, tons of money now — forty horses. Just put on a hat!”

“To vie with yours? But I feel pretty funky now... it is rather awful, after all... Something seems to tell me — not to. But I am going to all the same!”

“That’s a gallant! Now, how sweet! Come! You’ll be glad after”.

“How much will you love me? Oh, my little heart has gone all twinkly... Shall I write a note to tell papa?”

“No time! Don’t trouble about anything! Just throw on —

“But mustn’t I go and get my box of buttons? They’re in the drawing-room—”

“Box of what?”

“Sh-h-h! My soldiers’-buttons”.

“Now, what the deuce do you want soldiers’-buttons for? Oh, Sweet, something or other is going to intervene to balk and ruin us! Leave the buttons — I have some diamonds to give you!”

“Oh, no, Oscar, really, I am not going without my buttons... No one will see... You wait at the west shrubbery-end by that broken wall... au ‘voir...” She threw half-a-kiss, vanished...

On which he went exploring, and on discovering the broken wall, stepped in a pain of hope about, until sounds of her came, and Guncotton dashed, and he dashed, to a little figure in a flutter — no kiss, no time — she hardly had time to pant “Oscar, I am frightened”, when he had her hand snatched, and was off with her.

Up through Penpolack to the station — the train already there, Guncotton nearly missing it, only at the final moment deciding to leap and squeeze in. In some moments more they found themselves off for Thule and Honolulu, as it were on a sudden, by luck, and looked one at the other, with wonder.

“Girlie!” Warwick said, “girl of my heart! we’re all right!”

VII. ELOPING

YES, BUT THE station-master had recognized Guncotton; had recognized Paddy, too, under her hood.

“We’re all right!” says Warwick, with surprise, and he pointed at her, stooping, with pantomime, to sing “With a woola, woola, woola, and a wolla, wolla, woo, and a yoola, yoola, yoola, and a yolla, yolla, yoo!”

But, then, Paddy was a critic, and “woola, woola” seemed to her nothing else than ninny: for, if her forehead went smaller toward its top, coffin-shaped, there was sense in the attention of her eyes, which narrowed to smiling, and there was originality in her laugh. At once quite a new conception of Ivor Warwick commenced to arise in her, to dismay her — Ivor who in her eyes had been finically élite, “best-dressed”, civilization’s latest thing, disciplined as a conductor’s bâton; but this man for whom she had abandoned her soft home was all a storm, rude, exuberant, touched with buffoonery, his trousers showed tumours about the knee, his boots thick — and his odd talk! infected with slang, not good Georgian slang, but somehow Edwardian, Victorian; and no tenderness? lust, yes; but no obeisance, moaning eternal service, to his soul’s divinity. Within ten minutes ten things in him astonished, shocked, disillusioned her; nor in truth was Warwick as like Ivor Warwick in face as twins can be alike; yet no doubt that he was Ivor entered her consciousness; for a throng of proofs will fail to arouse a first doubt in a consciousness preoccupied with a certainty, though after a first a second readily occurs.

But this being's gift of the gab, far surpassing Ivor's, pleased, dazzled her; solitary in their compartment with the dog, his tongue flowed and flowed with the rapidity of the dog's rippling tongue, digging her ribs to a little giggling anon; and he had an addictedness to kissing which rather reconciled her to his unexpected characteristics. And so to a stop at Truro, a stop at Bodmin.

But at Bodmin Warwick got a shock: for, as the train was getting ready to move out, an officer trotted in upon the platform to trot along the train, until, coming to Warwick's compartment, on looking in, he put his hand to wring the door-handle, but had only time to cry "Hi, there!" when the train left him running backward.

From which the fugitives assumed that, Paddy's absence from home having been discovered, a wire had been sent out along the line, enjoining upon the authorities to stop her: and this was so, the Penpolack station-master having given information of having seen Paddy, Mr. Ivor Warwick, and Guncotton go off.

So, half-way toward Plymouth, when the train all-but stopped at a "distant station" signal, Warwick sprang down upon the rails, and grasping Paddy's hand, ran, saying "Come, girl! girl of my heart! the gates of hell shall not prevail against us".

And they fled, without any notion whither, fleeing the railway, until, mounting some hill-road in the night's Utopia, they spied in the moonlight a house of some size that stood lonely, having before it a post with a signboard marked "Fox and Hounds": into this they went to spend the night.

After being given a nice bedroom lighted by electricity, Warwick, who was ravenous, wanted Paddy to go down with him to a "commercial-room" for supper; but Paddy said "I don't want anything to eat, I'll stay here", with a maidenly shrinking from being eyed at.

And, seated alone in an easy-chair near an electric-stove, her knuckles at her cheek, she considered it, her heart going rather fast at the unknown gulfs before her: she had ventured upon a big thing, her everyday bed left, to spring into a precipice.

Nor did Warwick seem to be in any hurry to return to her; when it occurred to her that he must be eating a lot, she opened the room-door, stole out to a stair-head near, looked down over banisters: and there on the stair was he with a young woman whom he was busily kissing — an inn-maid rather monstrously fat, her wrists thick, her head cast back, absorbed in kissing away, like anchorites rapt in prayer; and she had awkwardly in hand a water-can which appeared on the point of dropping from her, her fingers were so relaxed and absent, while Guncotton sat close with a sideward up-look, watching human love with curiosity.

“Er”, Paddy went, not admiring his taste, her young life now making acquaintance with pain: for a gumboil for two days at twelve had been not much in comparison with the catastrophe of this miscarriage. She felt herself the victim of a mystery of iniquity, not conceiving that here were two moralities contrasting, hers a villager morality, ancient-Asiatic, concerned with persons, “neighbours”, his a world-morality concerned with worlds: so she saw nothing but her wrong. For this she had left her soft home, where were no crosses for her, nor cares of self-protection, self-defence; to which home something in her could never now return, ashamedly to confess her desertion of it a mistake and failure.

But, stung, she stung back. When Warwick, on running up, wrung the handle, the door, locked, repulsed his advance. Paddy inside said “I don’t want to open, Oscar”; and to his “Why?” and “why?” she answered always “I don’t want to”.

He had to sleep bachelor, for the fat quean shrank from being a bed-fellow.

And Paddy slept, dressed, in a chair.

At daylight she opened the door, and when he came demanding why she had handled him “so harshly last night”, she, smiling up into his face, replied “A caprice. Please get used to my caprices”.

“Hard-hearted!” he said. “Come on, give your old man a squeeze”.

“Er”, she went at him.

And he: “I say, don’t you love me, you?”

“Do you love me?”

“You may bet!”

“Me only?”

“Rather!”

She laughed.

“Do you doubt it?”

“It does not matter”.

“Oh, well. Let’s go down to breakfast”.

But Paddy would not: breakfast was taken up to her by the fat lass, whose eyes met Paddy’s silently meditating on her.

Then at ten o’clock the runaways started for London in a car — Warwick, unlicensed, driving; but he proved a furious driver, scatter-brained, and, having no practice in driving, twice horrified Paddy by accidents — at a spot where cattle were crossing at Honiton, and at Andover the car broke a motor-bicycle to fragments, with crackle of its own glass. And so into the lights o’ London, where at the Savoy Hotel Warwick took a flat, ordered a supper.

In their drawing-room he and Paddy stood on opposite sides of a table, looking at each other: and she said “It appears that you mean us to sleep like married couples?”

And he: “Well?”

“Shouldn’t that come after marriage?”

“Now, Paddy, Darling, shall we not be level-headed? — unless you mistrust me”.

“Oh, no, I don’t mistrust you in that way”.

“Well, then”.

She made no answer.

“Kiss me!” he said.

Obediently she came round, held up her lips.

“Pet! Sweet old thing!” he said to her.

But presently when he left her there, then after five minutes came back — no sight of her! the rooms empty of her presence; and he mourned for his night.

That, though, did not prevent him from revelling in the supper; and soon after it a note came by messenger-boy: “Dear Oscar, please forgive my flight. I am at the Langham Hotel. Paddy”.

To this he scribbled in answer “Heartless thing, but sweet. What is it all about, Woola-woola? I am tired and tipsy now, but tomorrow will look you up. Do yourself well, throw money about, you are now thousands of times richer than your father. Sweet dreams of your old man. Oscar”.

But that “tomorrow” was thronged with interests other than Paddy, who hardly entered his head, as his taxis threaded London from Mincing Lane to Threadneedle Street to Hatton Garden to Harley Street. At night he dined five men at his hotel, and was then tired — might then have ‘phoned to Paddy, or sent some money, but put it off him.

The next day was the same, though he was once very near to her in Harley Street, while he was eyeing over a house before buying: for he had a medical degree, had lived a little at twenty-three in Harley Street, and, in seeking now a London abode, his mind naturally harked back to that street of scientists. By the second nightfall he had signed deeds, had acquired No. 24 there; but now Paddy was ousted from his attention by the fact that that night Hogan and Dowdy were being “revivalist” at the Albert Hall; and his new motor, full of a pair of fellows and two girls-about-town, had barely spurted up when the first hymn was being sung in a hall swarming not only with the lower orders, but with lords: for it was the mode now to have gone once to Hogan’s.

Warwick knew that strong face from the newspapers, but now saw it solid— “a man of a fierce countenance” — a face almost a square, quite brown in contrast with its white brow, dropping across which brow, down to the left eyebrow, a wing of hair swept thick, with an expression of press-of-business, sweat-of-office; his body stoutish; otherwise, being shortish, it might have looked too small for his lump of skull; and with power he spoke, seeming himself to believe the things he said — nor was this incredible, since, unlike other clerical minds, no money-motive drove him: it was known of him that, though thousands of pounds passed through his hands every week, he himself remained a poor man — without even boasting that he was poor; what he lusted for was, not money, but empire — to see men believing that what he said, however rude, was true, to see them doing what he told them to do.

One wonders whether his eye was not once drawn that night to rest on Warwick, whether no voice within him warned that, sitting lost amid those thousands, was one who had vowed war upon him...

As to his Dowdy, Dowdy was the singer, and without doubt possessed a tenor voice of no little power and poignancy.

But as to Paddy, what of her? Forgotten! — anyway, neglected. It was very well to tell her “throw money about”, but no money had been given her, though she needed money for different things, her only wealth now being her box of buttons and a few jewels; and she stood astonished that a day had come for her in which she was no longer a centre of plenteousness and of pettings.

On the second night of the failure of Warwick’s promise to “look her up tomorrow” she wrote “Dear Oscar, I am still at the Langham Hotel. Paddy”; and, being uncertain whether Warwick was still at the Savoy, or was now at the Bermondsey address whither she had frequently written to Ivor Warwick, she wrote the note twice, to send to both addresses.

So the following morning Ivor knew where the fugitive was, and, wild with excitement, dashed at once from his flat to wire to his mother, now back at Penpolack, “Patricia St. Aubyn found, at Langham Hotel”; at the same time he wired to Paddy “I am delighted: expect me this forenoon. Ivor”.

What her “still” in “I am still at the Langham” might mean he could not conceive — that assumption that he had before known where she was! and it lent such wings to his keenness to see her, that, though a fault in a high-power switch at a sub-station bound him to his office some hours that morning, before eleven he was off for the hotel.

But before ten Warwick, who also had had Paddy’s note, had gone to her; and among her first words to him were “What did ‘I am delighted’ mean? ‘Delighted’ at what?”

And he: “I said so? When?”

“Why, in your wire” — holding it out.

Then he saw that the wire and delight were Ivor’s, who must be flying to her, and all the fat was in the fire, unless he acted like lightning. So at once he said “Come, let’s drive about, while we talk and arrange things”.

In passing out, he paid her hotel-bill, and in the motor told her never more to send any letter to Bermondsey, since he would now be at Harley Street; told her, too, that hotels were dangerous places for her, under whatever name she registered; but he knew of a boardinghouse — only, she should have some luggage: he and she could go shopping; then, if there were suitable rooms ready for her, he’d leave her at the boarding-house, or at a hotel near it, to dream of her old man, and he’d not forget to get a licence of marriage, so that they might marry and have a high time, with a woola, woola, woola, and a wolla, wolla, wolla, woo.

Troubled as she was, she had to throe toward laughters at the ardours of that hearth of his vitality, his hilarity like a typhoon of ozone on Alpine altitudes; he could only sit still when kissing, palming her larger parts, “ten kisses short as one, one long as twenty”, with moans of lust; and whatever he suggested she acquiesced in.

So when, before noon, Ivor Warwick arrived at the Langham, no Paddy, Paddy gone — with some man — no trace left: so that now profoundly perplexed he stood, reft of explanation of a senseless universe.

And he was knocked more agape, if possible, when, as he was going from the hotel, a dog sprang upon his breast, gladly wagging, gobbling barks of gladness — Guncotton, who, having slipped through a doorway opened by a decorator in Harley Street near, had now followed the scent of Warwick to the Langham, to find, not Warwick, but a second-best Ivor: as to which Ivor wrote that nightfall to his mother “Wild as it may seem, I believe that it was Guncotton: the dog’s manners had all the meaning of a recognition; and the fact that he had all of Guncotton’s markings, including Guncotton’s peculiarity — the left ear not tipped with black — adds assurance to my conviction. If I ought to call it assurance. Assurance confuted by assurance! the two faces of Janus exactly equal. For, as I said in the telegram, this was a Guncotton no longer aged, but jubilantly youthful. After bombarding me, darting and darting at me with the regularity of billows addicted to battering a crag, the dog dashed from me to be gone like a flash, continuing apparently to follow the scent from which my apparition had deflected him. If Guncotton could engender a pup to which, with his other characteristics, he transmitted his memories, too, then, this was that pup. Think, Mother dear, for us — I, I confess, am helpless here. You have much now to think of, dear Mother, Mother dear, but, then, Adequate is the name of your mental equipment, and as ever, I bet my last bit on that wit. It is dreadful that I am now writing, instead of travelling to you, as we expected, but qu'y faire? Within two days, though, I should be free of this second break-down in the generator-system....”

VIII. FELICIA WARWICK

AT THAT SAME twilight hour of Ivor's writing Dame Felicia Warwick was seated on a couch at "Caerwent", plying a needle as quietly as if no world had burst in pieces beneath her feet, working a pattern of worsted on canvas; and before her, seated, her old servant, Pruie.

There were questions and answers, and intervals wherein some sense of the efficiency of the lady's presence reigned there in dumbnesses of meditation, as though visible like her fingers' business was the business of her knitting wits behind her eyes — eyes light-blue, steady, dwelling on you out of the windows of her citadel of personality with a steady understanding, and, if you sinned, be sure your sin would find you out; her hair white, like white silk, but only its bun, or bulky loaf say, now showing under a hat of Hibernian peasant-Pats, turned down all round, she having been out planting potted begonias in a garden-border with a trowel for Summer flowering; but her face still held out against the siege of years, not looking a face of sixty, but of fifty say, her twentieth year still sometimes triumphing to pay it a flying visit; and still it was thoroughbred, with the serenity of a princess riding a racer, like the lady with greyhounds of Furse's "Diana of the Uplands", whose mode of ladyship, English homelife, fine linens, scented underclothes, her essence suggested; and her voice had some strangeness of charm, a voice a little hollow, solemn, as of one who relates a tale of stormings and misfortunes in fairyland forlorn, and stares at vacancy, relating it, seeing strange things. Only, some crows'-feet coming now at the eye-corners! not much: just to shew that she was mortal woman, and must some time buckle under to become as others. She said to her Pruie “Dear me, you still say that it was Mr. Ivor who ran up the stair”.

And Pruie: “I don’t know who else to say it was, Mrs. Warwick”.

“But since Mr. Ivor says that it was not?” Then: “I’d rather say it was Dr. Warwick, Pruie”.

“Dr. Warwick storm up a stair two at a time, Mrs. Warwick?”

“No, certainly”, the lady murmured, “that doesn’t sound right. But since it was not Mr. Ivor? Did you ever, Pruie, hear Mr. Ivor say ‘make yourself small’? bidding one take a cubit from one’s stature?”

“No, Ma’am, nor I did never hear Dr. Warwick say ‘make yourself small’”.

“No, they are not much for slang, those two gentlemen. You and I like to call a pub a pub, but they give themselves the pains to call it a public-house... But I can more easily imagine Dr. Warwick in a seaside-Johnnie’s straw-hat than imagine Mr. Ivor, can’t you?”

“Maybe, Ma’am”.

Dumbness...

And dreamily now the lady, reasoning as if to herself: “Anyway, some one ‘stormed’ up the stair: not Mr. Ivor, who was in Bermondsey, but so like, that you could take him to be Mr. Ivor. And he was like Mr. Ivor in other things than looks: was like Mr. Ivor, and especially like Dr. Warwick, in this, that he was a scientist — busied about something in the laboratory all the time you were listening; and a scientist who knew exactly where the laboratory is— ‘stormed’ straight to it; locked himself in; knew that your name is Pruie; knew that he might possibly storm up without being observed, the house being deserted. And he not only looked and behaved like Mr. Ivor, he smelled like Mr. Ivor — or like Dr. Warwick — for Guncotton was with him: you are sure that it was Guncotton, because the dog scratched to get at you when you rapped, knew that it was you; and since it was Guncotton, that does seem to force us to say that the man was either Dr. Warwick or Mr. Ivor. It is, indeed, possible to say instead that it was Mr. Ivor's or the Doctor's wraith, or the Doctor's ghost, if the Doctor was dead, and if old men's ghosts become young ghosts; but wraiths and ghosts, if they exist, are extremely rare, charily stingy of themselves, else everyone would know that they exist, whereas the human race refuses to credit that wraiths, at any rate, exist; if it did credit, no one could ever prove an alibi: for, if someone declared 'I was not in London, witnesses can prove that I was at Drayton', a jury would think 'That's no proof, it may have been his wraith that was at Drayton'; but no jury thinks this. And even if wraiths or ghosts do exist, and reflect light to be seen, do they diffuse particles to be smelled? and do they have the same smell as the bodies of which they are wraiths or ghosts, so that a dog's delicate nostrils can recognize them? No, that hardly seems reasonable. Let us say, then, that that stromer of the stair, that scientist so like Mr. Ivor, was not Mr. Ivor's or anyone's, wraith, nor was Dr. Warwick's ghost: for, apart from the question of the odour of ghosts, we can say that Dr. Warwick was not dead: pretending to be dead—"

"Oh, Mrs. Warwick!" — Pruie started.

"Bear with me, Pruie" — stopping her embroidery to gaze now at space — "let us confront facts, whatever pangs that costs us. No, not dead. Pretending to be dead, and carelessly pretending, indextrously, too engrossed with one big thing to trouble much about messy little things. The police rightly reject the idea that he has been murdered: none of the stabs in the cloak happen to be over the heart-region — penny-ha'penny holes made by a pen-knife. And where's the body? not buried anywhere near Devil's Cave, elaborately concealed, but the cloak and hat left on exhibition at the cave's opening. No, that's napoo. And the dog, where's he? If the master whom a dog is following near its home is killed, the dog comes home? But it appears from Mr. Ivor's second wire to-day that Guncotton is in London; and isn't Guncotton with Dr. Warwick? Only, the dog that fondled Mr. Ivor was a young dog, so could not, you may say, have been Guncotton; but, then, the same thing is true of the dog that stormed up the stair with the young philosopher: you are sure that that was Guncotton; yet it was a young Guncotton: for you know that the old Guncotton never would follow up to the laboratory, but would toddle to the drawing-room to warm his old maw. So the notion of a young Guncotton offers itself to us: and, if an old dog can become young, an old philosopher may; indeed, if the man who stormed the stair was either Dr. Warwick or Mr. Ivor, and was not Mr. Ivor, then it was a young Dr. Warwick. One must be jolly chary in letting oneself entertain such a notion: the only thing that could rescue it from being absurd would be the circumstance that it is true. Yet we see it taking place before us every day: in six months a tree becomes young, in six months old; look, it is old; look anew, it is young. And Dr. Warwick, an expert in sub-atoms, may have discovered some force which can both uproot a yew and renew a youth. Carew's Clause yew — that uprooting may have been an experiment... he goes out of doors that midnight... never did before... and soon afterwards the yew is down. But what was that dent in the sand? What was that? Ah, no, that beats me, that beats me.... And, if he did discover something, was his discovery sudden? It is a thing incredible that while in the course of discovery he kept the whole thing dark from me, who was the partner in all his thoughts. Yet some discoveries do come sudden, like Röntgen rays — some few: he may have discovered something in those four days of my absence in Penzance — maybe. That Monday night some Light from on high was among men, some psychic emanation strange like the 'cosmic rays' which are at present perplexing philosophers: those eerie 'dreamings' of people about here seem to mean that the Mind-stuff which permeates the world was mightily insurgent that night; and this might have urged a mind like Dr. Warwick toward fresh knowledge — might. It does seem that he has done something to himself, after experimenting on the yew and the dog, to renew his youth — something which has wrenched within him the springs of strictness and rectitude. I knew him when he was a youth, and it was not his way then to say 'make yourself small'; if he says it now, some profound modification has taken place in his temperament. With whom has Miss Paddy St. Aubyn run away? With whom? She was in love with Mr. Ivor — he told me. Hasn't she gone with someone who can be mistaken for Mr. Ivor, whom you mistook for Mr. Ivor, who had in his pocket the golf-balls — ?

"Well, really", Pruie put in here, "you mean, Ma'am, that Dr. Warwick could run away—"

"Doesn't sound quite o k., does it, Pruie? But, then, there are more things in heaven—" she was arrested now by a rap, and said "Inspector Trelawney — or else — no, I bet it is Sir Borlase St. Aubyn!" — as Pruie hobbled off to open.

It was Sir Borlase who in a minute stood before the lady, who stood up also, as tall as he, he not being big.

His bow was abrupt. "Good evening, Madam," — with the sharpness of a cavalry-captain's "charge!"

"Please sit, Sir Borlase St. Aubyn".

"Thank you, no. I won't sit. I am here merely to ask for your son's address. Be good enough to let me have it".

Her eyes dwelt on him, estimating him. "Well, you know — that depends. Is it that you want to write to him?"

“Write to him, indeed, Mrs. Warwick! Catch me writing love-letters to your son! Go to him — go for him”.

“Oh, don’t say that yet — wait — bear — till you know. Your father’s-heart is sore — and, O, if my head were waters, I could weep them all... But it was not my son — please, please, believe — don’t I know him? and if I give my word.... You have seen his wire, which I sent you at once this morning, telling that she was at the Langham Hotel, then his second wire, telling that she had gone from there — think how elaborate a hypocrisy! What a liar, who never lied before! And there are ten proofs... He meant to put on the sun-dial with his own hands the little packet of golf-balls which have now been found on it—”

But Sir Borlase brushed it off him. “Pardon me, Madam, I can’t go into all that. The main facts are certain. Last Saturday your son threatened me to have his way with my daughter; then was seen taking her into a train. And I know he had managed to fascinate her fancy, nobody else could have induced her — Intolerable wrong. Ancient name. No scandal — till now. Intolerable thing. She doesn’t even seem to be married, or would surely have written to me, have wired — fond of me. Well, the law of our land says ‘Do not kill’, and that’s all right; but if a man’s dearest heart’s-blood is robbed from him, the law admits, says ‘Oh, well, in that case, yes, red for red it is’. As for the address, I can readily discover it; the man is in Bermondsey somewhere. You might let me have it”.

Her eyes were steadily on him; and she said “I don’t at present quite see my way—”

“Good evening, Madam” — right about turn: he was gone.

And she to Pruie a minute later: “Ah, that roaring lion; it is killing he means, if he comes across Ivor!”

She added, “Now then, Pruie, run: tell Rudyard to run and let us know if Sir Borlase takes a London train” — this Rudyard being a relative of Pruie, porter at Penpolack station.

She divined that the baronet would hardly start that night, but might the day after: for, if he could not find Ivor’s private address, he could find the electric-station, at which all Penpolack was aware that Ivor was employed; the next afternoon, however, Ivor might be coming down while Sir Borlase was going up: that would be well! So she scribbled to him in haste that evening “Come, let nothing prevent”; but unfortunately the letter was rather late for the last, six o’clock post; and the next afternoon when the porter, Rudyard, ran down to “Caerwent” with the news that the baronet was off for London, this threw her into such a condition of terror, that at once she wired Ivor “Let nothing prevent coming. If impossible, do not be at works, nor at flat. I command”.

He had not yet got this, when she got a telegram from him: “Starting for you by four-fifteen”: and this came comforting.

But when about to go to his train for Penpolack, he got her telegram, “Come, let nothing prevent”, and its effect was the opposite of what she intended: for he saw that he was being bidden to fly from a peril, from Sir Borlase, and since “the righteous are as bold as a lion”, to fly was indecorous in his eyes: so he now sent her a second telegram: he “found it impossible”, after all, to go down; “forgive”, he said, “nor must I hide myself, forgive, forgive, this once”.

From which a fresh crisis of affright for her; thrice she ranged through “Caerwent” dining-room as through a cage too pent to contain her, her arms as if shackled behind her back in her customary manner; and she glanced at a clock — time, she decided, if she was lively, to catch the 8.40.... Within some minutes she had some things crushed into an attaché-case, and was running, throwing bye-bye behind at Pruie running in the tow of her rush. But after banging the garden gate, her run bolted, not up toward the station, but down toward the sands, where near the sea-edge she snatched up a patch of seaweed, and, as she dashed back, snapped this into her attaché-case, nor had her arithmetic, though risky, miscalculated her ticks, for she had been settled six ticks in a carriage before the train rolled out: on a sudden she was away for London.

IX. HOW TO GET A TRUCK FROM ELGIN TO LONDON

AT DAY-DAWN SHE went to stay with a family of four old maids, the St. John-Hammonds, whose Hanover Square mansion was her other home.

Now two winks of sleep, and now wide eyes of wit: the thing now being to hit upon Sir Borlase St. Aubyn among the millions of London; then to hit upon that young philosopher who had stormed up the “Caerwent” stair, and, without doubt, had plucked Paddy St. Aubyn like a flower; then to hit upon Paddy, whom, just possibly, it might not even now be too late to snatch from that which is worse than the grave for a girl.

To find Sir Borlase, she decided upon an audacious step — to tell him her Ivor’s address: so she made a trunk-call upon Miss Ruth St. Aubyn, Sir Borlase’s aunt, who had a house in Penpolack, and was always up with the lark... “I am Mrs. Warwick... Yes, in London... I want to call upon Sir Borlase, kindly tell me his address”; but Ruth St. Aubyn answered “I can’t, he wants this visit to London to be incognito”; and now Mrs. Warwick: “Well, then, will you ‘phone him Ivor Warwick’s address?” — now giving the address.

And now immediately she was in her hosts’ motorcar, to be off across the river through a Cockney morning that yawned at rawness of drizzly mist, and to take her stand at one of a row of garden-gates in front of great blocks of flats; and there, though eager to go up to her son, her feet remained sentry, guarding him from peril, as the dragon the apples.

Till Sir Borlase drove up, and found that before his gun could get at her son, it had to break through the barrage of her rationality. “Will you get into my motor?" she said to him— "an elopement. If my son has run off with your daughter, you run off with his mother. Too old; but remember ten years ago, Sir Borlase. Come; come with me".

He had to. And in the motor she went over anew the story of the young man who had darted up the "Caerwent" stair at a time when Ivor was under the eyes of five witnesses in London; then, having with her the letters of Ivor written since that night of Paddy's flight, she insisted upon Sir Borlase reading each: they breathed no little realness of pity for Paddy, grief, a grimness against the man who had misled her: "I devote my life, Mother, to finding that brute; if I do, I fancy the brute will rue his misdoing". All this was impressive; the baronet had intelligence; and it became as incredible to him that Ivor was the vile one as it was incredible that Ivor was not. Seeing which, she said "He hasn't yet gone out: go now to him, look into him, witness his innocence for yourself. Only give me your word that you will never do anything against him until you are certain that it was he".

And Sir Borlase consented, with "Oh, very well, I undertake that much".

Now in his own motor he drove back to the flats, achieved a fifth stair, rang, to snap sharp in-his cavalry-captain fashion "My daughter here, Warwick?"

"No, Sir", says Ivor.

"Where's she?"

"Somewhere in London, I think".

"Ask me in".

"Come in".

Within, the captain stepped deliberately about the three apartments like an inspector, without saying anything, on the look-out for some hint of womanhood; but here everything was fastidiously male, save a miniature of Paddy and two pastels of a mother: so in the end the two stood together discussing, drove together in the captain's car to the electric station, where were witnesses for Ivor, and finally, in the office, the captain offered his hand, saying "Well, Mr. Warwick, I seem to have misjudged you".

He added "Now we are allies: for you seem not less keen than I am to lay hands on the man, and we can work together, punish together".

He then went away, leaving the son all unconscious still that that dearest, his mother, was in London: for it would be well, she considered, for her to come to know more before acquainting him with this, so had asked the captain not to mention it.

In the effort to know more she spent that day, that Saturday, almost all: breakfast, then hours of it; lunch, then hours of it, with splendid patience: for just to wait, doing nothing but exercise faith in one's own forecast, expecting something where Nothing reigns, where Nothing is Nature, can be dreadfully distressing to faith. Her mission now was to pick out of the myriad reel of London that runner-up of stairs and abductor of young ladies, to peer into him, and say to herself "that's he", or "that's not he": and to this end she stood sentry through that day in Langham Place, while twice it rained, occasionally pacing some steps for change of air, but mostly standing a statue, a pale patience, having in her hand that patch of seaweed which she had snatched from the beach just before her dash from the country: for she divined that the dog which had fondled Ivor Warwick in Langham Place hardly lived far from it; if he lived near, his nostrils' quickness would scarcely fail to pick up a scent so raw as seaweed; and, if he was really Guncotton, he would run to an odour long known, now "lost awhile"; then, having Guncotton, she would have Guncotton's master.

But Guncotton, though near in Harley Street, was that day rather a prisoner. Seven o'clock struck; now coldness and hunger goaded her toward giving up; but still she would not go. Then All Souls' struck another hour, and now London frowned toward night, a rout of sounds, dimly mixed with lights and sights; soon now, however, like a streak of keenness, he came freed, and was with her a chaos of ecstasies.

“Not somuch of it”, she said to him, “let one breathe”.

And she said to him “So you are Guncotton? Gay young dog! Dog-about-town! Lighter than my heavy heart”.

Now she tossed away the dollop of seaweed, then, when he could listen to anything, said to him “Now take me to your home”.

And he, who had a good knowledge of English, went before her, with runnings to-and-fro, with “come!” and “come!”, until he conducted her into a noising of roysterers, to 24 on the east street-side, where several cars stood parked; but when he clawed at the door, calling “whoof!”, she fled away; then when he was let in, hankered back.

The house was uttering an uproar — from a diningroom to the left of the front-door — uproar of revelry; and since no blind was lowered, and a lower sash raised, she, standing on tiptoe at the “area”-rail, could perfectly discern inside not less than fifteen men and three girls competing in gabbling in a scramble of tongues tumbled in press of battle, and their standard had “Alcohol” on it. She saw someone stout, in swallow-tails, a butler, come trotting in, cumbered with more bottles, which he caused to pop and ooze froths like fumes of cannons operating in press of battle, to lay low the revellers; and she saw, seated askew on the table’s edge, one whom she had known forty years before, looking much as she had known him then, at twenty-seven: in one hand he had a glass, a Venetian bubble of glass, gold-beaded, his other hand fingering the ear of that one of the three girls who was dressed as a nurse.

“There he is”, she said — the moralist, timorous of the improper, meticulous as a micrometer. Into her head floated a memory of his book,

“The Foundations of Ethics”.

“There he is” — nothing thenceforth was incredible under the sun, nor anything credible.

“But the money — whence?” Did the same discovery that could uproot a yew and renew a youth make one wealthy, too?

But no sign of Paddy — that child’s life! Where, then, was she?

Having abandoned his wife for Paddy, had he abandoned Paddy likewise, that child?

Now he slid off the table, caught up the hospital-nurse, and went awkwardly waltzing with her through the throng, singing “After the Ball”.

One of the girls called “Shut up, Wallace, you can’t dance”.

And now he, loud-mouthed, “Now for the Troc, Boys!” — putting the spirit of fleeing into the onlooker’s feet; presently after which they were all standing, one calling out “Cut out night-clubs to-night, Wallace — Steinway Hall lecture to-morrow”.

On which another called out “Yes, how do you get a truck from Elgin to London? Doesn’t seem tremendously difficult!”

And a lad in evening-dress called out “A lecture by Wallace should be ‘For Girls Only’, and girls don’t care a damn how you get a truck—”

At which a noise of laughter; and Wallace — for, having taken the name “Wallace”, Warwick henceforth may well be called “Wallace” — Wallace, with a face going grave a moment, said “Lecture’s for boys, too: better come, the lot of you, if you know what’s good for you”.

Glasses, meantime, were drained, the lady decamped, the group trooped out, drove in their motors away.

Then she, weary, stepped into a taxi, to drive to Steinway Hall, her heart now a lump of lead, if lead can have a pang — of ethical dismay, of jealousy, perplexity at an earth turned turtle. That old man! her twin and other self! that he should have been discovering an elixir or something, and excluding her from communion, here was wounding from one's own true love: now she knew reproach of soul.

At Steinway Hall she saw that the lecture was for eleven o'clock the next (Sunday) morning; and now at last home to Hanover Square to a strange bed in a strange world, and as a door on its hinges so she turned that nightlong on it; no shutting of her eyes that stared until light of day, and then she must needs rise from brief sleep to be away to the lecture, where perhaps Paddy St. Aubyn might be: for the thing now was to unearth Paddy quick, if only to learn the worst.

So, veiled, she sat at the back of a room more or less full of, as it were, a family-party of house-owners, "the intelligentsia", dilettanti in distinguished costumes, having some interest in ideas, and willing to be critics of, to be amused by, whatever wind of new and curious may spring up.

And now walks Wallace to the platform, Dame Felicia Warwick knowing that swing-back of one arm, some hint of stamping mixed with his advance, hair rather tousled, trousers rather baggy — she knew them! had known them four years. But though he probably had little practice in public-speaking, he seemed not foreign to it, saying with sang-froid "Good day, Ladies and Gentlemen. Perhaps you will join me in singing Lord Tennyson's little hymn 'The Brook'".

And, standing up, some of them did...

I chatter over stony ways

In little sharps and trebles,

I bubble into eddying bays,

I babble on the pebbles.

And out again I curve and flow,

To join the brimming river,
For men may come, and men may go,
But I go on for ever.

And now when with a lust of the ear they seated their buttocks to hear, he brings from a pocket a thing like half-a-plum to clap upon his forehead — his so-called “psychophone” of those twilight-wanderers — and, invested with it, held his eyes upraised five seconds, as in silent prayer; then sitting free-and-easy on a little table’s brink, he proceeds to bring forth the most passionate message perhaps that man ever addressed to man, saying “Well, now, Ladies and Gentlemen, as to getting a truck from Elgin to London, there are various ways: you may push it with hand, foot, head, shoulder; or you may pull it by strings; or you may connect lower animals with it to pull it; or you may connect sails with it, for winds to push it; or you may connect an engine with it, to push or pull it by the expansive force of some gas compressed, as steam, or the explosive force of some gas, as frozen air exploded, or oil, operating in the four-cycle way of Otto, the two-cycle way of Diesel; or you may wind a wire round a drum in planes containing the drum’s axis, then, inciting in the wire a flow of electrons by reeling the drum about its axis between a magnet’s poles, you may then connect this wire with a wire wound about a like drum in the truck, thus making the truck’s drum a rotor, whose reeling, connected with the truck’s wheels, can set these areeling; or, by any of these means, you may get the truck to the Thames, then float it, sail it, paddle it, screw it, down the river to London, or up. But, however you do it, you do it by science. Some of us may be disposed to suppose that to move the truck by electric motor is more scientific than by pulling with strings; but that’s not so. Science is any knowledge of the order in which events always happen — firstly, secondly, thirdly — knowledge that, if you add water to sulphuric acid, then, secondly, the two wax furious, knowledge that, if you pry through a telescope, then, secondly, you can descry two hundred island universes, knowledge that, if something is pulled, then, secondly, it moves, or tends to: this is science, acquired afresh by each infant life: nothing can be ‘more scientific’ than science — than the science of a fly, of a vegetable cell, which could not continue alive six ticks without science; and the primary microbe that kicked was driven to acquire a trifle of science quick, so as not to die.

“Now, Life is good, ‘Life is sweet’, as we say — two statements that are one, since good means sweet. One needn’t trouble to prove that: for everything that you consider good gives pleasure, as, if you consider it good to give up smoking, that is for health, somehow for more pleasure than pain, as saints are ascetic to get to Nirvana’s calm, to a pleasure-garden, or Paradise ‘of pure delight where pleasures banish pain’: so they consider asceticism good, on the whole: good means pleasant. And Life is good: a fly shies from dying, as we rush from a motor-car coming, liking life. But no science, no (continued) life; and the more science the more life, since science is consciousness, and Life is consciousness. So, since life is good, and life is consciousness or science, science is the same as Good: for that there may be Good or pleasure there must be life, and that there may be (continued) life there must be science.

“And since Good is science, Evil is nescience, lack-of-science. A being all-conscious, omni-scient, is free of kidney-disease, conscious of a super-insulin — free of each species of evil, living within the deeps of seas of sweetness. So the so-called ‘mystery of evil’ is no mystery: for evil is unease; unease is nescience or non-science; and since science is of necessity a growth — for how could there be an omni-scient grub or monkey? — we see that the existence of evil is no ‘mystery’, but is a necessity of nescience, so that Evil can be defined as ‘the Necessity of Every Meantime’; also we see that God is good, that Life is destined to delight: for it is the law of Life to acquire science, Life can’t help in the long run, God so drives Life to science: and science is Good, science is delight.

“But some of your faces harden against me when I let slip this ‘God’, you élite people being pleased to name yourselves ‘atheists’. But, then, Ladies and Gentlemen, isn’t atheism, too, like any theism, pantheism, a doctrine about the origin of the universe? And if the origin of the universe is a mystery? inherently inconceivable? isn’t that savage to have some doctrine about it? There should be nothing; but Somehow something is, which moves: that’s so, isn’t it? And the English for this Somehow is ‘God’. For, if not, what is the English for it? Nothing? Yes, something: fancy a language without a word for chair, for world! So when you say ‘no God’, you say ‘no Somehow’, not meaning what you say, for there must be Somehow, and there cannot be an atheist. But, in fact, in saying ‘no God’, you are answering priests and negroes, who prattle that Somehow is So-and-so; and, in condescending to answer savages, you overshoot, say too much, meaning to say that there is no So-and-so; but you say that there is no Somehow. ‘God’, then, is good English for a Somehow that must be.

“And God is good; God is Divinely pitiless; God’s design is pitilessly to drive Life to arrive at delight through acquiring science: as when a Pleistocene Ice-age drove ape-types to light fires, or die; after which they were men, having as much more pleasure than apes as we have than they. When some mote is in our eye, how tearful is that tiny evil! We cannot blow our eyes, as we can our nose, nor can we sneeze through our eyes, as the people on some spheres doubtless do: we just sit and think ‘how pitiless! how badly made!’ But it is good so; the Sphinx has a smile, pitiless, yes, but still a smile, and, fixedly smiling, will continue to afflict us with digs, until we are egged to invent, discover, become nobler; already an ‘eye-stone’ is known of; if our mote is ferric, or nickel, or cobalt, a magnet gets it out; and a well-invented vacuum would have out any mote.

“God is good. Growth of science is a growth of knowledge of God’s goodness, and of God’s greatness. For, also, God is great. Stars are suns, bigger than this our globe by millions; these suns, numerous as grains of the rice-mowing, clustering in groups named ‘island-universes’; to traverse an island the flight of Light requires some thirty thousand years of wild work; to leap deep from island to island Light requires more than a million years, more than four, than fifty, millions — thousands of millions — so that we now see them as they were in old eternities before this solar system whirled; and there may be millions of islands — anyway there are hundreds. God’s great.

“We can’t realize this — much; the star-lords’ hearts are far from fancying the half of it; but we realize it a bit; and according as we realize it, we can’t avoid feeling awe. And since we now know that God is good, goading threetoed to hoofed, lizard to linnet, ape to Pope, Pope to Perrin, we can’t help feeling love — if we are young, healthy, if the hormones of our glands are in good flowing order, so that we can love. We still have pains; still tornadoes, volcanoes, are more powerful than we, and, in mounds of thousands, devour us; but in any pain we think ‘these afflictions are but for a moment; God’s pitilessly good; we have more pleasure than cavemen, our sons will have yet more; God’s design is to drive Life to acquire science, and arrive at delight’: and, consoled, we lewdly dance before God. Yes, God knows, we love.

Also we are awed. And awe-and-love is adoration; adoration is religion.

“And from adoration springs donation — giving of one’s self. So we should expect to find in those of us who most adore — most realize with awe that stars are suns, and with love that Power drives lower lives into higher — in those we should expect to find eminent examples of donation; as, in fact, we do find — the scientists of our time throwing away their lives like tuppence, experimenting on themselves, to leave behind them one gleam more of science — Catterall, Garré, Lola — hundreds: their donation, mark you, having no resemblance to the donation of ancient martyrs who bargained to gain gardens of gladness after; the after-gardens for which these give themselves are for the gladness of others whom they do not know, not for their own, or their neighbours: their donation is real donation because their adoration is real adoration; their adoration is real adoration because it is based on knowing, not on hopes.

“Certainly, though, we are not the first religious on earth: there was worship before churches, adoration before Herschel, and donation in advance of adoration, as eccentric has an angle-of-advance in respect of crankweb, as spark in respect of compression: for Society, chief of scientific finds, is Divine, a miracle and mystery of enrichment, like the condenser, the step-up transformer, an enormous multiplying of loaves-and-fishes, a sacrament of marriage, and strangeness of chemical combination: so that men have been enticed to die for men before ever a scientist died for Man, as a certain Curtius hurled his manhood in, that a chasm might close for Romans, as one crucified on a hill hangs still exhibited, beautiful in his bloodiness. And they were of yesterday: cast your mind back to a midday in the dark backward and abysm of Time, a million years; see met the headmen of the five M’Niami kraals — rather hairy, prognathous, but verily men — met in parliament: for things have happened hard this year, the dry season nearly done, and the rye-crop unripe, durra-crop dying, flour being ground from bitter acorns by hungry men, who now begin, too, to grope for tubers of lotuses, to grub for roots, to seethe leaves for food. So they debate it. Who, now, has savvy and a canny nut, and knack of sconce to cut a knot? Gabingwee Eagle-eye says his say, Gamba Staghorn says his say. And Okapi says his say, Pantanka says his say. Only M'Thoma sits there still, not saying anything; has M'Thoma, then, nothing to say?... Now, it is a truth that the seeds of fruit, put (as funeral-offerings) upon graves, sprout gaily and weirdly grow (the graves being free of weeds!): so what Pantanka Antelope says is this, 'Flesh of two-handed humans, buried, brings bread: if only Rembo, he whom an elephant rent yesterday, had died, vine and rye would suddenly thrive above shreds of Rembo's buried flesh; but Rembo lives on; nobody dead'. And now something comes out of M'Thoma; now M'Thoma's mouth is moved; M'Thoma's mouth mutters 'Club M'Thoma: bury shreds of M'Thoma's flesh'... Oh, happy day! O, holy, happy day! Earth and Heaven heard it, Earth sighed to Heaven 'I have given birth'. For the lion has it not, nor the hyrax; ask the ostrich, it is foolishness to her; the birds of the air say 'We have not heard of any such'... For their young, yes, these have come to do it, but that is nearly for themselves; ants, bees, do it for Society, but these sacrifice brief lives; Man stands up and does it — for his young to commence, but presently for his neighbours, then for his tribe, his nation, till finally now we find the scientist doing it for a sun, for Life, the product of a sun.

“We should not, then, say of Plato, Philo, Jesus, Mahomet, that they had ‘no’ religion; that is rather rough truth; for just the largeness of the arch of sky, which they saw, incites awe, and since they did not kill themselves, they must, on the whole, have liked life a little, loved God a little. But just a little (genuine) love; and still less awe: their knowledge of God's goodness and greatness was so rude. God for them was as human a being as Mumbo Jumbo is, with a hyacinthine beard, getting girls pregnant, ruling over a universe that consisted of four localities — earth, heaven, hell, purgatory — jerry-built places ready to perish in ‘the Consummation’, amid a ‘falling’ of stars, nor was ‘the Beginning’ far back when they were built, when ‘He made the stars also’; all the four localities for Man, the god himself a sort of man, against whom a group of angels waged war with a hope of conquering him: not much awe of him possible. And he was capricious: they were suspicious, had fears of what he might be up to next — to be God-fearing was considered good; but fear is a pain, and pain causes hate, ‘casting out love’. Nor was that curious if they feared him, he was so cruelly rough on them: no matches, look — what would you do without matches? ah, the hardship of your life! and no paper — how could you live without paper? no wealth — Croesus, Nero, were poverty-stricken compared with a crossing-sweeper now, who can get into a motor-bus and ‘phone to Scotland. They could build, indeed, as ants do — temples, Persepolis, cities with ‘streets called Straight’, colonnades miles long — but village-cities, no water-system, light-system, for night was night then, ‘the night cometh when no man can work’, and heaven was a place where ‘there is no night’. One old writer says that Antioch was as bright by night as by day; but bright with what? arc-lamps? or rush-lights? It was the opposite of bright. And crude needs, crude creature: so that, if Cæsar or Jesus could get up now, you’d regard him as an inferior type of creature after a five minutes’ interview with him. No matches! paper, w c’s, doctors (except witchdoctors down to the eighteenth century), no wealth, or wellth, populations sparse in the absence of science, society elementary, with leprosy, everybody ‘maimed or halt or blind’, having ‘the palsy’, having a devil: so that they sighed ‘Life is sorrow’, ‘Man is born to trouble’, as the three-toed sloth calls sorrowing ‘Ai’ and ‘Ai’, and they asserted ‘Better is the day of death than the day of birth’ — what a blasphemy that! so, in order to ease their fear with some dope of love, they had to manufacture hopes that God is good after all, hopes in elysian fields, paradises, after ceasing to live — the difference between their love at fancying that ‘these afflictions are but for a moment’ and our love at knowing it, being the same as between the flow of love-hormone when one fancies sexualities and the flow when one has the fact of an actual woman in one’s arms.

“So when we say ‘ancient man’ we say lower man, for Life is consciousness, science, and how tiny the science when stars could ‘fall’! — their type as low as their universe was tiny, just as much lower than ours as four little things are less than billions of big things, as much lower as hope in God’s goodness to village Jim is less than knowledge of God’s goodness to the army and march of living things. In tackling the mammoth task of getting a truck from Elgin to London, they pulled with ropes, pushed, or sailed it, unable to conceive of a vehicle being moved by other than animal force, wind, or gravity; the sun itself was dragged by two stallions’ gallop, whose names were known, the planets were pushed by angels, the sound of machinery thrashing being a sound recently arisen on this earth, never heard by an ancient ear — until 1600 when Papin put a steam-boat on the Seine (leaving out Hele’s clock, 1500, and Hero’s toy steam-turbine). If we move the truck by electric motor, this, I say, is no ‘more scientific’, essentially, than pulling with ropes, but how far the travel in science, in life, in intimacy with the profundities and finesses of that Somehow which Is!

“But when I say that they were little religious and we much more, I mean ‘we’ here, we élite, we ‘atheists’, as you too oddly call us; I do not mean all England. Not only officially is the religion of the English still first-century Asiatic, but actually half the people are church-members; three million copies of Hogan-and-Dowdy’s hymn-book have been sold: so, if England, unlike France, is still called ‘a Christian country’, that is not without reason, I warn you, and O that my head were waters, that I might weep for the sin of my people! Here is a cause for war: for can there long exist an Asiatic lot in the thick of Europe, like an old man in a caravan for whom all a caravan has to halt? War, or civil war — something — must eliminate this cyst. You may answer that that Christian half of England only half-believes the Christian story now; well, suppose so: then, roughly, that's as if a quarter of us were Asiatics; but since half, perhaps, of the Christian mythus is more African in type than Asiatic — a fact of ethnology — that's as if half of us were Asiatics.

“Now, half is a lot; half matters: for if Good is science, and science is adoration, religion, then irréligion is Evil itself; and this Asiatic half of us is irreligious in a deep way, unable even to suspect what religion is, until it evacuates a stagnant religion of Asiatic Galilee: as one cannot have an appetite, if one is chronically constipated. A religion is an emotion due to some view of the universe, and since views of the universe are liable to rapid evolutions as science advances, a religion may rapidly become irreligious, and more irreligious, and more — as that religion of half-Asiatic, half-African Palestine, once really a little religious in eras when even Europeans did not dream that Sirius is a sun, nor what a sun is, is now as preposterously irreligious in our Europe as an ox-cart is less evolved than a truck run by electric rotor.

“Moreover, the two halves of a nation will hardly be vastly different: if half is Asiatic-irreligious, the other half won't be profoundly European-religious. But a nation's religion underlies it, look, runs right through, imbruing its institutions, social tone — being its view of the universe. If it is a villager-religion, not concerned with service to a world quasi-eternal, quasi-infinite, something like God, but concerned about ‘loving’ John Hodge, who is nothing like God, then the nation will be a villager-nation of Hodges, bashfully touching its cap to bladders of fantasy, living in fear of a villager god who is much like Hodge, of a villager lord-of-the-manor who is much like the god. Fear, indeed, is the essence of the Asiatic, African, ancient mind — the child-mind, the essence of which is a consciousness of lords always there, of a father, a master — fear that ‘casts out love’, engendering a hate, an irréligion of timorousness: they beat tin-cans to shoo some demon who implicates the moon in eclipses, they become eunuch-monks, they proffer up incense in praying, so that the god, smelling the fragrance, may imagine that it is the prayers which he smells, and, charmed, may spare them: timorous of fancied gods, fancied ancestors who lived ten centuries long, and still live, watching what we are at, a fancied ‘wisdom of the ancients’ — as in our churches clergymen are still heard to take ‘a text’ from some ancient’s words, to make a sermon of it, presenting ancient mentations to the reverence of air-mechanics, blasphemously pretending that the Ever-moving never moves, that through millions of æons an Asiatic peasant of the first century, burdened with 173 vestigial organs, will always be the highest type that our earth has given birth to; and why? because it was God that begot him out of a girl — legends of a genus more African than Asiatic, some of them; anyway, not European: a cause for European war, au fond. And it permeates us, this perversion: our universities disperse it, our churches churn it, our B.B.C. dares to broadcast it — a sort of awe for fancies— ‘there were giants in those days’, sons by an angel’s lust of a lady’s flush some bumming Summer’s day — fancies of ancestors, of ‘the classics’, Kung fou Chou and Moses, Plato and Meng Chou and Vere de Vere. If any of you have never read Philo, Plato, Aristotle, do look into them a little for fun — make a cat laugh. Heavy bodies, Aristotle concluded, must fall faster than light bodies; the earth, he concluded, can’t be moving, for then how could one ever catch a ball flung up? one would be flying on with the earth, while the ball was left behind aloft; your boy is taught not to break into derision at brains so raw, his higher mind tied down to their lower, his eyes loaded with hypnosis, doped to an awe for fantasies that blocks out awe for facts.

“If the boy listens, I mean; but will he long be listening? Many of them, I see, have already lost interest in Aristotle in their interest in radio-mechanisms, electrons, etc. This Asiatic sin of England is, of course, an old England sin, a disease of old-age, like pyorrhea — not congenial to the young, though the young can be infected. So suppose that this crowd of us here take it into our heads to sound a trumpet, kick up a doomsday row, summoning the young out to civil war upon the old? There’s bound to be war anyhow, European or civil: better let it be civil—”

Now from the room’s centre arose an outcry: “Good hap! you are the cove I was looking for!” — from a being who seemed to be an Arab streaming in silks, with head-cloth, head-bands, his face baked dark and hard; but, in fact, his name was Crichton, his title “Crichton of Iraq”, for well he knew Basra and the Pirate’s Coast, was riddled with bullet-holes, and had riddled.

“Right you are, my friend,” Wallace replied: “the Young Men, Fitzroy Square... Aye, war: we can hear it crying aloud to be done, if European means science, if Asiatic means nescience, and if science is Good, nescience Evil. Now, if our religion is Asiatic, our social mode is Asiatic, and we have daimios, rajahs riding ‘elephants mad with pride’, owing to a grant of land from the Mogul. Tell me the tone of the religion of a land on Mars, and I will tell you how that land is ‘owned’: for the two fundamentals, religion and land, are twin things, religion being the product of truth, and truth ‘sets free’, but the landless man is a slave. England, a conquered country, is owned by her conquerors — two thousand old souls born in 1066: let us, the young, reconquer her. New-England-Religious and Old-England-Irreligious are foreigners — hopelessly — the irreligious dull with age, the religious bright with youthfulness and new truth: no point of likeness, of compromise, of truce, possible between them. Let's be trying it on! — we aren't going to mind, if we get shot, since we belong to What made us. Or does someone think that we can seize a country by 'peaceful voting' without thunder going on at guns going off? That seems a sufficiently wild idea. You remember the names Denikin, Koltchak, Wrangel — assassins whom our landed class hired at the price of a hundred million pounds to crush a scientific experiment taking place in Russia: never in the story of Man did the sun in its course look down upon the depravity of a rascality so crooked; will they assassinate for their mates and not assassinate for themselves? Haven't they an army, 'gentlemen cadets' of Woolwich and Sandhurst, with a rank-and-file hypnotized into chronic obedience to the better flesh-and-blood of officers? — cleverly arranged! And what is worse, they have universities. If we could only get at the young duke to give him a scientist mind, so that he gets into his tissues the consciousness that it was God who made him, not he himself who shifted the ends of his optic tract from the mid-brain, as in reptiles, to his area striata — gets into his tissues the scientist's consciousness that the self for which his father so fights is just a fancy, since nothing but God is, no one is but God, then we would see 'peaceful revolution' by voting; but his old Norman father of 1066 was taught that heavy bodies fall faster than light, has a liking for Aristotle, as for all things senile like himself, so the son, too, is duly dosed to dotage with the gist of Aristotle: he isn't going to offer to God a scientist's gift of himself, if he fancies that the earth can't be moving, that nothing's moving; he'll do a fight for it.

“A vile fight, though: for it is pretty evident that to present a country to a nation must be to put the nation at its ease; and by the law of probability the throng of a nation at its ease should speedily bring science from creeping to flying: so, if science is Good, the fellow's fight is against Good itself, is Evil itself — vile.

“But the generous blood of the young retches at vileness. So let us put it to them! I summon you: a big job — help! The early church of scientists, this new religion from on High, needs apostles, conscripts, warriors, and calls upon you in your Maker's name. To arms, Ladies and Gentlemen, Mars is ascendant. Perhaps the attack should start with the Eurasians, the irréligion — go for Hogan-and-Dowdy, down 'em, dout 'em out of our own England; then get to the cognate question, the land — England for the English. I name it ‘The Young Men's Conspiracy’: young men to be trained in modern warfare and modern religion, every Tommy an officer, every officer a martyr. I do the starting, you to do the helping and the praying. The Young Men, Fitzroy Square, or Wallace, Harley Street, 24; write, come — many jobs going. I am done. Those of you on the Young Men's side might stand now, bend your brow, raise your arm, swear to God”.

He stopped; and half perhaps of the hall sprang, arm up — Crichton of Iraq suddenly dropping back to his seat, bowed down, as in prayer. But Dame Felicia Warwick, sitting astare, did not move, until most of the crowd were out; then, having now determined that Paddy St. Aubyn was not there, she went following after the hospital nurse whom she had observed in the rollick at Harley Street the previous evening; and before long approached, accosted her, with “Well, what do you think of getting a truck from Elgin to London?”

A tall Venus with some scorn of chin, her hair shingled, fingering a cigarette, answered “Well, I think we are in for a new England, and letters addressed to ‘Boston, New England’ will be delivered in Lincolnshire. Dr. Wallace is out for blood, I know: ‘lads wha hae wi’ Wallace bled...”

“You know him, then?”

“Well, I ought to: I am his mistress”.

Up an inch started Felicia Warwick’s fingers at the frankness of the new morality. “I see: he has that — a mistress. Perhaps in the new religion the proprieties are not considered binding”.

The nurse raised an eyebrow. “No, it rather enjoys crashing through them. Religion is awe and love: ‘proprieties’ don’t come in”.

“Ah, you are quite a disciple, one can see: he is as much your master as you are his mistress”.

“More” — she smiled— “for I am not sole in my reign. The government is an oligarchy”.

“Or perhaps a polyarchy — of pretty Pollys”.

“Quite so — polyarchy. The mistresses of Dr. Wallace have to acquire the cannibal habit of swallowing one another — rather an effort. But we forgive him more than seven times: he is a good man — or boy, say: awfully boyish. Moreover, he may be going over to the ‘proprieties’ — is on the point of getting married like a good boy”.

“To — you?” Mrs. Warwick suggested.

But the nurse: “No, some little country-girl. He ran away with her on an impulse, so thinks he ought to marry — no love”.

And now near her ear from Mrs. Warwick: “She one of the mistresses?”

The answer came like nepenthe to the care-worn: “No, the girl apparently wants marriage first — in other words doesn’t love; and he, having others, hasn’t had enough impulse to break down her reluctance”.

“But sure, are you? Sure?”

The nurse glanced in some surprise at this interest before replying “Yes, I am sure”.

“And do you by chance know whereabouts the child is?” — again pressing asked; but the answer was, “No, I don’t know: somewhere in Bloomsbury, I fancy he said”.

Then Mrs. Warwick went on solitary, walking fast down a side-street that leads to Hyde Park, her heart a smart. His wildness surprised her! the rampancy of his immorality. “How can he think of marrying her?” she kept saying to herself, “he is married! to marry her while I am alive is utterly to ruin that child’s life! — but give me wit, God, give me wit”.

To find that Paddy St. Aubyn! to rescue that child, still by high luck rescuable! — she needed to sit to think, and an instinct in her feet carried her to the Park, to a bench there, where she sat racking her ingenious brains an hour before some species of scheme arose in her, when at once she was up to spring into a cab, and be away to Printing House Square.

X. THE TWO TUBES

THERE SHE PUT into The Times for eighty days an advertisement: “Collectors of buttons will find it advantageous to trade with L.M.: sell, buy, or barter. Box 3723.”

She knew of Paddy’s new passion for soldiers’ buttons from her son, and concluded that Paddy, if staying in some house with others, would mention “buttons” to them: so, even if Paddy herself had now dropped the St. Aubyn Hall habit of having The Times, someone of those about her might observe an advertisement about buttons, might shew it her, and she might answer... And from The Times the cab-drive was to The Telegraph, The Post, to advertise.

But month after month no result, and to sit and wait was trying, she occupying her interest now in watching the progress of that Young Men’s movement which at present was the subject of every newspaper; she lost all the flush of her hope; Paddy, she now said to herself, must by now be thinking, not of buttons, but of butterflies and blunders. But, in fact, Paddy had the habit of the light-hearted, in whose palace of idleness trifles are matters of paramount anxiety: so Mrs. Warwick’s first thoughts turned out good, for during the seventy-third forenoon of waiting she got a buttons-note at her Telegraph “Box” — from “Patricia Smyth”, indeed, but, as she had been shewn by Ivor notes of Paddy, she knew Paddy’s writing: this was from no Smyth, nor Smith.

She flew; said “Go quick” to her taximan; and it was not far — a boarding-house at the side of the Museum.

But she was late...

“Not five minutes ago Miss Smyth went”, a lady told her at the door—“gone to be married”.

In fact, Paddy had only observed the buttons advertisement because she was about to be married — had recently had reason to be reading drapers’ advertisements.

So here was pity and nonplus, and a lifting of the eyes on high.

“To be married where?”

“That I don’t know”.

“Oh, tell me, tell me!”

“But if I don’t know?”

The only thing now was to fly to him, try to stop him, he might not yet have started out. The notion of presenting herself before him, of reminding him of herself, had been greatly too repugnant to pride ever to enter her head: but now what mattered anything in comparison with this thing?

She ran — had dismissed her taximan! And all that long stretch of Mortimer Street, meeting no taxi, she ran — had been strongly constructed, could still run long with an impatient patience that plodded on and on; and wiping a flushed forehead she arrived.

But she was late...

“Dr. Wallace went off in the motor some minutes ago, Madam” — from Bargrave, the Harley Street butler.

“Ah, gone... Gone to be married, eh?”

“Well, the doctor did say that to me, but I supposed that he was joking”.

Six ticks now she stood there meditating it; then uttered these words, “He won’t be long, I will wait”.

But with what motive await his coming back? She had no such intention: the thought in her was this, that Paddy St. Aubyn was young, that she was old, and if she ceased to live within, say, twenty minutes, then Paddy's wedding would be made valid; also she was sure that there would be poisons in that house: the old doctor had always kept drugs — morphia, strychnine, nicotine, heart-tonics — within a little cupboard, painted white, stuck on his bedroom wall; nor would the routines of the young doctor be all different from the old doctor's.

On entering the hall, she saw pomp — lantern of ponderous Venetian, panels, screen of old Spanish leather stamped with Louis XV patterns in gold; then in the dining-room to the left a floor of porphyry, jasper, onyx, hearthplace of pavonazetto marbles; and, even as she entered this, here was Guncotton in a collar fresh-gilt rushing in to gush round her.

In peering into the room behind the dining-room, she saw Renaissance tapestries, graces of Tanagra figurines, divans of Persian saddlebags, and, on a table in a corner, scientific instruments, paraphernalia, a row of bottles; but biggish bottles, these; on tripping to them, she saw that they all contained inorganic chemicals, none of the drugs she wanted: so, lingering still a minute, until sure that the butler had gone from the hall, she muttered to the dog "I want the drugs, let's try the Doctor's bedroom"; and he seemed to comprehend, for immediately he was frisking toward the door with sideward eyeings at her, inviting her.

Swift and soft, then, out to the hall, up the stair... Now the open door of a drawing-room in front; and, back of that, a bedroom beside the stair-head, its door slightly open; and in, following the dog, she glided.

A spacious chamber, obscure, both blinds lowered, the bed a soft sight, a glow of eiderdown softness involved with a glow of gold hair tossed wide, a sweet girl lying soft there interred in softness, dead asleep at midday in consequence of the ordeal of a nightlong of toils probably, as in the morning's light one finds the shipwrecked wearied-out, asleep on the beach.

The thought crossed Mrs. Warwick's mind, "Can he be bringing his bride home to see this?"

The next thing which she saw was what she wanted: a little cupboard-box, slightly open, painted white, of the same size, the same shape, as the old one at "Caerwent": there beside the fire-place at the bed-foot....

Soundless she moved, opened it more, an eye aside on the sleeper...

Three little shelves, just as in the "Caerwent" cupboard; on the middle one nine or ten phials; lying behind them a pile of stones, which, from their shine and geometry, she at once understood to be diamonds, though some were blue (having been exposed to beta rays), and monstrous big, some of them, plums of fulgor; right before her eyes, too, two phials, the like of which she had never beheld — two tubes with widened bases, looking like diamond, within both being little lines of liquid, blue, like iodine, one a quarter-inch long, one three-quarters — the longer being what she wanted, for, on it, stuck-on lengthways, was a red label with "Poison" printed, and, written in pencil, "Three drops kill".

What liquid it might be she could not think — not nicotine, not cyanide; but since, like nicotine and cyanides, a little killed, then it killed quickly like these: this pleased her.

Now she tossed the contents of a phial labelled "Boracic Acid" into the fireplace, then tipped the diamond-looking tube over this phial, to get some of the "poison". But nothing came...

When she tapped the tube upon the mantelpiece and tried anew, still nothing came, the only result of her tapping being that the label, perfunctorily stuck-on on a sharp curvature, detached itself, curled off in her hand; and when she had crumpled this up, thrown it off her, only now she became aware that within the tube was a wee ball blocking the flow.

Now, all disappointed, puzzled, she was on the point of putting it back, and taking morphia instead, when, chancing to rotate the tube a little, at last she saw a drop drip.

Thenceforward, deliberately, drops dripped, one a minute maybe, pesteringly trying... five drops... and now, patience exhausted, she put back the tube, and was soft off...

Below she afresh entered the room behind the diningroom, where a scrivania was, and she pocketed three sheets of paper, envelopes, a pencil; then out afresh to the hall, to open the front-door soft, shut-in the dog, and be gone speeding northward for Regent's Park not far.

There, seated on a bench, she scribbled flyingly three notes of three lines each — to Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, "your daughter has this day been lawfully married"; to her "own boy", "believe, Dearest, that I do good in doing it"; to her friends, her hosts, "to say goodbye...": these to be found on her dead body.

A sunny noontide; the dome of sky an old-clo' counter of cloud-samples in many moods of white illumined, combined with blues of a blue-eyed beauteousness that no moaning of seraphs' throat may ever express. She let herself lose another minute in a last look at this our palace-home in heaven; until now her lips murmur something; and now she determines to heave to her mouth her drink of perdition, and drink.

It was as if she had swallowed fire: horridly it scorched all her gorge and vitals; and, holding her throat, up she leapt to rush to-and-fro some seconds, coughing, retching.

At once, too, she was drunk; stumbled, tumbled upon her palms; tottered upon an ash-tree to prop her back.

And, little by little, she stiffened: not her limbs only, but her liver and heart and soul; after ten minutes stark as death she stood there, looking at — herself.

For, two yards from her eyes, standing, smiling, nude, lewd, was a young woman, who, if not “herself”, was much like the young woman that she had been, though lithier, blither; and eye to eye the pair stared in a place and state that has no name, the lady having no more power to look a moment elsewhere, to think of anything else, than to fling England to the galaxy; still, fixed; as rapt as the dead are in the tetanus and trance of death, far from seeing the several people who passed near during the hours that her stare remained bound to that apparition, before, set free from the strait-jacket of that rigidity, she collapsed asleep, the sun now low.

When her lids had opened, while she was still seated on the ground against the tree-trunk, a park-keeper, strolling past, remarked “What, Miss, been having a drop?”

“Ha! ha! ha! ha!” — laughter darted from her heart: five drops she had had.

In another minute her feet were running a race with no one, freed from weights, up the steep to the Inner Circle, to traverse it, to spurt down to the lake, urgent to inspect in it at once what young charm of face was henceforth to be hers; after watching which, she cast her arms horizontal out, swinging forward this wanton hip and that; then, whistling “Blue Danube”, was waltzing “before the Lord”, her heart exalted to heaven; and presently was rushing somewhither afresh — had now lost the power to walk.

She tore up the three death-notes which she had written; and when the question “What next?” presented itself, discovered that she had no intention of going again to her friends, of revealing to anyone her change of state, the same instinct of secrecy as to this which had operated in Wallace operating in her also: for she did not feel that it was she who had been old, felt that a state of youngness was inherent in the she that was her real self; and her chance association with an old woman, who was never she, was hardly a thing which she felt disposed to admit to others — or to herself.

On leaving the park, to eat, to seek some lodging, the street-lamps now lit, a wind now arisen, she chose to pass down Harley Street, where, on coming to 24, she cast her head back, and laughed — understood that there would surely be meeting between Wallace and her, soon or late.

It was soon...

Before the door stood a motor, and at the door a large man in a red shirt — no jacket — to whom the butler was saying “Dr. Wallace won’t be long, Sir — is gone, as he said, to fetch ‘Mrs. Wallace’”.

“I’ll wait three minutes”, the man answered: “if he doesn’t come then, tell him Knight Crichton called to take him to the Young Men”.

In fact, Wallace was then driving in Langham Place, bringing his bride: for, after the midday marriage at the Marylebone Registry, he had taken her back to her boarding-house — perhaps remembering the pretty thing slumbering in his bed at home — but now had driven to Bloomsbury to bring her.

She, in Langham Place, broke down a little, took to crying, as brides are liable to do at their newness of life; on which he gave her a hug, saying “Pooh, pooh, we mustn’t cry, soon be used to it, don’t you want to have a husband to bully and stamp at, with a woola, woola — Oh, I say!”

I say”, as his eye-corner caught sight of a face passing in the light of a lamp.

Calling “Stop!”, and to Paddy, “Back in a minute”, he was out...

“I say, Miss, Miss, dropped your handkerchief!”

Felicia Warwick stopped, her eyes meditating on him in their quiet queen’s-way. “I haven’t dropped anything. What is it you want?”

“Only to say — Rough evening, isn’t it?”

“Oh, rats!”

“Cats, say, tigresses. You aren’t very gracious. Do please give one a chance”.

“No. You get away”.

“Oh, well, that’s sentence of death; I may as well go and kill myself. Surely you will at least let one know where one may hope just to see you?”

“No”.

“Now, what brutal luck! We aren’t strangers, understand! Somehow before the mountains towered something within me was intimate with something in you; haven’t I dreamed all night between your breasts, and lived at peace in the heaven of you? Oh do, now, do, do—”

Her eyes meditated on him. “All jolly fine. What about the wife? Aren’t you married? Isn’t that she in the car?”

“Oh, please, don’t bring in — that’s not of the slightest—”

“Isn’t it? Take care you don’t get shot. Anyway, if I were she, I’d have your eyes out”.

“They’d still see you, and nothing but you... Look here, all you have to do is just to let one know—”

“No. Eat your heart out. Drown yourself. If you follow me, I’ll call a policeman”.

Now she walked on south, he looking after; when she vanished he bowed to her absence; and still he stood staring at the nothing that remained of her.

Meantime, Paddy, having looked out, had seen him speaking, so, when he rejoined her and the motor moved on northward, she wished to know “Who, then, was the young lady? Not a rival, may I hope, on my wedding-day?”

“Pooh, pooh, we mustn’t harbour such notions—” he started to say, but now a call, “Wallace!”, stopped him — from another car passing southward; upon which the two cars stopped, and Crichton of Iraq, alighting from his, trotted to Wallace’s to say “You’ll be late! — aren’t you coming to the Young Men?”

“Need I?” — from Wallace— “there’s my cocktail-party—”

“But aren’t you expected to introduce Gwyer? I’ve just been to your place to fetch you”.

“Oh, very well”. To Paddy he added “Go on home, Pretty — just round the corner — I shan’t be long”.

But she had never entered that house before, entered it now with a sense of lostness and forlornness, then with a sense of pique, nor was in it fifteen minutes when she was out again, going back to her boarding-house.

Meantime, driving south with Crichton of Iraq, Wallace passed Felicia Warwick walking south — did not see her, but she saw him, and, knowing that Paddy was now alone and lonely, was visited by an impulse: “Try to get her from him for a lark! have her hidden under my wing for a week, make him anxious, long for her” — immediately, though hungry, she spun round to start eagerly for Harley Street, the goad of the south-wind now having her from behind, driving her biped, divided.

On asking if Mrs. Wallace was in, she was answered, “Yes”, and, on being asked her name, answered “Caroleth say”.

The butler then led her into the dining-room, switching on the lights, then went out, and after several minutes reappeared to say that Mrs. Wallace seemed to have gone out, he could not find her; on which Caroleth, thinking that Paddy may have gone out to buy something, said “I will wait”; but, in fact, Paddy, piqued at being deserted, had returned to her Bloomsbury, not meaning to come back to Harley Street but after entreaties.

So after some minutes more Caroleth peeped out into the hall: nobody about, no sound, this house being like a cathedral, a desert of dimness and dreariness whenever no ritual of revelry was being transacted in a rampancy of lamplight; and, seeing from the stair-foot a streak of sheen at the door of Wallace's chamber aloft — for Paddy had not switched-off on departing — she tripped soft up to that chamber of her change, as when “spirits of the dead” are drawn to revisit the spot of the tragedy which snapped their thread; and in there she went dashing like an apparition to-and-fro with the uneasy ceaselessness of the thief's feet, filling the room with the wind of her omnipresence, until some sound that the house vented caused her to pause a little, histing; and now, observing Wallace's Young Men shirt of red serge, she held it spread out by its arms before her, meditating on it, thrust out her tongue, making a face at it, then very clandestinely smelled it; but then flung it off her, muttering “No, mustn't... Oh, this too-too actual flesh! sweeter than Eden's deed of lechery; but do, do — I was born a lady — don't let me love You too flagrantly, God” — looking now into the little cupboard, to see before her those two curious tubes of which she had drunk five drops, and behind them the pile of diamonds — a thing astonishingly characteristic of Wallace, those wild riches lying there for anyone who liked to take. She picked up a big one, and was gazing at its glaring blaze under a glow-lamp's glare when — a knocking below at the front-door; upon which, pocketing the jewel, out she flew to the stair-head, to watch thence for her chance to dash down: for she imagined that it was Wallace come home; and the instant that five men who entered trooped into the dining-room she decided upon venturing to do a dash down, and passed soundless out.

XI. YOUTH AND AGE

NONE OF THE five, however, was Wallace, who at that time was still with Crichton of Iraq in a room full of tables and of tongues, a room still being fitted up, with boards leaning on one wall, with saw-dust — the Fitzroy Square headquarters — Wallace seated at a table with Jacobs, Chairman of the National Executive of the Labour Party, but Crichton stepping about beside them; a few studying technical books from the next room's library, a few pacing about in groups or pairs with their gallant swagger, looking like photographs of Crichton in their flash sash-belts, sometimes cutting the military salute strict and trim, as when the executioner severs at one stroke the traitor's neck, and is done with it — many of them fresh from a system of intensive training intended to transmute recruits into soldiers within two hectic weeks of drill, of revolver, rifle, machine-gun and mortar firing, of driving and maintaining a service-lorry, of a 120-mile march with night-camping, and locking imbued with all that, and more. The boys of the "British Fascisti" also had donned a habit of swagger, but had not that gorge and lordship of the Yeung Men, which so distinguished them, that, though their organization was still only three months old, everyone could say at a glance "that's a Young Man"; and since this was being said with admiration by ladies' lips, that fact may have added zest to the craze of Young Manism that had broken out, in America as in Britain; now in full blast was the cry "Join the Young Men!" — four words that were occupying in huge letters all the space of many a hoarding, many a page of newspaper: for never did movement better know how to howl and advertise itself, or was better able, being wealthy to excess — many of those who saw salvation for Men in that gospel of Wallace's Egg being of opulent families. And for many of them Crichton, that coxcomb ox, soon got to be the model, from him they took their tone. "Crichton of Iraq" probably had his name in imitation of "Lawrence of Arabia"; but there was more appropriateness in "Lawrence of Arabia": for Lawrence was of Arabia and of nothing else, whereas Crichton of Iraq was of Iraq and of Texas, of Zoutpansberg and "out back" Australia, the Bush, the Pampas. It was not English that he spoke but Greater British, and it was the fashion for the Young Men to shew-off their familiarity with the new-fangled slang, as when in the War-time it pleased people to say "napoo", "goodbaiee". He was handsome — ink-black beard of silk, "hyacinthine", blackened skin, eyes blue, mild, musing, and he had this excellence, a clear head — could see, having that intimacy with Nature by which one divines the unexplored and future, the hue of his mind akin with wide spaces, jungles of eucalyptus, ironbark forests, the mob of wild horses, the emu's eggs, glooms of gullies that no moonlight ever illumines; and since it was seen that he could see, he often had his way, not without tussles with Wallace and others: as now when Wallace said "Young men's Christian Conspiracy?", Crichton replied "That's about the size of it: take it easy, Baas" — stepping with his long-legged swagger, with stealing feet, his gait having something of a languor that lingered backward, as if his steps lingered a little sticking in tar, until something perhaps might suddenly spin him into a startling nimbleness, shewing him quick on his pins as a bush-cat's twist; and every day he was differently decked out to entice the eye with a crassness of barbaric dandyism, his garb this day being boxcloth gaiters, dreadnought cap with ear-flaps, belt of zebra-skin, whip of rhinoceros-hide to flog his legs with... "take it easy: it's no chop taking huff, if the General Staff have to fake it alone when you're knocking around with your hospitals and your girls—"

"Yes, yes, but Christian Conspiracy!" — from Wallace with a flush— "it is Christian that we are out to kill! Who moved the resolution? You?"

Jacobs answered "No, it was Kennedy of Trades Union Congress moved it".

And Crichton: "I won't say that I mayn't have suggested it; but I wasn't there, not when the resolution was moved; been down at the Small Arms Factory all afternoon, watching trials of the new Danish Lewis-gun — neatest little thing on this side Jordan! bipod rest, aircooled: I'd put up any day to knock sparks with it out of the enemy's Brende, if the 20 lbs. weight —"

"Yes, but the point is Christian Conspiracy", Wallace put in: "may I know why you suggested this?"

With a wink at Jacobs Crichton replied "Recollect, Baas, that we are in enemy's country; the enemy — naturally — have a law that Tom and Dick shall not arm to slaughter them; and the minute our crowd start playing the high rope any, they'll cry crack to the whole racket — unless they see that they've slept too late, and we're a lot too strong to jack-up to order. Our dart, then, is to be looking sloppy in the night-time, so as, when the sun rises, it will be surprised to find an army swarming. That's where 'Christian' comes in tricky — to draw conscripts quick. Every great movement is religious, as ours is; but it shouldn't be all-out new and upstart, as ours is, should be hitched to something familiar, to make it slick and native: that's why Hogan's hymn-book sells three millions, because his pow-wow's knee-haltered to what's homely. Now, everybody loves Jesus Christ — Alabama Nigger, Berber, you and I: there was some catch about that chap — was one of those vine-gods, corn-gods, that you so cotton to —”

Wallace shook his head. “I doubt it. I have been reading one of the gospels, eager to find vine-god signs, and I find scarcely any—”

“What about that last supper — bread and wine? that multiplying of loaves? that dying on Good Friday when vine-gods died, Easter Equinox, when the dog-star rises at the sun’s going down? All in the Old Testament is corn-god, man of sorrows, John Barleycorn; so is the opposite idea of a Messiah, a rider in triumph; and, as Jesus’ followers got the two all confused in their noddles, they made him both somehow; but, as they cottoned more to the Messiah-idea, they made no great matter about vine-god — that’s how the fakement pans out. And the racket is, not whether he was a corn-god any, but whether in fact people have got to think that he was some sort of a cove like that, and to love him for it. That’s why at the next Grand Council I mean to move that the Young Men’s oath be slewed round to ‘I stand ready to die like Christ for God’s sake’. How’s that? Do you come it, Jacobs?”

“It might work”, Jacobs answered.

“Do you come it, Baas?”

And Wallace testily: “Oh, have it your own way. You always do”.

Some minutes after which arrived Major Francis Gwyer, K.C.B., Chairman of the Territorial Army and Air Force Association of Middlesex, to lecture on “How Armies Fight” out in the marquee that occupied the yard, whom Wallace presented to the audience in an address, but then slipped out because of his cocktail-party. He was now in truth more occupied in returning to his old doctor’s-interests in hospitals than in learning war.

He arrived at home to find the house alight, a crowd of the hundred Young Men invited having now come, and it was some time before it dawned upon his consciousness that he did not see his bride about; not finding her, he despatched a motor-car to her boarding-house to fetch her, but the motor came back with a note, "I do not know the messenger whom you have sent to fetch me"; whereat he moaned, and at about ten, throwing himself into the motor, went for her.

She now allowed herself to come, but now to a house crowded with carousal, upstairs, downstairs, everything red, Redshirts, red cheeks, shoutings, singings; nor did Wallace present her to anyone, perhaps shrinking from admitting himself joined in holy matrimony, but led her straight to his bedroom, telling her "Now, Dear, go to bed, sleep till I come".

She, as he turned from her, asked "By the way, why on earth have you dropped the name 'Warwick', and taken 'Wallace'?"

But he: "Oh, my, ask me another time — another time" — he was gone.

But she did not "go to bed"— "sleep" in that uproar of tongues mixed with winds would scarcely be near — but lay dressed, her beret still on, box of buttons on knee, waiting, in an easy-chair, where the very uproar, continuous like the threshing of machinery at work, turned in the end into a soporific, and wearied her ear into the deafness of sleep.

There twisted in sleep she lay, one hip a mound that pouted as now her mouth pouted, when, at about two in the 'foreday, the house now soundless, Wallace comes, to stand before her, to ponder upon her unconsciousness, his arms akimbo.

And he chuckled, though there was nothing to chuckle at; and when just then the crow of a cock crowing somewhere chanced to penetrate through the storm to his consciousness, he chuckled afresh, muttering, not too rationality, “How ridiculous! both ends of the cock — after cocktail cockcrow”.

Then to Paddy: “So you didn’t go to bed. Want me to undress you, do you, you she-thing?”

Then glancing to where a fire had gone out: “Must be cold, poor beggar”.

And this word “cold” seemed to awake in him ideas of other coldness, other heat, which ideas put the devil in him, for now, serious, serious, his fore-finger pointed upon her as it were accusingly, says he “You wanted man, by heaven you shall have man. I’ll warm you up, by heaven I will, and myself, too, two drops apiece, aye, by heaven, two for you, and two for me, we’ll make a night of it, we two, aye, by heaven, we will”.

Now with that exalted stalk of Irving and the turgidness of tragic actors strutting, he struts to the cabinet of the two astral tubes...

But there things were scarcely in the condition which he expected: his lids blinked quick at it.

Within one tube a youth-elixir; within the other a liquid to be taken in case the elixir proved too potent for the drinker’s eucrazy; and, though he had used some of the youth, he knew that he had left more of youth than of counter-agent, with a label “Poison” on youth, to stop anybody from touching; but that label had peeled off in Felicia Warwick’s banging of the tube, to induce a flow; also, her taking some of the liquid had made its quantity less now than the other. So now Wallace, seeing facts through mists of gin-and-Martini, his flurried mentation shirking the mystery of the missing label, took the liquid that was more in amount, assuming that it was the youth-elixir; but the other was the youth-elixir!

Often before he had felt the temptation of a lewd dipsomania to swallow a drop or two more of Youth; now, yielding, he took two tea-spoons, wet with tea, from two cups that had been drunk from, and been left there on a bedside-table; and into each tea-spoon, with shivering fingers, he let drip two drops.

His own dose he drank with the extravagant gesture of stage-smugglers quaffing great mugs of grog; with the other drops he stalks toward Paddy, to wake her, persuade her to swallow, have her wanton.

But Paddy's drops spilled; he never got to her. Like thunder-stroke in the midway a sense of the menace of some tremendous misery visited, arrested, him. Instantly he was as sober as a judge. All joys waved him farewell. He let himself drop upon a chair in a corner to ponder upon it with a bowed brow.

An hour: during which he was conscious of the going on throughout his organism of an undoing working without truce or ruth, until all at once he hurled twinkling fingers on high, crying out "Felicia Warwick!"

Now he stood up to make straight for her with the promptness with which water takes the downward road — knew that she had come to London three months before, for the nurse with whom she had conversed after departing from Steinway Hall had described her to him; and he was aware with what family in Hanover Square she always lodged.

He had no need, as he now stepped toward the door, toward Paddy, to see in a wardrobe-glass how his face had fallen again — that real "fall of Man": wrinkles, the expression of agedness; he felt his agedness; and, standing half-a-minute over Paddy, up to heaven he cast hands and eyes, to sigh "Heavens! how reprehensible is such conduct!"

And now down and out; headlong, neglecting to take any hat; into gale and rain, to Hanover Square: to stand watching the house wherein (he thought) she was, wanting to rouse it, but now reluctant at that unholy hour; and, knowing that there is an all-night post-office at Charing Cross, he was off for this through the morning gloom, hugging himself, bent forward, his collar turned up, hunted by the gale, hurrying with some stumblings, but determined in his purpose to get two telegrams sent — to his son: “My own boy, come, I am at 24, Harley Street, Father”; and to Sir Borlase St. Aubyn: “Your daughter, Sir, is safe at 24 Harley Street. Pray come. Oscar Warwick”.

These he wrote, handed in; then back to Hanover Square, where, the morning being still dark, he walked about before the house, sometimes throwing his eyes on high in his indictment of that young man who had called himself Wallace, not at all feeling that that young man was he; the old man, he felt, was he; and “My own son’s lover”, he moaned, “an innocent young girl — bigamously wedded — and no compunction! not the least! Is it possible? And a life of riot — wine and women — now, how indecorous a course of conduct! No, I say that that was not I. And this Young Men movement... it is a falsity! Revolution is wrong: it is by evolution that the blossom becomes a fruit. If the religion and land-tenure of England are primitive, they are, nevertheless, the best possible to the mental stage of the people meantime, and cannot be transformed on a sudden, but will slowly modify themselves, as they have already done, and are now doing, under the impulse of profounder movements within the social organism than any upstart attempt to make all suddenly new. Patience! Quietude of mind! Learning to be still! It is well that I mistook the two liquids, never again will I drink one drop—”

Here he paused, feeling already within his nature the tug of the drug-drinker’s dipsomania to go again to that other tube of newness and youth...

Now morning had dawned, and when a blind went up in the mansion he ran to rap.

But dismay met him. “Mrs. Warwick did not sleep here, Sir”, a footman told him: “hasn’t been in the house since yesterday forenoon”.

Where, then, since not there? He stood stunned by it; then went away, determining to return later, after first going home to Paddy, with whom his next business was — to bid her know that the young man with whom she had run off was not Ivor Warwick, that she would lose nothing by never more laying eyes on that young man, whose behaviour was anything but estimable, and, as to her marriage with him, that was no marriage, the man had been already married.

In going home, he wrote a note in Wigmore Street post-office to Bargrave, his butler, saying that the bearer, Dr. Warwick, was Wallace’s representative during Wallace’s absence: this to become the old man’s passport into the young man’s home. But, that difficulty settled at the front-door, Paddy was still to be captured: for when he rapped at the bedroom — no reply; when he pried in — no one: for the young bride, waking about five o’clock, and finding herself solitary, had, in a new huff, taken new flight, her boarding-house again snapping her back as by an elastic band from her bridegroom’s neglectfulness; and till the morning was fully come she walked about the town during two houseless hours of storm, burdened by her box of buttons, now in the world’s school, learning sorrow and to rue.

And, moving about the bedroom, Dr. Warwick said to himself “Again, then, she has fled — well done! — no wonder, a high-spirited young lady. I go for her now, to bring her to her father’s arms”.

But he delayed some time, putting-on dry clothes, anon pausing to ask himself, all perplexed, “Where, then, could she have slept?” — thinking of Felicia Warwick — anon drawn to the cupboard, to look at the two tubes, saying “The label? Carelessly stuck-on, come off on drying; but it should still be here?... And I felt sure that there was more of the elixir than of the other: is it that it evaporates?... And those stones exposed there: dear me, how slattern, now, loose I call it, wild”. Now he took and put the diamonds into inside pockets, then, though pining for breakfast, his vitals devoured by a thirst that burned, went down to start out for Paddy.

But the motor which he had ordered having not yet come, he was off anew on foot for Hanover Square not far, to have the latest news there.

As he came to the south end of Harley Street, he met walking north that Caroleth whom Wallace had accosted the previous evening: did not see her start on seeing him, nor see that her face, always rather pale, was now suddenly pallor-struck — with panic at the notion of relapsing on a sudden to old-womanhood: for if the effect of the medicine of heaven was temporary in him, might it not be temporary in her?

She was now on her way to 24, in the hope of getting at Paddy, in pursuance of the plan to induce Paddy to make herself scarce and dear; but, seeing him elderly like that, she stopped; and he, seeing her stop after passing, trotted back to say “Pardon me: am I permitted to address you without an introduction?”

“Yes — Dr. Warwick”.

“Ah, you know my name”.

“Your face — from the papers. People imagine that you have been murdered”.

“Ah. Well, you interest me, bringing back to me strongly someone whom long since I knew; and, as I happen to have seen that you were recently accosted in the street by a young man, I want to speak of this. It is little probable that you will see that young man again, but, if ever you do” — his forefinger admonished her— “have nothing to do with him, ruthlessly reject, send him packing, take my advice, for the man is twice married, and means you no good. I am done. Good morning”.

She with a pallid smile stood looking after, muttering “He has a second pair of trousers, then... I’ll nick more of that elixir, to keep, in case” — while the old man went on his way to Hanover Square, only to come there upon more dismay, the morning post having brought to her friends a note from Mrs. Warwick enjoining them not to be anxious, she was well, but had been “called abroad.”

— an enigma that they nor Dr. Warwick could begin to solve.

All at a loss, he walked back to Harley Street, now to start out for Paddy, his motor-car being now before the door.

But afresh frustration met him at Paddy’s boardinghouse, where the proprietress told him “Miss Smyth did come back two hours ago, but, as I had let her rooms, and the house is full—”

“Ah, do not say that you do not know where she now is!”

“No, I don’t know. She took her luggage, and drove off that way” — pointing south.

“Then, perhaps I know...”

For during five days prior to moving to the boardinghouse beside the Museum Paddy had stayed at a hotel facing the Museum: so he considered it probable that to this she had now gone back. Paddy had known that Wallace would consider it probable, and thither, in fact, had gone, for Wallace to come and coax her to go home to him.

Thither, then, Dr. Warwick went; and, as he was entering the office to make enquiries, Paddy, who happened to be then descending the main stair, spied him from a corner of it, and stopped arrested, saying to herself “It is Dr. Warwick!... Has sent his father for me, but I won’t, he must come himself upon which she dashed back up.

In the office meantime Dr. Warwick was asking for “Miss Smyth”; but the manager’s man, examining the register, answered “Miss Smyth left on the 20th of March”.

Then the Doctor: “Yes, but she may have registered now in the name of Mrs. Warwick, having since married: has no young lady of that name come this morning?”

“No”, the other answered: “only one young lady so far has come in to-day — a Miss Wallace”.

“And Miss Wallace, you say, is not the same individual as Miss Smyth?”

The answer was, “No, I never saw Miss Wallace before”.

But then, in fact, he had never seen “Miss Smyth”: he assumed that he had, losing sight of the fact that eleven weeks previously when “Miss Smyth” was there five days, he had been away a fortnight in Westminster, auditing the books of a sister hotel: so that Dr. Warwick went away saying to himself “Where, then, in heaven’s name am I to look for her? — her father now doubtless on the way to me to clasp her to his heart”.

Now to the Langham Hotel, where, too, she had put up: but not there! then home, keen to eat, driven to drink. It was eleven o’clock.

“I should say you’d be hungry, Sir”, Bargrave, his butler, remarked to him.

“Yes, yes”, he answered, “pray, some breakfast”. Then, expecting Sir Borlase and Ivor Warwick, “Has no one called?”

“No, Sir”.

He might now have waited below for the breakfast, but he went to his bedroom — without conscious object.

There he paced the chamber’s length, the bed-foot on one side of him, the fireplace on the other; and each time that he passed the little white cupboard beside the fireplace, a furtive eye of yearning he turned that way, all his vitals calling within him “One may as well a little”.

But his will was of steel: six minutes of it, and still he was a victor. Once he muttered aloud “I will not”; and perhaps it was the fact that his son was coming, Paddy’s father coming for Paddy, and he having no Paddy to shew, added to the fact that the Felicia of his heart, too, was mysteriously missing from him, which lashed him at last to say “One drop, then — no more”.

The two tea-spoons of that ‘foreday had now disappeared, so he let a drop drip upon his left palm, licked it up, then immediately, in the grip of flames, with trepidant greed, quivering fingers of eagerness, he let drip two drops, three drops, four drops, licked them up...

A little afterward Bargrave rapped, the breakfast ready; ventured to rap again; but gained no answer. That breakfast went cold.

But though all the same phenomena now repeated themselves as when Dr. Warwick had previously swallowed drops in Devil’s Cave at Penpolack, those phenomena now transacted themselves with a rollic increase of speed, as though the material of his former experience remained latent within his system, merely waiting a spark to start the gay flaring of a conflagration. Within an hour the whole thing was now over, and he was roaming the room, hurried, fresh, flushed, chuckling, chattering to himself, gesticulating; and he said “My God! that old fogey, he had her, and he let her go! ‘I am done: good morning’. Dear me, good morning. Bad morning — for me: I shall never see her again, my God. Was that I? No, by heaven, that was not I. But what a deep disease — old age! How well will it be for men when they acquire the science to skip quit of it! The brain becomes numbed to a laziness and staleness like hardened old putty in a hole, losing the alacrity to summon facts, even well-known facts, losing the inventiveness, scepticism, circumspection, that looks round and sees truth: scep is Greek, spec is Latin, the two meaning look — before you leap, before you jump to conclusions. ‘Revolution is wrong’, says he: ‘it is by evolution that the blossom becomes a fruit’. Now! What an old — I can’t help laughing! Yet he knew that there is no such thing as evolution, but his brain lacked the alacrity to summon the fact, which he knew like two-and-two, that an iron on a fire doesn’t become hot in a constant manner, but by hops, by Planck’s quanta, as it cools by spasms, frog-hops, revolutions, as every other progress does, as an animal moves by steps, as a carriage-wheel in motion does, each point of it describing a series of semicircles hopwise — Poincaré thinks that even Time hops along, doesn’t ‘flow’, as Newton supposed. But rooted in that old soul was the old notion that fruits become fruits by evolution, and, not having the mental energy, the circumspection, scepticism, inventiveness, to look round—”

A knocking at the front-door, followed by a knock at the room-door, stopped his walk and thoughts. This time he said “Come in”.

And Bargrave: “Dear me, there you are, Sir! I had no notion you’d come. You had — a key?”

“Aye”.

“And Dr. Warwick, Sir?”

“Gone”.

“Ah, gone... Two gentlemen, Sir Borlase St. Aubyn and Mr. Ivor Warwick, to see him — I thought he was in: they are in the drawing-room”.

“Right: I’ll see them for Dr. Warwick”.

He lingered, though, a little, thinking “Now for it”; and, as he braced himself to set out, remembering his pockets burdened with diamonds, he turned back, tossed the diamonds to lie again in the little cabinet, thinking “Nobody to steal ’em”, then again lingered to brace himself on the brink of enterprise, thinking “Now for it”, and suddenly adventured to set out.

A few steps to the drawing-room, to find Ivor Warwick and Sir Borlase St. Aubyn walking about, they two being now in sympathy and league as regards Paddy, had met by appointment, Sir Borlase having wired to Ivor on getting the telegram from Dr. Warwick. And Wallace: “Good day, Gentlemen; I am Dr. Wallace, but not in actual practice as a doctor—”

“We aren’t here as patients”, Sir Borlase said: “here to see Dr. Warwick —”

“Wallace, not Warwick”.

“No, Warwick, Warwick”.

“No Warwick here, Sir”.

Sir Borlase and Ivor turned to stare at each other.

“But”, Ivor said, “the man-servant told us that Dr. Warwick is in!”

“Wallace he thought you said”.

And Sir Borlase: “Look here, we had wires this morning inviting us to meet Dr. Oscar Warwick at 24 Harley Street—”

“Some mistake: post-office mistake for 42, perhaps. Try 42, Sir. Unless it is some hoax—”

Sir Borlase spun sharp upon him. “Stay: is there, or is there not, in this house a young lady named Patricia St. Aubyn?”

“No young lady at all, I regret to say”.

“Well, I’m damned. You, I see, are the Young Men Wallace — that so?”

“Yes, Sir”.

“Hm. I’m afraid we aren’t very good friends, Dr.

Wallace... Why, by the way, are you so like my friend, Mr. Warwick, here?”

And Wallace: “I’m afraid I can’t say why, Sir, but the fact does seem to be as you say. Unless it is he who is like me. I hope you don’t mind my venturing to resemble you, Mr. Warwick. We are the Heavenly Twins, or would be, if I was good like you”.

Now Sir Borlase went pettish, saying harshly in his sharp way “We aren’t much disposed for jokes: Mr. Warwick thought he had discovered his father, and I that I had discovered a daughter —— —— —”

“I am sorry”, Wallace put in: “I wish I could do something. But I am the gainer, if you, Mr. Warwick, will come to see me again on the strength of our resemblance. Will you? I’ll shew you round, we’ll have some fun”.

Ivor bowed — no reply.

Silence.

Then Sir Borlase: “Well, there seems to be nothing more to be said”.

So now they went, Wallace descending to let them out himself.

Then, standing in the street at a loss, Sir Borlase asked “Shall we try 42?”

“If you think it worth while”, Ivor replied.

And Sir Borlase: “No, hardly... Something damned fishy in all this affair — unfathomable damned thing. That you should come to see your father, and find instead your brother — very like your brother, three or four years older—”

“What is specially extraordinary”, Ivor remarked, “is that his voice is rather like my father’s, also his neck-tie, and his boots”.

“By Jove. And he could pass for you, you know, Warwick, easily enough”.

“I dare say”.

“And if he has”.

“Let us not suspect that without evidence”.

“I dislike the fellow... Oh, well, somebody is going to get holes in his skin some day; I’ll be having my own back... I only wish I could just drop across that girl: not a bad little beggar, Warwick”.

Upon which Ivor Warwick touched the father’s arm, to reply “You will have her — patience”: the baronet thereupon gripped the young man’s hand in gratitude and brotherhood, and they stood silent awhile, till the baronet asked “So what next?... Dr. Wallace, by the way, wants you to pay him visits, to ‘have some fun’; but I think you are hardly in a mood for fun”.

Ivor smiled. “Still, I will pay him visits”.

“You will?”

“Yes, with my eyes open — in case there is anything to see”.

“Oho... Well, come and lunch with me”.

They walked on.

XII. THE HOMELESS

SO ONE AFTERNOON a week later Ivor Warwick did “pay a visit” to Wallace, and since she who was now Caroleth could not let Harley Street alone, but was drawn to haunt it, Ivor was seen going in by her, she being concealed at the corner of a by-street, watching for Wallace, watching for Paddy St. Aubyn, of whom she had lost track; and, on seeing Ivor Warwick step into that house of carousals, she went cross: for, having by this time seen the old Warwick transformed afresh into the young Wallace, she thought with jealousy that some parental emotion in Wallace might be drawing him towards friendship with her boy, and was cross at the prospect that the influence of Wallace’s wildness upon that nice-minded Ivor might be pernicious: for though she was now converted to a world-care from a care for persons, though her own motherly emotion was much less pronounced in her than before her change, some of it remained, as some of her care remained for Paddy’s haplessness.

And, watching anon, she saw many enter and depart from 24, but of Paddy no sight nor sign...

It was partly thoughts of Paddy that spurred her to hurry to 24 when, a short time after Ivor had gone in he came out again with Wallace in Redshirt dress, they two entering a motor-car to roll off; but another motive than Paddy had her — her dread lest the elixir might fail in her, as she conceived that she had seen it fail in Wallace; also she wanted wealth for her world-purposes, and wealth was there.

On being told that Dr. Wallace was not in, she asked if he would be long, and, on being answered “I don’t think so”, said “I will wait”, to be led to the diningroom, where, excited, caged in dangers, she meditated how handily to manage it; and when four Young Men were let in smoking the great cherry-wood pipes of the type which the Young Men regarded as part of their swaggering gallantry, she with instant grip, seizing opportunity by the throat, tripped out to whisper quick to the butler “I don’t like the men, you might take me to the drawing-room”.

“Certainly, Madam” — the butler led her up, the bedroom now only four yards from her.

She was soon tapping at its door; no answer: and in she slipped.

To the little white cabinet beside the hearth-place, drawing from her pocket a phial; and soon the tube of the elixir was being twisted in her fingers to induce the life-giver into her phial. But it was slow — slower still than before, possibly because some had since been deducted. Though a lewd lust took her to take the whole, it came so slow, and the peril of Wallace dropping upon her was so pressing, and the theft would be so much less noticeable if some were left, that she took only half, leaving, though, hardly four drips now.

Now she put her palm over the mound of jewels, and what her grasp had ambit to grab she appropriated.

For another half-minute she was peering here and there to see if anything feminine, any hint of Paddy, was apparent; then to slip back to the salon, as pilferers and midnight spirits flit satisfied, their business done; and she rang.

“I think I won’t wait”, she said when Bargrave came.

“What name shall I say, Madam?”

“Say — Miss Smyth... By the way, how about Mrs. Wallace? She not about now?”

“No, Madam”.

“Where’s she?”

He shrugged. “I only saw her twice — one night, then another night: ‘Mrs. Wallace’ did not stay long”.

“Ah”.

She went straight thence to the boarding-house where she knew that Paddy had been, to ask after Paddy; and, in walking to it, walked all unconsciously past the hotel where Paddy actually was.

That, though, was Paddy’s last-but-one day there...

Paddy had been waiting in vain for Wallace to come to coax her — Wallace not knowing where she was! In engaging an agent to investigate, he had said, “She is not at the Wellington or Langham hotel: I have enquired”.

So funds had failed her; nor could she go to Wallace, nor write “I need you”: that was vile; nor could she go to her father, nor write “The runaway comes back to you a failure”: that was killing.

She took to looking into newspaper advertisements, to see who were in need of any species of servant, and to some of these she wrote; but, having no experience in serving, had no answer: the world appeared to feel no need of a girl who could sit a giddy filly.

So she said to an American lady in the hotel “Do you collect soldiers’-buttons?”

“Buttons... Why, no, Dearie”, the lady said.

And Paddy: “I have a box half-full; I’ll shew you. And I have no money, my friend whom I expected has not come”.

“Oh, well”, the lady said, “in that case, Dearie, I do collect soldiers’-buttons. What’s the lot going at? Twenty pounds?”

So Paddy in her bedroom wetted the box, letting drip upon it, drop by drop, water from the well of welladays within her; then, having dried her eyes, parted from her darlings.

And when that crumb of twenty pounds got promptly gobbled down by the hungry gorge of the ogre which the hotel was, Paddy with happy astonishment chanced to spot in a paper tidings of a place where, if one deposits fineries, cash is handed to one; and, as she had some trinkets, rings, pretty linens, she made three different pilgrimages to pawnshops, got treasury-notes from them, and kept tossing these to that gorge of the guest-house, till nothing was left to get fresh treasury-notes.

But now the American lady made the discovery that twenty pounds is scarcely enough for a box of buttons, proffered ten more; and, this having been spent, when Paddy said “I am going to-day”, asked “Where to, Kid?”

When Paddy shrugged, the lady remarked over the crochet which she was doing “You notice that it’s raining locusts and whipporwills”.

At which Paddy’s lips spasmed to twitching, as she answered “Other people trudge in the rain; they make for a place named The Embankment, to rest”.

Now the lady knit her brows, looking up at Paddy to ask “Say, how’d you like being nurse to a baby?” — the social smirch inherent in this being less to her democratic nerves than to such as Paddy; but Paddy answered smartly “I’d like, yes!”

And the lady: “You’ve heard of Hogan and Dowdy? Mrs. Hogan and I have been chummy ever since we were girls together in Chicago; we meet at the American Women’s Club when she isn’t too poorly, and she told me there on Tuesday that she’s searching for a nurse right now. I’ll ring her up to say you’re coming”.

This was done; but Paddy had not admitted that she had only a shilling and tuppence left, nor had now her gold-handled sunshade: for which reasons she secretly lingered three hours within the guest-house, watching for the rain to relent; but it was washing-day in heaven, and not until night arrived, and still the sloppy skies dropped wetness, did she decide to set out and be wetted, not intending to spend on 'buses the nothing that was left her. But how prolonged the roads of London! And how impolite is God! sending His rain upon the just and upon the unjust, jogging them relentlessly to inventing umbrellas, to inventing the bringing-on and prohibiting of rain — impolite but good! for it is better to have suffered, and to have invented, and been elated, than never to have suffered, and been dull. But it was a bitter thing: Mrs. Hogan lived in Chiswick, and to get at her was a case of leg-wagging eight thousand times like a gas-engine, and a case of bathing without towel. It was a drooping soul, worn down, plastered with water, that at last got to a villa in Grove Park Terrace hardly fifty yards from the river and from Strand-on-the-Green, there where the boat-club is and the yacht-and-yawl builders, to stagger up a little garden-path of crazy-paving between privet-hedges to a pretty villa-door, which had in it a pattern of coloured glasses, whose hues looked nice and gaudy at night, illumined in the hall-lamp's glamour: for that big Hogan liked to be meek and lowly of heart, and granted to himself to reside in no seraglio.

On that door's sill Paddy sat to lay her head on a jamb, her lids closed down, relaxed as when St. Helena's weariness and painfulness succumbed to slumber, "with as weary bones as ever had patient Job"; and there a first indication occurred that the strain of her tribulation excelled her strength of brain: for presently her brows were frowning in an effort to remember how she came to be there, with what purpose, what was the name of the person with whom she was concerned.... After some minutes, though, in a flash of achievement she fished it out of the sea of nothingness: nurse-girl! aye, that was it, the name was Hogan. She stood up, rapped.

To be admitted by a woman, who, a cook by nature, was now doing other things, too, and to be led through a “hall”, up a stair, to a lady abed, who lay pale, spare — was, indeed, something of an invalid, consumptive — who said “Why, you are soaked!”; and she said “But, sakes, you are too young! Were you ever nurse to a baby? I’ll bet you weren’t”.

And the interview was brief: Mrs. Hogan, grieving to have to live without Paddy, yet decided to, then bade the cook conduct Paddy to dry before the parlour-fire; but, as the fire would hardly dry Paddy’s eyes, that had sprung salt water, Paddy thought it well to rush straight out to her rains afresh.

But whitheraway now? At the little garden-gate her steps lingered to ask herself that question, while still The Pitiless pelted her, ever insisting “invent, invent”. Northward? Without motive? No home of rest at the cruel trek’s end? Southward, though, some motive drew: there somewhere, not very remote, must be the river: there the weary are at rest.

But, as she remained there uncertain, a taxicab turned up out of the murk, to give birth to a man getting an umbrella open — Hogan, come home holy from the Memorial Hall, pelted by The Pitiless, but saved by inventors, and, even so, having his jacket-collar up. As he opens his garden-gate, into Paddy he butts.

“Well! And who are we?” he wished to know: “what, a Baptist? having it in the rain?”

Paddy told him. “I came to nurse the baby, but am too young.”

“Ah, I kind of knew... Well, you step inside wi’ me; step right in”.

And she went, getting more of the umbrella than he gave to himself.

To sit in the little parlour to one's right as one scraped past the perambulator; and it was cosy in there, the blinds lowered about the bow-window, a nice fire-light quivering upon "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out", and upon three other scriptures; as to which fire, though already bright, he said to the cook "Get busy on that fire, Eliza, till we kind of feel it in our conscience"; and when he had scampered aloft to pop a pneumatic kiss at the sick, he scampered back to find Paddy domestic, without her cap, relishing the refuge, she immediately liking him for his simpleness, robustness, trusting in him as in a harbour for his mass and stamina, knowing that he would not let her suffer hell.

Soon they both had oat-meal on their knees, seated side by side before the fire, then baked beans, tumblers of milk; and it was amusing to see with what assiduity he consumed the food, saying what he said with a full mouth, and he smacked his lips, and said "Ah".

"But about the soul?" he said to her: "saved? or not?"

And when she looked embarrassed, feeling somewhat saved, but not knowing really, he said "Never mind, we aren't through yet, we'll work it so you get saved later, and you aren't going to be sorry, for that's the one thing needful" — he kissed her forehead.

She said "I have heard what lots of people you save, and when Mrs. Stickney sent me to you, I felt confident — and I never dreamt it would be so far—"

"Walked all the way, did you? poor kid!" — he kissed her temple. "But tell us about the whole wow, how you got like this, for it's easy to see, you bet, that you're no nurse-girl".

Her head bent. "I ran away with my sweetheart — his name's Ivor — but he was strange — sometimes I couldn't make out whether it was he who was changed or I who was crazy — and I kept running away, since he kept neglecting me, till I got to the Wellington Hotel, where I waited for him; but he never came, though he knew I was there, for one day he sent his father, and I wouldn't go with his father. So I got to be without money. Mrs. Stickney bought my box of soldiers'-buttons, and I kept pawning—"

"Why, poor soul! But" — he frowned— "had you been fooling around, living in sin, with the guy?"

"Sin?... Oh, no, no" — she blushed— "we have never lived as married couples live—"

"Fine! That's what got him sore. Why, you're a dolly" — he kissed her eye-corner.

And she: "You don't think I am a little crazy?"

"Crazy?" says he: "what makes you talk that way? Why, you're quite a lot cute" — he kissed her cheek, each succeeding kiss sneaking nearer to her lips, so that he merely needed to persevere to reach that jelly red; but now on a sudden he detected, grabbed, scragged, the rogue that ogles in the reins, sprang suddenly upright, to step away to the bow-windows, to remain there, surprised at the blinds, and "What's up? What's all the kissing about? Drop it sharp!" he said to himself — though which was "he" and which was "himself" may not be very evident; but the truth is that he was the person named "Hogan" at that moment, and himself was the person, the many persons, named "Hogan", to come at moments in the future.

He spun round. "Well, I'll see how we can fix this machine: you wait" — stepping stressfully out, to be twenty minutes away: for there was something of a tiff and difficulty upstairs, the male Hogan wishing Paddy to live in that villa, the female Hogan distinctly not wishing that; but in the end he came down, saying "Well, I guess we got it fixed: Mrs. Hogan preferred a regular nurse-girl, but on the lot we reckon you'll come out fine": so that Paddy slept there that night, and the next day, hushing the baby-boy's crying, hummed over him that cadence which she had acquired from Wallace's wantonness, "With a woola, woola, woola, and a wolla, wolla, woo, and a yoola, yoola, yoola, and a yolla, yolla, yoo".

XIII. CAROLETH

SHE WAS KNOWN by Wallace some three months later to have been really at that Wellington Hotel, his agent having chanced to discover this, but not whereabouts she now was, her Yankee friend having now left London, and Wallace resolved to ferret for himself at the hotel. But he never went, a fresh interest so overwhelmed him when Crichton of Iraq said to him “What, not know Caroleth Lavarock?”

“Know of her”, Wallace answered: “don’t know her”.

And Crichton: “All out odd, that: call yourself a politician? Star of London, Sonny, ‘cleverest woman in Society’, as they say — rich — yacht costs forty thousand a year; and handsome wench — or it isn’t so much her handsomeness as herself, her eyes that confront creation, steady, knowing. And her crushes are political events — come to-night: meet Dinka, likely”.

So, as Crichton had the right to invite anyone to anything, Wallace went to Berkeley Square. And his eyes fell on Caroleth.

He breathed “Now, thank God! — got her”.

Two rooms below crowded, two crowded above, so that the hand of the Dowager Duchess of Chumley, Caroleth’s chaperone en titre, shook by habit, and in ten minutes Wallace’s hand was shaken by ten men — most there being men, three-fourths Redshirts; not all in red shirts: for though many Young Men would not appear in anything else, some did. But there was no difficulty in spotting as Redshirts even those in swallow-tails, for all had the same airs, suggesting Texas, Mexico, wore sashes, carried a dagger, poniard, sort of short sword, and vaingloriously swaggered like swashbucklers, giving to themselves a certain grimness, ruthlessness, of mood — this distinguishing them, the shirts not being all alike: most were a kind of jersey (three buttons on left shoulder), but, as shirts were the strong point of Crichton of Iraq, his were sometimes double-breasted, sometimes had flap-collars, with anchors, crabs, embroidered on: and that dandy mastodon was a model for throngs of Young Men.

He was now “flash” in moleskin trousers, shirt of red serge, a parrot purple on the chest, sash scarlet, and it was a pink-and-blue hand (tattooed) that he put out to Dinka, whom he dropped across in the front room upstairs, as he said, in his cosmopolitan-friendly way, “Hallo, Dinka: looks as if your lot will be coming an ugly facer in the voting”.

Dinka’s keen eye smiled aside on him, he, too, bonhomme, intimate with men. “That’s what you hope: personally I feel as safe as a church”.

And Crichton: “Church, is it? Not safe in thundery weather, Sonny: if lightning feels like striking something, it generally goes for a church”.

“Never strikes a synagogue, though” — from Dinka.

“Can’t find one, they’re so few, that’s why” — their voices rather raised, all those halls being as occupied by a noise of talk going on as by a reign of glowlamps glaring.

“But you Young Men don’t understand this country—” Dinka began to say.

And Crichton quick: “We are this country”.

“So you say. But Englishmen are factory-hands. When you tell them ‘land’, they don’t think you mean Nature, as economists mean, they think of farmers, and feel no real interest” — this word “land” being a word that anyone who moved from group to group of those guests would everywhere have heard rumoured; “the” is usually the commonest of English words, but now throughout England “land” perhaps was — a General Election impending.

“Well, no doubt you know the game all out and out”, Crichton of Iraq replied: “but that says nothing: makes no matter to the Young Men what factory-hands fancy; they step straight ahead, Ri! Lef! Ri! Lef!” — pacing on now with Jepp, General Secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen, while Dinka, who was in talk with Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, paced on toward the back apartment, many eyes following Dinka, the most important individual then in England — unless Wallace was? or Hogan? or Crichton of Iraq? or General Lord Gordridge, Commander-in-Chief of the Young Men? — Dinka, a Polish Jew, who had been the busiest of London publishers, but had flung up publishing for politics, with the deliberate object of tricking men into making him the British Mussolini, Hitler: for he “knew men”; and now had won far in that path (Home Secretary). But a common conjuror; no world-concern, no particular principles really; the side he liked was the side he considered likely to win. Common was the man’s name; his ‘cuteness saw the universe no further than his nose, though what he saw he saw in white light — had common sense, and all that he had was common. He said to Sir Borlase “Talk of the devil — there’s Hogan, see, on the couch with Mrs. Gooch of the National Union of Women Teachers; looks a fish out of water here”.

“It was I brought him” — from Sir Borlase, who was in favour with Dinka, being a somebody among the Fascisti, a “captain of Fascisti” — who were Dinkaite.

“Did you get salvation on the way coming?” Dinka asked— “may drop upon one any minute when Hogan’s about”.

But Sir Borlase answered with gravity. “Yes, but our lot don’t thank Hogan half enough, Man. I consider that Hogan on my side is more than five army-corps of Fascisti. I own land, Sir, rustics pay me rent, and it is such as Hogan who keep the people of this country rustics for me. When he informs them that ‘God so loved the world, that He gave his begotten son’, he is repeating a belief of rustics of old who supposed that ‘the’ world is the only world; and if, by inciting our people to receive it still, he keeps their minds rustic, I come nicely in. So I pay the man, pamper him, set him on a pedestal; and if ever I am impelled to make game of him, that’s in the strictest privacy”.

“Well, ditto here”, Dinka answered; “when we little two talk together, isn’t that the strictest privacy? If I am a bit of a Hebrew inside, isn’t my coat as Christian as they make ’em?... Wallace, see, with our hostess”.

Sir Borlase had already seen, and his attention been all drawn away to staring absently in a maze of meditation at it: for Caroleth had been gracious to him, and in what he saw was a grain of something which got him jealous.

So, parting from Dinka, he went after Caroleth’s and Wallace’s paces, urging himself to venture to join them, and was irked when he was joined by Ivor Warwick, whom Caroleth had lately adopted as a protégé, to pilot Ivor into the haven of High Society; and when Caroleth and Warwick had paced to the front and turned to come back, Sir Borlase, to work Warwick off him, walked on out to a balcony where he had spotted his uncle, Dr. Sir Malcolm MacAlister, to talk some moments with his uncle.

MacAlister was a mass of stuff, with a paunch which jutted beyond his swallow-tail’s lack of cloth, his voice glum, dull, himself dull, like organ-music, like flowers of the elder, like fundamentals without harmonics; yet fine the knack of those big fingers, of those fat eyes — chief visiting surgeon of St. Barts, Examiner in Hygiene at London University, pivot of the Lister Institute, as of the Association for the Advancement of Medicine by Research. He asked his nephew, “No word at all about Paddy?”

“No” — sharp and short.

“Oh, well, your care will be diverted: for it is obvious enough how things are with you”.

“How are things with me?” Sir Borlase demanded.

“Why, head-over-heels in love with Miss Lavarock. How old are you? Forty-five? I assumed that you had settled down”.

“I? Settled down be damned. I want her and I mean to have her”.

“Go ahead, then. There she is now with Wallace of the Young Men — seems rather interested in him. Step in, you, and cut the upstart out” — his tongue separating with a sound from his mouth’s roof at the end of his slow sentences.

And Sir Borlase: “Damn that man, I hate him”.

“I myself certainly do not love him — had to rebuke him seriously three days ago. He told me ‘you can’t understand’”.

“What was that about?”

“I was doing a splenectomy in the theatre on a youngster for hæmolytic icterus when the heart-beat went weak, whereupon a certain Nurse Hebbs proffered herself to be the donor in a blood-transfusion — estimable girl whom I have known since she was a lady-pupil paying a guinea a week, known her as probationer, staff-nurse, and now sister, admirably trained to assist at operations. The lad happened to be her nephew.; I knew her blood-groups to be compatible with his; and I at once accepted her most noble offer. But Wallace, who haunts the hospitals as a sort of amateur doctor, protested, grumbling at her — the girl, I could guess, is his lover — grumbling in a low tone, but I could very well hear him tell her ‘You think yourself mighty fine, but this is not world-service, hurting your health for your C3 nephew: don't do it!', so that I felt impelled to intervene, and told him 'Dr. Wallace, this is most irregular!', upon which he tossed at me the retort, 'Oh you can't understand' — uncontrolled person!"

"Oho" — from Sir Borlase— "selfish being, no doubt. Miss Lavarock's not selfish: I'll tell her that anecdote" — presently abandoning the balcony to thread his way through the cram after Caroleth, who was always outstanding, tall, her costumes, too, outstanding — a Victorian fichu that evening in shot peach taffeta over a gown of stiff cloque, negro, reaching to the ground, giving her great length; but the more he saw of her colloquy with Wallace, the more Sir Borlase was daunted from butting in... "in two there's company, in three there's none!" The two paced back to the back apartment, the hell of a heat between them, whose flames the very devil bathed in; and says Caroleth "How do you mean 'get me'? I'm not taking any! Let not him boast that putteth his armour on as he that taketh a lady's off, the battle done".

Wallace's eyes ogled aside with that roguery that rioted in their lights. "What is a lady's armour? I hope they don't still wear stays — nasty cataphracts that take a day to unbuckle".

And she: "One can be staid without stays — cold, cold — platinum that hardly the arc can melt. You will see!"

"If it is true. Even if true, don't say it, Dear. No, you don't know... that face of yours, and the message from the depths of fairyland which it fetches straight to my nature's nature — Heaven and earth shall pass away, but I shall have you".

"Where shall I be while you are doing it?"

"In my arms".

"Armed, then, and in armour... I say, you have heard, of course, of the old philosopher, Dr. Warwick?"

“Aye”.

“People think that he is dead, but one morning I met him in Harley Street, and he somehow knew that you had accosted me, for he said that, if ever I saw that young man again, I must stamp him out, ‘for the man’, he said, ‘is twice married, and means you no good’. Yes, ‘means you no good’. I am forewarned!”

And Wallace: “Ha, ha, how exasperating! And you let that old soul influence you? There’s one Young Man in Yeovil who is seventy-three, and he is younger than when he was twenty-five — can run three times farther; but he is one in fifty millions: old people are no good!”

“Not much, maybe”, Caroleth admitted; “still, statements of fact were made me — What did he mean by ‘twice married’? Can it be that you have committed bigamy?”

“Aye”.

“Really? They put people into prison — aren’t you afraid?”

“No”.

“Suppose I denounce you? Aren’t you afraid?”

“No”.

“You think the prison would fall, if you were inside?”

“Aye”.

“So you want to commit trigamy with me?”

“Aye”.

“I’ll see you burn to a cinder first”.

“I’ll still be hot to kindle you. I think you are already kindled”.

“You know an awful lot about ladies, eh?”

“Aye”.

“The Ayes have it. But I say — do you happen to know Sir Borlase St. Aubyn?”

“Aye”.

“He is somewhere here... Well, I am awfully sorry for him, because he has lost his daughter: so to the men who are after me I say ‘Find that poor man’s daughter for me, then come again’. To you, too, I say it; and to you I say, in addition, Kick Dinka out, make yourself a King, then come again. What are you waiting for?”

Wallace answered “Am I a military man? My rank in the Young Men army is subaltern in a telegraph-division section. The Young Men’s hour to strike is for their Army-Council to decide, not for me. Moreover, I don’t think much of ‘Kings’: I like government by the people for the people”.

And Caroleth: “Is there much sense in that? ‘For’, yes; but why ‘by’? If you can and will govern better than the people, isn’t it better for the people to be governed by you?”

“That sounds true”, Wallace answered, “but may not be: it may be a greatest good for the people to practise governing — be their own lorry-driver, even if the driving is cross-eyed meantime”.

Caroleth’s forefinger cut a circle. “But if the driving is in circles meantime? The driver must be a living being! not a dummy; the people must be a real people, having a country — as a family has a home and a motive — owning a country’s treasures, which are spent in educating them to a family unanimity in seeing the simple facts relevant to running a country; and, being responsible for a nation’s trend toward an aim, they’d mock at the idea of voting for the victory of Tom’s personality, which hits Jim’s fancy more than Tim’s personality does, but Bill fancies Tim’s. Is there ‘government by the people’ now? half voting against half? a civil war of whims? There is no people, or just half the germ of a people, its Government amphibious, wriggling, urging itself nowhither in the wormamblystoma stage of evolution: there cannot be a people without a country. The so-called ‘Englishman’ vociferates ‘for King and Country’, not because he is a fool by nature who cannot note a fact huge as Fujiyama before his nose, but because he is a fool by education, or education, education say, inducted to mental laziness instead of educated to vigour, and sluggishly slouching in his jail of habit-of-thought — no serf has walked the earth who was so perfectly interned. So be King-and-Country, you: give the country; then when there is a people, there can be government by the people”.

Wallace’s forehead went puckered. “I don’t much like kings...”

On which the back of Caroleth’s hand hit his, with “Will you do what I tell you?”

“Aye”, he said, “on condition that I get you”.

And she: “But look alive! act, don’t intend! — hustle the experts — be always the attacker — invent events — don’t wait on elections, or any events. As for me, force me, master me: others are after me — tempting my frailties”.

“By God, ‘frailties’! Sweet!” — a whisper.

“And remember Sir Borlase St. Aubyn: that daughter-matter disposes me to comfort him”.

“How the devil am I to find the man’s daughter, if she cannot be found?”

“You must. The devil is out of it, unless the devil is you”.

“Oh, well... But, I say, can I come to-morrow?”

She looked at him, said low “When you like”.

“Now, you Sweet!” — hissed into the ear’s secret receiver.

But now Mr. E. P. Reynolds, President of the International Federation of Trade Unions, drew toward them, and to talk policy with him Caroleth saw fit to part from Wallace.

XIV. VIVISECTION

WALLACE THOUGHT TO call upon her the following afternoon, but failed to, because of what took place in the forenoon to occupy all his thoughts.

It was in the dining-room of Dr. Sir Malcolm MacAlister (uncle of Sir Borlase St. Aubyn) in Harley Street, whither a flock of some twenty alumni assembled to a clinical lecture on mastoid abscess, in which MacAlister was so special a dab, that three established doctors were there amid the lads, in addition to Wallace — whom it was rather pathetic to see tramping humbly about with his note-book like the youngsters, regathering the long-forgotten minutiae of anatomy, physiology, pathology — without other motive than an addictedness to wisdom.

There, anyway, he was, not considering of any importance a tiff that he had recently had with MacAlister in respect of a blood-transfusion from a lover of his; then, the lecture over, the youngsters gone, he stood a long time in a group with the four grown-ups, discussing mastoid abscess, discussing other matters in high physiology, serum-therapy, organotherapy, neuropathology, changes in the blood in passing through different tissues, relations between blood-pressure and secretions, influences of the central nervous system on circulation, animal heat and respiration, muscular contractility, the sympathetic system, physical changes in sleep and “unconsciousness” — and so on; MacAlister, whose method was highly scientific, described some vivisections that he was engaged on to investigate certain varicosities in the dendrites of the nerve-cells of the brain-surface, these, he believed, contracting in brain-action, expanding in brain-rest; “but”, he said, “the thing remains unascertained; the human brain — this is what we need in cerebral vivisection; here the official of the prison and the asylum has an advantage”.

Upon which Wallace started, with the remark, “But it is important! Someone should offer... Here I am: vivisect me”.

On this Dr. MacAlister looked deliberately in turn at each of the other three before observing with some stiffness “If that is meant in jest, Dr. Wallace—”

“Jest?” says Wallace: “why jest, Sir?”

“Not meant in jest”, says MacAlister: “that is — remarkable. Do you propose, then, Sir, that I be hanged?”

“Why, yes, Dr. MacAlister” — from Wallace: “a quicker death than being vivisected”.

Afresh MacAlister’s eyes turned, hurt, to each of the other three, one of whom had blurted some derision; and afresh he said to Wallace “You do mean it seriously, Dr. Wallace?”

“Of course, Sir, I mean it seriously” — promptly from Wallace: “why not? is it an uncommon thing for scientists to die for science?”

And once more MacAlister looked round at the others; but now he said to them “It might be done”.

And since he said it smiling, they smiled.

“Oh, very well”, he suddenly added: “if I am hanged, at any rate I escape drowning. And then, death in the vivisection is not inevitable, though I recommend you, Dr. Wallace, to see to it that your last will and testament is in order. This is Tuesday: shall we say Thursday? at three o’clock? here? I will send you some directions as to your diet meantime”.

And Wallace: “Yes. Good-day” — turning without delay to get out of that house, that the colourlessness of his countenance might not be observed.

Wallace was a coward, soft, nesh, twinged with an only son’s shrinking from any discomfort, relishing enjoyment with effeminacy, so that the prospect of perishing all at once, leaving his riches behind, his wives and wines and viands on life’s sideboard, made a wreck of him that day and the next. If, staring, he sat, he started horrified to his feet; if he dropped asleep some moments, horrified he started upright; if he ate something, he saw the stuff dead in his dead stomach. “So young! the worm, the worm”, he murmured. The hollowness of the echoes of Eternity so infected his nerves with gruesomeness, that he got to be timorous of ghosts, and ogled the glooms with a nigger-boy’s bigness of eyeball in going up to his room in the night-time. A few final letters he contrived to write — Young Men letters — but would not see even Crichton of Iraq; and, suddenly remembering Caroleth, he scribbled a line, “About to die, I salute you”.

When the darksome hour at last came round his countenance was so marred with experience of misery, that Dr. MacAlister, seeing it, nodded a “Hm!” of vindictive contentment, so clearly he saw that Wallace had been well whipped for not being his twin.

A physiological laboratory at the house-back, MacAlister’s paunch pushing more podgily without his coat, his forearm bared for butchery; a pair of white nurses there with ice-bag, lint, sutures, cotton-wool, basin; an anaesthetist there, a dresser, antiseptics, forceps, “lion” forceps self-locking, tourniquet, dissecting-knives, cold steels gleaming grim, sphygmograph, the frightful trephine — Wallace was permitted to see it all, and wince; and two young doctors there, who hardly stopped their colloquy to bow to Wallace with an underlook that was not without something of mockery, something of ill-will for not being their twin.

All gathered round him, strapped and clamped, on an oblong table that had on it a slab of brass; all were inclined toward smiling; and he was permitted to see the anaesthetist actually draw its stopper from a bottle, before Dr. MacAlister had the ruth to remark “No, after all, it is too unorthodox: I must withdraw from this, Dr. Wallace”.

Some tittering arose, while Wallace, set free, sat up all astare, as when Lazarus tottered from death’s maw amazed at the depth of hell and the hollowness of heaven’s hall. He got himself off the little table to totter giddily to a chair in a corner, upon which he dropped, and, burying his face, gave way to a gobbling of sobs that booed boohoo, boohoo.

One of the doctors came proffering a tumbler, muttering “Drink some”, and Wallace stopped to swallow something, then went on with his sobbing.

But within some minutes he stood up, knowing now that there never had been any intention to do the vivisecting, that he had been excruciated for not being the twin-brother of money-hunting Harley Street, and, without saying anything, he dressed himself — jacket — collar — but then, across that sub-joy which (of course) wrought in him, dropped with some acrimony the remark, as he walked from the apartment, “It shall be done: I will do it — on some nobler soul than any in this room”.

At about that same hour Sir Borlase St. Aubyn in Caroleth Lavarock’s drawing-room was recounting to her the story of how Wallace had rebuked his lover-nurse for being willing to transfuse her blood into her nephew...

Caroleth heard it without saying a word, but the baronet observed her frown; and now, bending toward her, went on to say “But about the marrying: overlook bluntness; I’m a blunt beggar. Is it to be? You may as well”.

Now, clement of heart, Caroleth never thundered No at a man; and in the case of Sir Borlase she had special reasons to keep him hoping, and under her power to influence: she had just received Wallace's mysterious "About to die I salute you", which seemed to her to mean that Wallace now anticipated being shot by Sir Borlase: and, not wanting anybody to be shot, she replied, chin on fists, her eyes meditating on Sir Borlase, "You know that I like you—"

"That really so?" leapt from the baronet.

"But marriage is the white woman's burden. Ask another time. After the election. My head is all preoccupied with the whirl of parties, circles — other than wedding-parties, wedding-rings".

"Very well, My Lady: your will be done. Failure of heart's action; head full of politics. Going to the Queen's Hall meeting?"

"Yes".

"There'll be ructions: Fascisti mean to kick up a shindy".

"I know".

"And Hogan may be going: he is furious at the 'Christian'— 'Young Men's Christian Conspiracy'!"

"Crichton's doing, that. Not bad: hoists Hogan's own flag".

"At any rate, you'll need protecting. Shall I take you?"

"Well — if you like".

"Thanks! Good thing you are! By heaven, I'll bet you like me".

"Needn't bet: I just said so".

"Bravo! Long live the Queen!"

"The Queen's Hall".

"The Queen's all" — kissing her hand; and on the next week's Wednesday evening it was he who took her to the meeting.

A red meeting: for although others than Redshirts were there — hundreds went in vain, no room — the mood of all was red, as when on some Autumn day of storm all the hall of heaven is gone agadding in a mood of holiday and flags hoisted for fête, so the mood of that reunion was new-born, exuberant with youthfulness, boisterous rollick. Ere ever the speakers were on the platform two areas of scrimmage — sticks, fisticuffs — were reigning in two regions of the pit, for when Young Men came across Fascisti it was a case of terrier and stink-rat... “crabbed age and youth can’t live together...”

Stormy was the voyage of Alderman J. B. Jacob’s oratory (Chairman of Executive of Labour Party); scattered in whistle of whirlwind the speech of Commander Sturwood (Institute of Aeronautical Engineers); and, if Wallace was then listened to a minute, this was because of astonishment at his matter: for the meaning of the meeting was electioneering, writs for the new Parliament having been issued a week previously, and the meeting’s theme was the delinquencies of the last Parliament, which had too much pampered the landed class; but about this Wallace had nothing to say: he said “I have a proposal to make you. You Young Men have one Idol — Science. God, you think, is not a Quaker, nor a Trade Unionist, nor a Buddhist, but a Bio-Chemist: therefore bio-chemistry is your adoration. Now, I put a case to you: there is a certain question relating to the nerve-cells on the brain-surface, which, it appears, can hardly be settled without vivisection of the brain of Man: so, on hearing of this, a man whom I know presented himself for vivisection to an expert who had been vivisecting other animals in vain. The expert replied that he had no desire to be hanged, and though he presently consented, pretended to consent, yet when the man had passed through the strains of one who has only two more days of delight at the sight of these delighted skies, the scientist declined — didn’t do it — not a high scientist. So I, knowing of this, said “I will do it — on some one of the forty thousand Young Men who will offer themselves’. So, now, offer yourselves. Death, I may mention, though not certain, is almost certain. So offer yourselves. Write to me personally at the Fitzroy Square Young Men, blotting with your blood the top left corner of the envelope, and mentioning whether you have dependents. Preference will be given to single men who —”

“This is outrageous!” — from the throat of Mr. Hogan, springing upright in the pit.

Uproar; and, roaring out of uproar, “He was the ‘man’!” from the throat of Crichton of Iraq on the platform, pointing ecstatically at Wallace, “none but Wallace himself was—”

Profounder uproar, chaos, tension of electric atmospherics, with here, there, a petty skirmish working, deaf to everything other than its own privy business — events like pellets of rain pelting rare, scouts forerunning the shower’s downrush.

And Hogan’s throat, roaring through uproar: “Wallace forgets, forgets, forgets that this is kind of a Christian country! Young Men’s Christian Conspiracy is it? Christian conspiracy against Christianity! See here, there has already been a vivisection — on a cross; blood has already been shed — the blood of Jesus Christ—”

And Crichton’s throat, roaring through crisis of uproar: “This Wallace of yours is down to the ground the greatest saint that—”

And, from her stand on her seat, Caroleth Lavarock’s crimson scream “To hell with Hogan, Boys!” — she being now without Sir Borlase, who, promising return, had spurted away, and at that instant did re-enter the hall — at the head of a squad of Fascisti, who, having stood drawn-up outside, now, knocking aside the hall-keepers, trotted vociferating in; whereupon the Young Men in the body of the hall, smelling blood, were up and at them like hunting-dogs, as all along the galleries also was battle joined, and joy of battle. So here was the finish of the “meeting”, which blew up here; some policemen, too, with joy of battle, joined in, their hand against every man, soon enough to go struggling under, adrown in the typhoon; the orators, their fortress stormed, fled mauled away to the hall-office at the left; and even when the hall breathed rid of fists and heat, a little of the sea of war had dribbled out to the street.

As for Caroleth Lavarock, it was not Sir Borlase (who had lost her) that took her home, but Wallace, his brow brown with bruises, as she had a handkerchief at her split lip; and she remarked in the car “Nice thing this vivisection of a Young Man: there’ll be no end of a rumpus. Whom did you consult about it?”

“It is a thing to be done”, Wallace answered: “I consulted no one”.

And she: “Oh, well, if you see fit to act on your own in this way, without the Executive Council” — to which she had lately been co-opted: “and why not have waited till after the election? Even if the man does not die, the whole thing will be unpopular, people won’t understand. It is amusing that Jacobs, your own chairman to-night, is an official in the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection — helps to edit ‘The Abolitionist’: he won’t understand. And if the man does die? as he will? Votes will be lost in bucketfuls, Dinka and Hogan will preach it — You lack the clinical skill—”

“How do you know?” Wallace demanded: “I am studying the cerebrum intensively —— — —” “Study’s no good: one needs years of experience in technique. Why, you are wild”.

“Wild in love with you: I am going to kiss the lip, to see if that will make it well”.

“False prophecy. One wanting to kiss should do it, not prophesy. Not for me. Biting would make it worse. Ha, ha, it was a Young Man who vivisected me with his random knuckles. I saw him, know him, his name’s Knowles: handsome chap — moustache — his kiss might make it well, as the hair of a dog—”

“Oh, so?” This took Wallace aback. Then: “Lucky devil, to vivisect you: that’s what I am after”.

And Caroleth: “Aye, there you have laboratory experience, I know. But, as for me, ‘he that hath clean hands’ may come and succeed, not you. Do I look a light o’ love like the others? Turn over a new leaf”.

Wallace whispered “Then you’ll turn up trumps with your ace of hearts? Agreed?”

On which Caroleth cocked a supercilious nostril to say “Turn over first, then see, gross Pig”.

“Dear!” — a whisper— “I think I’ll get you”.

“Oh, well” — standing up now, as the car stopped.

And from the next morning the offers of themselves for the vivisection commenced to come from Young Men; presently a phalanx of clerks could hardly get through the plague of letters — hundreds of thousands: from whom Wallace selected at random a fellow of twenty-three named Driscoll, a draper’s assistant of Clapham; but, strenuously preparing himself for the operation, did not immediately acquaint Driscoll.

Meantime, all the goose-necks of “The Press” were protruded to scream and gobble, all agreeing in bawling the same strain of indignation: “If there is any drawing back from the arrest of Dr. Wallace in this matter, then the Government has frankly abdicated, all’s up with law and order in this country”; “Who is this ‘Dr.’ Wallace who so greatly dares? It appears that he is not even a doctor, since the British Medical Association, on looking for his name to erase it from the Register, have failed to discover it”; “We have slept while our enemies waked, and the Philistines are upon us. But Samson is still Samson. This incident is to be welcomed for bringing things to a crisis; the day of a trial of strengths has arrived”; even the paper that was Wallace’s voice: “Frankly, we find ourselves unable to side with this defiance of the moral sense of our time, and, if we are ‘villagers’, as the Young Men will name us, we are what we are — cannot for the present be other. Because this vivisection is called a crime, it is a mistake, and, occurring at least thirty years too soon, is a true anachronism”.

During all which, troops were on the move toward London: swinging kilt of Queen’s Own Cameronians; from Dover Castle Barracks 2nd Royal West Kents; 2nd Royal Warwickshires from Inkerman Barracks (Woking); moving down Piccadilly blue tunics of 12th Lancers; and the Young Men, too, commoved: to the General Officer Commanding 2nd Division had gone out from headquarters a telegram— “mobilize”; to a colonel on parade-ground in Bermondsey an orderly turned up to present a red envelope (called a “red pill”), while a whisper worked from lip to lip, “going to see service”; some shipping-clerk at his office-desk in Leadenhall Street might have in his pocket four shillings, come to him with a “travelling warrant” which directed him at what spot to report himself at what hour; and in the air an expectancy — of what? No one was sure: a speech of Dinka, at Manchester, upon which the country keenly hung, was such a feat of vagueness, that it was impossible to guess what the Government meant to attempt, if anything. Certainly, Dinka did not lack valour — nay, audacity; but perhaps discretion was rather his trait; he had an eye aside that warily weighed; he liked quietness to thrive in; and ever he exhibited a vacillation in dealing with the Young Men, who were a something unforeseen, perplexing, that had been no element in his scheme when he conceived it, as when one excogitates a deal on the Stock Exchange, and a storm crops up to demolish the Exchange.

In Hogan, on the contrary, valour far surpassed discretion: he did not mince matters, “vivisection” now filling his mouth. On the Sunday evening following that Queen’s Hall Wednesday his talk was to ten thousand within the Albert Hall, and to other thousands crowding the space at the hall’s back, to whom his talk was broadcast; “lessons” were read by a bishop, the Very Rev. Dr. Shipley, Chaplain of the Forces; the singing of the Old Hundredth, of two Hogan-and-Dowdy hymns, was led by a choir of a thousand, and was roared by thousands of Salvationist throats, Christian Association throats, Fascisti throats: for though the Fascisti were rather down on Jews, they made exceptions of two Jews — Jesus and Dinka. And Hogan spoke. He was against vivisection, against science... “We know enough to get saved from hell; what’s all the patter about ‘brain-surface’? That stuff won’t go here: it’s the heart’s vivisection we’re after, the heart’s circumcision.. In the thick of which Wallace, blanched like meerschaum, not far from the platform, was up wild of eye... “He wishes to keep you prisoners in fancies — such fancies! African! — I wish to set you free in facts; he wishes to keep you Christian, I wish to make you religious; he wishes to keep you atheists half-believing in Mumbo Jumbo, I wish you to know for certain that God is all in all; he wishes to keep you villagers turning the other cheek to your neighbour Jim, I wish to make you world-citizens; and if to advance ten thousand miles in happiness and self-respect demands of you some slight effort of mind, will you let laziness prevent — ?”

“Out with him!” — hurled from his first words, and working itself up to more and more turmoil— “Chuck him out!”, “Out with him!”, till, the urgency of it reaching to the verve of whirlwind, he ceased when he could no more hear his own mouth's howling.

In some moments more he was down; so many hands were at him, that many blows were aimed which never touched him; but before he received serious injury someone wild of eye was somewhere rushing, shouting through the riot "The Young Men are coming!", and even as this cry of "Young Men!", "Young Men!", was everywhere being repeated, a red irruption of Young Men running came — as when flame breaks out — brandishing a red flag, to mingle in the scrimmage, and crash a path to the deliverance of the prisoner, so that many a chair was smashed.

In the thick of which the voice of a singer, strong to occupy all that hall, arrested every attention — the voice of Caroleth Lavarock standing in a box, costumed in midnight blue with angel-wing sleeves, singing a hymn of her own making to the tune of "Giovanezza", the Italian "Hymn of Youth" — her singing differing from others' who, singing in English, cannot be understood by Englishmen, who, singing through a veil of breathiness, fancy they are saying something, but are not saying anything, fancy they are trained to sing, but are not trained to sing; but each word of hers could clearly be heard, as in speech; and when after three lines of it the row had died down enough, she began again:

"Up the Red Flag!" calling, storming,
Lo, the Young Men, high-inspired,
Over all the foothills swarming,
Bulls by Daybreak's red rag fired:
Rash who'd check their raids and rages,
Ravished they by cosmic Voices,
Fascinated by the Ages,
Dragged by astral gravities.

O! the red boys! royal florid!
Red their blood, their rag, their forehead,
Bloody drops adorn their forehead,
Royal florid brawl the boys.
So for Man's flag, aye, the glad rag,
Higher! highhigh! highhala!

Whither tend they, this way taking?
Dark to them what things on Mars are;
Masked the dead, no answer making;
Far from answering the stars are:
But the boys' hearts feel a smarting.
Hear a call "Be on the mountains!"
So they shout back "We are starting!",
Helping each his girl aloft.
O! her chin's pitch! note her thumb, too!
Super-monkey that she's come to:
Only God knows what she'll come to
When they help her up His hills.
So for Man's flag, aye, the glad rag,
Higher! highhigh! highhala!

For themselves these fells they mount not,
Mount for sons of sons of mothers,
Dusts and heats and carks they count not,
Break their hearts as bread for others;
Beautiful upon the mountains
Are their feet! whose bleeding breedeth,
Where they trample, flowers, fountains:

Mountaineers on Calvary.

O! the high boys climbing higher!

Climbers all we born of fire,

Nor that flag's rags, dyed in fire,

Will we strike while fire climbs.

So for Man's flag, aye, the glad rag,

Higher! highhigh! highhala!

.. which was like oil on boisterous waters through some subjection to some spell of personality; but then, automatically, uproar was resumed at the point where uproar had left off, as when the skull of a baby bawling is ducked under water, and the ear knows peace, but so soon as it is up anew there is bawling, resuming the thread of the bawling left off. Mr. Hogan roared, but the meeting, now interested in itself, did not hear; then Mr. Dowdy, a powerful bigness, began a hymn, but stopped; whereupon Hogan roared to Wallace, "Why mess up the meeting this way, Wallace? Come upon the platform —— —"

"No", Wallace roared back: "you broke up my meeting".

And Hogan: "Tit for tat! Evil for evil! Let's have a debate, Wallace, in orderly style. Fix it that way".

"If you like! Some other night".

"Right! Call off your fellows for now".

Upon which Wallace, who had had enough of it, sent out messengers, and before long the hall was rid of Young Men; but the mood of the reunion could scarcely now be resumed, so that it broke up sooner than usual, with few souls saved, troops of the meeting streaming out before the end, among them Wallace, on seeing Caroleth stand up in her box.

In the crowd outside he handed into their car three girls-about-town who had turned up near him in the outward streaming, and to their lips when they were seated he affixed three benedictory kisses like seals, lingeringly — not thinking that Caroleth would yet be thereabouts; but when he looked round, there she stood with Sir Borlase St. Aubyn and with High Commissioner for Australia, Sir Michael Henry.

As it was with Wallace that she had come, it was he who drove her home, but he found her not in her best temper; when he said “Hurrah for the Red Flag song”, she answered “Leave out the hurrahs... What is the ‘debate’ with Hogan for? Waste of time. You can be pretty simple, Dr. Wallace. Don’t you suppose that Hogan knows that debating is not his strong point? He will simply revitalize in reply — if it comes to debating; but meantime he hopes that before the date fixed you will be in prison for killing, and that your failure to be at the debate will affect the election; you can be pretty simple: women play the devil with a fellow’s headpiece”.

“Nonsense”, says Wallace: “no women — much; it is rabbits I am vivisecting. It appears that I can only love a woman whose name begins with C, and ends with something like ‘let’s’

And Caroleth: “Dear me, that describes me. But, then, I am practically engaged — you know Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, don’t you? That poor man still has no news of his child: I can’t help favouring him”.

“What business is that of yours? And am I not searching the world for the girl?”

“It is finding that matters... And, by the way, there is that young man, Ivor Warwick, for whom I have a liking: I am told that he is now mixing in your carouses, and you are leading him to the devil”.

Wallace laughed. “Well, but the fellow was rather a prig — needs to be led to the devil, who is no prig. Don’t let that—” “I will let it. I hear that the saying in the night-clubs is ‘here come the twins’, when you win him in; but I do not wish my special friends to be twins with you. Your life is dissolute, I shall decline to receive you—”

“Oh, well, you are cross to-night. Shall I come tomorrow?”

“No. Good-night” — getting up, as the motor drew up.

After which for some days there was no meeting between them, Wallace meantime giving all his wit and will to vivisecting, fixing, too, by letter with Hogan the place of the debate, its subject, its date, which, by Hogan’s suggestion, was arranged for the general-election polling-day; and soon the goose-necks of the newspapers were giving the thing to the four winds.

Meantime, an interview between Wallace and the selected for the vivisection, Thomas Driscoll: a sufficiently common-looking Cockney — long cheeks — a little sniff-up which wrinkled the nostrils every three minutes. He said to Wallace “I only ask one thing, Sir: If you do me any injury which will be permanent, finish me off”; to which Wallace answered “Yes, I promise; but I am hoping for better things than that”; and the event was fixed for the third day thence, the Thursday, as by Wednesday the world had heard.

That Wednesday afternoon Wallace was in Caroleth Lavarock’s drawing-room, who said to him “Dr. Sir Malcolm MacAlister has just left me; he is pretty indignant: says you have no chance of success; ‘murder!’ he says”.

“Oh, that kind of mind!” Wallace answered with scorn — seated near her on a couch; she, with her goût for flagrant costumes toggled out as a man in corduroy trousers, in a Young Man red-shirt, in sandals, down her back hanging, like a Mongol’s legs, two gross plaits of gold-hair that gave out a glory of goldiness; and a magnetic man she made: Wallace’s difficulty was to keep his hands off her, nor did he long succeed. “That kind of mind!”, he said: “no world-concern; the individual fills their interest”.

“But he knows his business, you will admit”, Caroleth said: “a great biologist, while you, I gather, are rather a physicist, your hands hardly educated in the biological sense: pity you ever — Oh, well, too late now... As to the ‘individual’, isn’t the individual, too, important, since unique? I am told that you rebuked one of your numerous dolls, a certain nurse, for offering to transfuse her blood into a moribund lad; but that lad may have had the faculty to scent out some fact which no one else—”

“Quite so”, Wallace put in, “and his importance consisted in that — his social value, if any; in that alone. But it was as an individual per se that the nurse was seeing him; for him she purposed to hurt her health — the fellow was her nephew — and for her own private likes and vanities, not for society: bad conduct. Men will be good when their conduct becomes Divine — Absolute, Blank — pitiless of the individual, even of the individual city, for God will wipe out a Lisbon in six ticks, but is good to worlds — if not to every world, to worlds in general”.

On which Caroleth with a smile: “Very well, always remember that I as an individual am of no importance”.

And Wallace with that leering of his which twinkled: “You, yes; no one else; especially when you are in trousers”.

“I have three pairs, too. More than you, I think: I know of two—”

“What business is it of yours? Do I ask how many pairs of drawers you have?”

“Well... but... that’s more intimate. And we aren’t Victorians: I wonder you don’t know that ladies have invented in that way”.

“Aye, I know, I know, with a woola, woola, woola, and a wolla, wolla, woo—”

“Dear me, what is the meaning of that inanity that you sometimes descend to?”

“And a yoola, yoola, yoola—”

“And a foola, foola, foo”.

“But I say — Caroleth — look, now — shall we be chums after all? close, close—”

“Be careful! don’t touch! mind you! There is another ‘individual’ of ‘importance’ in my eyes — that Paddy St. Aubyn—”

“Ah, heaven! will you never leave me in peace about that—”

“And, apart from ‘goodness’, there is a compulsion upon human beings to be pretty; when a man is morally presentable, then a lady may begin to consider—”

“No, at once” — breathlessly— “I swear that I — but don’t keep me suffering in flames — I can’t bear any more — kiss me!”

Up like a dart from his arms she started, he after; and round about a card-table she darted dodging, he dodging to catch her.

“Ha, ha, ha, ha” — from her— “how dare you chase me?”

“Ha, ha, ha, ha” — from him— “you have to give in”.

“Yes, ha, ha, ha, ha, when you catch me” — as a Venus de Milo dropped to fragments.

And he apant: “Ha, ha, ha, ha, by Heaven, I’ll have you kidnapped, strip you stark, wallop your burn with a horsewhip — then you’ll give in”.

And she apant: “Ha, ha, ha, ha, gross Pig, then you’ll taste hell-fire, you shall see and not touch!”

And he: “Ha, ha, ha, ha, by Heaven, I doubt whether you’re a maid! There’s a certain pollen of modesty which virgins have—”

And she: “Ha, ha, ha, ha, you hit it there! Why, I have had a child!”

This ended it. As if shot, Wallace sat down on the couch, looking at the floor, mottled now between pallor and heat; then in a minute heaved a sigh, rising; bowed to her; and moved slowly out, without saying anything; while Caroleth, looking after his disappearance, rued, breathing “Oh, horrid of me; and to-morrow the vivisection...”

Later she attempted to telephone him, but he was out — wandering about London like one lost.

Then she decided to write, and, in the disguised hand which she used in writing to him, wrote “Why take me so heavily when we were sky-larking? If I have had any child, you are the father, no one else would do. So now you are happy. Good luck to-morrow! Come soon”. But it was posted too late for that night’s letters.

And that night he could little sleep, the calamity of her having a sexual past, added to his mistrust of his hand in that operation hanging over his head, caused him to get out of bed on the momentous morning with trembling fingers, with a feeling of seediness. There on his bedside table were letters — hers — a personal letter from Dinka entreating him to determine, even now, to abstain from the vivisecting, not to stain the streets with blood; but he did not read, did not see, the letters; ate no breakfast; went out to a long walk.

He found at the South end of Harley Street four lorries, three loaded with barrels, with rocks, the fourth an army-munition lorry surrounded by Young Men steel-helmeted, who were making a barricade across the street, emplacing Maxims, a knot of five policemen eyeing them in silence; and, if he had walked northward, he would have seen barricades at all the Harley Street corners.

On coming home, he found his four vivisection-assistants already assembled in the room behind the dining-room, in it being now a couple of arc-lamps muttering cicada palaver, spluttering ultra-whiteness of light; and when, as he was discussing with his helpers, the butler presented him a trayful of letters, he took up a few to look through, among them that of Caroleth, which enraptured his eyes, and, coming now, only the more excited him, heightening his neurosis for the trial.

Soon after which, in comes Driscoll, sniffing up the nose, cool as a cucumber, having the tale to tell that at seven in the morning a squad of soldiers had come to his lodging, meaning probably to seize him, but “I was a bit too fly for ’em”, he said — had taken flight over two roofs, and had been strolling in hiding ever since. “I could do with something to eat”, he concluded.

But Wallace: “Better not now; drink a little wine”.

And when this was drunk, Wallace could discover nothing more to postpone the raw moment of operating. His pallor was now pitiable; but, as to Driscoll, not the least agitation was to be seen in that changeless face, even when he lay on the strait table, awaiting the anaesthetist’s wad: he sniffed up through the nostril, took it easy...

Within fifteen minutes, though, of his anæsthetization he was dead. Wallace, even if competent, was too doubtful of his competence, too fevered, to succeed: at one point his fingers distinctly slipped, his horror whispering “O, God!”; and he went on to a moment when, in a rage of fluster, desperation, he stuck a dissecting-knife into the brain-substance, and ended it.

Moving now without motive about the room, he suddenly threw at the others “Murder!”

And, standing some moments at the table’s head, he said to his dead “So you smile, do you? Tasted honey-dew, have you? No wonder you smile” — his soul gripped now toward crying, his face a grimace of emotion, as in the moments before a baby cries.

In another minute he was running out of the house, southward, pursued by a troop of newspaper-men, who sent at him shouts, “Is it done?”, “Is he dead?”, to which he, as he dashed through the passage left for the public in the barricade, shouted backward “Yes, murdered! dead!”

Thence, shadowed by a batch of Young Men in plain clothes, he dashed on his way to Berkeley Square, where, dropping upon a couch, bowed down, he panted at Caroleth “Dead”.

She, standing over him, asked “And the dendrites, did you discover — ?”

“Discover, no, discovered nothing. You were quite right, I lacked the clinical skill, murdered he lies there for nothing, for nothing, for nothing...”

She put her palm on his head. “Never mind, cheer up. How can you say ‘for nothing’? Discovery was not your main motive, but to offer to men a model of world-service; and you’ve done it. Isn’t that so? Come — Dear — cheer up”.

Now he humbly blubbed. “Blessed being, thank you, thank you, I’ll never forget you. But it is hard to bear, I made a regular mess of it — shameful, shameful; I have a mind to walk into the Home Office, and say to Dinka ‘Here I am, hang me’”.

Her eyes flashed now. “Pooh, Dinka wouldn’t dare: Dinka knows too well what’s good for Dinka’s skin. And now to inscribe in Dinka’s remembrance how the Young Men bury their Christs — the obsequies of a god, ending, of course, in the Abbey”.

Wallace started. “You say that?”

And she: “Well, but we are in for it now; and now the thing is to put fear into the Old Men’s liver: attack! attack!” — her eyes on fire: “Crichton, Truscott and I met to discuss it last night, and we saw eye to eye: we seize the Abbey, kidnap the dean to make him read the burial-service — as is only fit: no one yet buried in that Abbey is worthy to lie beside Driscoll, unless it be Thomas Tompion, and that ‘unknown warrior’—”

“Aye, that’s true, Caroleth, a dear fellow — phlegmatic beggar — hero to his finger-tips. He lies dead—”

“At any rate, he’ll be having a funeral: never man had funeral as this man will have; night-funeral — torchlight — all London booming, minute-guns going, sixteen thousand pounds, we reckon, squandered upon a glory of rockets, to signify that a sovereign is gone up in his gauds of office to God”.

“Very well”, Wallace said, “let it be so”.

And so it was. Nor, owing to the impending of the election, was the Abbey-burial accompanied by any trouble; low lay the Government: for if, coming now to blows with the Young Men, it chanced to get a black eye, that must gybe some of the voting against it, and a black eye just now was likely: its fighting strength in London was outclassed; there was some Young-Menism among the regulars, it could not at present be guessed how much; it was certain that something like a third of the Reserves were Young Men; some Territorials, too; and it was being whispered in drawing-rooms that the Prince of Wales had taken the Young Men oath incognito, as a number of young noblemen had openly signed Young Men attestation papers: so, with the election four days ahead, the mind of the Cabinet-meeting during the Friday afternoon was discreet, cunctatory; “wait” was on Dinka’s lip, “bide our time”, “be blind in one eye”, “shun a tussle just now”. So on the Saturday morning the Young Men’s 7th Rutherfords occupied the Abbey and its environs in a dead silence of the Old Men: it was the dean himself who, taking his seizure with great good humour, appointed the spot in the north transept for the martyr’s tomb; and soon after nine that night swarms upon swarms of travellers’ eyes, from Yorkshire, from Cornwall, from France, watched the pomp of his passage.

XV. LIGHTNING

BUT IT MIGHT have been better for the Old Men if they had been less prudent; for during the Tuesday (polling-day) those “in the know” reported that the voting was tending heavily in favour of the land-nationalizing party — and kept on tending until the evening, when an incident (of which all Britain instantly knew) appears to have biased the voting toward what was now called “The Old Men’s” side.

This incident happened at the Salvationists’ “Congress Hall” in Clapton, where Hogan and Wallace met that night to debate on “Who is better off, a Christian or a Scientist?”

It was drizzling, winds blustering, some thunder rumbling somewhere; but this did not prevent that Mr. Hogan’s motor was compelled to come slow through the great crowd that surrounded it with gratulations, an outbreak of bugles’ throats greeting him the moment his feet moved into the building. Nor did Wallace come alone, though his throng consisted, not of the public, but of Young Men in everyday dress, there to protect him. There were constables in that hall who eyed him with a longing eye aside.

And it was a queer “debate” — scarcely fair play, for not merely was the platform thick with clerics, but actually there was “a prayer” and a singing of “Rock of Ages” with a rollicking swing through noises of rain and wind; during which a Salvationist mounted the platform to hand a telegram to Mr. Hogan, Hogan handed it to Dowdy and, the singing done, Dowdy announced two voting results — West Fulham, Monmouth — causing all the Young Men elements in the hall to break into cheering at two fresh victories for change — hand-claps raining through winds of hissing, everyone being imbued with that mood of newness of election-night when the galaxies gaze down upon a nation on the tramp toward strange azimuths; in the midst of which cheering, jeering, up sprang Caroleth Lavarock in a right-hand gallery, looking bridal in a costume of mastic and silver cloque lamé, to sing in her distinct manner an election-night carol to the air of “Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching”:

Broad, broad, ho, the hosts go voting,
Mum, grum, ponderously strong:
As when elephant brigades
Trample straight through brakes, stockades,
Here can cats’ ears catch a crash of trampled camps of wrong.

Wrung, wrung, roams the Woman wombfull,
Urged, scourged, gross she panging goes,
Under spangled glooms that gloat,
Noting moon-falls, globes that bloat,
Noting in Eternity this earth-night’s birthnight throes.

Weird, weird, hear the feet abeating,
Called, thralled, geist-beguiled they plod,
Whither wind whines, whisper guides,
Whither wisp of glimmer glides,
For the nations’ migrant trails are trails of migrant God.

Although a thud of thunder rather interrupted the last part, all the hall applauded when Mr. Hogan had the gallantry to clap; and now he rose and spoke, introducing Wallace, suggesting for Wallace a patient hearing “from us”; and Wallace, standing at a table, spoke, reasoning in a tone of reasonableness, appealingly... “Look at Denmark, now. You know how Denmark in the war with Germany lost Schleswig, Holstein, Lauenberg, her fertile bits, little being left her but fen and bog-lands. Yet Denmark today is more prosperous than Denmark before that war of ’64. So what rescued Denmark? Denmark’s Buddhism? Denmark’s Christianity? It is not Buddhism that makes Japan prosperous, for she was Buddhist ages before she was prosperous, nor is it Christianity, for she is not Christian, nor is Russia jocund for being Christian. In fact, Denmark was rescued by an invention in spite of Christianity, which, disliking change, dislikes science, the cause of change, and depresses invention — archimandrites and archbishops, popes and dukes, never being remarkable for their inventions, but for their tiaras, and copes with orphreys, and braw robes of Basuto lords; and in professing to be leaders of men they do not attempt to prove their fitness to lead by perceiving anything new and true, but by dressing themselves up as pretty princes. So Denmark was not rescued by Christianity; Denmark was rescued by science, by finding out that fat is lighter than water, by the invention of the cream-separator. And we, too, if we like marching and lightness of heart, must choose the Father for our Marshal, the Scientist Father, the Chauffeur of the stars, and Argo is His motor-boat, we being done with the son, as the French already are, who was an Asiatic peasant, dead now, and powerless to—”

Powerless to do what? He never uttered it. As he pronounced that “powerless”, he was down, felled, together with the fragments of a lamp.

His palm had been on the lamp-standard (of brass), this perhaps being why a wink of lightning that blinked white of wing into the building singled him out to tingle through; and before he could tumble down an outcry of thunder, bullying as from some gruff throat, throed the ground.

Commotion now... Mr. Hogan presently pressed his way out of the little crowd lingering round the stricken to vociferate “Will any doctor in the audience please step up here?” But no doctor came; and when Wallace had been lifted to a chair, had stared about, had dabbed a kiss upon Caroleth Lavarock’s hand, now solacing his brow, Hogan stepped forward to call in an awed voice to the audience “Let us pray”.

But the prayer was scarcely fair-play — to kick the stricken, to thank the Lord Jesus for contenting himself with giving Wallace “an awful warning”, while graciously sparing Wallace’s life [Cries of “Praise the Lord!”]; he prayed that no permanent ill-consequences might follow, that Wallace might in this way be led, like Paul, to “turn to the Lord” [Cries of “Amen! Amen!”].

But he was no sooner done than Wallace was up, pale, shaken, but still combative... “Was it Jesus who struck me down? it does seem so; but may it not rather have been the Father, who, even as I was praising Him, let fly His lightning at me, since I was pawing the wrong lamp, and true as doom His foot-rules whisk, His balance-beams wince slant; but Jesus, I think, would be too human, good-hearted, to smite with lightning a poor beggar who means well, even if Jesus has now got to find out what lightning is — not ‘fire’, as he fancied when alive [Outcries of “Shame! Shame!”]. ‘Shame’ to him? No, he couldn’t help fancying so; that was his Age’s rude way of looking at everything, as fourteen centuries later Dante still fancied that lightning is fire; and no ‘shame’ to me, I can’t help his fancying so. Anyway, the stroke ends the debate, I am all of a tremble, I simply can’t go on. But let’s fight it out another night. Mr. Hogan says that it was the son who struck me down; I say that it was the Electro-chemical Father; and the point about a statement is its truth — hasn’t long been the point! is not the point now among Negro peoples, nor among some of us, who greet a statement which jumps with our mood and comforts our mumpishness, whereas strong minds respect a statement only for its truth, not bothering to smile at it, if untrue. So let us test the truth of this” — his brow now rushing from blanched to flushed— “let Mr. Hogan, meeting me again some evening, pray to the son, to any of his gods, to send a storm, wind, lightning, rain: and I will give him twenty minutes to get it. Then, if no storm comes, I will pray: for I happen to know some scientists who are so well in with the Scientist Father, that they can cause storms to arise; and since I can talk with them by a kind of wireless, I will pray them to send a storm, wind, lightning, rain: and Mr. Hogan will give me twenty minutes to get it. Then, if a storm comes, all will see with their eyes who is better off, a Christian or a Scientist. Now, Mr. Hogan, what do you say?”

Up, as if to catch a ball, Hogan with a flushed brow sprang to shout “I accept!”; and all that hall was a vortex of applause.

Meanwhile, the tidings of Wallace’s lightning-shock had reached Broadcasting House, at an hour when much of the voting was still to be done, and the thing was broadcast, not as a bit of the “news-bulletins”, but as a separate tit-bit sent from Heaven: “Dr. Wallace, in the very act of uttering at Congress Hall what many of us would regard as blasphemy, was struck down...”

And three hours afterwards when, not far from midnight, Caroleth and Wallace in the midst of a multitude were watching from a motor-car a square of paper in The Post’s façade which shewed the pollings, Old Men victories were coming-in more frequent than in the day; and Caroleth remarked then “We shall have a majority of three, instead of seventeen: this comes of’ debating’

“Oh, you are always finding fault” — crossly from Wallace.

And she: “When wild things are done. That storm-test of yours and Hogan’s — how wild! if you meant it”.

“Not so wild, on my side, as you fancy”.

“Why not so wild?” — her steady gaze of understanding dwelling on him— “Are there scientists who can cause storms?”

“There are”, says he.

“Oh, well, if it pleases you to make queer statements”.

“You don’t know everything”.

“No? But, of course, I know this, and, of course, Hogan knows. If Hogan is uneducated enough to have some hope that his gods may send a storm for him, he will say, when they do not, ‘It was not God’s will’, and will outlive his loss of prestige. But he is sure that your ‘scientists’ will send no storm for you, and that your prestige will perish: so one can understand him. But you! your impulsiveness is a puzzle”.

His gaze, in his open car, was raised to the stars, that now after the gale gloated in crowds of glory, while all the tract of placard-gazers was applauding two new constituencies’ polls exhibited together, an Old Men victory, and a Young; then, the noise of it dying down, Wallace replied “Well, yes. I was impulsive — was very shaken, remember... And suppose a storm does come for me — as is possible? A big thing... Not likely, but — Oh, well, I can kidnap Hogan, so that he fails to appear at the test”.

“Unless”, Caroleth answered, “Hogan kidnaps you”.

Wallace laughed. “That will not be Christlike”.

And Caroleth: “Pooh, Christ had a beard, and wore taliths: Hogan is not careful to be Christlike; Christ may ‘come to Chicago’, but did not come from Chicago... There is that danger of kidnapping, not only from Hogan — any day you may be snapped up. And the protection of you in London is a strain on the Young Men — hundreds of them now round you: why not go down to your Harlebeke House? for two months, say, till the land-bill is through Committee: then there'll be war, and you can come out of your hole”.

Wallace's answer was “Yes, but to wrench myself from where you are —”

“There is the telephone”, she said; “we can talk; I can keep you in touch with things; and the people in the dessous de la politique will visit you. Yes, go. And do try to wriggle somehow out of this storm-test indiscretion: it mayn't be so easy to kidnap Hogan as you think”.

“All right, I'll go: give me a goodbye kiss now”.

“No”.

“What, never one kiss — surely, surely—”

“No. No, I say”. She slapped his thumb, saying “Two fires make a conflagration”. Then quickly: “What about that Paddy St. Aubyn? I feel a sort of responsibility — her father—”

“Oh, Heaven”, — from Wallace— “still that same kiddie in my way, I can't find the kid! If I find her, then you will? What do you mean, ‘two fires —’?”

“Find her and see” — a whisper in confidence, as the placard-square was switched-off to darkness, and those watching stars appeared to whisper “It is finished”.

XVI. THE DYING GOD

BUT FOR WALLACE — or Hogan — to “wriggle somehow” out of the storm-test was pretty soon an impossible thing: for the kuli of Guzerat, the Kurd and Berber, were conversing of it. The thing was, indeed, a world-affair in which each person felt a concern — except those few with culture enough to be perfectly certain that no tempest would occur for the “prayer” of either of the pair of preachers, whereas the millions easily jumped to the assumption that one or the other would triumph, and the “conflict between Science and Christianity” be finally decided that night of the test: for, with that credulousness of men, and that hero-worship of personalities, each of the two parties into which the challenge split humanity conceived that its champion was too responsible a pubheist to have made or accepted the challenge without having something mysterious “up his sleeve”. So Germany, with its angry fervour against Christianity, was pro-Wallace; France, whose fervour against Christianity was long gone dead and cold in old disdain, as a stripling has forgotten his teething, hated Wallace’s land-idea, many millions of Frenchmen being land-owners, and was pro-Hogan; Russia was pro-Wallace, Denmark was, Sweden, Holland; America (in the main) was pro-Hogan, and in many a church, in Chicago as in Alabama, orisons were being offered up that God would bare His arm, manifest His strength, exalt His name, to proclaim to all the world that the prayer of the servant of God had been heard before the throne of grace.

Meantime, Wallace was all in a state of apprehension: for a leader must not stand on a platform and look a fool. On three successive midnights, when all was still in the laboratory of Harlebeke House (Sussex), he had donned his “psychophone” to present his plight to those “scientists” of his, paying their flying visits in the twilight of infinity; and had awaited a reply. By this time he had discovered something about psychic rays, which, it appears, are the “missing rays”, being two octaves of the known forty, lying between Herschellian (infra-red) rays and Hertzian (wireless) rays, their wave-lengths varying from the twentieth of a cm. to over five cms.; akin to heat-rays, many can be measured by the bolometer; and they greatly augment the sensitiveness of smell. But, as to guidance in his plight — nothing! Greedily listing, he had received impressions of “distance”... “conditional”... “hatched”; then again he had received impressions of “Og and Mog”... “remote”... “impossible”; then again he had received impressions of “endeavour”... “Terra” — nothing else!

He fled from his apprehensions and depression to the pressure of the day’s politics, and to his Walpurgis, Whitsun, Beltane, celebrations, making those days red-letter days round about Southwater village (a mile from Harlebeke House), down whose row of disjointed cottages a Harlebeke groom moved slow on horseback, blowing a bugle in the gloom and stillness of midnight, and at intervals he shouted aloud “Who will die for the village?”: to which a farm-labourer named Martin, shewing himself at a little window, shouted back “I will die for the village”. “Come, then, My God”, the groom said; and Martin was then put upon the horse, to be led up to Harlebeke, in whose famed avenue of elms Wallace’s torch awaited the god amid the torches of Mr. R. S. Newnes (Secretary of the National Union of Seamen), of Mrs. Seaton Garry (Women’s International League), of Crichton of Iraq, of “Tom” Grimes (Treasurer of the Miners’ Federation of Great Britain), and of two London girls. Then when all the household had bowed down before the corn-god, he was led up to bed in the chamber in which George IV had slept.

But for five days the dying-god rites hung fire, Wallace was so caught and involved in an imbroglio of politics that interfered even with eating and sleeping.

The inner history of it was like this: after the rushing through of a Land-Registration Act had come the first reading of a land-nationalization bill, named “Land-Purchase Bill”, purposing to purchase Britain at a seven-years purchase; but this had come as a shock to many, a three-years’ purchase having previously been understood between the Young Men and the (Labour) Cabinet; and actually it was not until the morning after the bill’s first reading that Wallace heard a word about seven years. He flew into a fury of rage, he shouted “betrayed” — though, in fact, it was not without much temptation that the Parliamentary Labour Party had so double-crossed the Young Men: for trench-warfare, bombing planes, were all foreign to the mood of the British Labour-leaders, and when they saw a chance of “avoiding bloodshed” they keenly seized it, having an exaggerated horror of bloodshed (men’s blood, not sheep’s); nor was Dinka less soft, less fond of the sun’s rut and bureaucratic punctualities, so that both sides had been inclined to traffic on the sly. Dinka had said “You have only a penny-farthing majority, an unworkable Three, so give me thirty-years’ purchase, and I work the bill through The Lords for you: let’s avoid bloodshed”; but since thirty-years’ purchase would have been to land Britain permanently in debt, the Labour-men had answered “Twelve is our limit”; Dinka had said “Fifteen is ours”; and there had been deadlock. But at a new meeting a week before first-reading Dinka had come down to the Labourmen’s twelve, only to discover that one clique of them under I.L.P. influence were not disposed to rise above seven; whereupon the Jew had called them

Shylocks, but finally had been wrung to decide to try what he could do to “avoid bloodshed” at seven. Seven, however did not suit Wallace: he stormed, he threatened: without a doubt, he swore, if the bill passed at more than three years, the Young Men would crumple up Parliament like a cream tart, trample upon its ruins. Now Mr. Sims Connor (Prime Minister) ran down, many ran down, to councils in the Harlebeke library; there were bribes of compromise, bright-ideas, proffers, threats, counter-threats; “five” instead of “three” was for several days as frequent on the intriguers’ lips as “cinque” is in Italy, where everyone says cinque, cinque; Crichton of Iraq was inclined to five; even Caroleth Lavarock, who often prodded Wallace to travel faster and farther than he wanted, liked five; “Will you do what I say?”, she asked him one afternoon on the telephone; and he answered “I will not. Isn’t it a fact that this word ‘purchase’ is an absurd word here? three-years’ gift, say: one can’t purchase something from someone who has nothing, having done no work. The fancy of the simple-minded ancients, which some Simple Simons still entertain, that one can own something without moving it, or having it from someone who has moved it, will set all the cats of the future laughing. I own some diamonds, but I had first to take them, i.e., move them, do work on them, pick them up... No purchase about it!” Through which obstinacy of Wallace it presently got to be understood that an amendment of “three” for “seven” in the second-reading would be accepted by the Government.

It was only then that the dying-god rites could get properly going, though Martin, the god, had meantime been vastly adored, no one, not even Lord Blatchring, the Lord Chancellor, entering his presence without bending the knee, he in his diadem and ermines sitting at meal-time at the table’s head — though, an earth-born soul, his habit of holding knife-and-fork was hardly quite nice. On his tenth day at Harlebeke he held a lens to focus the sun's heat-rays upon a great heap of faggots in the park, and crowds of roes and cows remained astare at the flames that roared. Then after school a troop of the village-children moved from door to door, to gallop at each through the doggerel,

Wood for the fire,
Wood for the fire,
To make it burn up higher and higher,
Unless you do, the bulls won't sire,
The earth will tire;

and, loaded with the wood given at doorways, they trooped back to throw it into the conflagration; then, going to dip the knee where Martin sat robed on a throne on the grass, they had from his lavish hand showers of sugarplums.

Then, the next midnight, the climax: all Harlebeke, all Southwater, a crowd out of Horsham, Billingshurst, Hitchingfield, Barnes Green, were there, as well as some twenty Young Men, with Crichton of Iraq, Dr. Gocher (Chief Medical Officer of the Ministry of Health), Kennedy (General Secretary of Trades Union Congress), Reynolds (Secretary of Malthusian League for Human Welfare), Mungo (Home Secretary), and some others — these being seated in easy-chairs with Wallace on that hill-top of the park where Martin was, where tar-barrel was, “angel-man”, huge loaf, syringes, rockets, and where the two fires were — for another fire, “The New Fire”, had been lighted by Martin's hand with a brand from The Old Fire, that the sunbeams had lighted, this New Fire having been built round a poplar, which, stripped of its branches, had a cross-piece fastened to its lofty top; and the stars of that dark midnight looked down with many eyes upon Midsummer Night's dream, upon something of Lammas and Hallowmas as well as of Beltane and Walpurgis, some having nosegays of gaudy corncockle, some adorned with long fennel, St. John's wort, orpin, having-on garlands of mugwort, vervain, and in their hands sprigs of larkspur, through which to spy at the fires, and be free of eye-disease that year, while the Southwater houses were all in gala with garlands of cornflower, and with flags, and the bells of St. Cuthbert gabbled. An hour before midnight the driving of five of the Harlebeke cows through the New Fire had been the business, and though the cows had failed to see the symbolism of it, this, after no little shouting and bother, had been accomplished; upon which three mobs of boys started off with sticks snatched from The New Fire, with ashes, and with torches of broomstumps daubed with pitch, to plant the singed sticks in cornfields (so as to cause corncockle and darnel to die out), also to fumigate cattle with the torches (and safeguard them against charms and harms) to leave sticks at cottages (and safeguard them against fire), to scatter ashes over cabbage-beds (and safeguard them against slugs). Meanwhile the scene in its bath of flood-light from Harlebeke House was sufficiently animated; trees were galaxies of lamps, crimson, smaragdine; round and round The New Fire the loaf moved, large as the Jews' Ark of the Covenant; the tar-barrels, pivoted on poles, had chains attached, to which everyone gave a tug, to make the flames go on rotating; discs of birch, lit at the fires, were being hurled on high; the Silver Band from Horsham was rendering "Walküren-ritt"; a whirl of rose-water out of squirting-tubes was being squirted by everybody at everybody in the mood of the Roman carnival; a crackle of gunfire prattling was going on; and up the rockets raced to pop soft aloft and come again in glory, a snowstorm of colours falling soft... But now a hush, some minutes' dumbness: the Rt. Hon. Rudgwick Mungo rose to shout megaphonically wide "Who will die for the village? Who will pass through The Two Fires?", upon which the god rose up to shout aloud “I will die!” — and to step down from his throne toward The Old Fire, while Mr. Rudgwick Mungo published the shout “The Servant of God! The King will do it!” But Martin lacked practice in dying, and hardly did it nicely: he — hesitated: so long, that a moment came when Wallace’s heart sank; but soon afterwards Martin darted, and was through, patting at his burning ermines, panting to himself “by Hell”; nor did he much hesitate before The New Fire, but dashed, and was through. Now Mr. Rudgwick Mungo published the shout, “By his weals we are healed!”; and now a fanfare of trumpets; and now a procession to accompany Martin back to the throne, while the band broke into “Ecce Homo, behold the Man”. Having now in his hand a brand from The New Fire, with this Martin set fire to the “angel-man”, which stood beside the throne — a man of straw and wax, beautifully made (in London) — whereupon everybody set to beating the image with sticks, until it was demolished. Then ensued the beating down of the two main flames, until they were reduced to two sheets of embers shuddering to blushings, as breezes shoot, pursuing each other’s career over pools convulsed with blushings. After which followed orgy: now the switching-on of lights on the table a little way down the hill for wines, beers, eatables; dancings now round the two ember-stretches, dashings through the embers in pairs, brand in hand, hand in hand, every pair crying out, as they ran before the dash through, “Corn, corn, grow high”, Martin now standing there, shouting out the names of each pair before the dash, uproars of applause greeting the highest leapers: for the higher the leap, the higher the year’s corn; and whichever man dashed through unsmirched would have no illness that year, nor would any girl get pregnant, however great her indiscretions.

Wallace was standing flushed, having just done his second dash across the embers hand-in-hand with one of his London ladies, when Crichton of Iraq came from the house to announce that Mr. Hogan had been trying to get at Wallace on the telephone, but had now rung off.

“Keeping late hours, our Hogan”, Wallace remarked; and added “I’ll come”.

As they went together, Crichton remarked “Rum start that this Hogan is still there, a free man to-night! — unless you really intend to let that storm-test fakement come off?”

“Oh, I don’t know” — from Wallace.

“Well, but that’d never be practical politics, would it? So why isn’t this Hogan kidnapped?”

“I don’t want to kidnap him”, Wallace answered: “I like my old Hogan — or should, if the man did not do vast harm; but when a man depresses the level of a nation’s intelligence, to which nations owe all their superhets, all, all, their goods, and doesn’t care a curse, if only his own little purposes are served, then I want to get my dagger into the dog’s guts. Yes, kidnap the beggar: be damned to bad men”.

They were now in the ‘phone-room, but before he could ring-up Hogan he was rung-up by someone who announced what caused him to call out joyously “You’ve got her?” — someone on night-duty at the agents who had been trying to find Paddy St. Aubyn, someone who said “We had traced her to that house four days ago, saw Mr. Hogan himself about the matter, but failed to gather from him that the girl was there. Now, however, we have information that she is a nurse-girl in the Hogan home”, not mentioning that the information had now come to him from Mr. Hogan himself: for to mention this would have been to hurt the look of his firm’s acuteness in detective work.

And Wallace: “Nurse... dear me... Hogan... Oh, very well; good-bye”.

And now to ring up Hogan...

From Hogan he heard “See here, Dr. Wallace, I now find it impossible for our storm-test meeting to be on that fifth: sorry; but some later date it must be now. I’ve been kind of wanting to run down your way to fix this machine between us, but London has me a prisoner. Could you make it convenient to discuss it here with me? say to-morrow evening at six?”

Somedumbness. Then Wallace: “You realize, of course, that it will be an earthquake, if the date is postponed?”

And Hogan: “Sure I do. Like postponing Christmas. But it’s plum impossible — I see no way out”.

“Who will be at your place to-morrow evening?”

“Who will? Why, I — my wife — my nurse-girl — my cook...”

“Quite so: you have a wife, and a nurse-girl”.

“Yeah. And a cook”.

“Quite so. Those all?”

“Yeah — that I know of”.

“I’ll come. Six o’clock to-morrow. Goodbye”.

And Crichton of Iraq, hovering there astare: “You’ll go? not to Hogan’s?”

“Aye” — from Wallace.

“But not — alone, Sonny?”

“Yes, I think so”.

“Oh, well” — Crichton threw an arm of despair— “go your own road”.

XVII. WAR

THE DAY OF the extinguishing of those Old and New Fires was a day of high crisis in English history; and other fires were lighted.

Mr. Hogan had first heard of it near five in the evening from Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, who, at the Carlton Club, had rung him up, Hogan being then in his little “parlour”, tossing off letter after letter, with that wing of hair dropping across his forehead which gave him his affaire air of generals and administrators arranging their campaigns. But anon he stopped, lost in thoughts of Woman, musings that were lewd, for although his strength was not less than heroic, the calamity of an avalanche of temptation had smashed upon his head. And from time to time he prayed, he wrestled, with all his heart’s ardour he besought...

His wife lying ill; Paddy, some feet above him, was alone; a dart and he had her, that female being, so near, alone, with him, in the world, for the soundless house was the world; and there is an actualness in the sun’s calories, intolerable, sixty millions hot: how sweet and easy to yield an instant to the sweep of the river of heat, dash to perdition down with it, splash in the Lethe of it, drown in the cataract’s crash of it...

“Help... Thou can’st save, and Thou alone... though my sins are as scarlet, they shall be as wool... red like crimson, they shall be as snow...”

He heard her come down, stir the perambulator to settle the baby in — outside the parlour-door, so close! only a hero could have remained seated there, and not slipped out to thrill in her V-rays, draw up into his nostrils the cantharides of her aura; yet he managed it, his hands clutching his desk as an anchor of custody. Only when she was at the gate he could not help starting up to gaze clandestinely after; but then, as she vanished, proudly he frowned, heroic, saying “Pooh, Man, be a man, stamp it out o’ you, damn it out, blast it out, will you go to Hell, Hogan, for the tickling of a nerve?”

It was then that the telephone bell went — Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, to ask “You know that a three-years’ purchase amendment has been accepted by those front-bench fellows?”

“No, I’ve not heard”, Hogan answered.

And Sir Borlase: “An hour ago... Well, of course, that blows everything to hell. Blood it is. And everybody on our side is asking ‘Why wait?’ If Dinka hesitates, move without Dinka, that’s all. But Dinka knows that he mustn’t now. So the thing now is to be sudden as thunder, and get London: the side that gets London has half won the war. To this end it is proposed to keep the Young Men distracted within the next sixty hours — give them something else to think about, grab Wallace. And there you come in: it is being said that you could entice Wallace from the country, if you invited him to discuss with you a new date for the storm-test: then we grab him”.

A silence. For what concord has Christ with Belial? “He won’t come”, Hogan muttered.

“May. Are you for trying it? You must be eager for some way of escape out of that storm-test”.

Hogan’s lids were lowered. “That may be... But I am not much on kidnapping, Sir Borlase; not a lot in my line of business”.

“No, no, no, it won’t be you... Look here, we can’t discuss it on the ‘phone: I’ll dash down to you for a chat”.

Hogan started at this! — at the thought of Sir Borlase being in that house, with a risk of his seeing Paddy, carrying Paddy off: for, having lately been told by Paddy her real name, Hogan knew that Sir Borlase was her father.

“Sorry, sorry”, he said, “it can’t be any time to-day—”

“To-morrow, then. At three shall we say?”

“Yeah” — reluctantly— “that might do me”.

“Bye”.

Now Hogan dropped upon a sofa, his temples pressed between his palms, to consider it.

When he had said “I accept” to Wallace’s invitation to a storm-test, it had not been without some hope that a storm might come for him: for suchlike half-beliefs as that faith can move a mountain, still a tempest, heal a leper, were in-bred within him: it was early in his youth that he had asserted the occurring in him of a certain revolution of mood named “conversion” among sectarians, nor, since then, had he undergone any mental culture worth mentioning: so that in so far as it is possible for a modern genuinely to accept ancient dogmas Hogan accepted them. He had hoped, then, for some sort of storm to respond to his prayer of faith; but now he no longer hoped: for, though he had committed no positive “sin”, he was so holy and good, that just the hunger to sin was crimson sin for him, and “the Lord heareth not sinners”, nor will launch a storm for the tarnished heart. Hence, if Wallace had ceased to live now, Hogan would hardly have mourned; nor was the notion of kidnapping Wallace new to him: his ears had been keen to hear of it. He had not proposed it — was little inclined to deeds of violence — but now it was proposed to him, and now he let himself “sin”, lent ear to it, presently fell in with it. Now, “easy is the descent to evil”; “the beginning of sin is as when one letteth out water”: sins follow with slippier and slippier facility.

He did not think that Wallace would come to be kidnapped for the asking: so about ten o'clock he rang up the detectives who had called upon him in their hunt for Paddy; told them that Paddy was there. He was aware that it was Wallace who employed them; for Paddy, pointing to Wallace's face in a paper, had told him that that was he for whom she had left her home: so when he had given the detectives time to inform Wallace where Paddy was, he rang up Wallace to say "Come, let us discuss; the appointed date for the storm-test has become impossible" — an untruth, "the beginning of sin". But Wallace was then out of doors, bounding across New Fire embers with his ladies; when he came in, though, he had from the detectives where Paddy was; then he rang-up Hogan, and, having now the Paddy-motive, too, for going to London, he told Hogan that he'd go, tripping into Hogan's trap.

Hogan smiled before he sighed more than he had smiled.

But now, before Wallace's coming at six, before Sir Borlase's coming at three, Paddy had to be cleared out of the house...

This was Hogan's care the next forenoon: at a near villa in which was exhibited a "To Let" he engaged a chamber for Paddy.

But, as to this, Paddy had to be reckoned with...

Three days before this, Mrs. Hogan having summoned Paddy to her bedside, had said to Paddy "Bring the baby, let me have him a bit": and what had Paddy answered? — sullenly, with downcast lids: "No, Mrs. Hogan, that would not be right". Whereupon a stare, a mutter from Mrs. Hogan: "Yes, sure, that girl's out of her head".

And this was so: "that would not be right" meaning "not right for another woman to mess my baby about". For the girl's maternal instincts, instigated to activity by her close association with a male in an elopement, but then thwarted, balked, repressed into her Unconscious, had re-emerged into her Conscious in the form of this hallucination that it was she who had given birth to the baby which she nursed. On this point at this date her psychology had gone as mad as a March-hare.

So when Hogan went upstairs at noon to tell her of the nice room that he had contrived to get her at No. 19 down the road, where he'd go to see her daily, Paddy, going pallid, answered "But about my baby?", and when Hogan told her that Mrs. Soames (the cook) had undertaken to look to Baby until another nurse turned up, her teeth pecked together with grievance, she jerked her head, murmuring to herself "The lot of you don't get my baby from me, though!"

Nor was it easy to win her out of the house: she wished to stay for "dinner", this had to be conceded, and it was past two before she migrated, Hogan bearing her two bags. He came back feeling very relieved, the field cleared for her father's visit, not remembering that Paddy had a key.

At three came Sir Borlase...

I said I d come, he said, "but it seems to be too late now about winning Wallace to London: tonight's the ructions night: it's all planned". He had sat on a sofa facing the parlour-door, Hogan before him, back to door.

Hogan said "Wallace is coming here at six".

And Sir Borlase, starting: "Wallace is? By Jove, bravo! You managed it?"

"The man is coming".

"Well done. With what force, I wonder?"

"Alone, I reckon. Coming on a private matter as well as—" here Hogan was arrested, seeming to hear a sound like a key put into the front door.

It might have been Mrs. Soames, the cook, there, but she usually entered by the back; or it might have been Paddy come back — now he remembered Paddy's key; and he dared not open the parlour-door to see, lest Paddy's father might see Paddy: so there he sat on prickles, straining one absent ear to track another sound.

No other sound came: Paddy entered mouse-noiseless, aware of voices in the parlour, of the voice of her father, who said "Well, then, I must be looking alive"; and on this there entered her head the idea "Conspiracy" to separate — to rend her baby from her breast.

Not longer than six ticks she lingered goggle-eyed, hearkening at that parlour-door key-hole, then quick was the word, and quiet — up the stair... while Sir Borlase, now standing, was saying "Au revoir, then. Busy night, this; big with crisis. As to Wallace, I'll be pretty glad to get him — there's more than politics between that man and me. I think, the man is so suspiciously like a young man of whom my daughter was fond — You know, my Friend, that I've lost my daughter — rather hard lines — played the devil with me, Man — nice little girl, Hogan — Oh, well, ha, ha, nothing matters".

Now Hogan tripped into the hypocrite's sin, permitting his tongue to utter "Don't despair, Sir. Take it to the Lord in prayer".

And Sir Borlase, moving out: "Prayer, is it? I've prayed, though I never prayed before. No go: my prayers don't reach like yours — don't you know".

They being now out in the "hall", and Paddy at that moment bounding down the stair with her baby, she, in dashing round the stair-angle, beheld their backs, as they, if they had happened to give one backward glance, must have seen something of her; but, checking her speed, she doubled back up unseen.

Then at the front door, which they found rather open, Hogan stood looking at the baronet's going; and he grumbled "A daughter lost — a father mourning, heartbroken — and I know where she is, but do not tell him.

That's Christlike, ha, ha; that's doing to others as I would wish them to do to me. Pooh, virtue is gone out of me — a son of Belial, nothing else, fearing not God, neither regarding man. But not so bad as that: the man shall know — now."

Now like the desperate toward precipices he started, darted, northward after Sir Borlase, to tell him; and, catching sight of the baronet just vanishing into a bystreet, "Hi!", he shouted, "St. Aubyn!". But without result.

Purposing to return by train as he had come by train, Sir Borlase was walking to the station; but, on coming across a taxi in the third street, he determined to return in that, and was going into it when Hogan, spurring round the corner, saw his legs getting in. A howl now might have got Sir Borlase's attention, but Hogan failed to howl — told himself that he was too late, said "another time", and in a moment Sir Borlase was gone.

Now, there had been eyes at an upper window which had spied Hogan's dash from the villa, and now was Paddy's chance to dash, too. From the villa's gate she saw Hogan, northward, going round a corner, and soon she was in her new room southward, where at once she got crammed into one bag the things in her two bags, then with crafty stealths, gravely loaded — for both bag and baby were big-bellied — sallied out to run southward into the east end of Strand-on-the-Green near.

At the west part of the Strand, not far from Kew Bridge, was a "To Let" facing the river, and there she rapped, to crave shelter of a strong-boned young woman, prosperous, industrious helpmate of a mechanic, who added to her pocket-money by letting parts of her ample domicile.

She asked Paddy "And where have you your furniture?", to which Paddy answered "I haven't any furniture".

“But aren’t the rooms unfurnished?” the woman said: “it is a little house at the back, that has one upstairs room, and one downstairs, seven shillings a week, unfurnished”.

And Paddy: “All I want is a little bed, a little table, and a chair”.

“Well, that might be — But aren’t you very young? What about the baby’s father? Where’s he?”

Paddy shook her head. “He has no father”.

And the woman: “How do you mean — no father?”

“He is like that — he never had any father”.

“Oh, come!”

“Please believe what one says. Shouldn’t I have known, if he had had a father?”

“Well, I never heard — You mean to stand there and tell me that he just came like that, without any father?”

“Yes” — with a sincerity of such a thoroughness as somewhat to shake the young woman’s assurance of the way of Nature.

“Well, I never heard of such a thing in all my born days”, she said, “except at Christmas-time when Jesus Christ was born. You — mean — to — say — he just come like that, and no father?”

“Yes, I tell you”, says Paddy: “he is like that”.

“Well, but, if it can’t be, it can’t!”

“Oh, pray, don’t doubt one’s word”.

“Not that I would doubt your word, if you put it like that. But I don’t think — you are very young — better try somewhere else”.

“I am tired already” — from Paddy— “he is fat. And — I don’t know where to go”.

“Oh, come along, then”, the woman unkindly replied out of a kind mind; and there Paddy abode that night in a waste of back-garden that had a boat in it, and a boat-builder's booth, and a bed of sunflowers.

Meantime, Mrs. Soames, Hogan's cook, had broken in to where Hogan was scribbling a host of notes with a business brow, and had exclaimed "Mr. Hogan, Sir, where's Baby?"

And Hogan, spinning round: "In his cot, I suppose!"

"Baby's gone, Sir!"

Out at once Hogan darted, down to the house of Paddy's new room; and he groaned in his heart "The way of transgressors is hard!"

That was soon after four o'clock, an hour when Caroleth Lavarock in London was at the phone, wanting to talk with Wallace at Harlebeke; but it was Crichton of Iraq who replied to her. "Wallace is gone off by motor-car to Hogan's in Chiswick".

"Whatever for?" says she, and she was breathless: "it is being expected in London that he will be kidnapped — to-night — I have heard; and it is most urgent that he, and you, should meet the Labourmen to-night: we lose London, we half lose the war, if we fail to take measures at once. This is the night; we are already in an anarchy: two whole divisions are at this moment pouring toward Wallingford, Windsor, London — the King's troops moving without the King's order by order of officers who are against the King: they will occupy the House of Commons — tonight — I have information — if it be not adequately guarded. Oh, why is Wallace not there? The Labourmen meet—"

"Where? When?" Crichton sharply asked.

And Caroleth: "At eight. I don't think that the where is settled — it mustn't be at any obvious spot like Downing Street or Transport House, where they'd be dropped upon—"

"Right you are, says Moses: I'll see to it: bye.."

At once he rang up Fitzroy Square, uttered two phrases, then, with that spinning swiftness of decision which distinguished his agile instants, he twisted on his pins, and dashed. Within some minutes he was off in a motor for London, honking his own horn.

And while he scorched northward, Caroleth was hastily pacing a chamber like a caged animal, except when every few minutes she tripped to the 'phone's trill; but after half an hour of it, anxious, tormented, she summoned a motor to dash away for Chiswick, and see what was going on at Hogan's villa.

Meanwhile, Wallace was speeding ahead, half-way to London, eager to get Paddy, so as to get Caroleth; and he was alone, without any weapon, not believing that Hogan would have any hand in a kidnapping, having a trust in Hogan, in Hogan's Christianity, well knowing that an integrity or rectitude of behaviour as between "neighbour" and "neighbour" is inherent in the ancient religions.

But if the religionist chance to "fall from grace"? Then naught is left in him, no other culture, seven devils may enter the empty place, and he may use thumbscrews on his neighbour, the rack, the stake, the pillory, so that Smithfield flares. Hence when Caroleth dashed into the Hogan street near five-thirty, she cried "Stop!", catching sight before the Hogan house of a group of some ten fellows in conference, who, she felt sure, were there to cop Wallace — strange though it was that they were in the street, not concealed within the villa.

They were in the street for the simple reason that no one had let them into the villa — only Mrs. Hogan there, in bed: for Mrs. Soames, the cook, having nothing to do, had gone soon after her usual hour, and Hogan was still out, engaged in a wild-goose chase throughout that mesh of "terraces", flying in slippers from "To Let" to "To Let" — Paddy gone, big-bellied baby gone — and again and again he groaned in his heart “Aye, Hogan, the way of transgressors is hard”.

So Caroleth, on seeing that knot of Fascisti fellows standing there in conference, stopped, turned, and was urgently off for Sussex, to meet and deflect Wallace from going near Hogan’s. Unfortunately, she took the road on which he was not: for, knowing that he was coming to Chiswick, she drove through Richmond on to the Guildford road, while he was now honking through Croydon.

And when he got to Grove Park Terrace, there was no longer the spectacle of any group of fellows before Hogan’s house to put him on his guard: for the group had finally decided to go round to the house-back, had climbed a window into the kitchen, were now soundlessly on the watch for Wallace within the villa.

Wallace knocked; thrice he knocked; stepped backward to call “Hogan!”; he called “Paddy!”: no answer.

Some drizzle was mixed with the dusks of arriving night; but he could see that the door was a little open; for those within had opened it to tempt him to enter and be separated from his motor; and he entered.

“Hogan!” he called again; “Paddy!”. There a perambulator was: a baby must be somewhere.

But the house was soundless to him; in her head on her bed Mrs. Hogan meditated the goings-on, and said nothing; every moment the gloom in there grew denser.

He pried into the room to his right; muttered “Funny!”; then up the steps he adventured, on the look out for some sign of Paddy, till on the higher floor he was suddenly among soldiers.

One tall carle, touching a moustache, remarked calmly enough “We’ve got you all right, Wallace: come quietly. Go bring the car, Wright”.

“Insolence of you!” says Wallace, flushing up through his pallor: “see if you don’t catch it hot from Mr. Hogan, using his house for this outrage” — his faith in Hogan in no way shaken!

“That’s as it may be: we don’t—” the carle started to say, but then started in another sense at an outcry below, a howl from the Wright sent for “the car”, that had been left for concealment in a near street; and up the stair, wide-eyed, bounded this Wright with the outcry, “The Young Men are coming!” — that outcry that had now acquired the frightfulness of the cry, “The Danes are coming!”, which ages ago struck a panic, ghostly in tone, to the fantasy of this country.

The tall carle sharply asked “Shut the door?”, and, as Wright replied “Yes”, a call from outside the house sounded: “How many, Wallace?” — from Crichton of Iraq, on seeing Wallace’s car.

Wallace called back “Ten, Crichton!”

Whereupon a group-commander in one of the newcome cars said to his three “Crack up that bay-window”, and out crackled a racket of bullets; but, as those three were doing a dash to the shattered window, one of them dropped shot inside the garden gate, whereupon the group-commander shouted “Back, you two!”, and the two darted back to cover behind the cars.

For now the four new-come cars had sharply emptied themselves, both parties now shooting under cover, but the Young Men more than double in number, they being a section of mounted-infantry — six “groups” of four — Crichton making them twenty-five; and like patterings on a rainy day, and like tape-machines chattering in spasms, the exchange of firing transacted itself some time with catch-as-catch-can, car against house, bad for glass, while the road, growing crowded, gabbled with gazers’ tongues, Mr. Hogan with a white nose now among them, reflecting on the way of transgressors.

But, as the Fascisti had only revolvers, and at most sixty shots, and, as the Young Men had come anticipating struggle, with ammunition to waste, even with tear-gas, the longer they potted on, the more hopeless for the house. And the house were only eight, since two of their ten were looking to Wallace: so when their fire slackened, three Young Men, shielded behind car-mats, made a dash for the bay-window, laid flat two sentinels there, flung the door open, and a general rush-in to a scrimmage on the top floor followed, where the main body of Fascisti went down under fists and butt-ends, Crichton of Iraq crying to the one under his knee “Going to stash the racket? raw meat like you?”, while Wallace was calling out “But they surrender! Spare the poor beggars!” Within some minutes after which he was driving northward with Crichton, leaving three dead, with five wounded. When he asked why they were going to Berkeley Square, Crichton replied “To get from Caroleth Lavarock the place of the Labourmen’s conference — didn’t know it when she ‘phoned me, only knew that it is at eight: not much time left, by George; and it’s no chop ‘phoning about at random: the dart is to go straight to her”.

“So this is the night”, says Wallace: “sudden!”

And Crichton: “That’s so. The levellest heads this night of our Lord come off first chop”.

But circumstances, too, may turn the scale in human affairs: when they came to Berkeley Square Caroleth was absent — far gone on the Guildford Road, hoping to intercept Wallace. So Crichton and Wallace had to use her ‘phone— “to ‘phone at random”, for nobody seemed to be at home that evening; The Daily Herald, shying from relying upon Crichton’s voice, which could be copied, declined to reply to his query, “Where?”, offering to reply by messenger; but this meant time.

At last, though, Caroleth had determined to turn back, and, going again to Hogan's, said to him at his door, "There has been a battle here, Mr. Hogan, I gather: Dr. Wallace, coming to see you, found kidnappers. Is that so?" Hogan was haggard: having failed to help a father who had lost a daughter, he was now himself a father who had lost a son. Despondently he answered "Yes, that's so".

"But you didn't know that he was coming to be kidnapped?" Caroleth asked.

"No, get me, didn't know," he replied, "but suspected, and didn't warn him; on the contrary, enticed him. That was wrong".

"Oh, well", she said, changing her tone, "we all fall into wrong. And, if we confess—"

"You are a Christian — more than I — to comfort the broken-hearted. That was wrong".

"Don't you mind... But I must rush: 'bye'".

Back to her car she dashed, and, arriving after eight at Berkeley Square, darted in upon Crichton and Wallace with strings of drizzled hair draping her face's pallor, with eyes wide like the sky's azure, to cry "Fly! Fly! Why are you here?"

"We want to know—"

"Fly!" — pushing Wallace— "No. 1, Guilford Place, W.C.".

This No. 1 was the house of a son-in-law of Jepp, General Secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen; and, assembled there round a dining-room table on the ground-floor, were nine, till Crichton and Wallace, and lastly Caroleth Lavarock, arrived, making twelve: of whom three were ladies, three were gentlemen, while six were persons of working-class birth whom circumstances had whirled to exalted office; and between the six gentry and the six others a heated controversy arose and waged, to squander two precious hours.

“God!” Wallace grumbled, sitting on prickles, “What a gang of magpies! the monstrosity of a training which consists in a training to make ‘speeches’!”

When Crichton of Iraq outlined what measures were now crying aloud to be adopted at this or that strategic point, Kennedy of Trades Union Congress uttered a phrase which two others had already uttered: “Let us get down to brass tacks”.

And Crichton: “But I’ve got down to brass tacks! Brass tacks? Brazen tactics, say”.

“Here, here!” — from Lady St. Arvens, of the Weavers’, Winders’, and Reelers’ Association, M.P. for West Ham South.

“The Labour Party” — this from the Rt. Hon. Mr. Sims Connor, Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary— “is not a revolutionary party: it can only move the King’s-troops to protect the King in response to some overt act by the King’s enemies”.

“But, in Heaven’s name”, Wallace exclaimed, “aren’t newspaper-men coming every few minutes to hand you notes with news of overt acts by the King’s enemies?”

“Here, here!” leapt from Miss Emily Gissing of the Women’s Co-operative Guild, M.P. for Rhondda South: “and, if we don’t hurry, there will soon be no need for notes with news, the acts will be so very overt”.

Now from Jacobs, Chairman of the National Executive of the Labour Party, came “But if King’s-troops are moving by order of the King’s enemies, what guarantee have we that other King’s-troops will move by our order? and if we once order, and are not obeyed, all’s up with us”.

On which Sir Henry Bennett, K.C.V.O., Chief Party-whip: “Which is as much as to confess, Jacobs, that a Labour Government in this country is at present impossible. Yet in your months of office what steps have you taken to appoint to the King’s-troops officers, obedience to whose orders will be obedience to your orders?”

“That would only have been to precipitate bloodshed” — this from Mr. E. M. Sopworth, War Minister: “we are out to bar bloodshed as long as possible”.

“Ah, because you are free Britons, you see”, Miss Caroleth Lavarock answered with a vindictive lip, a flush of cerise which brushed her pallor shewing that her blood was up: “free Britons! in other words serfs trained to chatter catchwords, bred from birth in the notion that your owners are somehow of better flesh than you. If you shrink from having your own blood shed, still more do you shrink from shedding theirs, and, if you dare to hit at them, you hit like nigger-boys hitting at big game, who lean far forward to hit the air, then skedaddle with leers of scare at their own cheekiness”.

On this Mr. Rudgwick Mungo, Home Secretary, said “If Miss Lavarock could manage to argue without personal abuse—”

“Pooh, Sir, I am fed up with your stalenesses”, Miss Lavarock retorted: “the lot of you only repeat, you never really say anything. ‘So refreshing a cup of tea, isn’t it?’ — that’s your watchword and motto: once a month you utter it without fail. Where’s the ‘abuse’ in saying that you are slaves, if it is a truth that you were born and brought up slaves? Why, it would be unworthy in a lady to move among such serfs — I’d blow out any brains — if I didn’t hope that you won’t eternally be serfs. Dear me, I have been old and now am young, yet never saw I leaders so at a loss to lead”.

“You mean”, Mr. Sims Connor replied, “that you have been young, and now are — slightly — older”, bowing with gallantry.

“Oh, well” — from Miss Lavarock— “since we have time for such niceties”.

So, in conversation, nine o’clock passed...

At nine-fifteen sounds that Crichton of Iraq considered to be six-inch howitzers, mouthing somewhere like hounds in the night, arrived at that dining-room...

At ten Mr. W. Burbidge Irving, of Transport and General Workers’ Union, was for the third time suggesting “Why not the Young Men to protect the King?”, to which Crichton of Iraq replied “That says nothing, my good Sir, how can an army of volunteers be mobilized at an hour’s notice? The Young Men in barracks in London are hardly half a division: they can’t be game for a flutter with half an army corps”.

“At any rate” — this from Mr. E. M. Sopworth (War Minister)— “it now appears that the general sense of the meeting is to wait and see what the night brings forth before trying the experiment—”

Whereupon, red with wrath, up sprang Wallace, to bang the table, and utter a kind of prayer — quite in the manner of Mr. Hogan, whose prayers informed Almighty God of facts; and passionately he vociferated “Oh, God, You made us, but we don’t love you, God, we don’t like bloodshed, You like bloodshed, because You care nothing about Tom and Dick, You only care about Tomson and Dickson, but we care, and we don’t want to get any holes in our skin, for though You alone can make skin, we think that we made ours, and we don’t want to get any bloody holes in it for You—”

But in the thick of this a ‘phone bell tinkled in the “hall” beyond the door, and Sims Connor, with Kennedy and Sopworth, hurried out, to learn from The Daily Herald: “You would do well to flee instantly — I have reason to think that your meeting-place has been scented out, nor could anything that you could do now rescue the situation: London's lost — St. Stephen's occupied, The Bank, Post Office, Tower, the bridges, railway stations, Whitehall, Woolwich; Dinka has been named 'Leader' at a meeting in Committee-room No. 15; Wellington Barracks has shelled the Bermondsey Barracks, where 340 Young Men have surrendered, 49 having being killed, and all their war-matériel captured; probably no Young Men war-matériel will be in London by to-morrow morning. I myself am now speaking under arrest — may be stopped at any moment — Daily Herald suppressed — most of the staff here will sleep—”

“In prison”, he was doubtless about to say, but was interrupted: and in the midst of their dumbness of dismay the Labourmen were startled to the heart by butt-ends battering their front-door. Back they ran to the nine in the dining-room to cry out “London lost, and we raided!”, whereupon Crichton of Iraq tripped to throw up a window, to look out, and to call “Follow me, all!”

“But the ladies!”, Sir Henry Bennett called through the distraction of tongues and breaths; whereupon Lady St. Arvens called “Go! Go! you are not to mind us”; and now Crichton leapt fifteen feet down into an “area” which, on that side of the house, is in Guilford Street, but on the house's adjacent (front) side is in Guilford Place, the house being at the corner between Street and Place; then all the men, following Crichton's lead, went sliding in speedy succession, like medicine-drops measured out, down a stack-pipe that runs close by one of the windows — hardly highly dignified for coat-tails — the last to go being Wallace, who suddenly, in parting, twisted to snatch Miss Caroleth Lavarock to his heart, to ravish her lips ere she realized, and, that tipple of spittle pilfered, pitched to the window. Then when the front-door was opened to a squad of 2nd Seaforths of the 2nd

Highland Brigade of the 1st Army-corps' 1st Division, and when these had stepped within to effect a seizure, the fugitives trooped up "area" steps which are adjacent to the front-door, to rush off helterskelter now on various ways, and get out of London as best they could, none attempting to go again to his home, all having a rendezvous at Pontefract.

So when the Seaforths stepped into the dining-room, it was to find it empty but for three ladies quietly seated there with their serene habit of eye to command the obeisance of the helot-class, and to govern England; nor was anything insolent said or done to them.

XVIII. MUNITIONS

THE YOUNG MEN'S (main) rendezvous was at the Aire, to hold there the Great North Road east of the Pennines; and about that nodal point, in those West Riding towns, in Pontefract, Halifax, Tadcaster, York, in Beverley, too, Hull, were presented during three days scenes like a chaos of ants scattered. But it was not a chaos: each was where he should be, doing what he should; when the arriving of the squads ceased, of the battery-sections, sapper-companies, ammunition columns, field-hospitals, just three divisions were there with their divisional troops and with corps troops, not more nor less; ready for service within a week were all battalion store-"houses" (ten baggage-wagons, store-wagons, supply-wagons), got from Army Ordnance at York — one difference between Old Men army-organization and Young Men being that not all the hands acting for the Old Men were at heart Old Men, while all acting for the Young were heartily Young Men, down to the very horse-owners to whom 12s. 6d. a year had been paid to present (registered) horses to be bought when war should call: so within twelve days ammunition-columns had been mobilized, ammunition-parks, bearer-companies, the pontoon-troop, field-companies of engineers, field-park wagons looking like gipsy-carts, khaki-coloured, with "Printing Wagon" marked on this, "Photographic Wagon" marked on that — wagons, harness, arms, equipment, having been kept ready at York, the corps' headquarters; and Artillery took charge of ammunition-columns, Service Corps of supply-columns, Medical Corps of field-hospitals and bearer-companies — the organization being more or less on the model of the old "regular" army, so that the Young Men had “Lancers”, had “Guards”, their Army Medical Corps was called by habit “R.A.M.C.”, Royal Medical, their engineers were “R.E.”, Royal Engineers: and perhaps there was a fitness in this, since the Prince of Wales was reported to be a Young Man, and did, in fact, before the war was a month old, propose to the Young Men the kidnapping of the King with the King’s approval: for the King was the representative of the Nation, whose welfare was his welfare and affair; but the barons, the Old Men, were the representatives of themselves, as against the Nation, whose welfare was at their expense: hence the inherency of that ancient hostility between King and barons, and Magna Carta was a carta for magnates, not for carters. But for some reason neither the Young nor the Old Men ever did in fact kidnap the King, as Simon de Montfort and others had done, Kings having perhaps ceased to be of high import.

Though, then, for over fourteen days roads were cumbered with muddles of Steam Road Transport trains, ponderous like steam-rollers, and tanks, and gun-columns, and wagon, and horse, order gradually rose out of it, like a seraglio that grows within scaffolding: fines of communication guarded; warehouses taken by Army Ordnance Corps for the reception of stores, of spare guns, rifles, shells, cartridges, wagons, clothes, boots, etc.; the Commissariat Department of Army-Service commandeering warehouses, getting together wagons for supply-park, for field-bakery, making contracts with farmer-folk for the supply of cattle, sheep, flour, vegetables, forage; the taxation of the counties round taken over (the corps costing some £7,000 a day); A.P.D. (Army Pay Department) establishing at Pontefract offices to pay honest cash for provisions, hay, horses, wagons; a Railway Company of the Engineers taking over the railway, reorganizing time-tables, train services; Army Medical Corps preparing a main hospital at York, smaller ones at Tadcaster, Beverley, Goole, while the Veterinary Department established a horse-hospital at Selby, the Remount Department a dépôt not far from Wakefield.

So, too, with 35,000 Young Men away west about the Mersey marshes, about Chester, Stockport, Manchester, to hold England west of the Pennines; and so with other corps along the Severn, about Worcester, about Gloucester — this being the broad fact that everybody presently got to gather, that North and West were Young Men, while South and East were Old Men. This, though, was only roughly true: for soon enough Old Men were far gone westward, digging themselves in at Malvern Hills, while Young Men were drawing fines round Oxford, Wallingford, and were garrisoned behind wire-entanglements far east near Peterborough — the strategies of both the Field-M Marshals Commanding soon seeming to collapse to mere tactics and opportunism: so that ere long there were few spots in England where the housewife, hanging out at noonday her washing in the garden's sunshine, was not conscious of gun-sounds mumbling dumbly somewhere, as when in Nevis one hears somewhere in the blue room of heaven-above rumours of bumpings that are Mont Pelée booming gusts of thunder in Martinique, like echoes of God's voice guffawing in heaven's void; and speedily she ceased to heed the habitualness of it, any more than she heeds the jews-harp music of aeroplanes faring habitual on their business over her head — though she might frown, mystified, over some yellow stains appearing on her linens, which were stains of lyddite-vapours pervading the air, and she might frown, mystified, at some whiffs like charlock and odours of mortality, with which high-explosive vapours taint the air.

Otherwise the war hardly troubled her ordinary habit — some rise in prices — some bothers in travel — some scarcity of butter, bacon; but she had her morning letter from her married daughter, her Sunday paper, as customary. Indeed, in some of its details the war touched upon the comic: the Post Office, for instance, was Old Men, yet down the Young Men's fines stepped twice a day the old-time postman, an official of the enemy, to deliver letters; and yonder aloft muttered along some warplane of Young or Old with its bomb-racks, bombing-sights, machine-gun, yet it was more than the place of either side was worth to bomb a British town, or much destroy a bridge, a railway-line; there would have been a fine outcry from the public.

But the important thing about the war was that the peoples of our globe got to twig the inwardness of it, what the Young Men meant, fought for, what the Old Men meant, fought for, and to compare them, and with bated breath await, aware that here was crisis in the history of Life, and for all time this fighting would decide the fines whereon human nature was henceforth to move — a strife of mightier moment than ever yet the multitudes of Armageddon had mustered to struggle in, or the rumpus of drum and trumpet had summoned the nations of men to gaze at, and be amazed. For that inwardness was not difficult to twig: what was meant was simple as A B C. What the Young Men meant was what had been told to the old Dr. Warwick by that Egg in that seraglio of the heavenly travellers: in the words of Major-General Shervington, commanding the Third Division of the First Army Corps of Young Men, writing in The Nineteenth Century and After: "If we meet someone afresh after sixty years, we see changes, differences, mental, physical: and since we see a changed man, a different man, it can't be the same man; and since that man has ceased to exist after sixty years, the man has ceased to exist after sixty ticks, after the sixty-millionth of a tick, since at each instant billions of changes are taking place in each thing, what is true of a man being true, too, of a bean, an atom, an electron, a sun: so that Being is Change, i.e.. Motion, i.e.. Force, and nothing is, save One, Whose Name is Wonder and Lovely, and there is none else, to whom be love and wonder for ever and ever, Amen. If, then, a series of chaps named Jim live for what the series imagine to be Jim's self, that is living for what is not, is living for a screen-film series of apparitions (fifty per second) that successively fill the bit of space named Jim; but, then, so to five is not to see facts; and since happiness consists in seeing facts, a series of Jims who know their way about will live for what is, for the Real, for God": so said the Young Men. The Old Men, on the contrary, contended: "That is all nonsense, God be damned, it is I who am I for ever, and for my everlasting self I fight, the only god that I acknowledge being the god of my grandmothers, the god of Dinka, of the Jews, the Zulus, of all human creatures till recently, a god who was as much subject to Change as I am, now was angry, now was pleased, nor did he consider that this made him a different god every day, for says he 'I am the same yesterday, today and for ever', even though yesterday he intended, and today repented; and he commanded me 'Look to yourself, as I am doing'".

Such was the controversy, a quarrel profounder "than ever plummet sounded"; but what the Old Men contended was what Man in the mass had anciently accepted, and still acted on: so that, if the Young Men happened to become the masters, that was likely to modify mankind into a new type, living a modern life, seeing the universe in a new light.

And at first the Young Men did pretty well — had more revenues than they knew what to do with; had ranks that were constantly undergoing growth, thousands of "rookies" (recruits) flocking voluntary to their flag; had a strategy which military men considered excellent — until it degenerated, grew wild, gave way to temptation, as when two prize-fighters lose temper, and go slogging all over the place.

There were experts, for instance, who said of the Battle of Peterborough that the Young Men should not have been anywhere near Peterborough.

And at one time, even though they had Sheffield, Leeds, Birmingham, a cry spread among them, “We lack ammunition! We lack tanks! We lack planes!” Only then they invented a Minister of Munitions.

No hint of such a thing ever arose in the Old Men regiments: Dinka had London; London is a sixth of England.

Over London, here and there, munition-factories had sprung up, in which the workers were paid what, to them, were the wages of earls — the overseer of one of these, by the way, being that mechanic in whose back-yard at Strand-on-the-Green Paddy St. Aubyn had gone to be a lodger; and he, wishing to be rid of her as a tenant — for she quickly ceased to pay anything — but shrinking from turning her mercilessly off, offered her a job in his munition-works away in the East-end, she to point bayonets with a file, at five pounds a week.

He himself got her the lodging in the Whitechapel Road to which she migrated, whence in the forenoons she went in an overall to the munitions in Cambridge Road to rub a bayonet or two; then in the dinner-hour visited her baby, whom a neighbour-woman looked to for her; and at sunset took the baby home.

But this ended within ten days: her mental kink had at this time turned her quite unworldly, flighty of mind: she fell short of filing bayonets nicely; if her time to arrive was nine, she walked in at ten, eleven; thrice she was warned that she would be turned away; then with soft words was turned away.

XIX. PILFERINGS

SHE HAD THEN to change to a wretched little lodging a little cheaper in Cleveland Street, a high-up den whose chair, table, bed were Neolithic in type; and even for this, ere long, she failed to pay. When nourishment began to fall short, the small boy clamoured to God in an astonishment of protest, she hushing his racket in passions of trouble, agitating him distractedly in her arms, tramping to and fro, with “Hush, then, hush, I say, I can’t stand it, hush!” — his rackets affecting her with a terror lest her-and-his secret should attract attention, and he be snatched from her by the proper authorities: for her saner bit suspected that he was not really her baby, but breathed not a syllable of this to her crazy bit, allowing to her crazy bit free rein to indulge the caprice of its humour and be amused in its cosy home of belief, as children do — craziness being a degeneration to a mood of children, no sort of morbid anatomy being in mad brains (so far traced), but just a self-indulgent lapse to a condition of fantasy, a conviction of fairyland unrealities, as in fanatics and “believers”. And still her indignance intensified, until in the end she tore her breast bare to put the baby to, and furiously he set to suck, but then, earning no nurture by his work, interrupted his sucking to scream to heaven a minute in a pricklyheat of exasperation, then suddenly to seek and fumble greedily, and go again, and suck, and leave off to scream irritably a minute, and go again, and suck, and get nothing; nor was it until after two days of it — since she herself lacked food — that his mouthing tempted some milk to melt and mount (milk coming from grandmothers sometimes, from maids, from males), but not nearly enough to keep that belly of his blown with content.

That same midnight in Mile End Road (where her Cleveland Street is) she begged for money — of a woman, who gave her four pennies: this being her first begging.

On the third evening after this, observing in Mile End Road a baker's shop with nobody within it, in she stepped soft in bright light, to nick a loaf. As she stepped soft out, a man said to her, "You've pinched that loaf: go put it back"; on which she stared scared at him, hesitated, suddenly took to her heels.

Of the loaf she made a pap, woke the baby, and spoonfed him, charming him to chumminess with muchness of starch: for the drag on her breasts of his grampus belly was greatly a strain on her frail frame.

It was not till the next evening after this that it entered her recollection that she had a key to the Hogan villa, within which were loaves, beans, cheese, meat... Far to tramp, yes; but she had a little one to keep living, and did it.

Setting out near ten in the evening, her perseverance got home again as breaking day rose upon her broken; but her success had been complete: she came cumbered with eatables.

And three times within a month she did this with the same success.

But it was thenceforth perilous: for now Mr. Hogan spoke to a policeman of eatables mysteriously disappearing, thrice in the silence of the night-time's dark, from his larder — never supposing that it was his own baby who bolted them.

But before her fourth tramp westward for food, what was named "The Rebellion" came to pass. There had been some Young Men reverses — at Wirkworth — at Newcastle-under-Lyme — and the throngs of Young Men adherents in the East-end — in Poplar, Bromley, Rotherhithe, that Dock-region — may have got impatient, lost temper. Tempers were then in a state of irritation, for, the whereabouts of Wallace being a mystery, he being no longer in what was called “The Northern Army”, Mr. Hogan, in Queen’s Hall, had expressed his “fear” that the curiosity of the human race in respect of the storm-test was after all doomed to disappointment, since Dr. Wallace appeared to mean to evade it — had concealed himself: from which suggestion, much bruited by the newspapers, arose a dispute of no little petulance: for how, the Young Men sympathizers replied, could it be stated that it was in order to evade the storm-test that Wallace was hiding himself, when he had other evident motives? Would not special efforts be made to capture him, if the enemy had his whereabouts? if he dared to come to London to talk in a public hall, would he not be captured? it was libellous to bawl abroad that his hiding was a hiding from the storm-test. So the controversy raged. And in the midst of it “The Rebellion”: two days of looting, glass crackling, four post-offices taken and garrisoned, two factories, overpowering and capture of The Tower, an actual little battle with 2nd East Kents (“The Buffs”) in Tower Hamlets cemetery, then three barricades — one of them across Cambridge Road, a little west of that Cleveland Street of Paddy; and Paddy, fascinated, lingered to witness the travail and grimness of it, and came again, and lingered, once giving a hand to bear away a wounded hoveller. That barricade, though, was carried in bright moonlight near midnight by some ist King’s Royal Rifles of the Ladysmith Brigade, and this definitely ended “The Rebellion” in a sauve qui peut of the barricade’s defenders.

At that moment Paddy was at her front-door to go again to watch the show, when she saw a young gentleman who had been the captain, so to say, of the barricade — his name was Darrel — running madly southward, and he had got close to her when a group of four King's Rifles darted round the north street-corner after him (where Cleveland meets Cambridge): seeing which, she sent out to him a secret shout, "In here!", and in he suddenly decided to dive.

Soon, behind the closed door, they stood darkly hearkening to the running past of the pursuers, who had not remarked into what doorway Darrel had darted.

She whispered to him "Is the barricade taken?"

But his being was given up to a travail of breathing, unable to speak, until he gained the victory of getting out between gasps "But if we had had — five more rifles — just five — we would have well — peppered the devils..."

She secretly asked "Would you like some cheese?" And he: "I? No, no cheese. I live only four doors down, at No. 14 — since the war: 'a spy' — send information to the Northern Army — so have to lie pretty low here in the East: have seen you in the streets, known you — from some photograph, I supposed — but this afternoon, on seeing you, I remembered: not from a photograph, from a painting — in the flat of my pal, Ivor Warwick; your name's Paddy... Why, what's that?" — starting on becoming aware of something that grazed his leg, then, flashing sharp a flash-lamp, saw that it was a cat, saw, too, ruminating there in the gloom four more cats squatted at home, populace of a "hall" grossly squalid; and says he "What are you doing in this den, girl like you?"

And she: "You say he's your pal: he took me from home, then sent his father to me—"

"That's all nonsense", Darrel interrupted: "I know the whole story: it was someone whom you mistook for Ivor".

"It was not Ivor?"

“No, nonsense, Ivor is not a fellow who would do anything unbecoming. He is hunting for you, will jump for joy when I ‘phone him—”

At which “‘phone” Paddy shrank; then sharply she asked “Are you in the plot, too?”

“Plot?” — from Darrel.

She leant toward him to throw at him in a tone of quarrel “Yes, the lot of you — the plot to take my baby from me!”

“No, then”, says Darrel, “I am not in the plot: I didn’t know that you have a baby. You don’t look — Who’s the baby’s father?”

“He is my baby: he has no father”.

“By Jove. Exclusive possession. Parthenogenesis. Virgin birth. Anyway, Ivor will soon pull you straight, I’ll ‘phone him your address—”

“My address! Would that be honourable? I rescue you from being arrested, then you betray me—”

He smiled. “Very well, I won’t betray you. But aren’t you fond of Ivor? He idolizes you, I know. You would like to see him?”

Now she sighed. “I would, yes — since you say that it was not he—”

“It wasn’t, believe me. So ‘phone him yourself — or write — he is still there in Bermondsey: arrange a rendezvous. Will you?”

“Yes, I will, I will”, she whispered.

And she did, that same midnight.

The next night she went to a post-office, and was handed the reply: Ivor’s delight at once more seeing her writing surpassed utterance, but she would see it rioting in his eyes on the third evening thence, at eight, before the post-office whence her letter to him was addressed.

So it was settled.

XX. EVESHAM

BUT BEFORE THAT “third evening” things occurred in the Third Corps of Young Men which, by causing Wallace to come to London, modified the result of the rendezvous.

In the forenoon of the day in which Paddy had that reply from Ivor, Wallace was in a column on the march from the Severn-ford at Claines toward Evesham, he being no longer a telegraphist in the sappers of the First Corps, but an artilleryman in the Third — a job of more danger, which he had thought well to change to; and he sat on a gun-limber of his gun-section, having no officer-rank, so that sometimes out of some sergeant walking with him a shout might start at some Tommy lounging, “Up. ‘Tendon! Salute!” He was now just one of ten — or eleven, counting a sergeant mounted — he and another seated on the limber, two on the carriage, three walking in front with three horsed — swaggering artillerymen, rigged out with sword, revolver, glittering spin’s which jingled, considering themselves a peg above the family of Man; and back of his gun the gun’s wagon, with its limber and ten, under a corporal horsed; and back of this wagon another gun and its wagon and twenty-two: all this gun-lot jogging silent along, not unconscious of the blue-eyed brightness and broad holiday-mood of that noontide; but others less silent, a noising of song emanating out of the two companies of 2nd Millikans ahead, separated from the guns only by two ammunition-carts, some mules, and an officer horsed; and Wallace wondered at the charm of that noonday march into Utopia which could so upbuoy them into song, cumbered as they were — two belt-pouches loaded with 200 cartridges, from spoon to cape to towel loading knapsack, and under knapsack mess-tin, and under mess-tin greatcoat rolled, with water-bottle, haversack, lint-and-bandages, and the Lee-Enfield's weight, the bayonet's, one third carrying pickaxes, two thirds shovels; and he muttered to himself "Gay beggars, sing away, I shan't sing, am a fish out of water, for she's my ocean, and I'm not going to stand it much longer — not to touch her — just to watch the sky-colour of her eyes, her stare of intelligence while she shews her teeth a little in a kind of smile — wonderfully like Felicia Warwick — just to watch her — Caroleth Lavarock! no bells on her fingers, nor bells on her toes, yet she has music wherever she goes, and there's a heartache in the beauty of that being — just to watch her, not to touch — though I kissed her in parting, aye, I got it in all right that time, and, by heaven, she let me, never said anything!" But though he did not sing, he could hardly help laughing to heaven, as his region of the column (over a league long) moved downhill through grove, where a polyglot of other throttles was throwing off glut of music, thrush, goldfinch, a cuckoo just above bruited her two-note summary of the mood of Summer hours in an emotion that uttered something not unlike "coo, coo", or say "oo, oo":

Oo, oo,

Old nine,

Yet new,

This noon.

Strange brew,

Dream scene,

Strange blue,

Rouge, green

Braw, broad!

All bliss!

Thank God God is; and yonder out of monastery-cloisters of wood the rotor of a wood-dove's throat, moved to music, and soon anew moved, rolling soft his rondo that wallowed in softness, but with precision of rhythm, strictness of swing, dulcet, but disciplined by the strictness of his Conductor's bâton, that strictly beat to him:

In troth, Ruth, drew you

My soul, Ruth, through you,

That close, close, knew you:

Done; and forward out of the throng of the two companies of Millikans a noising of "Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching", sung to the words of Caroleth Lavarock, which she sang in that hall at Clapton:

Weird, weird, hear the feet abeating,

Called, thralled, geist-beguiled they plod,

Whither wind whines, whisper guides,

Whither wisp of glimmer glides:

For the nations' migrant trails are trails of migrant God;

and backward, too, out of the mass of seven companies (of 1st Cockcrofts) that came after gun-wagon No. 2 rumours of music evaporating rose:

It's a long, long way to Tipperary; and presently afresh a strangeness as of herald voices noising in the void of heaven:

Time like an ever-rolling stream
Bears all its sons away,
They fly forgotten, as a dream
Dies at the opening day;

after those seven companies of Cockcrofts coming four ammunition-carts, and mules, and an officer mounted, and tool-chest, and medical cart; and, a quarter-mile behind these, the column's rear-guard — half-a-company; and, a mile behind this, the “train” — baggage and supply wagons; and lastly half-a-company. And, half-a-mile ahead of the two companies of Millikans, the advance-guard's main body — a company-and-a-half; and, a quarter-mile ahead of main body, half-a-company; and, ahead of that half-company, the advance-guard's van-guard — a cavalry-troop; and, two miles ahead of cavalry-troop, cavalry patrols pioneering: articulations of the worm awork.

But whitheraway the worm? Uncertain the day's weird of worms! hazard is their father, jeopardy their mother's name, welladay their set of sun. At dawn that morning General Ritchie, commanding the Third Corps, had dictated to Brigadier Mappin, Chief Staff-officer, in The Birch-and-Ash Tavern at Bridgnorth: “Corps Headquarters, 5 a.m. i. Enemy brigades — the 3rd (Irish) and the 4th (Fusiliers) — have reached Kenilworth and Leamington; their patrols are reported near Clent Hills and Stratford, their scouts been seen west of the Avon near Southrood; a battalion (2nd Royal Scots) is preparing to cross to the left of the Severn at Kempsey, having the objective to make contact with their Warwickshire detachments... 2. First and Second Divisions will advance toward Warwick... 3. Order for the cavalry: (a) the cavalry division, nineteen miles long, eight miles ahead, will form a screen to cover the advance...(b) will be clear of the road Stourbridge-Droitwich by 1615 hours... (c) the right of screen will advance along the road from Royd through Droitwich... left of screen along the road from Claines through Evesham...(d) general task: to reconnoitre country, discover positions and strengths, question prisoners and country-people...(e) special task: to injure bridges, railways, but only where necessary...(f) Major-General Sherrard will keep up communications between all parts of screen, telegraph movements to General Ritchie... P.O. every half-hour... copies by cyclists also... 4. Order for First and Second Divisions: (a) First Infantry-division will march by Hallow Heath to Stratford roads: the head of its advance-guard will pass the Gander Inn at 0325 hours, and be at the cross-roads by Hesham village at 1800... Second Infantry Division will march by the Stourport-Warwick road... (b) Division generals will keep in communication by signallers and cyclists... 5. Order for Corps troops: (a) Corps-cavalry: the Howitzer and Heavy Field Batteries will march behind the Second Division; E and F Batteries of the First Pompons Horse Artillery will join Major-General Sherrard near Sheaham this evening... (c) Corps-engineers: Engineers will march behind the Second Division; Officer Commanding First Telegraph Division will send a section to maintain communication between cavalry-screen and Cradleigh post-office; the Eighth Railway Company, in charge of the Bridgnorth-Worcester railway, will maintain supply of food, ammunition, stores, to the divisions...(d) Corps-infantry: Second Battalion of Niels Bohrs will provide escorts to the trains...(e) Corps-cyclists: one company will be attached to each infantry division... 6. Order of trains: (a) division-trains will follow one mile behind rear-guards in the order — ammunition-column, field-hospital, supply, baggage...(b) train of corps-troops will follow the Second Division... (c) Supply, Park, and Field Bakery will remain at Bridgnorth... (d) Ammunition Park will be at Garborough Green at 0530... 7. Position of General Officer Commanding: General Ritchie will leave the Corps Headquarters at 0430, and will march at the head of main body of the Second Division; Corps Headquarters will be ready to leave Bridgnorth for Cradleigh by special train at midday. By order: E. C. Mappin, Brigadier General Staff” — a document which, having been despatched to the Engineers’ Park (copies to be typed by the sapper-sergeant of the printing-wagon), was then sent out by Brigadier Mappin as Corps Orders” to major-generals commanding divisions, and to officers commanding cavalry, engineers, Service Corps, and Medical Corps of divisional troops, each major-general then writing “Divisional Orders”, to send copies to the officers commanding his brigades, and to the three commanding Army Service Corps, Bearer Company, Field Hospital, of his brigade.

All, then, was meticulously in order — except at one point: the intelligence-officer. Here, it seems clear, “someone had blundered”: for the next morning when the vedettes of that First Division contingent which contained Wallace’s gun-section looked south from Harvington Hill (there where the hill and a loop of the Avon enclose Evesham within a square), it was to see, not one “Royal Scots battalion”, but at least three battalions.

It had been in order to tempt that 2nd battalion of Scots to cross the Severn that the Young Men corps had been deliberately withdrawn northward from round Worcester toward Bridgnorth, the objective being to draw those Severn Scots into an attempt to join their Warwickshire detachments, to foil the attempt, and to draw those Warwickshire bodies to battle.

But that Severn force had affected a junction with another Severn force just prior to their night-time crossing at Kempsey; and before the sun was well up, before any Young Men reinforcements could come, battle was clamouring across the Avon.

The Young Men were little ready for it when that reveille shrilled and the soldier rushed to his rifle: some lengths of tape, pegged overnight to the ground by their sappers as guides for trench-digging, were still lying white about; some land-mines, dug to go off under an attacker's foot, were still not loaded; some wire-entanglements still lying idle in masses: the enemy having come by forced march — seventeen miles in nine hours. If the usual artillery barking preceded the attack, this was almost too short, too ill-matched, to be called a duel. At six-fifteen o'clock Wallace's eighteen-pounder field-gun and its sister-gun, having been unlimbered, had been run up to a ridge by hand to ambush behind a hedge, where he, with another gunman of his No. 1 gun, was steadily running to-and-fro to gun from wagon and again to wagon, to get another shrapnel-shell to hand to one of the two of his gun who were adjusting the shells' time-rings prior to passing them on to the loader, while another kept swinging open breech-block, another aimed, discharged, gun — the two guns' gullets going soblike in gong-sounds, their gruffness irregularly competitive in quavers, semiquavers, demisemiquaver bang-bangs, everyone in the two gun-crews as urgently engaged as when in conflagrations furniture is being rescued, and burdened legs trot ponderously brisk, and earnest is the word. But it became obvious that the shells, set at twenty second, were squandering bullets, exploding short four miles off: at the same time a storm of sixty-pounder T.N.T. shells with percussion-fuses — were dropping almost plumb nigh behind the section, hurling on high surges of earth and fire, dirtied with a turgid blackishness of vapour sailing away, their back-blast enveloping both the gun-section and the escort-section of infantry posted to protect the guns; so that already one of the three wagon-limber nags lay stiff, with a bagful of bowels pouting, and a gaze that moped sullen in death; seeing which, the subaltern commanding the gun-section dropped field-glasses to take range-taker, and to gallop off to another point of vantage, while the guns were run down to be limbered up, to gallop after him, and begin again to bay and bang: it was six-forty o'clock — an hour at which General Sir John Ritchie's Chief Staff Officer at Cradleigh was actively opening to read to him reports arriving every few minutes by D.R., by trooper, while the general was despatching order after order, every one by two messengers on two roads. At six-fifty Colonel Needham, senior colonel in command of the storm-tossed column, received written order to "hold out" for the coming up of reinforcements, the battle being now at its acme — Vickers' six-hundred-a-minute gabbling their garrulous acrimony, magazine-firing going grum, rifles growing hot in hand, close support guns crashing cruelly upon all packed troop-masses, trenches' edges changed to stretches of cherry-red; but three minutes later, the fate of the Young Men, already domineered by over-weight of metal, was sealed, when, in addition to three bombing planes booming over them, bad angels going about like roaring lions, seeking whom they might devour, half a squadron of troopers' hoofs in two troops broke out thundering upon their trouble with blazing sabres bared. Now was the instant, the decision — Charge! — captains' whistles shrilling, the gibbering bugle yodling, cheering of regiments rushing to butchery, kilts rocking rhythmic, pendulums of doom set rocking in time, as in the laboratory, across gross legs grossly male... Now, running away was little the way of the Young Men; but when, after section fire at three hundred yards, and when afresh at two hundred it was "Independent Fire!", and afresh at eighty "Rapid Fire!", in periodic shocks, and still it was throating at a wave which approached, and rode, and roared, and would not waver, the Young Men wavered — went under — fled. The result of the battle of Evesham was not a retreat but a rout.

Yet, even so, some of them, with imperial intrepidity, soon ceased from fleeing, two groups stopping at country-houses perfunctorily to fortify them, one group fortified a garden-wall to snipe through, one group got a stockade rising in wood to fortify with piles of soil, and wait to fire through; Wallace's two guns were not captured: many days afterwards they lay four miles from Harvington Hill at a farm named Symes House not far from the Stratford Road. Their gunners, when loading with shrapnel set at zero, were swept away in the wind of the scamper, and could still, as they galloped astare, see couples of company-cooks at the digging of field-kitchen trenches, within which to kindle blazes to boil the morning kettle, could see drivers fetching corn-rations from the supply-wagon to the nose-bag of horses still standing picketed to horse-lines. At ten o'clock twenty-two of them were seated on three steps which they had dug out at the back of bramble-hedge on the Stratford Road, and they were eating concentrated-beef and tablets of cocoa-paste (emergency-rations from tin cylinders carried in their haversacks), when a hiss burst out amid them, "Here they come!" — as, on a brow of mounting road a mile off, arose a troop of troopers trotting down in column of route, neck-and-neck four abreast, armed with lance in loop at right arm, rifle at left, sabre at saddle. The artillerymen rushed to peer, with ready rifle, through the hedge, only Wallace on the lowest step still munching cocoa-paste, though pale of face, and he muttered to himself "Honour pricks me on, yea, but how if honour prick me off again when I get on..." That would not be well, if he were taken prisoner.

At the same time his No. i gun-sergeant glanced round to say to him "Now, Sir, is your time to be running".

"No" — Wallace shook his head.

"Well, but, Sir, oughtn't you to?" the sergeant asked.

“I’ll make you an offer”, Wallace suddenly said: “I see no good in shooting a few of those few: so let’s all run; but I won’t run alone”.

Whereupon a laying together of heads, eager whisperings, and ere long, for his sake, Yes was resolved. “Very well, Sir,” the sergeant said, “run it is this day for the Young Men of England. Come, Boys, scatter all you can...”

And presently in every region of a field of eddish were fleeing feet — seen by the troopers, from whom a few bullets flew out, but without wounding.

Half-an-hour afterwards Wallace found himself wandering solitary in Nowhere along a by-road with pheasant coppice on both sides; but on coming suddenly in sight of a hamlet in a valley, he stopped, harked back, thinking “No, better not be seen in uniform... If I could get some kind of disguise... By heaven, I’d be off to London to see her a little, have a spree...”

Nor had he long said this when “Got it!” leapt from him, he now seeing a priest approaching, bearing the elements of the Holy Supper, which he had been administering to someone ill.

And “Nice morning, Holy Father”, says Wallace, with that twinkle that was in his leer.

“Aye, nice morning, My Son”, says the shaven priest, who shaved close, but could not shave away the shade of blue-black which smudged the bulge of a double chin, cheek, mouth.

And Wallace: “Seventh Heaven, this, Holy Father. There’s many a million planets, I fancy, that haven’t an atmosphere fawning with the soft fondness of this. That sky, once brown, frowning, grum Armageddon of elements struggling, see it now: what archangel’s fancy could ever have pictured such a vision? Oh, His lips distil the honeycomb, Father, honey and butter, Holy Father, are under His tongue”.

“Hm”, the holy father muttered.

And Wallace: “Well, now, here am I, a Young Man, at a loose end, wandering forlorn, my contingent defeated this morning near Evesham, and I wanting to be off to London for a few days’ fling. So, if you let me have your cassock, your biretta, and take my things, then I will be a priest, and you will be a Young Man”.

Some moments’ dumbness; then the holy father: “But I don’t want to be a Young Man!”

“Rather an honour, you know”, says Wallace: “and you notice the revolver here”.

Rather startled, the holy father glanced at him, with “What, you wouldn’t shoot me, would you?”

And Wallace: “I didn’t say I’d shoot you: I just drew your attention to the presence of a revolver in the company, so as to bias your behaviour”.

Upon which they both laughed.

Then Wallace: “And if I did shoot you? Isn’t that a fact that such as you ought to be cut short in the doing of the vast harm that you do, in the despoiling men of the much of joy that you despoil them of?”

“Oho!” says the priest: “is that how things are? And what is this vast harm that I do, My Son?”

And Wallace: “Feeble question, Holy Father: you should know, you know — O, you should! Don’t you let yourself utter at Benediction on Sunday nights that a girl was once got with child by a swan which was a god in disguise, and other suchlike stuff, keeping the people in such a stage of intelligence that they sit patiently bearing it, and don’t boo you out of their presence for so daring to presume on their toleration? Then you go home and switch-on your light, enjoying at home the intelligence which you earn your living by waging war on in church. Is that well done? If I was a governor, I should never be troubling about punishing murderers — not worth the notice of a grown-up Government; but a man who purposely hurts a world I'd first hang, then shoot, then burn, and scatter his ashes, till he taste the second death”.

“Oho!” — the bonhomme father chuckled— “is that the sort of bhoy we are? First hang, then shoot, then... Pooh, Man, keep your hair on. Don't imagine that priests are either fools or rascals. We know that we do some harm in smudging intelligence, those of us who aren't peasants; but we aren't rascals, for we hope that we do more good than harm, since there is something of more importance than intelligence — morality is”.

“Oh, well”, says Wallace, “if you won't let me call you rascals, you must let me call you fools, if you say that. Doesn't morality depend upon intelligence? ‘moral’ meaning respectful of the customs which intelligence at any time in any country decides to be desirable. The morality of New Japan is not the morality of Old Japan, is it? The morality of England now is not the morality of Congoland now, nor of Scotland now, nor of England fifty years ago: customs change with intelligence; and where intelligence is slumbrous, change of custom is slow or stationary, and there men are most customary, like the stationary savage, like the Chinese, stationary as ditch-water through five thousand years — respect of ancestors, ancestral morality. Morality is respect; intelligence, civilization, progress, is disrespect. Intelligence consists in seeing truth — in seeing the untruth of untruths, and being sceptical, in seeing the truth of truths, and being inventive: scepticism, inventiveness: those Two are Intelligence, Wisdom; and to invent is as much to disrespect as to be sceptical is to disrespect. You and I — we modern Europeans — can't even sympathize with the moralness of the lower races, the profoundness of their respect for custom: among the Agar Dinga a rainmaker, on getting old, steps down into a hole in the ground, admonishes the crowd round him to remain moral, then orders them to cover him over with soil; in the Tien-tain mountains in Tai-chow five monks he in a chest in an oven to die in fire on some feast-day each year; so some official will still commit hara-kiri over a Mikado's new tomb, rip his bowels open — no fun that; and Japan imagines that she is the missionary, Heaven-appointed, to teach the Christian countries morality — a most dangerous piece of nonsense to enter a nation's head. The morality of the lower races is fanatic, extravagant: in Southern India a woman will crack her skull on the door of an enemy, who must then do the same; some Chinese become substitutes for men sentenced to death, that money may be paid to relatives: there's respect of custom for you. To preach to men to be moral is nonsense: the sin of Man is that he is addicted to morality. The lives of savages is made bitter by it — taboo! taboo! — mustn't do this, mustn't do that, as in Deuteronomy, Leviticus, nobody ever dreaming of doubting, of rebelling: and just so deep asleep as their scepticism is their inventiveness, just so inveterate as their unintelligence is their stationariness. So what makes you a higher life than the far more moral savage is that you, more intelligent, will find yourself speaking of the eight hundred billion waves a second of violet light, while he can only count to six; and what makes him a higher life than a sparrow is that he can count to six, and the sparrow, more moral still than he, can only count to two. And since civilization is intelligence, is scepticism and inventiveness, is disrespect, and you teach respect — not even respect of sceptics and inventors, but of ancestors empty of scepticism and inventiveness — you are, then, a wagger of war against civilization, and should be shot like a mad dog by civilized Man”.

“Mad dog” — the holy father's lids peered narrow, considering it—“oho! don't think I don't see your point. But you are too cocksure for me,

My Son: for I, too, look, am trained in disrespect: as you disrespect ancestors, so I disrespect intelligence, which, I know, is very prone to error. If I preach that a girl was got with child by a swan which was a god — though there's no swan in Christianity, it is the Greek legend that has swan, the Christian is African (Egyptian) — but suchlike things are only silly on one condition: that they never happened; and I disrespect my intelligence which tells me that they never happened, for they may have, once. You don't know. If you say that you know, I ask 'How do you?'"

Wallace answered "Yes, but when the intelligent are wrong, it isn't their intelligence that's wrong, it's their unintelligence: Intelligence is seeing truth, is Right, and to disrespect it, to oppose its growth, is to oppose Right. As to the girl-and-god, the brain evolves by process of the suns to a point in scepticism where men say with knowledge 'This is untrue', without bothering to ask themselves how they know, as a day comes when a child automatically finds itself knowing that Alice in Wonderland is fantasy, as a shopman murmurs 'charlatan' at St. Paul's assertion that he was 'caught up to the third heaven', for, though the shopman knows no astronomy, he was born certain that there is no third heaven, and is evolved to the point where such fancies as that the cosmos consists of spheres of glass have become comic. Then again, as to girl-and-god, trained investigators have lately got an exact knowledge of the psychology of savages, and know that savage speculations are not only untrue, but have a quality of dog's-luck that makes them the opposite of true. Suppose Aristotle asserts that the earth sits still, then you are safe in betting that it flits with a billion wings; or, if I say to you that a person cannot exist longer than one tick of the clock, then, though I make the statement without offering any proof, you still have good reason to believe it, because Plato and all savages have always been convinced of the opposite, that a person exists eternally. I know, then, that the god never got the girl with child, if only because savages say that he did. But the main point, Holy Father, is that I want to go to London for a lark: surely you will indulge a fellow-sinner to that extent? and within two days I send you £100 to get new togs”.

Which set the holy father chuckling, and saying “Well, you aren’t a bad sort, you think I ought to be shot, but you don’t shoot me, don’t live up to your principles, thank God. Do you know who I think you are? — Wallace himself. Can you deny it?”

Upon which Wallace’s eyelids went shy, and the holy father added “You see, that’s who you are, no other than Wallace, I vow. And if I give you away?”

“You wouldn’t do that”, Wallace muttered.

“No, I wouldn’t do that. Come on! change clothes”.

And Wallace: “Now, how kind and good! Thank you! That’s your training: still too rude a villager to accommodate the concept ‘world’, a murderer of the world, but jolly good to Bob, your neighbour — good to me, and I thank you”.

Meantime, the change was being effected: the holy father got even the revolver...

XXI. IN PRISON

AND THE NEXT evening Wallace, a priest, drove straight from Paddington to Berkeley Square, proposing to strike Caroleth Lavarock dumb with surprise, a chronic smile of prospect fixed on his lips, as a too slow taxicab took him: but vain hopes! the lady was away from home.

He next drove to the rendezvous which, the day before, he had written to make with three men, including Ivor Warwick, “his” son, this rendezvous being at the Langham Hotel, for he had not dared to make it at his own home; but when, in going to Berkeley Square, he had passed through Harley Street, and had stood still a little to gaze at his home, everything there had looked so humdrum, usual, safe, that he decided to risk bringing his friends there for the night’s revel.

When he entered their presence at the hotel, everyone exploded into ridicule at his holy dress. “Good old Father Wallace, unholy father of many”, one of the girls observed, walking with him the little distance round to Harley Street — all a boisterous throng of laughers, except Ivor Warwick, who that night had a fixity of lip, and again and again had to goad himself to look gay with the others — with whom, in truth, he was never in unison, but in his association with Wallace was always playing a part, feigning to revel, with the motive to come to some sort of proof that it was Wallace who, as he darkly boded, had drawn Paddy St. Aubyn from her father’s home. In fact, while he laughed with the laughers, he inwardly looked down upon Wallace’s orgies as uncouth, and hissed at the nuisance of having to join in them — that night especially, for — high, unexpected thing! — he had lately had a letter from Paddy inviting him to meet her before a Whitechapel post-office, the letter which she had decided to write when pressed by Frank Darrel, Ivor's friend, fighter at that Cambridge Road barricade in "The Rebellion".

All preoccupied with which high event, Ivor nevertheless contrived to incite himself to be jolly, and at eleven o'clock had the head of one of the girls on his shoulder, while with a certain dignity of neck, standoffishly tolerant of her existence, his fingers consented to toy with her curls; in the same moments Wallace himself had another lady on his holy-father knee, on which he was cantering her with a gee-up clucking of the tongue; and since the blinds (of that dining-room) had not been lowered, Caroleth Lavarock, who stood peering from the street on tiptoe, could distinctly see.

Having much to discuss with Wallace as to the war-politics, she had come to see if by chance he was at his house, having been told on going home from a dinnerparty that he was in London — had been to visit her; and at this spectacle of "her" son and his father junketing there together, the unholy father in holy garb leading the son astray, a rage of jealousy, of ill-feeling, heated her spleen.

Suddenly she ran to bang at the house-door.

"Be good enough to inform Mr. Ivor Warwick that a lady desires to talk with him" — to Bargrave the butler— "kindly say it privately".

When Ivor tripped out to her, she said "Come"; and he went southward with her, his bare head bowed, being accustomed to hold her in reverence above women, if only because her tone, the quality of her smile, eyes, voice, her height, so reminded him of a mother, so loved, so lost.

"We two are friends by nature, Ivor", she said, "yet you grieve me. Haven't I spoken to you of it before? It is astonishing, Ivor, that you should choose Dr. Wallace as a chum, a model to copy, and let yourself come among the sort of company that form his comus. Understand that Dr. Wallace has a philosophy by which he does what he does without loss of quality; his consciousness of superiority to the past, which he disdains as a past of half-apes, is part of his everyday mentation: if someone told him that, since so-and-so is contrary to the moral law of some country or epoch, therefore he ought not to do it, that would make him laugh, he'd say 'but the intelligence of the inventors of suchlike customs was ancient, they never dreamt of radium nor of radio'. But you! you are an English gentleman, an islander, a variation from type, the embodiment of a local concept, trained from boyhood to cut a nose at every side-slip from the tightrope of a style: you lose your soul, if you do as he does. And in vain I have tried to separate you from him; but tonight I will separate you: going to tell you something — you are not to tell anyone: it was Dr. Wallace who ran away with Paddy St. Aubyn. Now you have it”.

“Ha, ha” — a dangerous half-a-laugh, hardly audible.

“Now you have it”.

“You know?”

“Yes”.

“How?”

“I need not go into that: I do know. Don't let me see you with him again”.

“Ha, ha, you won't” — stepping high-strung, his fingers opening and closing convulsively into fists, as to grip some stick to strike.

“Poor boy, robbed of lover and of mother” — her palm on his arm: “I will be your mother, see? Shall I?”

“Dear Caroleth!... Ha, ha, it was he!”

“Yes, but don't have any quarrel: there are reasons why it would be improper for you to be in conflict with him; don't see him at all again; go home now. Good-bye, My Dear. Come soon to see me” — as he now kissed her hand at her door; and the door had no sooner closed after her than he was ardently back for Harley Street.

There he did not again go into the riotous diningroom, but, taking his stick in the hall, went up to the drawing-room, where, striding in a high-strung way, he waited with no little strain and patience until the noisy departure after midnight of all but one of the roysterers; and now he called down over the stair-banisters “I am here, Wallace!”

Darting up, Wallace started to say “Why in the world did you — ?”, but stopped when Ivor, having him now in the drawing-room, stepped in silence, locked the door, Wallace standing ghast with astonishment, watching him go and come again to press his fists on a table, the stick within one of them, while he bent forward to talk to Wallace.

“Why, what is it?” says Wallace, pale.

Ivor had a judge’s visage, rigid, but blanched, too; and he asked a needless question: “That is so, is it? that it was you who led away Miss Patricia St. Aubyn?”

“Led away... Well, what of it? What of it? Spit it out!” says Wallace.

“Pretending to be I, without doubt. It is my business, then; I am called upon... That poor child is now somewhere in Whitechapel, living apparently in penury; a stone might melt in pity... Do you suppose, Sir, that she will any longer go unavenged, if I have any manhood? I have given no undertaking, you know, to keep secret the fact that you are in London: that is about to be made known; tomorrow night you will spend, not in revelling, but in a prison, I think. And certainly, in addition, you deserve the stick. I would be inert, if I did not inflict it”.

Fright at which penetrated the stratum of wine that invested Wallace — not so much fright at the stick, though that was thick, as at the making known of his presence in London, for the repercussions of his imprisonment upon the Young Men's interests could scarcely fail to be momentous.

But, then, the taker of vengeance here was tackling the task of his vengeance in the temper of Hamlet, which, urged toward vengeance, brandishes words, shirking the brashness of departure from the ordinary — his subconscious being no doubt dominated by the mass of the personality of Wallace. His “about to be made known” should have been “has been”, since he had had time to make it known; nor was there any need to threaten the stick: an efficient stick strikes in a silence of lightning; and, in locking the door, he inefficiently left the key in the lock, preoccupied with principles, not with things: so that Wallace, who was nearer the door, and had acquired some adroitness of self-protection from the plights of war, after staring at “his” son as at some cobra that rears to sting, and after saying “Oh, you!” at the dangerous object sprung up to confront him, suddenly skedaddled, wrenched the key, snatched it free, dashed through, and had the door afresh locked ere the other could reach it: so it was the threatener of prison who was a prisoner.

But for how long? That drawing-room was not built to be a prison for living beings with viscera: the prisoner must soon be freed, nor, meantime, was it difficult for a nimble fellow to slip down to a window-ledge just below, and be off to accomplish his evil will. If Wallace resolved to flee immediately from London, that would be without seeing Caroleth Lavarock: so, after pondering bitterly on his fix a little, he said to himself, “Take the spunk out of him, give the beggar something else to think about”; and he said in his bedroom to his Bargrave “Bring some cake”.

When this came he deposited upon the salver a glass of water that he had prepared, then, going soft with the butler to the drawing-room door, he peeped in, until the prisoner, who was walking hither and thither, paused at a window; whereupon, unlocking the door without sound, Wallace whispered “Now” to the butler, sending him to step soft in, softly to deposit the salver upon a table behind Ivor’s back, and step soft out; then softly anew to lock the door.

At about two o’clock Ivor Warwick dropped tired upon a sofa, slept, woke in an hour, and now took up a stool to bombard the door; but then laughed, put it down, said “patience, patience”, paced about. Void and long those night-hours, and it was as much to do something as because he wanted water that at last, at four, he swallowed half of the water that he saw on the salver.

Soon subsequently to this he was seated, leaning double on the edge of a couch, his head bowed down, down, suffering a strange undoing; and he kept asking himself “But what is it? Why am I like this?”

He presently let his empty self drop upon the couch, to sleep afresh, to dream now of eerie wreckage, bereavement irretrievable, vast disasters: for some dark star had come in among our sun’s family, and nothing was any more stable in Nature, the planets bolting, now toward the star, now toward the sun, now toward one another in intricate indecision, distracted, while the family of Man ran to-and-fro with frantic arms outflung, calling upon the rocks of God to cover them from regarding.

When at six o’clock he saw himself in a mirror, he remained agaze, going “Ur... Who am I?”; and when an hour afterwards Bargrave opened the door to give him liberty, the butler was profoundly puzzled, for, as with those prisoners of the Bastille, a young man had been imprisoned, but an old man was released.

That day Ivor did not go to his business — remained brooding at home, no lust in him, little interest, even his grief dull, even his amaze, nothing any longer great in him, save his tolerance, his forgivingness, his listlessness, his nonentity. Sometimes his foot moved about his flat, dully, without motive, but mostly he sat in the lassitude of his copos with hanging arms, hardly ate anything, no appetite. In the evening when his clock struck three-quarters, though he could not see it, the flat being in darkness, it entered his head that that was a quarter to eight, that at eight he had to meet Paddy St. Aubyn, and would be late: so now he heaved himself to his feet.

She, for her share, was at the rendezvous before eight — keen to see him for different reasons, for himself, for explanations, and then for what was involved now in all her thoughts and motives — money: not money for her own stomach's good, but to gain her baby's favour, to maintain that belly of his globose and boon. That day had been a day of straits for food, and she came to the rendezvous radiant, full of hope that it would result for her in money, which she meant to shew a reluctance to accept, then, when pressed, to accept. But now the Cambridge Road post-office clock pointed to ten past, and she said with offence "How dreadful of him to be late!"

It was not until fifteen minutes later that he came walking northward, having arrived by train at Whitechapel Station; and, seeing her some distance away, he smiled, lifted his stick at her, quickened pace a little, she standing with a craned neck, peering keenly toward him, until the instant when a street-lamp's rays hit his face full; and now she whispered with conviction "Yes, his father again!", and took to her heels.

He called "Paddy!" once, ran some steps after, then stopped, as her fleeing feet disappeared at the corner where her own Cleveland Street joins Cambridge Road.

She ran a little past her lodging to her friend, Darrel's lodging, not only in the hope that he might think of offering her a shilling or two, but that she might pour out to him her resentment at the rendezvous' result: for anything queer, anything infected with unexpectedness, instantly pricked into activity within her that suspicion which she cherished that people in general were in a conspiracy to filch her little one from her. But Darrel happened to be not then at home; and some two hours earlier than usual she started off on one of her nocturnal tramps to procure a store of food out of Mr. Hogan's home.

Unfortunately, since her last expedition Hogan had talked of the larcenies to the police; and if the bucket goes too often to the well, one day the rope breaks.

The policeman on the beat thereabouts was on the look out for her...!

So, near midnight, when those by-streets brooded quiet under a moon that, blooming full, looked on unmoved from the heights, he spied her coming out of the Hogan gate loaded with things to eat; and, as on tiptoe he tripped like a griffon to grip her, he said to himself "Got you, My Lady".

But he had not got her: some instinct visited her to glance aside; and, as she caught sight of him, she, calling upon God, was gone.

Nor, loaded though she was, clinging still to her load, could he catch those passionate toes of her dash; and since she had sixpence left, he, on pitching out into Chiswick High Road, was barely in time to see her skip into a 'bus, to leave him pining behind.

But he was able to note the number of the 'bus, and muttered at her "You aren't so safe as you think yourself".

He instantly stepped into a telephone-box to give The Yard a description of her dress, hand-bag, 'bus-number; upon which The Yard wirelessly it to a flying-squad car: so that before the 'bus arrived at her Cleveland Street corner it was being followed by a car within which three sat and chatted, the cat permitting the mouse to limp free off, for fun, the sweeter to pounce upon its woe.

When, feeling safe now, she went walking northward in Cleveland Street for her home, one of those three was following; but again, warned of God, she felt him in her, glanced backward, and, as “O, Lord God!” parted from her heart, darted, he after.

On coming to Darrel’s lodging, closer than her own lodging, in, in her panic, she bolted, she darted, and up — two sets of stair — to dash his door open; but he, who was over some writing, had hardly time to start upright and become aware of the wildness of affright of that wild face, when another presence was breathlessly with them, the detective, who said “Got you neat”.

“This is my domicile... What is it?” — from Darrel.

The detective exhibited his Yardman warrant-card, saying “Entering and theft: come on, You”.

“Oh, but be reasonable, Officer”, Darrel pleaded: “this is a young lady, daughter of a captain of hussars, well known in Old Men circles—”

“Well, you know what orders are, Sir,” the officer said. “Come with me, You”.

From milk-white lips of one standing stiff-stark in the farthest corner came a whisper, “My baby”.

“Has she a baby?” the Yardman asked Darrel.

“Yes: No. 21, third floor. Please, please, Officer —— —”

“Pooh, the baby will be well looked after, Man. Come on, come on”.

As he now made a step toward her, out of the depths of her entrails a scream pealed, “My baby!”

In a moment more she fainted, fell upon her face; whereupon the inexorable detective shrilled a whistle out of the window, and, when his car came, carried her down in his arms.

XXII. BANG!

AT ONCE NOW Frank Darrel rang up Ivor Warwick to tell of the pity of it, rousing Ivor from sleep; and at once Ivor rang up Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, to tell.

Two days before this he had rung up the baronet as soon as he had had Paddy's letter making that rendezvous at the post-office, but, as the baronet had been "at the front" somewhere, Ivor, having discovered exactly where, had written the tidings of the finding of Paddy: so now had reason to believe that Paddy's father might be in London; and, in fact, at that hour, about two in the morning, Sir Borlase had been half an hour in his flat in The Albany, and was undressing for bed.

When he heard that his girl was then in a cell for theft he was so long voiceless, that Ivor enquired if he was there...

"I'm here", he replied.

"And I can tell you now definitely", Ivor added, "that it was Dr. Wallace who enticed her off".

"Ah, it was: Wallace. How do you know?"

"A lady told me, then I confronted him, and he admitted—"

"Confronted where?"

"He is in London, in the disguise of a priest — at his place in Harley Street; or was last night".

"I see. Thanks! Goodbye".

Sir Borlase left off undressing — to dress. He went out. To rap at a door, to rouse Harley Street with the row of his rapping, until a drowsing butler appeared, to hear “I want Wallace”.

“Not here, Sir”, Bargrave answered: “not been here all yesterday”.

“No? I’ll see: switch-on all lights” — and in that voice that ordered was what could not be disobeyed.

Sir Borlase now hunted through the house, not hiding his revolver, down to the basement, up to the domestics’ bedrooms, prying under bedsteads, behind doors.

But the butler had told the truth: for, in consequence of Ivor Warwick’s threat to make known his presence in London, Wallace had not dared to stay there, had decamped to the Langham Hotel before breakfast, stubbornly reluctant to flee from London until he had seen Caroleth Lavarock.

So at ten in the forenoon, after studying the news of two far-flung battles, one on the North-East front, one in the West, in one the Young Men routed, in the other the Old Men, in both the conquerors almost as destroyed as the conquered, he had been at Caroleth’s door; but she, resentful of his ladies and revels, freshly witnessed by her the previous evening, had been not-at-home to him, had said vindictively to herself, “He shall find me difficult: thrice he shall come and not see me”.

So he had had to go again in the afternoon— “not at home”; and again in the evening, when she was really not at home, having gone to a carnival-dance (of the Trade Union Club) at the Royal Opera-house; and to his question, “When expected home?” her footman answered “in the small hours of the morning”.

In those small hours Wallace was there before her door, waiting to intercept her home-coming.

And that way also Sir Borlase St. Aubyn went: for after his hunt, before departing from the Harley Street house, he had scribbled a note: “Lady of my heart, I am hoping to do myself the honour of calling upon you at ten a.m. tomorrow, this being written in London. I think you will be interested to know that my daughter has been discovered. She sleeps (?) tonight in a police-cell, accused of stealing food. Her betrayer was Wallace”: and, on his way home, he bent his steps into Berkeley Square to drop this into Caroleth’s letter-box.

So almost immediately on entering the square from Bond Street he saw a priest, saw that face of Wallace loitering, and uttered, “God, what luck!”

Nor did he, like Ivor Warwick, bark before he bit: he barked and bit within the same twinkling of an eye: bang! the bullet tore Wallace’s arm.

In one instant Wallace saw, recognized, understood; and, cherishing ever a tender care for his skin’s entirety, took to his heels for Charles Street, to his right as he ran south; but had hardly got to the corner when bang! again the baronet barked, bit — this time in the right thigh.

Wallace, though, could still run: and along Charles Street the race was, each running as he had never run, Wallace rather impeded by the quarrelling of his priest’s frock, nor was he ever more than forty yards ahead; but he had wondrous luck — a taxi pacing empty, as if waiting there for him; and, panting at the taximan “Quick! man wanting to kill—”, he was in and away.

That braw voice of the baronet, not far, bawled after him “I’ll have you, Wallace!”

Now Wallace saw that London was all too hot for him, and was immediately in flight out of it, without having contrived to see Caroleth Lavarock.

It was not till the next noon, at Harrow, where he slept, that he saw a doctor, to have his wounds rendered aseptic; but that was rather late; and, as he made his way back to his battery, it was with a shivering of feverishness in his system.

XXIII. HARBOUR

WHILE HE STILL slept that morning at Harrow, Sir Borlase St. Aubyn was in Berkeley Square telling Caroleth of the failure of his effort in the early morning hours to get his girl out of her cell. “It appears”, he said, “that ‘misdemeanants’ can be bailed out, but she, if you please, is a ‘felon’ — stole some food apparently — to satisfy—”

Here the father’s utterance rather broke, while Caroleth’s eyes filled with tears. She muttered “That’s nonsense about ‘felon’, we must have her free at once. From whom, then, did she steal the food?”

“Curious thing”, Sir Borlase answered— “from Hogan, they tell me! She in Whitechapel, Hogan miles away in Chiswick: I can’t understand it!”

But Caroleth sprang to discovery. “I can: has a key to Hogan’s villa, that’s why... Or don’t you know that she was a nurse-maid to Hogan?”

“Nurse-maid... ha, ha... No, how was I to know? Hogan never told me. He knew that I had lost a daughter, but I suppose it did not enter his head that she might be that daughter”.

Which mumness of Hogan rousing in Caroleth an indignation against him, she said “Yes, Hogan had some reason to keep her hidden from you — knew that she is your daughter, for he telephoned her name to some agents of Dr. Wallace — I had set Wallace to help in the hunt for her — and told the agents that she was in his house, to tempt Wallace to go there and be kidnapped”. Profoundly frowning at it, the baronet sat dumb-struck, till he exclaimed “That man! Knew! ‘Some reason to keep her hidden’... I think Mr. Hogan is going to have me against him, as Wallace has—”

Now Caroleth leant forward to lay her hand on his, with “I want you to get rid of the idea that it was Dr. Wallace with whom she ran off—”

“Idea?” — from the baronet: “the man has now admitted it to someone: there’s no doubt; and I think I’ve already got a bullet or two into him, but he got off. I’ll have him yet”.

“Ah!” — her underlook dwelling on that intractable directness— “what a mess through one man’s wildness... Oh, well, let us see about getting the girl free”.

“And the baby”, the baronet added.

“Baby? Baby?”

“Has a baby — so they said at the station — ill-fated little beggar — not a bad little beggar — ill-fated — born under a star of disaster, poor beggar... Baby in the workhouse infirmary. See me here, grandfather of a pauper — comic opera”.

“But not her baby!” Caroleth suddenly cried: “no, no, I am certain that that girl is as virgin as early snowdrops... You know, don’t you, that Hogan lost a baby? a newspaper topic. And this is it! For some reason she ran away from Hogan, taking his baby for some reason, then considered that she had a right to steal his eatables to feed his child. That’s it! Now we’ll go and get her free: I’ll ‘phone to Hogan...”

But Mr. Hogan was not at home — had, in fact, gone to be the prosecutor of the thief, and was seated among solicitors within the court, still without any suspicion that the thief was the Paddy of his reins’ desire, when Caroleth and the baronet arrived at the police-citadel: upon which, sent for, he came astonished to the outer charge-room, shook hands with Caroleth, but the hand which he presented to the baronet was not shaken: only his assurance was shaken by that frown of the baronet’s rancour.

Then when the matter had been explained to him by Caroleth, and now the case came on, he went back with Caroleth into the court, to see Paddy, all astare, now in the “dock”, the baronet remaining in the outer room restlessly pacing in pain. But now it was soon over: for since Mr. Hogan would not now “prosecute”, but on the contrary asked the magistrate’s pardon for the larcenies, the magistrate only “bound the accused over”; and staring she came out liberated to the charge-room, her hair dishevelled, her dress rumpled, her hand in Caroleth’s.

When she saw her father, she stared at him, muttering “Papa”; and, suddenly dropping upon her knees with quivering fists, she entreated “Oh, Papa, you won’t let them take my baby from me!”

On which Caroleth took and pressed the father’s hand, whose face-muscles now convulsed toward eruption of emotion, while to Paddy Caroleth said “You shall have your baby, if you will come and live with me: will you?”

“Yes, I will”, Paddy answered wiping her eyes, “if you get me my baby: he isn’t going to let anybody but me feed him”.

Now Caroleth whispered at Mr. Hogan’s ear “I can have the baby, can’t I?”

“Well, you know” — from Hogan— “Mrs. Hogan’s consent has to be gotten there; but I think I can fix it so you have him for a time”.

“And my bag”, Paddy now said, “where is it? There is food in it”.

Whereupon the baronet, throwing his hand at her, walked out of the room, able to bear it no more: so that Caroleth drove away alone with Paddy, first to the work-house, then, with the baby, to Berkeley Square.

There she at once ‘phoned to Ivor Warwick: “Your dear little bride is now with me, come quick, marry her quick. She did marry Wallace, but, then, he is a lawless bigamist, was already married, and the darling remains as immaculate as Mary of Nazareth — a bit off her nut, maybe — paranoiac — and no wonder, but I'll soon have her straight" — little thinking that Ivor in his present mind was another Ivor, less keen on being married than previously, and reluctant, moreover, to exhibit to her his old-man's wrinkles of that part of a peach which is nearest the stone.

As she said "have her straight", out broke Waldteufel's waltz, "The Skaters", on the wireless, and into the dining-room with wild jollity at the musicians's shrieks of joy she dashed, shrieking out "Come, Paddy, girl!", to snatch Paddy off from the boy into a mad waltzing of bacchants, quickly to have Paddy pink and happy.

Then, this over, she skipped back to the 'phone, to talk now with Harley Street, on the chance that Wallace might still be there, that she might inform him of Paddy's haps, and warn him of Sir Borlase's will to kill; but, then, Wallace was now well out of London.

XXIV. THE STORM-TEST DATE

HE WAS FEVERISH when that evening he reached his D.A.C. (Divisional Ammunition Column), and, though he resisted being treated as on sick-list, was ordered by his lieutenant-colonel, who had come to visit him, to a field-hospital bed for the night, whence the next day he was carted to the Advanced Dépôt Stationary Hospital at Stratford, and thence to the General Hospital at Worcester.

Something of which movements could not but become publicly known, to be then much “stretched”: the newspapers had it that he had been wounded “in battle”, was at death’s door; and at last his whereabouts were discovered.

And this was the moment which Mr. Hogan chose to propose a date for the storm-test that he had postponed: Wallace had from him a letter correctly directed to “053, Art., 1432... O. Wallace, G.H., Worcester”, the date now proposed being the twelfth of September, only seven days thence. “It was impossible”, Hogan wrote, “to propose a date before, not only because your own army appeared to be unaware of your whereabouts within it, but because of difficulties with the Corporation of the Royal Albert Hall, and because of the tangle of my engagements in general; nor, if the date which I now suggest fails to suit you, do I see my way to propose any other: the public must then reconcile itself to the annulment of the test...”

This letter Wallace handed to Crichton of Iraq, who was seated in regimentals of a squadron-major at his bedside, Crichton having come west from the debacle of the North-Eastern Army to the only corps of Young Men that could any longer be considered to exist as a corps; and he said to Wallace “You’ll take no notice of this stuff, of course: that storm-test fakement was never any chop any road, and now’s your chance to skip free of the whole jimbang”.

But Wallace answered “If I take no notice, I simply play into Hogan’s hands: he thinks that I am too ill to bother, will toss it all off me, then he’ll howl abroad that I have backed out — bad for us, that; or he reckons that I may die, then he can cry out that he on his side did all that was possible to bring the thing about, but I decided to die. No, I will accept his date”.

“Oh, well” — Crichton sighed. “There’ll be one more big-sized battle, and if that test-racket comes off before it to make the wise Wallace look soft, the effect of it upon that battle will sure be bad. Do, Wallace, listen, listen—”

And Wallace: “But suppose the test makes me look the opposite of soft? That would abolish priests and lords and rats and flies in Japan and Java, which is what the Young Men are shedding their blood for. I know it sounds tommy-rot, but try to believe me, Crichton: I do know scientists who can cause storms — I do — for I’ve seen ’em do it — or no, not storms, but clouds, mist, and I don’t doubt that they can cause storms — enormous powers over sub-atomic forces. Also, I can talk to them at a distance, if they are not too far—”

“Well, well” — Crichton smiled— “I’m not saying it’s not so, since you say it is: but is it practical politics, Sonny? I am thinking of the morale of our men: battle impending — within ten days, Ritchie reckons — corps-cavalry starts marching at dawn to-morrow — not far from London, it will be — Wallingford-Reading line, as I pan it out — battle taller in momentousness than any yet fought on this side Jordan — not big in numbers, of course, for the two armies that began the campaigning are now cramming the prisons and concentration-camps of Britain, only eighty thousand of our crowd left, and not more than seventy of the enemy, which seventy will include twenty recalled from the Indian sixty, aye, with some Brabant's Horse among 'em, Cape Mounted Rifles, Yeomanry, while our eighty will include Foreign Legion adventurers, with six thousand rookies having precious little training: so our morale should be sky-high, for though we outman them, and outgun them, the enemy have the planes, they have the tanks, they have the war-habit".

"I know, yes", Wallace said: "but, then, don't worry, there will be no storm-test in reality. I have hardly any more hope, au fond, in my scientists than you have; nor would I be allowed to go spouting in London, Dinka would quickly have me under lock-and-key. So I'll accept Hogan's date, then send four or five of our finest scouts to kidnap him on the quiet; it will then look as if it was he who has backed out... How would that do?"

"Not so easy, kidnapping Hogan", Crichton of Iraq remarked, but when he more or less acquiesced to this, Wallace, now well of his wounds, wrote accepting Hogan's date: whereupon the gale of the world's concern in the event burst out again with its previous turbidness, and the condition of Man was as when a breeze is breathing in amid the leaves of the aspen-tree, the American press afresh exhibiting a species of hysteria, the preachers shrieking, the speech-makers, the singers of theme-songs in music-halls, nor less in France, in Japan, celebrities airing their opinions, predictions, in interviews, the Atlantic liners as thick with visitors arriving as the cross-Channel ships, and the price of tickets to witness the event rising still from peak to peak.

This, though, did not please Caroleth Lavarock: for the Young Men's sake she was intolerantly hostile to what she called "the rawness" of that storm-test, and for Wallace's sake also: for, on ringing up Ivor Warwick to enquire why it was he did not fly to see his Paddy, he answered “I will come... There are reasons that keep me back, moreover I am not at the moment keen to ally myself with Sir Borlase St. Aubyn, who means to be violent at the storm-test: when Wallace stands up on that platform as a target to him, he gives fire, lays Wallace low”; and, as Sir Borlase had himself dropped hints of this purpose to Caroleth, the thing was all on her nerves.

Four vain attempts she made to ‘phone to Wallace, who was now on the move south-eastward with his corps, until at last, at Woodstock, she succeeded in saying to him “If you still want me so hotly, come, have me”.

“Being of Heaven”, Wallace breathed: “but really? I ask out of the dust: will you marry this dog of yours?”

“Yes, Bigamist, I am so weak”.

“By God!”

“On one condition”.

“Condition?”

“That you back out of the storm-test crudity”.

“Oho!” Some moments’ dumbness now. Then, “Right! I back out” — which was deceitfully said, for he had no intention to back out; but since he already had in London six smart carles on the spring to kidnap Hogan, he felt that he could safely say “I back out”.

Unfortunately, the thought had entered other heads — in Whitehall, for example — that Wallace might find it good to kidnap Hogan, so that Wallace’s six found more than six loitering always round about the Hogan house, and wherever Hogan went eyes were there, wide awake, to take care of him; the kidnapers and the anti-kidnapers saw one another, fathomed one another, laughed with one another; as Darrel, the spy of Whitechapel, wrote of it to Wallace: “Interest in the test is become such a craze, that it is no easy matter to defeat it now by such means as kidnapping: I see advertised a Wallace collar, a Hogan loaf; in Jugoslavia miniature flags fixed on jacket-lapels are being exhibited in millions in support of Wallace or of Hogan, and similar symbols are common about Stockholm, Brussels, Rome — Bombay; in France the fruit-broker, Larabit, has set up betting-booths in principal cities, betting three-to-two against adherents of either leader, and is expecting to reap plenteously, while the desertions from the Foreign Legion with the purpose of joining the Young Men was the subject of an interpellation yesterday in the Chamber, the French in general being adverse to the Wallace cause, because of the Wallace land-idea. What I, for my part, now counsel, as the lesser of two evils — if your Excellency sees your way — is a raw avowal of withdrawal..

But Wallace continued to trust in luck in respect of getting Hogan gripped, recklessly to trust — a spiritual result of the fact that nothing at the moment was to him of supreme interest but Caroleth Lavarock's lips; and with the object of washing quickly in the joy of that orgy — this before all things, then to think of other things — headlong to London he flew under the busby, in the dolman, of a captain of 14th Hussars, his arm in a sling, to perfect him with a look of woundedness and sick-list furlough.

And straight from his train he made for Caxton Hall, Westminster, to acquire a licence to marry, Caroleth so far knowing nothing of his coming — was in those moments at the 'phone, hearing from Ivor Warwick that Ivor was even then on the point of setting out at last to visit Paddy; and she bid him come, since Paddy, though now out, would soon be back.

Then from Westminster Wallace made for the Langham Hotel, where at once he flew to the 'phone to pour out to his loved-one "I have it! the licence".

And she: “You have? Come along, then, Scapegrace... The test is now duly annulled, is it?”

“Aye”, he deceitfully answered, hoping still stubbornly in his kidnappers’ luck, though this was only four days before the test-date.

And Caroleth: “Come, then, dart, you Priap, if you don’t get arrested on the way — or shot dead! Mad as a March-hare, I think: but hares make good venison, eh?”

“Lo, I come quickly!” he cried.

It was then three in the afternoon, everything propitious for their meeting, Paddy absent in the Park with her darling and perambulator; but even as Wallace darted from the ‘phone to speed to her, a knocking was at her house-door — Ivor Warwick, finally brought by her insinuations to see Paddy.

When he stood before her Caroleth’s gaze dwelt dumb some time on that old soul, her left eye going narrow with intensity of stress.

“Don’t look well”, she mentioned.

His lids fell. “Forgive me: some bewitchment has—”

“Now, if this thing isn’t too much!” she suddenly broke out with reproach: “I wonder if he expects me to stand this?” — for, having once seen Wallace suddenly old after being young, she had come to conclude that he could concoct two molys, to make old as to make young — and her ruth flew into fury.

“Tell me this”, she said to Ivor, “have you been with Dr. Wallace since the night I told you that it was he who eloped with Paddy?”

“That night I saw him after leaving you”, Ivor replied.

“I told you not to... And what did you eat or drink while with him?”

“Nothing”.

“You did. Try to remember”.

“Well, he locked me into his drawing-room, and I think — yes, there was a cake—”

Now there was a knocking at the house-door. A footman came with the name: “Dr. Wallace”.

And Caroleth: “Say to the gentleman that Miss Lavarock is not at home, but will soon communicate with him at his hotel”.

And to Ivor she now said “Oh, well, take heart, you will soon be yourself again. Dr. Wallace is in London, and I am going to give you his address: say that you will not disclose it”.

When he bowed, with “Quite so”, she handed him a note which she had now dashed off and enclosed, saying to him “Take this to Dr. Wallace at the Langham Hotel; and please do what he tells you”.

So Ivor was off, to be taken up at the hotel to Wallace’s flat, who had lately arrived from Caroleth “not-at-home”; and, seeing Ivor, Wallace went “Ha, ha” — with that twinkle in his leer— “you Ivor Warwick? Why the devil are you looking sixty years old? That’s the girls, My Boy; a harem, eh? ten a day; you must go slower, Ivor, must go slower”.

Ivor sneered without reply, now handing the note...

And Wallace read “Don’t think that you will see my face until Ivor Warwick is restored to his proper self. Pity you are such a rascal. Caroleth”.

Wallace started! asking himself, “How can she know that I did it? how? and know that I can restore him?” — moving frowning about; but then, suddenly throwing the perplexity of it off him, said to Ivor “Come on — come with me”; and together they walked round to Harley Street.

There, Ivor remaining in the dining-room, Wallace sped up to his bedroom to get and give some drips of that bezoar of the Deep that is the dew of youth.

But now when he opened the cupboard door, looked at the tube — a blow for him, dismay, mystification! only three or four drips being any more there...

Ghast he stood, breathing “My God! it evaporates!”

But, in fact, it was Caroleth who, since he last looked at the tube, had abstracted the larger part of that algin of youth: for, having beheld him suddenly old that day when he in mistake had drunk the old-age moly, she had apprehended that the effect of the youth moly, which she had drunk, might be temporary in her, and later on had stolen in and taken, to keep in case of need, most of what he, in restoring himself to youth, had left of the youth moly: so now scarcely any was left...

And “Oh, no!” he breathed, “I don’t give this away!”

Down now in a rush of passion he dashed afresh to the dining-room, and he stamped at Ivor with “I’m damned if I’ll stand — Good day, Sir: I have no business with you; tell Miss Lavarock from me that she may do as she dam-well chooses”.

With which message Ivor went back to Berkeley Square, Caroleth being now seated with her head hung far back, dreaming utopian things, having before her a harp flowing as wheatfields flow and flow when sweet winds blow, her hands within it winnowing with swift business. And through the thrumming of it she muttered to Ivor “Here you are, looking a little — depressed, Ivor... Didn’t Dr. Wallace offer you anything to drink?”

And Ivor: “No, he was not so polite — seems angry: I am to tell you from him that you may do as you please”.

The strings continued to bubble dulcetness, as brooks do that tinkle dulcet blubbings, Caroleth answering through the thrumming “Very well, I will do as I please... As to Paddy, she is still out, and I am glad, I don’t wish her to see you looking — gloomy. I suggested that she might take the baby to visit his mother, and possibly she is gone to Hogan's: I'll see" — now discarding the harp to pass to the 'phone.

It was Mr. Hogan himself who answered her: "No, she has not come. And I pray you not to let her for the present — I have, I may say, a reason: after the storm-test, yes — not now, not now".

Caroleth started. "Storm-test... But isn't the storm-test annulled by Wallace? So I have been informed."

And Hogan: "Annulled, no. My! what people wouldn't all say, if it was! It is for the Twelfth — if nothing happens — as fixed".

"I see. Thanks. Goodbye" — several minutes she remained staring there, wounded at the discovery that Wallace had wanted to delude her.

Then, going again to Ivor, she sent him home, telling him "Keep heart: I may soon 'phone to you to come again"; then sat down some minutes, full of the fact that the test was still to come off. "But the madman will be shot!" she muttered, jumping up now to 'phone to Sir Borlase St. Aubyn at The Albany, to say "I have been expecting you, and feel neglected."

And he: "That so? You know how to flatter, don't you?"

"In no mood for flattering", she answered: "on the contrary, I'm cross: for a little bird has been chirping to me that you purpose to shoot at Wallace when he offers his body to your vengeance at the test".

This got the baronet jealous-angry. "And you care? You don't care for that man!"

She answered coldly "But if I care for the Young Men's cause, must I not therefore care for Wallace's life?"

This comforted. "Is that it?" he asked.

And she: "But is it an actual fact that you have that intention?"

"A natural intention, don't you think? Wherever and whenever I first get the man I go for him".

“But if I pray you to drop it?”

“Then, it is dropped. But for a consideration, eh? Quid pro quo. I am in a bargaining mood”.

“You still want to marry me?”

“You know”.

“Come round: let’s discuss it”.

“I have to be at the Home Office — a Dinka appointment: will tonight do? dine with me?”

“All right: come for me. Goodbye”.

And now she rang up Wallace at the Langham Hotel, to say “I am not at the moment disposed to say much to you; but I ought to warn you: understand that, if you get so far as to stand up at the test — which is not, as you said, annulled — you will get no farther, a bullet will blow you out”.

Dumbness; then Wallace: “Bullet... I — see. But, then, of course, men did not make themselves, they belong to what made them. I am frightened of bullets, I confess, but, if what I do is for the public good — Who is going to shoot me? Little nigger named St. Aubyn?”

And Caroleth: “Not without reason, you know: he has seen his girl in a police-court — not quite right in her head even now. See what vast harm one unharnessed man can do”.

This got Wallace still crosser. “Pooh, pooh, common Tom’s talk, Dear Lady. How can one living thing do ‘vast harm’ to one other? The vastest harm one can do is to kill the other; but billions of beings cease to live each minute — fleas and chieftains of the spheres: that’s a fact; and, if the death of one is of no importance, still less, if possible, is the manner of his death, by pneumonia, or typhoon, or a bullet. It is unintelligence which does vast harm, for fools harm humanity, while rogues harm Matt or Margaret. But what I can’t understand is how you come to know the things you seem to know: who told you, told Ivor Warwick, told this St. Aubyn, that I have had anything to do with the little Paddy?”

“It would be long to relate”, Caroleth coldly answered.

“Anyway, you have made me get a licence to marry: am I now to tear that up?”

“You may as well — unless I am to see Ivor Warwick restored to his proper self, and to know for certain that the absurd storm-test is not to take place”.

“But it is impossible to understand — How has it entered your head that I am able to ‘restore’ — ?”

“By putting two and two together” — coldly from Caroleth.

And Wallace: “Aye, anything but putting One and One together, as I want you to. As to the storm-test, it is less ‘absurd’ than you discern, though to me, too, it is sometimes absurd, and I am doing all I know to stop it from occurring; but I am determined not to back out of it: that, I can see, would be the worst I could do in the Young Men’s interests. So I thank you for your warning, but crowds of bullets crucifying each inch of me will not stop me”.

“I will stop you, then”, she muttered, her lips now fixed; and she said “Goodbye.”

Immediately she proceeded to ‘phone again to Hogan... “I conceive that you are not keen on the taking place of the test, the challenge to which was made you in an impulse, and accepted by you in an impulse: no more keen than I am. So let us stop it, as we can, since Wallace is in London, and would no doubt be at once snapped up, if you whisper it to Dinka. Wallace is at the Langham Hotel in the disguise, I hear, of a captain of Hussars”.

And Hogan: “Ah, so?... Captain of Hussars, Langham Hotel... thanks! I’ll consider whether and how I can fix it”.

He did not consider long! Almost at once Dinka knew...

Then Hogan waited, and Caroleth waited, for the arrest of Wallace.

But the next day passed, and the next — no news.

Hogan and Caroleth sat in prickles of expectancy; but the bomb failed to go off.

They had, in fact, misread the mind of Dinka, who, ever “tricky”, ever had his fingers on the pulse of the people’s fevers, and to cut out the storm-test now by the seizure of Wallace would have been to cause that other sort of storm that he was always cautious to avoid. The King had lately come to London from Windsor to give dinners to the Kings of Sweden, Denmark, different princes, and to take the bunch of them to witness which way the test-show went; all the nations were agog at “storm-test” as when an organism is gone rollick with grog: Dinka felt it an indelicate thing to step in. But he had also a war-motive far stronger: for now the two armies stood confronted on a Wallingford-Reading line for a final trial of strengths, precisely as Crichton of Iraq had forecasted: the Old Men assembling a far-flung park of aeroplanes, twenty-five square miles, to wipe out the enemy under one catastrophe of fire from heaven: the Young Men assembling men, with mortar and howitzer, hand-grenade, pompom, field-gun, machine-gun, to overwhelm the enemy under weight of metal; and already skirmishings were bursting out to fret and flicker a little, here, there, and be finished. In which condition of things Dinka wished the test to take place, that Wallace, discredited, might harm his men’s morale; then to arrest.

So Wallace remained free; but during a day or two Hogan was so sure of an arrest, that he let himself say in a Press Association “interview” that he had reason to believe that Wallace was anything but eager for the test, and was now in London, with the object, probably, of getting himself arrested, to evade the test: the rumour of which statement flew like loosened effluvia during two days in the newspapers of Europe and America; and it had upon the Young Men army a marked effect of depression, of which every officer was conscious: certainly, in each of three skirmishes which occurred during the two pre-test days the Young Men forces suffered definite defeats.

But, then, no arrest of Wallace followed: so that Hogan, seeing now that he could not get Wallace arrested, dropped back upon the plan to get himself kidnapped: for Hogan now had hardly any hope, whatever he once had, of getting a storm from God, his conscience, once spotless, having gone all fogged: so at ten in the forenoon of the test-date, noting from a window three of the kidnapper party in a side-street, he went down, climbed a back-wall to hide himself from his guardians, and came out through someone's garden-gate in among the kidnappers.

Upon which Darrel, the Whitechapel spy, remarked to him "We have to ask you to come with us, Mr. Hogan".

Hogan answered "You have a nerve, Sir, to dare to take my person".

And Darrel: "Don't look at it like that, Mr. Hogan — politics, Sir. Do we tie your mouth up, or will you keep quiet?"

"I'll keep quiet" — he got into the kidnappers' car.

Such, then, was the effect upon Hogan of Dinka's unwillingness to arrest Wallace; but upon Caroleth Lavarock, for her part, the effect was a heightening to a crisis of her apprehension that Wallace would be shot at the test. She had before toyed with St. Aubyn's proposal of prompt marriage as payment for an abandonment of his intent to shoot; but now, seeing no other way out, she took the proposal into practical consideration, and, desperately set upon rescuing Wallace, consented to it.

As to Wallace himself, he had to live through three pre-test days of dreadful strain: he kept having intimations from the army that his presence at the front was desirable, and he kept asking himself "Why, why, am I in London?"; his kidnapping party were continuing to fail: the test, he now felt, would undoubtedly take place, and the tender memory, still fresh in his flesh, of the revolver-shots which had rent him rendered him most shrinkingly timorous of the new wound which he was now sure of receiving; on the second day he even weakened to the extent of attempting to get himself arrested, leaving the hotel to go to his own home, and sending from "Brown" a telegram to the Home Office, "Wallace can be found in his Harley Street house", so as, at all costs, to rescue himself from the gall of the Gethsemane of the storm-test: he was astonished when no arrest followed! Meantime, his tormented midnights were spent in sighings of orison, on his knees, his "psychophone" chronic on his forehead; and with all his soul he besought, he implored, wrestling long in prayer with those sailors whom once he had known in their roaming home. Nor was he all without impressions of response from them, but very indefinite, remote, especially in the first of the nights when he heard, or scented, say, the replies "remembers"... "mother"... "coming"; but in the second midnight the impressions were less disconnected, stingy; and in the third midnight he emerged out of that stress of his supplications with some strange surmise of joy prying somewhere in his consciousness — pale he was, dazed, staring at vacancy, grinning, giddied, half inclined to laugh, half inclined to cry: he had got "egg's mother remembers"... "pray at the time"... "will not be far from you"...

When at eleven the next forenoon, the test-date, he was told at the 'phone, "This is Frank Darrel speaking, Sir... We have Hogan at last... now taking him to the Windsor House", Wallace made this answer, "Take him back home, set him free".

This at the Langham Hotel, to which he had again gone that morning — to avoid capture now...

And some minutes after being rung up by Darrel he was rung up by Caroleth Lavarock to be told, "I have with me Ivor Warwick: kindly say if it is any good my sending him again to you?"

For she, in an hour when Paddy was out, had called Ivor to her side, in order to give him to drink those drops of elixir which she had nicked from Wallace; but, being most reluctant to lose them, she had decided at the final moment before giving to try to conjure Wallace to give, imagining that Wallace could concoct as much of the azoth as he chose.

And, by luck, Wallace was at present in a better temper — had indeed rushed into a state of exhilaration in consequence of hopes more rose-coloured than were warranted. He answered to Caroleth "You don't know what you ask — a vast favour".

And she: "He has suffered vastly. It is odd — Don't you pity him? No feeling for him?"

"Well — yes. But the fellow attacked me!"

"Now, could he help?"

"And if I do? You'll give in?"

"If you do, then when the storm-test is an accomplished fact which cannot be undone, and you are down in the mouth, I may pity you, and be disposed to come to terms".

Now Wallace cried out "I mayn't be down in the mouth! I have a fancy now that my Masters are in a good mood, and not far from me. Young Woman! Caroleth! Think of it! New heavens and a new earth!"

Taken rather aback by that cry, Caroleth presently said "Oh, well, tomorrow when it will be all over is nearly here... But shall I send him? Please — for me—"

And Wallace: "Oh, very well, send him, send him. But, ah, you are a costly thing; I buy you with many times your weight in diamonds".

Again, then, Ivor was sent to the hotel, again to walk thence round to Harley Street with Wallace, who, after going upstairs, came again to the dining-room with two phials, which he gave, saying to Ivor “This phial contains three drops of a drug that is nearly as strong as nicotine or prussic acid, and is as good as those are bad: swallow them, you; and this other phial contains one drop of the same: make your Paddy swallow it, then marry her. And you should love me well, My Friend: for these four are the only drips of the drug that exist on this globe, and it will be a thousand years, maybe two, before a human being makes any more”.

Five hours afterwards Ivor Warwick departed from that house adance with newness of youth; and at Berkeley Square, having Paddy now wrapped in his arms, put to her lips, as directed, that tiny drip in the second phial: so she was alaugh by the time he was dining with her and Caroleth and the Dowager Duchess of Chumley; with which three, too, he drove to the test, Paddy now parting without regret from her big-bellied baby, her craze for him now dead, while Caroleth went all asmile at the prattling, the wild-eyed liveliness of Ivor and Paddy, gowned, she, in a gorgeous design of flowered satin with sleeves which were enormities — little anticipating that that gown was to come off her quicker than it had gone on.

XXV. THE STORM-TEST

THESE FOUR, THEN, together saw from Caroleth's box in the Hall that storm-test at which the human host stood hushed, as when a sun's eclipse is being transacted, and the spheres are in a fix of travail.

The spaces about the Albert Hall, streets leading to it, were not less bethronged than the hall itself, nor was Britain's consciousness of the event keener than Tahiti's.

Many sat on the platform, at their centre being Mr. Hogan, who conducted the meeting, this beginning with a fanfare of fifty trumpets and the National Anthem when the King and Queen, together with their group of guests, appeared, this to be followed, with Wallace's consent, by a "hymn", selected by Wallace, in which all the hall joined.

O God, our Help in ages past,
Our Hope for years to come,
Our Shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal Home....

Time like an ever-rolling stream
Bears all its sons away,
They fly forgotten, as a dream
Dies at the opening day....

Whereupon choristers in white gowns who occupied the arena — a thousand delegates from country choirs combined with a thousand members of London Choral Societies, and with the Broadcasting Corporation's Symphony Orchestra — rendered selections from “The Creation”.

And now from a little book that he had Mr. Hogan stood to read out something:

And it came to pass that Ahab said unto Elijah, Art thou he that troubleth Israel?

And Elijah answered, I have not troubled Israel, but thou, in that thou hast forsaken the Lord, and hast followed Baal.

Now therefore send and gather all Israel unto Mount Carmel, and the prophets of Baal, four hundred and fifty.

So Ahab sent and gathered them together unto Mount Carmel.

Then said Elijah, Let them cut one bullock in pieces, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under; and I will cut in pieces another bullock, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under. And let them call upon their god, and I will call upon the Lord; and the god that answereth by fire, let him be God.

And all the people said, It is well spoken.

Then the prophets of Baal cut in pieces a bullock, and called upon Baal from morning even until noon, saying, O, Baal, hear us. But there was no voice, nor any that answered. And they cut themselves with knives and lances.

And Elijah built an altar, and cut a bullock in pieces, and laid it on the wood. And Elijah said, Lord God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel. Hear me, O Lord, hear me, that this people may know that thou art the Lord God.

Then the fire of the Lord fell, and consumed the burnt-sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones.

And when all the people saw it, they fell upon their faces; and they said, The Lord he is God, the Lord he is God.

And Elijah said unto them, Take the prophets of Baal, let not one escape. And they took them; and Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there.

On reading which, Mr. Hogan, now leaning forward on his fists, addressed the assembly — rather blanched, a ribbedness anon appearing at that right-angle of his jaw, but much less blanched than Wallace, who, at a small table at Hogan's right, was every moment expecting the gash of gunshot in his flesh; and Hogan spoke with a simplicity, a subduedness, a sadness of humility, yet a manliness also, that won the hearts of all. He said that, Dr. Wallace having been struck by lightning at a public meeting, he, Hogan, had — perhaps unwarrantably — ascribed the stroke to the anger of God; but Dr. Wallace had answered that God's lightning, like everything that happens, is not Christian nor Buddhist, but scientific, so that the Good of Man consists, not in being Christian, but in being scientific, then had gone on to challenge him, Hogan, to a test, in which he, Hogan, should supplicate Jehovah, the God of Christians, to send out lightnings, Dr. Wallace supplicating some scientists whom he claimed to know to send out lightnings: and, if a storm came for him, Hogan, then God was, like Hogan, Christian, and Good consisted in being Christian; but if a storm came for Dr. Wallace, then God was, like Dr. Wallace, anti-Christian, scientific, and Good consisted in being scientific. He, Hogan, at the goad of the moment, had hardly been able to resist the impulse to accept a challenge so direct and public, and had accepted — the result being that assembly, on which was bent that night the gaze of the ryot of the Ganges, and of the rabble of junk-dwellers that jump from junk to junk familiarly in their city of junks on the Yangtsekiang. "But", he added, "did I do well in accepting? I confess that I have since had searchings of heart: for though we are told that 'the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much', we are told, too, 'thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God', lest He let fly His hand and cut you off, and, if I cry for his lightnings, His lightnings may fly out to strike me dead with excess of light. Elijah tempted Him; but am! Elijah? Dust and ashes! miserable sinner, God knows, not fit to represent the three hundred million Christians who are depending this night upon my righteousness. But, then, pluck — and faith: if we have that faith — each and all of us — which can move even the founded mountain, then, I reckon, the trick's done — Lord, increase our faith! Let us pray”.

Now the prayer: begun by informing the Omnipresent of the object of the meeting (“Almighty God, we are met together tonight in order to—” etc), and continued with an entreaty that the oncoming of a storm might demonstrate to all men that the god of Christians was verily God — a thing which anything of a storm that night could hardly fail to demonstrate, for the night was quite calm — a little misty!

When the preacher ceased, sat down, a profound stillness was shattered by the Hall's organ starting to render Handel's “Largo”; and, this over, Mr. Dowdy (at Mr. Hogan's left) stood to bugle solo out of his lungs his beautiful tenor, rendering that ribbedness, meantime, at the corners of Mr. Hogan's jaws stirring awork, his visage otherwise a mask of wax shewing no token of the woe that must have been his, as those minutes moved past, while the human family, hearkening to the broadcasting of it, or not hearkening, thought in its heart “He fails”.

O, rest in the Lord,

Wait patiently on Him....

Then after half-an-hour Wallace sprang upright with the wild countenance of some wight who is doing a run preliminary to springing into a precipice, for he had been told that he would be laid low, and if ever man was desperately afraid and desperately brave, it was that man then.

He complimented Mr. Hogan on the fairness with which Hogan had represented the nature of the test, and had confessed that his, Hogan's, hope was based on "faith", whereas his, Wallace's, hope was based on knowledge. He, Wallace, did not pray "Lord, increase our faith", which was as much as to say "increase our rickety half-faith that Thou art what our half-savage fathers imagined Thee to be". His, Wallace's, faith could not possibly be increased, being complete — his faith that no storm could be brought-on by 'the prayer of a righteous man', could only be brought-on by science, by that prayer which labour was, by the prayer of the labouratory. In other words, his, Wallace's "faith" was "faith" in a higher conception of God than Mr. Hogan's conception: so that in this test he, Wallace, was Elijah, and Mr. Hogan was the idolator, the Baal-sluggard: for idolatry was a lazy-minded lolling in a lower old conception of God, and since Elijah's Jehovah was doubtless a less low and lazy conception than Baal was, he, Wallace, was Elijah here. All living things were at all instants aware of the being of God — fleas, and so-called "atheists", and archangels, and savages, and Christians, and philosophers; and it is the same God that all were aware of — the Power that moves the universe; but there were higher and lower conceptions of Power. Mr. Hogan's conception was not high, was lazy-minded, idolatrous; he might call the God of his conception "Power" and "Almighty", but that God could never cause a storm, or do anything whatever, for, as He had qualities, He was not Force (which had no qualities), and nothing but Force could do anything whatever. But Power was Force: for Power was power to make an event happen, and since only five events could possibly happen — (i) something might move, (2) something might stop moving, (3) something might move faster, (4) something might move slower, (5) something might move on a new course — since no other event could happen, and since these events, we know, were due to Force, therefore Power was Force, and had no qualities. Then again, Mr. Hogan had that conception of the ancients and savages that Power, the Mover, could be moved — by prayers of the righteous man! But how could Power be moved, when Power alone could move, and when nothing else than Power was power? Power was “Absolute”, as philosophers babbled — had no qualities, was a Dark Somehow that caused motion, and could not be altered in quantity; that was all that could ever be known by any soul about Power: the created were far from ever beginning a little to grasp the Uncreated. If Power had qualities, a nature, like a cock, an axe, Power would be forced, like cocks, axes, to behave according to its nature, and since Force alone could force, Force would be forcing Force, which was nonsense; and if God had a nature, was fat, or loving, or fussy, or ten-fingered, then God couldn’t help loving, and would be an under-God, since Nature which forced him to love would be Force, would be God. So God did not make apes nor men “in his own image”, having no image, and “thou shalt not make to thyself any mental image, nor bow down to Mumbo Jumbo, for I, the Lord thy God, am an imageless sort of god, not unworthy the worship of your heart’s heart, as your father’s half-a-farthing fancies are”. So, if some of them supposed that he, Wallace, stood there representing irréligion, lazy-mindedness, that was nonsense, it was the other lot who were idolatrous: he, Wallace, on the contrary, was what Goethe called Spinoza, “ein Gott-betrunkener Mensch”, “a God-drunken fellow”: for God was in all his thoughts: he had seen such visions of loveliness as no tongue could utter, washed in joys profounder than ever plummet sounded: which joys he wanted them all to rollick in through a concept of God as true as his — his, he knew, being true a little — a very little — soon to become idolatrous, as Mr. Hogan's at present was idolatrous...

At this point Wallace abruptly sat down, affrighted, sighing “No, I can't.. experiencing a feeling that a bullet was even now on the wing to meet his bosom. That, though, was not so; and he had no sooner touched his chair than up anew he darted, shewing a face still more ashen-wild than before, to pant “I am done... had more to say, but — I can't... I'll now make my supplication to my Masters...”

Now he caught from a pocket his “psychophone” to clap upon his forehead, and raise his face to the heavenly places...

“Egg!” — a mutter, some of which Mr. Hogan could catch, no one else — “Now hatched... supernal friend, friend of Terra, lover of worlds — this is the moment — I come to you: it is to get a world a step higher in its climb toward heaven, its thoughts of God; and your august Mother, she sent me a message, she said that if ever I appealed to her, and she was near to hear, and the matter was large, she would hearken to me. Now's the hour: send out tempest, rend up by the roots the atmosphere of this planet, throw it like dust, send it bellowing for dismay like bulls: O, with your fine ear hear, and be enticed by a soul that lies bowed before the Divine power of your science: hear, O, hear, hear..

Now with a feeling of reprieve and astonishment that still he was not shot he suddenly sat, having half forgotten in the urgency of his orison the gun which lurked, but now remembering with a freshness of shock.

As he sat, the Hall's organ started to recite, “Still as the Night”.

For six minutes it continued to recite...

Until somewhere some startling window slammed smartly, and like a spirit that trips in dance the breath of a wind visited that chamber with freshness of animation, to whisk through it, quicken, thrill it to a quivering of the lip, kindling every eye to a fire of ecstasy, ten thousand now bounding upright to fill the building with an uproar of vociferation — upright, too, now, being Dr. Wallace, who, stooping, was pointing a forefinger at Mr. Hogan, while soft he hummed “With a woola, woola, woola, and a wolla, wolla, woo.. Then, facing the assembly, he obtained by making gestures hush enough to be able to shout through the rumpus “Your Majesties! Ladies and Gentlemen! Will you take my advice? don’t wait, get home. A storm’s coming, I think — not meaning when I say ‘storm’ what you mean when you say ‘storm’: I mean storm primordial, the transcendency of Nature’s rank energies, Jurassic distraction, Triassic racket, the scientists who are sending it, since they condescend to send anything, being likely to send something definite, nor are they the kind of people likely to care for the convenience, or the life, of Bill and Pete — they don’t care for their own life, deeply sweeter to them than ours to us — only care for Life. So what I say is, get home, don’t linger, I am off” — at once he was in flight down the steps.

In being borne toward a doorway by the current of a crowd, crushed tight, he chanced to catch sight of Caroleth Lavarock’s flagrant gown five yards in front, and of Ivor and Paddy crushed against her: on which he attempted to hail them, shouting again and again through the row of gale and of mouths “Wait for me!”, and after some minutes they appeared to hear, for Caroleth, throwing a look round a little, lifted an arm. But an instant afterwards Wallace was conscious of a tapping on his back, and horridly he started on seeing that it was Sir Borlase St. Aubyn some feet in his rear reaching forward to touch him.

Sir Borlase now shouted at him “Wallace! you are never more to communicate with that lady, understand, Wallace!... I obtained this paper to give to you.”

By his and Wallace's collusion a document was now manoeuvred out of his hand to Wallace's hand.

Meantime, the fainting of a lady near in front of Wallace had produced a new focus of confusion in the crowd, and when Wallace again gazed round, his eyes now failed to find any sign of the Caroleth group.

Nor was it till he was at his car that he could give a glance at the document handed him, and his forehead dropped at it with such an abandon as if the baronet's gunshot had actually gashed his heart: it was a marriage certificate of Caroleth's marriage with the baronet that afternoon in Westminster.

And since Wallace did not know her motive, that she had been driven to the marriage in order to win from the baronet a promise not to lift a revolver at Wallace in the storm-test, it was a lost despondent heart that drove to his Harley Street home that evening.

XXVI. TURMOIL

HE MIGHT NOT have been any more lost, despondent, if he had known that two spies in a motor were moving behind his motor, the providence of the Home Office having ordained that his arrest should follow the storm-test, whatever its result.

And the shortness of that trip to Harley Street had in it something of astonishment: for though those routes were crowded, the two motors moved quicker than they meant, since the wind came out of west and south, and before long such an object as a motor-car was like fluff to its force.

At this hour, though, the storming of men (in towns) was more boisterous than the winds: queues a thousand yards long waiting for trains, trams, 'buses; stairs and escalators of undergrounds crammed with people desperately seeking trains, Charing Cross underground, in the thick of the chaos of rush and crush, having to be closed for nearly an hour — no more room on platforms, trains crammed with standing men; the parks, too, were at this hour being crammed, and remained open through the night, many at this time finding rest for the feet by sitting down on the pavements, on door-steps, in the middle of streets, a multitude somehow of prams more harrassing the muddle of that tempest of men.

And rapidly down like the heart of Man sank the barometer, the record of the Meteorological office being to come after which was over-hurricane, and then, about two in the morning (G.M.T.), over-over-hurricane, when the turmoil of earth and heaven became deafening, so that naught could any longer be heard but the bawling of the dark, and the heart of all that was mortal paused aghast at the appalling dominance of the voice of God. That night none of our race shut down the eyelids to drowse, and the fowls of the air were led astonished astray on aerial voyages strange and lorn.

It is known that in the China Sea that night, the Timor Sea — there about the Philippines, Borneo, Celebes — the sea was bubbling hot, a pot aboil, over some thousands of square kilometres, eating out the baru seams of junks, the pitch of ships' seams: and this is considered to have been the sufficient cause of a storm which was universal on the earth.

In one island, Nevis (West Indies), Life appears to have been wiped out, except for one cynical kitten found surviving, which licked an itch of her skin; and something like this was also true of Florida Keys, of South Florida, of some regions of India, and of some of Japan, while in Europe somehow the loss of (human) life was as small as the loss of property was enormous — buildings, ships, stock, crops, forests.

As to Florida, Miami and Palm Beach were wafted away, hardly any trace of them remaining. At about nine o'clock a Florida aeroplane which, after a wireless warning, started out, racing the storm, to bid the three hundred inhabitants of Ritter Island flee, actually arrived, alighted on the island, but — no one was now alive in it.

Freaks of that sort by the storm were not infrequent: the fields round about Itchenor (Sussex) were found the next daybreak to present the appearance of a sea, crowded to come after which was over-hurricane, and then, about two in the morning (G.M.T.), over-over-hurricane, when the turmoil of earth and heaven became deafening, so that naught could any longer be heard but the bawling of the dark, and the heart of all that was mortal paused aghast at the appalling dominance of the voice of God. Freaks of that sort by the storm were not infrequent: the fields round about Itchenor (Sussex) were found the next daybreak to present the appearance of a sea, crowded with craft from the harbour; at some points flocks of house-roofs were seen wayfaring together in the air, like migrations of great geese streaming on their way; another freak-effect was the smell that buildings emanated a minute before tumbling, as many persons whose scent was alert learned that night, and so, by flying in time, saved their lives (smell of mortar newly exposed?); another freak-effect was accesses of sexual lewdness — that brisk business of the bull that leaps — this being no doubt due to a feeling of newness and doomsday, holiday from the ordinary walk and law, the universal old world come now to its term, and a new world summoned to birth by that rumpus of the archangel's trump which the mouth of the tempest was sounding from Pole to Pole: at about eleven a lady in the shreds of a chemise dashed for shelter into a telephone call-box at Notting Hill, a gentleman in tatters dashed in, they were quite unacquainted, yet within some minutes a child was conceived there, of which the gentleman was never to know that he was the parent (the lady being married), and there may have been millions of similar incidents; freakish, too, the story of how at East How (near Bournemouth) an oak-tree dropped perpendicular out of the air into the middle of a bungalow's roof, guarded the roof from being blown away, and afterwards looked as if it had grown there; for three or four days there was nothing like a train, tram, 'bus running, no vehicle on any road, owing to tree-trunks not removed, nor in tubes etc. any train, owing to the break-down of electricity; at the start of the storm some Cardiff policemen, hearing what they thought to be a burglar-alarm going on in an undertaker's garage, surrounded, entered, the garage, to discover that the noise was coming from a motor horn which the storm had short-circuited: one hour later in the night slight would have been their concern about burglars!

But for fully an hour after coming home Wallace sat motionless in his drawing-room, bowed down, brow in hands, except when, twice, he lifted his head in listening to tidings from Reading headquarters out of a superhet receiver near him, tuned to the army's short-wave; but, as the second message had broken off abruptly, he expected no more; and, seated there in grief, with fragments of his windows' glass at his feet, he said within himself "What use is my heart-beat to me now, with that darling madness of the tune that her being hums always to haunt my ear? Howl away! blow me to hell away! howl! blow! I have half a mind myself to blow — blow my brains out".

But at half-past nine the superhet anew broke out — General Ritchie in high spirits at the microphone, with “I have the hope that your Excellency is listening. They have managed to patch-up the aerial break-down of half-an-hour ago, and I take the opportunity — I think I am not premature in announcing now a final victory of the Young Men of England over the Old Fogeys of that ilk. Once again, as in The Armada of 1688, England has been saved by a gale, for of the armada of aeroplanes that started out at 8.45 to annihilate our lines none has arrived: I can hardly be far wrong in stating that every one has come a cropper. Nice high winds, Your Excellency — nice high winds. Winds, happily, behind our men, who are now advancing to attack along our whole front — looking, I am afraid, a rather draggled and ragged crew, the gale playing some curious pranks, I gather, with the guns; but our boys, like Scots, advance with the name of Wallace in their mouths, and with hearts so high now, that I doubt if a war-host thrice their number would subdue the resolution of these troops. They, poor beggars, will be in a sorry way tomorrow: nothing resembling a tent remains; no roof is over my own head, as I speak; but we shall march, Your Excellency, into London, as the clock—”

At this point the superhet anew went mute, at the same moment that the room went dark, but for the off-shine shed abroad from some flaming house not far, all being now up with electricity in London for that night (except cell-electricity); and in that rufous gloom Wallace sat on, again grasping his bowed brow, his fingers amid the mop of wildness that his hair now was, and, grinding his teeth, he groaned within himself “Howl away! blow me to hell away! howl! blow!”, the tempest’s hubbub now resembling the roaring of a cohort of aeroplanes that, moving close overhead, boom their chorus with a reboant bravura, mixed with this continuous undertone being overtones of all the orchestras of the halls of the void, alto voices calling lost, grave diapason grieving, soprano pealing, vox humana pleading; anon the mass of the air was, as it were, staggered and vibrated, uttering a noising as of gun-batteries gobbling volleys afar, or of carpets flapped; and anon there droned from its throat a solemn noising of snorers snoring at midnight, brief as when the spinning-top breathes a little in deeps of sleep.

Through which uproar Wallace could on a sudden catch a clattering of his door-knocker: whereupon he rushed to shout to his butler “Don’t open!”, since the knocking might be by officers sent to take him; then, speeding to a window, he peeped, to descry five lights (electric — men in this latter day having invented lamps which no tempest can quench); also, he could descry forms of five men: for the night was not yet quite deprived of light, in the skies a local smudge of shine diving through cloudrack, like some affrighted fowl diving to covert — the moon scooting in a mood of doom and darksome disaster, as when a woman bathing is overtaken by men, and trailing in a scare of shame what robes she clutches about her nudity, she rushes, scooting for cover. There was also the offshine from conflagrations which already were raging about London beyond the scope of fire-brigades’ control; by which offshine the five could descry Wallace at the window’s brink; and one of them with stentor lungs sent up “Your Excellency! Frank Darrel come for you, with your four London men: flee instantly with us; arrest impending: and, if arrested, you die tonight, for they know, having lost the war, that you will be rescued tomorrow..

Wallace shouted down “I hear! Right! I come!”

But even as he moved to go, he was aware of the coming of another group, three or four times more numerous than his five; was aware of the five rushing down to the “area”; aware of a revolver-shot; aware of the newcomers rushing across the street for cover to a corner nearly opposite; and now the outbreak of a fusillade of bullets between area and street-corner, so that the storm seemed to cough and clear its throat — Wallace spurting to seize a revolver lying on his night-table; then, lurking behind the drawing-room wall between window and window, he pointed the revolver at the street-corner; but, able to descry nobody, and ever shy of destroying life, he fired no shot.

And still the interchange of shots continued between the combatant bodies — fifteen minutes, twenty — obstinately like the dropping of water on a rainy day... But now — dumbness: no more of the kettledrum's tremolo in the course of the tempest's oratorio... The following day one saw a pile of five lying dead there in the "area", the eye of one of their pocket-lamps staring alight....

And, they dead, the rest ran across to rattle Wallace's knocker; they howled "Open, Wallace!"; and, having a crowbar, attacked the door with hubbub, one group going by way of the area through the house to guard its back, while Wallace, hiding behind his bedroom's locked door, trepidant, watchful, eyeing the door aside, had in his hand that alkahest of old-age which once already had made of him an old man — he not intending to be arrested, since his arrest, his death, at the enemy's hand, any defeat of him now in the hour of victory and éclat, must seriously injure the Young Men's prestige; nor was he much in love with youth and vitality just now, owing to that marriage of Caroleth Lavarock: so chose to vanish in old-age, and elude arrest, since not by force, by ruse.

But he waited for the actual entrance of the enemy — had not long to wait! for before ever the officers' crowbar had made any impression upon the front door, the door suddenly took to itself wings to swing inward from the gale, and crack itself with racket against the stair. Bargrave, the butler, put his mouth to the bedroom to howl "Door's gone, Sir!"

“I hear!” calls Wallace, who had already divested himself of his officer’s uniform to don clothes of his own; and desperately now he tosses to his mouth what remained of that menstruum of the mundane roamers, sighing to himself “Goodbye for ever, Wallace”.

The arresting party were soon at the bedroom door, but, getting no entrance, left a guard, the rest going further, asearch; and when, after half-an-hour’s search of the house, the searchers turned up afresh at the bedroom door, determined to break in now, Wallace waited till the work had gone on nearly to completion, then got himself up from tossing on his bed of unease to open, and the troop stepped in to see, not the Wallace whom they knew in Hussar uniform, but an old man panting for breath, his back propped upon the wall, who was understood to want to say to them “You waste your time, Sirs, in seeking Dr. Wallace here, and that will be a kindness to one who is old, is ill, and indeed dying, if you now decide to go away, leaving me to die in peace”.

On which one shouted to the others, “No go! bird’s flown”; and presently the house was empty of them.

As they now pressed against the gale toward the Langham Hotel to grab anything arrestable there, their torches chanced to catch a glimpse of Sir Borlase St. Aubyn clinging like the shipwrecked to some railings, he having made his way hitherward to see officially that the arrest was affected. When he called “Not got him?”, an officer called “Bird flown!”, and pressed on, that not being a night for prattle, but mankind contrived to transact its business as the beasts contrive, finding no need for speaking.

Sir Borlase then turned his step toward Berkeley Square, with the purpose to urge his spouse to come now to his home, since he had not managed to cajole her to this after their marriage that afternoon, she having protested that a reception prevented.

On entering Berkeley Square his heart rather sank to note that the roof and upper part of her house were now down in the Square as were three others of those old buildings, while a fourth, unregarded by any brigade, was now grumbling in a soliloquy of conflagration, behaving as a flambeau to the midnight's drama, it being now long past ten o'clock, the tempest's trumpets now mustering its armies for the over-hurricane.

But the baronet battled on, to batter like a master at the front door; and his rumpus reached the ear of Caroleth Lavarock, who had taken refuge in the kitchen, with her being Paddy, Ivor, the Dowager Duchess of Chumley, the Hogan child lying agaze on some coal-sacks on a table, together with eight or nine domestics, the place an agitation of shines and giant shadows, dashed from a fire dancing mad in its grate, a marionette in rags, the strings of whose mad jigging the gale managed; and there was the glimmering of a single pocket-lamp — as at this hour all hospitals, stations, lifts, houses, colleges, were groping gloomy in a glimmering of pocket-lamps, since other lamps, gas, acetylene, candles, were at once puffed out.

Everything that one did, just to stand, sit, change position, one felt to be a rashness, a blasphemy, a challenge to the spirit of malignity in the gale to select one for laying dead; but Caroleth rose, and with the pocket-lamp scrambled upstairs — had the fancy that it was Wallace at the door, come to her for company in the solitude of the storm's enormousness.

As the door was protected from the gale by the house, she, with the help of the baronet's shoulder, managed to drag it open, and now he stood revealed, not now looking a grandee, but risen up out of death-struggle with the gale as ungraced a ragamuffin of the slums as herself.

Her heart hardened against him...

For since life itself was involved in the storm, and was at any moment likely to end, everything that night lost its old proportions, unrealities vanished, naught but the storm's reality occupying the mind, all ceremony, nicety, amenity of speech appearing trifles: so when the baronet with his mouth in her ear howled into her "Come for you", she, with that offendedness and mare's-kick of women who, loved, do not love, answered with animus "I am not married to you — have a husband — you drove me to it — how dare you go about killing people who haven't even hurt your girl's little finger?"

On her lips leaving his ear, the baronet, leaning toward her, brought his lips near her ear to tell her in a sort of confidence "Look here, damn you — there — take it — I say damn you" — he vanished as the door crashed to its slam, for something like a vacuum was in front of it.

Then, with halts and runs, Caroleth fought the campaign of her way back to the below-stairs, to take her seat again on a kitchen-chair near the grate, the little household-group waiting round her recluse like some group within a room on its way to the moon, blown out of some tube's mouth to roam the ether, some seated on the floor, mute as at a wake, waiting in scare for what the mood of that almighty of the tempest might next decide to do.

The baby sat up, began to bellow, as his round mouth proved, but nobody paid any attention: his reign was over.

And pretty quickly now Caroleth began to question whether she had not been rash, impetuous, in blabbing her fact to the baronet: for might he not now go and do what his promise to her had stopped him from doing at the storm-test? She had noticed no weapon on him, except a cane; but he might have had a weapon. This set her fidgety. After half-an-hour of anxiety she shouted at Ivor, who sat nigh her, "Going to Harley Street".

"Can't do that" — from Ivor: "give a message: I will go".

And Paddy, lifting her head from his shoulder: "I, too".

"You? No", cries Ivor.

“If you can, I can”, says Paddy.

And Caroleth: “Very well, tell him Come”.

When he stood up Paddy stood up, and when he won his first skirmish, the journey to the open, Paddy was his ally, though the so-called “over-hurricane” was now bawling, and murk and turbulence were the world; but, though the moon had now foundered like many another vessel, they could still more or less see, having the pocket-lamp, and having that glare which regions of conflagration gave out, this revealing the grotesque resemblance of every congregation of trees to a navy of ship’s-masts leaning in a breeze, no branch now being on any tree, some stretches of oak-branches, leafless on the ground, having the appearance of heaps of Negroes’ hair. Also the storm was warm, and not to be called wet (in Britain), though there was hail here and there, and local cloudbursts, brief torrents of rain, tropical, if inches within six minutes, and hailstones elsewhere like plums pelting, laying low some. But no drop wetted Ivor and Paddy, though foreigners had wetness enough — flood — a romp of waters sixteen feet deep leaping rollick, with song, down the Rocky Mountains, to drown a thousand in Colorado; cloudbursts in Kansas, Texas; the Republican River in Nebraska, its banks broken, rolling with a cataract’s roaring four miles wide, carrying on its bosom farm-houses that like arks bore travellers on their roofs, and spreading into a lake a hundred miles wide over the plain between Republican and Platte, those dots over all the lake’s face being the bodies of men and cattle. The Alleghany, too, rising forty feet, flooded Pittsburg (Pa.), fire then breaking out in an oil-company’s plant, and when some oil-tanks exploded, the oil, floating ablaze on the flood, set the town aflame; Johnstown, too, on the bursting of the Wilmer Dam, and the submergence of its thirty bridges, was all under water; while at McClelland Town a coal-pit, flooded, was the darksome catacomb of five hundred miners. The Seine

Valley, too, was flooded, and in the Vaucluse country (South France) hundreds of thousands were made homeless, hundreds arriving by boat at an Avignon that was an island in a Rhone Valley that was a sea — this sea hiding hamlets, farmsteads; in Switzerland the Aire, and the Drize, tributaries of the Rhone, overflowed the low regions round Geneva, drowning farms, cutting off houses; in the Ardeche were landslides; and down into that devouring mouth of the sea slid in thousands of tons of flour the cliffs of England, cloud on cloud deciding to slide and fly, at Dover, Folkestone, Cromer... For the sea that night of riot was irrational, like a madman that rends out his hair at a dance, and had “malevolence-of-the-insane”, billows mounting sixty feet to surmount sea-walls and pound promenades that became blizzards of spray, thickets of snakes’ hissings, the raucousness of the waters’ wrath being audible far inland; at Key West (Florida) breakers which grasped a travelling train dragged it off into that gorge of the sea, as crocodiles drag dogs; Gravesend High Street became a river; the wood-blocks of roads were torn up; ‘buses, cars, were soon ploughing slow through rivers in the streets of Chatham, Gillingham; shingle three feet deep buried Hythe promenade, beach-huts being swung like tennis-balls forty feet to the sea-wall, the sea streaming through the streets, barrels, sofas, floating about rooms in West Parade; at Sydney (Australia) a tram was struck three yards from its rails; at our Brighton many tons of water poured into the Aquarium subway, broke through two sets of doors, flooded the forecourt; and though each ship on the sea immediately pelted for shelter, if near shelter, filling the ether with a crisscross of S.O.S., not many rescued themselves, but the benighted carack, battleship, liner, dived forlorn in the vast dark, as light to the storm’s might as the tiny yacht, coble, koff, the boy and dhow and nugger, felucca, xebec; dozens in Southampton Water tossed to be smashed upon the quays of docks; fishingboats, speedboats, motorboats, rowboats, tossed from moorings; tankers at Netley, hoppers, dredgers; lightships themselves becoming wandering lights; lighthouses broken short, like every kind of tower, minar, like factory-chimneys, and in the air like larks factories, railways' engine-sheds, hoardings.

And amid the wreckage strange escapes: near Amiens a man who had a woman tied to his belt, and a baby, while clinging neck-deep to a tree, managed to catch a hut which was floating past, to clamber in, and, roaming about in this sort of craft, rode out the storm; every one of seventy girl-tailors, whose work-rooms were on an upper floor of a gown-factory in St. Martin's (London), were marshalled and marched to safety after an explosion in the basement had thrown the whole fabric aslant; from a cargo-steamer that had turned turtle in the Mersey-mouth, a cabin-boy, by swimming the mountains from off Formby Point, reached Formby Beach; the central span of the Menai Bridge was so far dislodged, one could not see why the bridge was not destroyed, but it lived through; a French ketch, anchored in a Land's End bay, dragged, drifted, but, even as she sank, her four, and a dog, were got into the Sennen lifeboat, and survived; so, too, as regards a Dunkirk-Channel boat, which, her propeller having picked up a wire, was entangled and trapped in Folkestone Harbour: an improbable tug that took her in tow for Dover got there safe. And heavenly like the escapes, the heroisms, fidelities to very death. It appears that people who work for a world — nurses, lifeboat-men, scientists, firemen, postmen, coastguards — work with more happiness and heartiness than those who toil for an “employer's” pocket and for their own stomach's comfort: when at the start of the storm shops were besieged for candles, oil, and when these turned out unserviceable, nurses were still not defeated — wrote their reports by the shabby sheen of flashlamps; all round our shores propellers were racing when sterns shot upward, hand-gear was being tried for steering when fires, bursting out, burned steering-gear pipes, sinkings were occurring 6 per minute: yet everywhere lifeboats and tugs dared to try to answer distress-signals; the Ramsgate lifeboat, attracted by a motor-tanker blown on to the Goodwins near the Brake Lightship, dashed out, found the tanker shipping each sea that towered, found her too bulky to be towed, but stood-by over an hour, tholing all that warfare of waters, till the tanker sank; five of the Yarmouth (Isle of Wight) lifeboat-crew had the audacity to dash out in a rowing-boat, on catching the dark outcries of a brig's skipper, who in a dinghy was rowing from her; they could not see him; he and they perished, but when a motorboat was towing a coal-barge over Plymouth Sound, and, on the tow-rope parting, both foundered, a lifeboat that was thereabout came up in time to rescue two of the motorboat's crew; and when the Salcombe (Devon) lifeboat tried to put to sea to a coasting-steamer anchored off Bolt Head, tried five times to cross the estuary-bar, and failed, her engine deficient in horse-power, another town's boat issued out auxiliary into the war, crossed, did the trick of victory; as to firemen, some fought all night, some standing on rafts, having on gas-masks, some, when acetylene gave out, fighting on by the shine of arc-lamps whose dynamos their fire-engines incited; when gaswork-furnaces at Worthing were flooded, the brigade there worked until daybreak, stubbornly pumping four thousand gallons a minute; one postman, driving the Brighton-to-Arundel nightmail-van, but blocked by a world of waters at Worthing, tried four roads, a miner in the colliery of the night, was tossed aloft, thrice ruined, crucified on the cross of the gale, degraded to a rag, to a gashed Scaramouch, a laughing-stock, but at daybreak actually presented himself and his van at Arundel, conqueror of the strong. He had survived (about two a.m.) things more terrific still than Ivor and Paddy when they did their trip to Harley Street, their chief peril being the shell-fire of tiles, slates, bricks, flying all about, like snowstorm of brimstone upon Sodom: for though, all pylons being down, wires galore entangled all roads, most ‘phone-poles bringing down wire-entanglements of some forty wires, and though there was no lack of high-tension cables of grid lines on the ground, the peril of live wires was insignificant, since fires had started in main-control chambers, switchboards had blown up, as had distribution fuse-boxes, junction-boxes, manhole-covers been shot into the air: so that not long after the start of the storm no electric light or power was in any hotel, hospital, cinema, theatre, street, tramcar, trolley-bus, tube, house — except in some country-house provided with private-dynamo. But for Ivor and Paddy there was that missile danger, tiles, tiles, a manhole danger, too, a danger of being dashed too violently flat to survive. In Bond Street they were led pelting eastward astray with long-legged strides down a side-street (Brook Street), their run stumbling through the débris of bedsteads, sideboards, glass, wall, that cumbered all the street, until down they tumbled together, and lay still, astounded. Then, seeing a broken doorway, now wide as a gateway, near, Ivor, after getting himself up, grasped Paddy to his heart, and started to gain that opening; went down again with her; but again adventured, now to stagger in, and to butt against a taxicab that the gale had battered the doorway with, before depositing the cab in the “hall”. Into this cab they got, to sit gasping, exhausted, and get breath. And presently Paddy’s shouted whisper into Ivor’s ear: “Let it, I don’t care, do you?”

And Ivor’s shouted whisper: “Ah!”

And Paddy’s: “Kiss me!”

And Ivor’s: “Ah, Darling, not now”.

And Paddy’s: “Yes!”

And Ivor’s: “Soon! Let’s go on”.

Now the Puritan fellow forced himself, stood up, they went out anew, down to the bottom of Bond Street, into Oxford Street, where they saw a cloth-store caught gaily aloft, as paper-bags are, and there, too, sighted one woman — Ah, the wild soul, caught somewhither on her lorn orbit, baulked, lost, but obstinate. They were advancing in dashes, with respites to breathe, seizing chances, having the wind on their backs, but she was attempting to make head in the teeth of it, bent westward, her hair stretched rigid as glass between her head and the gale, flag of her distress and her temerity; and she seemed to have a child! — some white weight — the rags still left to her of something like a chemise reaching eastward away from her shoulders, struggling to leave her and soar to gaiety. Her only of women they encountered in their trip, London now cowering in its cellars, kitchens, undergrounds, all ear and fear, but in Vere Street they saw a man, taking breath apparently, embracing some railings — saw without knowing him, or he them, though it was Paddy's father.

For he, as Caroleth had apprehended, had made his way to Harley Street after leaving her — dark-minded that night, the baronet, dangerous, having no gun now, but having a cane, a flash-lamp, and fingers which worked, itching to give the world tit for tat. At Harley Street, indeed, he had seen only an old man on a bed, who somehow seemed to be Dr. Warwick, seemed to be near death; and without making any attempt to say anything, he had glanced and gone away — his angriness now uglier against Caroleth and against Hogan than against Wallace. “Horrid dog!” he called to the gale — that Hogan who had had his girl and had kept her dark from him, whose absurdities had brought upon the world this storm, had burst up the Old Men war-host, so that baronets now would have need to work for their grub, like their game-keepers: he'd draw a razor across his throat first. Noxious and turbulent as the night, murky, inclement, was his mind that night.

Out in the street again, he said “Flog the dog”, and although Hogan was leagues distant from him, and to get at Hogan was to go against the gale, he had leisure for the campaign, could hardly go home and tamely sit, waiting to be blown to hell away, supposing that any home was still left him. So he set out, and four hours later, by no little trickiness and tactics, did actually achieve, reaching Chiswick streaming with blood, worn out to feebleness, a red wretch of shreds, but still stubbornly invincible, the last incidents of his battle having been through the over-over-hurricane.

At Hogan’s gate down he dropped smitten, his mouth agape, his ribs and hollow belly labouring for breath.

Afterwards he sat apart on the door-sill, having now the villa between the wind and him; but presently sprang up to start a battery with the knocker of the dark dwelling; and, having for a long time no reply, kept on with angry doggedness, battering and battering, to brag as gross as that baritone of the hurricane’s throat. And Hogan came at last, he, it appears, having been seated in his kitchen with his wife, in darkness — for apparently he had no flash-light — until a conjecture had arisen within him, then a conviction, that someone, perhaps homeless, was clamouring at his door: and that moved him to come.

“What, you?” he howled, as he won the door open, for the baronet’s pocket-lamp was on; and that was all that was uttered at the door, Hogan knowing that the other was there for no good, the two now going into the little “parlour”, where Hogan at once got a pencil from a desk, rent off a book-cover, and turned to proffer them to Sir Borlase with the cry, “Write!”; but, as he turned, now presenting his front, Sir Borlase, without any word, with a blanched lip of venom, venomously slashed his face with the cane.

Upon which Hogan managed to shy behind a table, bawling aloud, as at a fire which breaks out, “Why, the man’s mad!”, bawling aloud also, with a throat all engorged, at the fire which gave chase “Strike again, You, and I down you!”; but whether or not Sir Borlase heard this, he was not deterred, nor deterred by the chair which Hogan now snatched up by two of its legs: the check to snatch which so damaged his aheadness, that Sir Borlase caught him, slashed; and, as again the cane came in agony across his nose, Hogan’s chair crashed upon his antagonist’s cranium.

Now the baronet went knock-kneed and wobbled, appeared to stand reflecting on things a little, doddering, tottering, until he decided to drop ponderously upon his right side, and lie still.

Over him Hogan, holding the pocket-lamp, stooped agaze, investigating, but smitten stupid, devoid of thought, his eyes moving a little from side to side, as when one reflects, but empty of reflection. Was it death? All at once he fled away, vaulting through the broken bay-window, out into the torment of the storm...

Murder, wild winds of the night...

Running before the wind, lifted sometimes into runnings on his toes, hunted into caprices of haste, sudden tackings toward this interest or that, like a ship running capricious without rudder, like a silly fowl which is chased, he roamed far eastward at random, all gone, God-forsaken, during two hours, being powerfully built, and, thrice downed, he thrice survived. Sometimes his fist shot aloft to shake menaces at the heavens.

Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!

Night of outrage, and the break-up of the fountains of the Great Deep. Murderous that mood of the storm, and that was well, that was God’s mood; but shall a man do murder with his hand upon the son of man, to smirch his hand eternally? That’s hard happening.

“False gods!” he cried aloud: “idols of the mind! Baal, Chemosh, Asmodeus, Jove, Jehovah, Rimmon! The father is Osiris, the son is Horus, the holy ghost is Astaroth of Babylon, associated with the dove. No more, You! I am through with you! through with you!”

Blow away! wrench out the hairs of your distraction for scattering! rage! blow!

His arm rose heavenward in threat, but then his heart smote him, and, his palms covering his face, he broke into sobbing, like a boy: for it was hard to part from them.

And almost at the same time, his mind being blown about like his body, he had thoughts of Paddy St. Aubyn, lewd emotions at the hope that now he might have her, her father out of the way, murdered by the storm, for all murders in the dismal abyss of that midnight’s turmoil were murders by the storm.

He did not know that Paddy had now found another from whom she could hardly be parted — though there was some parting that midnight when that other permitted her to start back homeward alone from Harley Street.

For when they two had been blown into the doorless house, had looked about for Wallace, and not found, and when they had stood over the bed where an old man lay, their flash-lamps’ shine touching his face, Ivor had started with a mutter, “My father!” — long lost, now found, and found apparently at the point of death — though dying was conscious, for, taking Paddy’s hand, he patted it, and smiled, then patted Ivor’s hand, and smiled.

Not knowing now what to do, they remained some time seated on the bed, one on either side of him, hearing the roaring of that swollen Rhone of the wind rolling ceaseless on its road, the wee glowlamp effulging a local smudge of sheen in their gloom.

To Ivor, meanwhile, it was not inconceivable that Warwick might be no other than Wallace transformed, for he himself had experienced miracles, and well knew now that there were more quintessences in heaven and earth than were dreamt of in his electro-chemistry. And though Wallace, in restoring him, had told him that no more of the moly remained among men, Ivor divined that Caroleth might have some, since Caroleth had promised to restore him, if Wallace did not. So now he composed with his palms an arch over his mouth to shout close at the old man "Shall we go and tell Miss Lavarock?"

But, as the old man did not appear to hear, he now rose, ran out, and after scrambling down over the house-door and furniture that now encumbered the stair, unearthed a pencil at a desk below, the back of a writing-pad, then, on clambering back up, shed shine on the cardboard to show "Shall we go now and tell Miss Lavarock?"

The old man smiled a tired smile; his head shook "No".

Then once more they remained idly seated on the bed, hearing the tempest deepen now to the bass of a still profounder rumpus, rise to shrieks more gibbering still of beings streaming in affrighted flight; until the old soul seemed to take a turn for the worse, his respiration more precarious, nose more livid, eyes more sunken; and now Paddy, having caught sight of water spilled over the floor, dipped her palm in, to console with the wet the sick temples.

Then once more they remained listlessly seated.

Till Paddy, taking board and pencil, wrote, "After all, we must take some answer to Caroleth."

Ivor replied "Should we reach her? wind ahead?"

And Paddy: "Might try".

And Ivor: "Could I leave him like this?"

And Paddy: "You stay, I'll go".

This horrified him; but she jumped up at once, and he let her go solitary.

Three minutes after, though, he realized that he still had the flash-lamp, she in darkness, and now he dashed down and out — soon to catch her, for she had not gained much: and they moved on together, getting a foot and again a foot, actually at last to gain Berkeley Square before two in the ‘foreday. It was Paddy who had won best through, Ivor having been struck by a tile over the eye, and the only rags left him were on one leg, whereas Paddy, not bleeding, remained decent in a petticoat’s relics. When they re-entered that underground where the household-group mutely awaited in their fireshine’s jig whatever vials of doom the gale’s will might design to empty upon their heads, Ivor dropped helpless upon the chair which he had left, all but unconscious, his breath scraping raucous. It was Paddy who wrote for Caroleth “No Wallace. Dr. Warwick there sick.”

When Caroleth had reflected a little on this, she presently wrote to Paddy “It is all right: Warwick has a panacea which he will drink”.

Now Paddy went to wet one of her tatters under a tap, with it wiped Ivor’s wound, bound his brow round... Finally his eyes opened, and before long now he saw what Caroleth had written to Paddy, “Warwick has a panacea...”, on which at once he wrote to Caroleth “If he could get up to get panacea, he has none, if Warwick is Wallace, who told me there may be no more panacea for two thousand years”.

But since to Caroleth this was incredible, she took it coolly, continued to sit brooding, looking at the versatility of the fireshine’s flightiness: for she had always presumed that Dr. Warwick had discovered the moly in the course of his studies, and could produce as much of it as he chose: so, if Wallace had now had cause to drink some of the old-age alkahest — probably to escape arrest after the storm-test — he would naturally have by him some of the youth-moly to swallow after. But her wits were quicker than common, and, as she sat there pondering with awe upon that Pehlevi of the storm's oratory, a lamp of understanding flashed up in her scone: for which "scientists", she now asked herself, were they who had poured out at Wallace's orison this pentecost of mighty rushing wind? She was herself a scientist, and certainly they were no earthly "scientists", but scientists having finer ears than cats', quick to catch that which is stirring among the worlds, and what some heart is hankering after in some azimuth afar. Aye, there had been one night diviner than all night-times round about Penpolack townlet in Cornwall, a night impregnated with trillings of such stars as sing together and ring like chimes of Christmas midnights, when astral influences had moved human souls to dreams that teemed with meanings more mysterious than gnomes gloat on, with oglings: the "scientists" had been there then: no terrestrial scientists; visitants from abroad: their keel it was which had left that dent in Penpolack beach, they who had rooted up Carew's Clause yew; and it was true that Wallace had bestowed upon Ivor and Paddy the last of the life-hellebore, for it was from those scientists that he had had it — with the diamonds.

Caroleth sprang up. But what was the good? No key! She sat again.

When the first crackle of the catastrophe of the upper part of the house had occurred, she had rushed toward her bedchamber to get the hellebore from a trunk, but then a sudden had rushed in the other direction to rescue herself; and the trunk was now down in the Square — if not soaring in the air. But supposing she found, how open it? Her bunch of keys had reeled away with the bedchamber and the trunk.

But presently after she had started up and sat again a kitchen-maid came to give coals to the fire, and to poke it, for light, not for warmth, not with the bigger kitchen-poker, but with a small stick which was pointed: at sight of which, Caroleth had the notion that with this she might contrive to prise the trunk open: and once more with sprightly eyes she was up.

Now she bound a dishclout close about her skull, gipsy-like; she girt her loins firmly about with cloths; and, guessing what it was that Ivor cried at her (“Shall I come?”), her head shook “No” at him, as she dashed out and vanished, with the flash-lamp.

Nor was it long before she found out the trunk emboxed under a hotchpotch of débris — blocks of wardrobe, bricks, beds; and though she could not, standing, move this, for now it was two o’clock, now the wings of the “over-over-hurricane” were urgently stretched whither they listed, lightsome its flight, mighty the largeness of the laughter of its emancipation attained: so that if, standing, she attempted to put forth any force, she became weightless, or down she went; but, by lying to windward of a pile of wreckage, which checked her rolling, and by clinging, she contrived to shift things by the Turmoil — 367 force of her legs, thus getting finally at the trunk; nor did she need to use the little poker on it, both its hinges being now broken, and when she had revolved the lid to crack it off the lock, her hand dived, and quickly had the phial of elixir-drops.

Now with all canvas spread she kept adjusting her helm to scud before the storm — straw caught in cosmic transactions, wafted like dust-clouds drawn all abroad in subtropic Moroccos when the sirocco romps; but she was cunning — Mind versus Might — and not once was overturned, for every time she was obliged to stop for breath, promptly she dropped upon her face, and every time she felt herself being enticed to fly, she preferred the earth, promptly she dropped, and clung to something. When at last she skedaddled into the Harley Street house, her throat giggled a little, uttering “Aye”, and “Aye”, uneasy glee, risky victory...

The front half of the house was now down, but the stair still there intact: so, after managing to clamber the wreckage which strewed it, she soon stood over the old man in the bed-chamber, and “Oh, poor!” she muttered,

“he took too much”, seeing his condition in the lamp-flash — though he was still conscious, smiled with her.

At once she lifted his head, kissed his cheek, put the ule of youth to his lips...

But there was a difficulty little expected — the fence of his fixed teeth, his head shaken at her, seeming to beseech her to let him die in quietness.

Nonplussed she stood at it, understanding now that it must be far from entering his head that this which she presented him was that syrup of virtue, since he was certain that none was now on earth, nor could she be heard, if she cried it aloud, nor could write to him — had come without the pencil!

“Now, how trying!” she cried: for he, knowing that any medicine, but one, would only prolong his sorrow, would not let her, never thinking that this could be that one.

However, on going in search, and observing a hairbrush in the grate, she snatched up this, ran back, and now set forcefully to coax him to let her win its silver handle between his teeth. This finally, tired at her persistence, he did, and the instant she had his bps split and fixed, she tipped the elixir in.

When he started, sat upright, retching, coughing, she knew that he had duly swallowed; and when, with eyeballs agaze, he jerked rigid, to lie as one berthed stiffstark for the grave, she said “He is in the Kief” (trance).

Then for many minutes she kept vigil, anon switching the flashlight upon the magic-lantern jumps of his changing, watching him change each minute into sixty other men, hearkening with awe in the dark intervals at that darksome soliloquy that the storm talked, thinking in her heart “Ah, dark-minded night-time! in what longitude at this hour are voices of the foundered not shouting outcries all forlorn, which are swallowed up and lost, caught away out of the mouth itself, never to be heard in heaven nor heard on earth? nor does the foundering know if it is the row of the oceans that drowns his howl or the row of the winds, for the wind imitates the theme of the sea, mouthing the thing that breakers meant to utter through many a dim millennium when they broke and roared, and broke and broke and mourned, on Silurian coasts before the moon was cold... He is in the sleep”.

Not long in the sleep! All at once the flying eyes of a fellow wildly alive were there awake, he saying to her “Hello, Giglot! Hello, Moppet! Sweet Quean! Housemaid! Harlot! I hate you! You’ve been and married—”

Smiling, her head shook No at him, for, with her lively intelligence, she could divine by watching his lips’ business what he wanted to say, as the deaf divine.

And he: “But how come I — ? I feel quite — ! But storm, eh? Storm! My God! An hour hence where shall you and I be found — ?” Now, seeing his psycho phone lying beside his pillow, he clapped it upon his brow, about to announce to those astral rambles that the storm had duly come, but come in a mood all too cosmic for mortal man, when the dog, Guncotton, darting into the room, threw his paws upon the bed, pressingly barking; and since Wallace’s own sense of smell was super-normally bright whenever the psychophone was on his brow, he now suddenly let out the howl, “I smell something! the house is going!” — bounding now out of the bed to catch up Caroleth in his arms, to dash with her, mouth to mouth, out of the room, she at the stair-head separating her lips from his to shout “You will fall!”; but of course, he did not hear, and, not knowing that the stair was all encumbered, down he went tumbling, and she; without much hurt, however; in some moments he had found her, his mouth had found out hers, as he now spurted with her, lip to lip, into the little high-walled yard at the back; nor were they well in it, when all the hind-walls of the house reluctantly decided to nod, to rush down, more or less upon them, in solid and in clouds of powder. But not far an instant could his lips be riven to relinquish their feast of sweetmeat; now that his arms had her, he was hardly the species of bull-dog to let her go before she was his; but in the haste and awkwardness of their mixing he was bitterly conscious all the time of some splinter, of pitcher or bottle, cutting his shin, she bitterly conscious of some spike of mortar sticking into her spine, and of his psychophone afflicting her forehead, both inwardly aware that, if they had had the strength of will to wait some seconds, no sense of trouble might have infected their blessedness, yet, aware, too, of impending doom, thinking “Let us eat and drink, for in a trice we die”...

XXVII. MORNING

NOW DAWN WAS not far; but, ah, the bleakness of the meanings of that dawning day, and the weird sweet things that the pealing of the symphonies of the winds told to the poet's soul, that no pen may tell.

Supposing that the poet was not very hungry! — in which respect Caroleth and Wallace had luck, for in the part of the Langham Hotel that still stood they procured something to eat; then, going together to see London, saw in Oxford Street a great congregation of people flocking round one coffee-stall — though there was no (hot) coffee, for the storm, considerably mollified, was still boisterous, bleak, singing now its sweet swan-song of Saint Saens, nor certainly had most of that tatterdemallion multitude any money on them to purchase coffee, but were there just to be in the neighbourhood of coffee, and enjoy the thought of coffee. Yet their hunger was not grievous to bear like the hunger of the old civilization's needy, in each bosom now burgeoning a certain joyance at the knowledge of a more abundant earth come that morning to birth.

Also, in Knightsbridge, Caroleth and Wallace had the sight of a march into London of a detachment of Young Men — the Second Rutherfords — its band rendering the Niebelungen March; the rags of its flags garrulous on the gale; and all along its ranks girls, stretching their legs, marching in rags which yet managed to be becoming, some with tripudiary feet that, yielding to the new era's mood, reeled in dance; one and another of which girls some Young Man in marching hugged, gave her a taste of his emergency ration, between young man and girl being a comradeship, and they understand each other; and before noon, as the Young Men troops continued to pour into the London barracks through the London streets, London completely verted from Old Men to Young Men: hosts of girls got garlands of home-made flowers to crown the conquerors' foreheads; whatever bells hung still aloft broke into pæans of welcome; flags fluttering from millions of house-windows; crowds singing in streets; and that midnight torchlight processions everywhere marched, not in London only, in honour of the new era here, when men were to love as the Young Men loved, not their unreal selves, but that Real One.

Then, after witnessing that march-in of the Rutherfords, Caroleth and Wallace revisited the environs of Harley Street, and, on finding Wallace's motor-car quite sound in its mews, by eleven o'clock were taking off from Hendon for the air, America their aim: for it had been decided that Crichton of Iraq was to be the guiding mind in England, while Wallace was to see what America wanted him to be to it, one of Caroleth's sayings being, "Give me a new New World, and I will give you a young Old World".

So they set off westward in haste — not foppishly dressed for a long voyage! she with her skull still bound about with a kitchen-cloth, and her occupation was to keep decently repressed her breasts' propensity to break prison and exhibit their pretty berries: so that when they were over that southward bend of the Thames where the last battle had been, he said to her "You look a malkin; but, then, the lady fights up, triumphs, pries through. What startles me is rather your morals: during the night of your marriage-day you 'misconduct yourself', as they say; the morning after the marriage you fly off — literally — with another man: 'oâh, shockan!' as the French say".

And she: "Light o' Love? Is that it"? — their voices noising in a sort of song, as on some orb where there's no talking, but voice calls to voice in song, as when the sailor's tenor, all involved in wawlings of winds, sings out aloft "Aye, aye", and "Aye, aye": for the blast ran brabbling past the aeroplane's tramp as the spattering breath of brazing-lamps brays... "Light o' love? but if I was brought up to consider adultery unladylike? Don't guess so wide. I had a sufficient reason for going through a marriage-form with Sir Borlase St. Aubyn; but as I happened to be already married—"

"You were, Caroleth? Married to whom?"

"To you. Hence the event in the storm, which was not so lawless as you thought. Pity, eh? You like it lawless".

Wallace sat bewildered. "Married to me... That, too, was an unreal marriage, Young Lady, the bridegroom did it asleep".

"You were awake. Have you forgotten an old lady named Felicia Warwick whom you once professed to adore? I am — as to say — she".

But this was too much for the brain to take in at once; a superhet's minute of silence, to "heat-up", moved by, Wallace's brows peering keenly at her, as when Rontgen peered at the miracle of his digits' phalanges visible in x-rays. He breathed "Tell me..." and when she told how she had pilfered some of the moly, labelled "poison", to commit suicide, and had been made young instead, then had pilfered more, and now had given him the whole of this, he dropped upon her, his sobs got out "My own, my home — innate mate — I had an instinct — dear to me, nearer than breathing, wife twice"; and when she had pecked a kiss at his hair, and said "Get up", she added "Now you tell: how did you get the elecampane? who are they who sent the gale?"

But he drew in his breath. "Mustn't tell! 'Improper'! I promised".

And she: "You think I don't know? They were — from Mars".

“Hm”, he went: “Mars, eh? There are more swimmers in the Sea than poor little Mars, and our little sun doesn’t count in the crowd”.

“Whoever they are”, she said, “they have a heavy hand. All the cities seemed bombed. That wood down there — not one bough. They’ve wrecked civilization”.

“Dear me”, he answered, “you, too, say ‘Wreck civilization’ — one of those epidemics of phrase that come upon men: ‘the next war will wreck civilization’... The storm has more wrecked civilization than a thousand armies could in a thousand years: but for how long? three weeks? In three months it will be as forgotten as Lisbon in three months forgot its earthquake. Civilization is telephoning, and to wreck that, no scientist must be left anywhere, no mechanic, no text-book — can’t be wrecked by hundreds of storms, thousands of wars. Roman civilization could be wrecked, Greek, Assyrian, infant civilization, village civilization; but what is true of an infant thing may contain no trace of truth as to an adult thing: an infant may be wrecked by dropping from a nurse’s arms, but a policeman can’t be wrecked by dropping from a nurse’s arms; rain may crush a lettuce seedling, but hail cannot a little beat down a beech-tree. Rome was a village (in tone): Cæsar couldn’t fly to America — no America; couldn’t wireless to Australia — no Australia; and the Roman empire was a real empire, its villager bits paying tribute to its chief village; but there’s no British Empire — that’s nonsense; such a thing as a modern empire is impossible outside China, where, too, it is becoming impossible, because the concept ‘world’ has been born, and mankind is emerging from the villager type. So our civilization can’t be ‘wrecked’. Inconveniences like wars, storms, are of no importance: what causes misery is not the turbulences of Nature or of men, but men’s inertia, the senility of their forgiveingness, their meekness toward adventurers. They are told ‘forgive seventy times’, and they proceed to forgive seventy million times, for 'tis their nature to forgive and be lazy. Out of two hundred million people in India a score or so have had the pluck to sit on elephants, and say with a wink 'We are Kings, India is ours', and century after century the millions toil on in chronic sorrow, tilling for the good of those few soil which is their own, sluggishly forgiving all the grossness of the wrong done them, though just fifty daggers dug into fifty guts would for ever end their agonies — cursed are the meek! for they shall not inherit the earth..."

She said "Look down and see something..."

Now they saw the sea trotting with wandering feet along beneath, its breezes on their brow with an exultant message of freshness, and in their outlook a boundlessness of mountain summits.

TO

MY DEAR MOTHER

THE RACE OF ORVEN

NEVER WITHOUT GRIEF and pain could I remember the fate of Prince Zaleski — victim of a too importunate, too unfortunate Love, which the fulgor of the throne itself could not abash; exile perforce from his native land, and voluntary exile from the rest of men! Having renounced the world, over which, lurid and inscrutable as a falling star, he had passed, the world quickly ceased to wonder at him; and even I, to whom, more than to another, the workings of that just and passionate mind had been revealed, half forgot him in the rush of things.

But during the time that what was called the ‘Pharanx labyrinth’ was exercising many of the heaviest brains in the land, my thought turned repeatedly to him; and even when the affair had passed from the general attention, a bright day in Spring, combined perhaps with a latent mistrust of the dénoûment of that dark plot, drew me to his place of hermitage.

I reached the gloomy abode of my friend as the sun set. It was a vast palace of the older world standing lonely in the midst of woodland, and approached by a sombre avenue of poplars and cypresses, through which the sunlight hardly pierced. Up this I passed, and seeking out the deserted stables (which I found all too dilapidated to afford shelter) finally put up my calèche in the ruined sacristy of an old Dominican chapel, and turned my mare loose to browse for the night on a paddock behind the domain.

As I pushed back the open front door and entered the mansion, I could not but wonder at the saturnine fancy that had led this wayward man to select a brooding-place so desolate for the passage of his days. I regarded it as a vast tomb of Mausolus in which lay deep sepulchred how much genius, culture, brilliancy, power! The hall was constructed in the manner of a Roman atrium, and from the oblong pool of turgid water in the centre a troop of fat and otiose rats fled weakly squealing at my approach. I mounted by broken marble steps to the corridors running round the open space, and thence pursued my way through a mazeland of apartments — suite upon suite — along many a length of passage, up and down many stairs. Dust-clouds rose from the uncarpeted floors and choked me; incontinent Echo coughed answering ricochets to my footsteps in the gathering darkness, and added emphasis to the funereal gloom of the dwelling. Nowhere was there a vestige of furniture — nowhere a trace of human life.

After a long interval I came, in a remote tower of the building and near its utmost summit, to a richly-carpeted passage, from the ceiling of which three mosaic lamps shed dim violet, scarlet and pale-rose lights around. At the end I perceived two figures standing as if in silent guard on each side of a door tapestried with the python's skin. One was a post-replica in Parian marble of the nude Aphrodite of Cnidus; in the other I recognised the gigantic form of the negro Ham, the prince's only attendant, whose fierce, and glistening, and ebon visage broadened into a grin of intelligence as I came nearer. Nodding to him, I pushed without ceremony into Zaleski's apartment.

The room was not a large one, but lofty. Even in the semi-darkness of the very faint greenish lustre radiated from an open censerlike lampas of fretted gold in the centre of the domed encausted roof, a certain incongruity of barbaric gorgeousness in the furnishing filled me with amazement. The air was heavy with the scented odour of this light, and the fumes of the narcotic cannabis sativa — the base of the bhang of the Mohammedans — in which I knew it to be the habit of my friend to assuage himself. The hangings were of wine-coloured velvet, heavy, gold-fringed and embroidered at Nurshedabad. All the world knew Prince Zaleski to be a consummate cognoscente — a profound amateur — as well as a savant and a thinker; but I was, nevertheless, astounded at the mere multitudinousness of the curios he had contrived to crowd into the space around him. Side by side rested a palaeolithic implement, a Chinese ‘wise man,’ a Gnostic gem, an amphora of Graeco-Etruscan work. The general effect was a bizarrerie of half-weird sheen and gloom. Flemish sepulchral brasses companied strangely with runic tablets, miniature paintings, a winged bull, Tamil scriptures on lacquered leaves of the talipot, mediaeval reliquaries richly gemmed, Brahmin gods. One whole side of the room was occupied by an organ whose thunder in that circumscribed place must have set all these relics of dead epochs clashing and jingling in fantastic dances. As I entered, the vaporous atmosphere was palpitating to the low, liquid tinkling of an invisible musical box. The prince reclined on a couch from which a draping of cloth-of-silver rolled torrent over the floor. Beside him, stretched in its open sarcophagus which rested on three brazen trestles, lay the mummy of an ancient Memphian, from the upper part of which the brown cerements had rotted or been rent, leaving the hideousness of the naked, grinning countenance exposed to view.

Discarding his gemmed chibouque and an old vellum reprint of Anacreon, Zaleski rose hastily and greeted me with warmth, muttering at the same time some commonplace about his ‘pleasure’ and the ‘unexpectedness’ of my visit. He then gave orders to Ham to prepare me a bed in one of the adjoining chambers. We passed the greater part of the night in a delightful stream of that somnolent and half-mystic talk which Prince Zaleski alone could initiate and sustain, during which he repeatedly pressed on me a concoction of Indian hemp resembling hashish, prepared by his own hands, and quite innocuous. It was after a simple breakfast the next morning that I entered on the subject which was partly the occasion of my visit. He lay back on his couch, volumed in a Turkish beneesh, and listened to me, a little wearily perhaps at first, with woven fingers, and the pale inverted eyes of old anchorites and astrologers, the moony greenish light falling on his always wan features.

‘You knew Lord Pharanx?’ I asked.

‘I have met him in “the world.” His son Lord Randolph, too, I saw once at Court at Peterhof, and once again at the Winter Palace of the Tsar. I noticed in their great stature, shaggy heads of hair, ears of a very peculiar conformation, and a certain aggressiveness of demeanour — a strong likeness between father and son.’

I had brought with me a bundle of old newspapers, and comparing these as I went on, I proceeded to lay the incidents before him.

‘The father,’ I said, ‘held, as you know, high office in a late Administration, and was one of our big luminaries in politics; he has also been President of the Council of several learned societies, and author of a book on Modern Ethics. His son was rapidly rising to eminence in the corps diplomatique, and lately (though, strictly speaking, unebenbürtig) contracted an affiance with the Prinzessin Charlotte Mariana Natalia of Morgen-üppigen, a lady with a strain of indubitable Hohenzollern blood in her royal veins. The Orven family is a very old and distinguished one, though — especially in modern days — far from wealthy. However, some little time after Randolph had become engaged to this royal lady, the father insured his life for immense sums in various offices both in England and America, and the reproach of poverty is now swept from the race. Six months ago, almost simultaneously, both father and son resigned their various positions en bloc. But all this, of course, I am telling you on the assumption that you have not already read it in the papers.’

‘A modern newspaper,’ he said, ‘being what it mostly is, is the one thing insupportable to me at present. Believe me, I never see one.’

‘Well, then, Lord Pharanx, as I said, threw up his posts in the fulness of his vigour, and retired to one of his country seats. A good many years ago, he and Randolph had a terrible row over some trifle, and, with the implacability that distinguishes their race, had not since exchanged a word. But some little time after the retirement of the father, a message was despatched by him to the son, who was then in India. Considered as the first step in the rapprochement of this proud and selfish pair of beings, it was an altogether remarkable message, and was subsequently deposed to in evidence by a telegraph official; it ran:

“Return. The beginning of the end is come.” Whereupon Randolph did return, and in three months from the date of his landing in England, Lord Pharanx was dead.’

‘Murdered?’

A certain something in the tone in which this word was uttered by Zaleski puzzled me. It left me uncertain whether he had addressed to me an exclamation of conviction, or a simple question. I must have looked this feeling, for he said at once:

‘I could easily, from your manner, surmise as much, you know. Perhaps I might even have foretold it, years ago.’

‘Foretold — what? Not the murder of Lord Pharanx?’

‘Something of that kind,’ he answered with a smile; ‘but proceed — tell me all the facts you know.’

Word-mysteries of this sort fell frequent from the lips of the prince. I continued the narrative.

‘The two, then, met, and were reconciled. But it was a reconciliation without cordiality, without affection — a shaking of hands across a barrier of brass; and even this hand-shaking was a strictly metaphorical one, for they do not seem ever to have got beyond the interchange of a frigid bow. The opportunities, however, for observation were few. Soon after Randolph's arrival at Orven Hall, his father entered on a life of the most absolute seclusion. The mansion is an old three-storied one, the top floor consisting for the most part of sleeping-rooms, the first of a library, drawing-room, and so on, and the ground-floor, in addition to the dining and other ordinary rooms, of another small library, looking out (at the side of the house) on a low balcony, which, in turn, looks on a lawn dotted with flower-beds. It was this smaller library on the ground-floor that was now divested of its books, and converted into a bedroom for the earl. Hither he migrated, and here he lived, scarcely ever leaving it. Randolph, on his part, moved to a room on the first floor immediately above this. Some of the retainers of the family were dismissed, and on the remaining few fell a hush of expectancy, a sense of wonder, as to what these things boded. A great enforced quiet pervaded the building, the least undue noise in any part being sure to be followed by the angry voice of the master demanding the cause. Once, as the servants were supping in the kitchen on the side of the house most remote from that which he occupied, Lord Pharanx, slippered and in dressing-gown, appeared at the doorway, purple with rage, threatening to pack the whole company of them out of doors if they did not moderate the clatter of their knives and forks. He had always been regarded with fear in his own household, and the very sound of his voice now became a terror. His food was taken to him in the room he had made his habitation, and it was remarked that, though simple before in his gustatory tastes, he now — possibly owing to the sedentary life he led — became fastidious, insisting on recherché bits. I mention all these details to you — as I shall mention others — not because they have the least connection with the tragedy as it subsequently occurred, but merely because I know them, and you have requested me to state all I know.'

'Yes,' he answered, with a suspicion of ennui, 'you are right. I may as well hear the whole — if I must hear a part.'

'Meanwhile, Randolph appears to have visited the earl at least once a day. In such retirement did he, too, live that many of his friends still supposed him to be in India. There was only one respect in which he broke through this privacy. You know, of course, that the Orvens are, and, I believe, always have been, noted as the most obstinate, the most crabbed of Conservatives in politics. Even among the past-enamoured families of England, they stand out conspicuously in this respect. Is it credible to you, then, that Randolph should offer himself to the Radical Association of the Borough of Orven as a candidate for the next election in opposition to the sitting member? It is on record, too, that he spoke at three public meetings — reported in local papers — at which he avowed his political conversion; afterwards laid the foundation-stone of a new Baptist chapel; presided at a Methodist tea-meeting; and taking an abnormal interest in the debased condition of the labourers in the villages round, fitted up as a class-room an apartment on the top floor at Orven Hall, and gathered round him on two evenings in every week a class of yokels, whom he proceeded to cram with demonstrations in elementary mechanics.'

'Mechanics!' cried Zaleski, starting upright for a moment, 'mechanics to agricultural labourers! Why not elementary chemistry? Why not elementary botany? Why mechanics?'

This was the first evidence of interest he had shown in the story. I was pleased, but answered:

'The point is unimportant; and there really is no accounting for the vagaries of such a man. He wished, I imagine, to give some idea to the young illiterates of the simple laws of motion and force. But now I come to a new character in the drama — the chief character of all. One day a woman presented herself at Orven Hall and demanded to see its owner. She spoke English with a strong French accent. Though approaching middle life she was still beautiful, having wild black eyes, and creamy pale face. Her dress was tawdry, cheap, and loud, showing signs of wear; her hair was unkempt; her manners were not the manners of a lady. A certain vehemence, exasperation, unreprieve distinguished all she said and did. The footman refused her admission; Lord Pharanx, he said, was invisible. She persisted violently, pushed past him, and had to be forcibly ejected; during all which the voice of the master was heard roaring from the passage red-eyed remonstrance at the unusual noise. She went away gesticulating wildly, and vowing vengeance on Lord Pharanx and all the world. It was afterwards found that she had taken up her abode in one of the neighbouring hamlets, called Lee.

‘This person, who gave the name of Maude Cibras, subsequently called at the Hall three times in succession, and was each time refused admittance. It was now, however, thought advisable to inform Randolph of her visits. He said she might be permitted to see him, if she returned. This she did on the next day, and had a long interview in private with him. Her voice was heard raised as if in angry protest by one Hester Dyett, a servant of the house, while Randolph in low tones seemed to try to soothe her. The conversation was in French, and no word could be made out. She passed out at length, tossing her head jauntily, and smiling a vulgar triumph at the footman who had before opposed her ingress. She was never known to seek admission to the house again.

‘But her connection with its inmates did not cease. The same Hester asserts that one night, coming home late through the park, she saw two persons conversing on a bench beneath the trees, crept behind some bushes, and discovered that they were the strange woman and Randolph. The same servant bears evidence to tracking them to other meeting-places, and to finding in the letter-bag letters addressed to Maude Cibras in Randolph's hand-writing. One of these was actually unearthed later on. Indeed, so engrossing did the intercourse become, that it seems even to have interfered with the outburst of radical zeal in the new political convert. The rendezvous — always held under cover of darkness, but naked and open to the eye of the watchful Hester — sometimes clashed with the science lectures, when these latter would be put off, so that they became gradually fewer, and then almost ceased.'

'Your narrative becomes unexpectedly interesting,' said Zaleski; 'but this unearthed letter of Randolph's — what was in it?'

I read as follows:

“Dear Mdlle. Cibras, — I am exerting my utmost influence for you with my father. But he shows no signs of coming round as yet. If I could only induce him to see you! But he is, as you know, a person of unrelenting will, and meanwhile you must confide in my loyal efforts on your behalf. At the same time, I admit that the situation is a precarious one: you are, I am sure, well provided for in the present will of Lord Pharanx, but he is on the point — within, say, three or four days — of making another; and exasperated as he is at your appearance in England, I know there is no chance of your receiving a centime under the new will. Before then, however, we must hope that something favourable to you may happen; and in the meantime, let me implore you not to let your only too just resentment pass beyond the bounds of reason.

“Sincerely yours,

“RANDOLPH.””

‘I like the letter!’ cried Zaleski. ‘You notice the tone of manly candour. But the facts — were they true? Did the earl make a new will in the time specified?’

‘No, — but that may have been because his death intervened.’

‘And in the old will, was Mdlle. Cibras provided for?’

‘Yes, — that at least was correct.’

A shadow of pain passed over his face.

‘And now,’ I went on, ‘I come to the closing scene, in which one of England’s foremost men perished by the act of an obscure assassin. The letter I have read was written to Maude Cibras on the 5th of January. The next thing that happens is on the 6th, when Lord Pharanx left his room for another during the whole day, and a skilled mechanic was introduced into it for the purpose of effecting some alterations. Asked by Hester Dyett, as he was leaving the house, what was the nature of his operations, the man replied that he had been applying a patent arrangement to the window looking out on the balcony, for the better protection of the room against burglars, several robberies having recently been committed in the neighbourhood. The sudden death of this man, however, before the occurrence of the tragedy, prevented his evidence being heard. On the next day — the 7th — Hester, entering the room with Lord Pharanx’s dinner, fancies, though she cannot tell why (inasmuch as his back is towards her, he sitting in an arm-chair by the fire), that Lord Pharanx has been “drinking heavily.”

‘On the 8th a singular thing befell. The earl was at last induced to see Maude Cibras, and during the morning of that day, with his own hand, wrote a note informing her of his decision, Randolph handing the note to a messenger. That note also has been made public. It reads as follows:

“Maude Cibras. — You may come here to-night after dark. Walk to the south side of the house, come up the steps to the balcony, and pass in through the open window to my room. Remember, however, that you have nothing to expect from me, and that from to-night I blot you eternally from my mind: but I will hear your story, which I know beforehand to be false. Destroy this note. PHARANX.”

As I progressed with my tale, I came to notice that over the countenance of Prince Zaleski there grew little by little a singular fixed aspect. His small, keen features distorted themselves into an expression of what I can only describe as an abnormal inquisitiveness — an inquisitiveness most impatient, arrogant, in its intensity. His pupils, contracted each to a dot, became the central puncta of two rings of fiery light; his little sharp teeth seemed to gnash. Once before I had seen him look thus greedily, when, grasping a Troglodyte tablet covered with half-effaced hieroglyphics — his fingers livid with the fixity of his grip — he bent on it that strenuous inquisition, that ardent questioning gaze, till, by a species of mesmeric dominancy, he seemed to wrench from it the arcanum it hid from other eyes; then he lay back, pale and faint from the too arduous victory.

When I had read Lord Pharanx’s letter, he took the paper eagerly from my hand, and ran his eyes over the passage.

‘Tell me — the end,’ he said.

‘Maude Cibras,’ I went on, ‘thus invited to a meeting with the earl, failed to make her appearance at the appointed time. It happened that she had left her lodgings in the village early that very morning, and, for some purpose or other, had travelled to the town of Bath. Randolph, too, went away the same day in the opposite direction to Plymouth. He returned on the following morning, the 9th; soon after walked over to Lee; and entered into conversation with the keeper of the inn where Cibras lodged; asked if she was at home, and on being told that she had gone away, asked further if she had taken her luggage with her; was informed that she had, and had also announced her intention of at once leaving England. He then walked away in the direction of the Hall. On this day Hester Dyett noticed that there were many articles of value scattered about the earl's room, notably a tiara of old Brazilian brilliants, sometimes worn by the late Lady Pharanx. Randolph — who was present at the time — further drew her attention to these by telling her that Lord Pharanx had chosen to bring together in his apartment many of the family jewels; and she was instructed to tell the other servants of this fact, in case they should notice any suspicious-looking loafers about the estate.

‘On the 10th, both father and son remained in their rooms all day, except when the latter came down to meals; at which times he would lock his door behind him, and with his own hands take in the earl's food, giving as his reason that his father was writing a very important document, and did not wish to be disturbed by the presence of a servant. During the forenoon, Hester Dyett, hearing loud noises in Randolph's room, as if furniture was being removed from place to place, found some pretext for knocking at his door, when he ordered her on no account to interrupt him again, as he was busy packing his clothes in view of a journey to London on the next day. The subsequent conduct of the woman shows that her curiosity must have been excited to the utmost by the undoubtedly strange spectacle of Randolph packing his own clothes. During the afternoon a lad from the village was instructed to collect his companions for a science lecture the same evening at eight o'clock. And so the eventful day wore on.

‘We arrive now at this hour of eight P.M. on this 10th day of January. The night is dark and windy; some snow has been falling, but has now ceased. In an upper room is Randolph engaged in expounding the elements of dynamics; in the room under that is Hester Dyett — for Hester has somehow obtained a key that opens the door of Randolph's room, and takes advantage of his absence upstairs to explore it. Under her is Lord Pharanx, certainly in bed, probably asleep. Hester, trembling all over in a fever of fear and excitement, holds a lighted taper in one hand, which she religiously shades with the other; for the storm is gusty, and the gusts, tearing through the crevices of the rattling old casements, toss great flickering shadows on the hangings, which frighten her to death. She has just time to see that the whole room is in the wildest confusion, when suddenly a rougher puff blows out the flame, and she is left in what to her, standing as she was on that forbidden ground, must have been a horror of darkness. At the same moment, clear and sharp from right beneath her, a pistol-shot rings out on her ear. For an instant she stands in stone, incapable of motion. Then on her dazed senses there supervenes — so she swore — the consciousness that some object is moving in the room — moving apparently of its own accord — moving in direct opposition to all the laws of nature as she knows them. She imagines that she perceives a phantasm — a strange something — globular-white — looking, as she says, “like a good-sized ball of cotton” — rise directly from the floor before her, ascending slowly upward, as if driven aloft by some invisible force. A sharp shock of the sense of the supernatural deprives her of ordered reason. Throwing forward her arms, and uttering a shrill scream, she rushes towards the door. But she never reaches it: midway she falls prostrate over some object, and knows no more; and when, an hour later, she is borne out of the room in the arms of Randolph himself, the blood is dripping from a fracture of her right tibia.

‘Meantime, in the upper chamber the pistol-shot and the scream of the woman have been heard. All eyes turn to Randolph. He stands in the shadow of the mechanical contrivance on which he has been illustrating his points; leans for support on it. He essays to speak, the muscles of his face work, but no sound comes. Only after a time is he able to gasp: "Did you hear something — from below?" They answer "yes" in chorus; then one of the lads takes a lighted candle, and together they troop out, Randolph behind them. A terrified servant rushes up with the news that something dreadful has happened in the house. They proceed for some distance, but there is an open window on the stairs, and the light is blown out. They have to wait some minutes till another is obtained, and then the procession moves forward once more. Arrived at Lord Pharanx's door, and finding it locked, a lantern is procured, and Randolph leads them through the house and out on the lawn. But having nearly reached the balcony, a lad observes a track of small woman's-feet in the snow; a halt is called, and then Randolph points out another track of feet, half obliterated by the snow, extending from a coppice close by up to the balcony, and forming an angle with the first track. These latter are great big feet, made by ponderous labourers' boots. He holds the lantern over the flower-beds, and shows how they have been trampled down. Some one finds a common scarf, such as workmen wear; and a ring and a locket, dropped by the burglars in their flight, are also found by Randolph half buried in the snow. And now the foremost reach the window. Randolph, from behind, calls to them to enter. They cry back that they cannot, the window being closed. At this reply he seems to be overcome by surprise, by terror. Some one hears him murmur the words, "My God, what can have happened now?" His horror is increased when one of the lads bears to him a revolting trophy, which has been found just outside the window; it is the front phalanges of three fingers of a human hand. Again he utters the agonised moan, "My God!" and then, mastering his agitation, makes for the window; he finds that the catch of the sash has been roughly wrenched off, and that the sash can be opened by merely pushing it up: does so, and enters. The room is in darkness: on the floor under the window is found the insensible body of the woman Cibras. She is alive, but has fainted. Her right fingers are closed round the handle of a large bowie-knife, which is covered with blood; parts of the left are missing. All the jewelry has been stolen from the room. Lord Pharanx lies on the bed, stabbed through the bedclothes to the heart. Later on a bullet is also found imbedded in his brain. I should explain that a trenchant edge, running along the bottom of the sash, was the obvious means by which the fingers of Cibras had been cut off. This had been placed there a few days before by the workman I spoke of. Several secret springs had been placed on the inner side of the lower horizontal piece of the window-frame, by pressing any one of which the sash was lowered; so that no one, ignorant of the secret, could pass out from within, without resting the hand on one of these springs, and so bringing down the armed sash suddenly on the underlying hand.

‘There was, of course, a trial. The poor culprit, in mortal terror of death, shrieked out a confession of the murder just as the jury had returned from their brief consultation, and before they had time to pronounce their verdict of “guilty.” But she denied shooting Lord Pharanx, and she denied stealing the jewels; and indeed no pistol and no jewels were found on her, or anywhere in the room. So that many points remain mysterious. What part did the burglars play in the tragedy? Were they in collusion with Cibras? Had the strange behaviour of at least one of the inmates of Orven Hall no hidden significance? The wildest guesses were made throughout the country; theories propounded. But no theory explained all the points. The ferment, however, has now subsided. To-morrow morning Maude Cibras ends her life on the gallows.’

Thus I ended my narrative.

Without a word Zaleski rose from the couch, and walked to the organ. Assisted from behind by Ham, who foreknew his master's every whim, he proceeded to render with infinite feeling an air from the Lakmé of Delibes; long he sat, dreamily uttering the melody, his head sunken on his breast. When at last he rose, his great expanse of brow was clear, and a smile all but solemn in its serenity was on his lips. He walked up to an ivory escritoire, scribbled a few words on a sheet of paper, and handed it to the negro with the order to take my trap and drive with the message in all haste to the nearest telegraph office.

'That message,' he said, resuming his place on the couch, 'is a last word on the tragedy, and will, no doubt, produce some modification in the final stage of its history. And now, Shiel, let us sit together and confer on this matter. From the manner in which you have expressed yourself, it is evident that there are points which puzzle you — you do not get a clean coup d'oeil of the whole regiment of facts, and their causes, and their consequences, as they occurred. Let us see if out of that confusion we cannot produce a coherence, a symmetry. A great wrong is done, and on the society in which it is done is imposed the task of making it translucent, of seeing it in all its relations, and of punishing it. But what happens? The society fails to rise to the occasion; on the whole, it contrives to make the opacity more opaque, does not see the crime in any human sense; is unable to punish it. Now this, you will admit, whenever it occurs, is a woful failure: woful I mean, not very in itself, but very in its significance: and there must be a precise cause for it. That cause is the lack of something not merely, or specially, in the investigators of the wrong, but in the world at large — shall we not boldly call it the lack of culture? Do not, however, misunderstand me: by the term I mean not so much attainment in general, as mood in particular. Whether or when such mood may become universal may be to you a matter of doubt.

As for me, I often think that when the era of civilisation begins — as assuredly it shall some day begin — when the races of the world cease to be credulous, ovine mobs and become critical, human nations, then will be the ushering in of the ten thousand years of a clairvoyant culture. But nowhere, and at no time during the very few hundreds of years that man has occupied the earth, has there been one single sign of its presence. In individuals, yes — in the Greek Plato, and I think in your English Milton and Bishop Berkeley — but in humanity, never; and hardly in any individual outside those two nations. The reason, I fancy, is not so much that man is a hopeless fool, as that Time, so far as he is concerned, has, as we know, only just begun: it being, of course, conceivable that the creation of a perfect society of men, as the first requisite to a régime of culture, must nick to itself a longer loop of time than the making of, say, a stratum of coal. A loquacious person — he is one of your cherished “novel”-writers, by the way, if that be indeed a Novel in which there is nowhere any pretence at novelty — once assured me that he could never reflect without swelling on the greatness of the age in which he lived, an age the mighty civilisation of which he likened to the Augustan and Periclean. A certain stony gaze of anthropological interest with which I regarded his frontal bone seemed to strike the poor man dumb, and he took a hurried departure. Could he have been ignorant that ours is, in general, greater than the Periclean for the very reason that the Divinity is neither the devil nor a bungler; that three thousand years of human consciousness is not nothing; that a whole is greater than its part, and a butterfly than a chrysalis? But it was the assumption that it was therefore in any way great in the abstract that occasioned my profound astonishment, and indeed contempt. Civilisation, if it means anything, can only mean the art by which men live musically together — to the lutings, as it were, of Panpipes, or say perhaps, to triumphant organ-bursts of martial, marching dithyrambs. Any formula defining it as “the art of lying back and getting elaborately tickled,” should surely at this hour be too primitive — too Opic — to bring anything but a smile to the lips of grown white-skinned men; and the very fact that such a definition can still find undoubting acceptance in all quarters may be an indication that the true [Greek: idéa] which this condition of being must finally assume is far indeed — far, perhaps, by ages and aeons — from becoming part of the general conception. Nowhere since the beginning has the gross problem of living ever so much as approached solution, much less the delicate and intricate one of living together: à propos of which your body corporate not only still produces criminals (as the body-natural fleas), but its very elementary organism cannot so much as catch a really athletic one as yet. Meanwhile you and I are handicapped. The individual travaileth in pain. In the struggle for quality, powers, air, he spends his strength, and yet hardly escapes asphyxiation. He can no more wriggle himself free of the psychic gravitations that invest him than the earth can shake herself loose of the sun, or he of the omnipotences that rivet him to the universe. If by chance one shoots a downy hint of wings, an instant feeling of contrast puffs him with self-consciousness: a tragedy at once: the unconscious being “the alone complete.” To attain to anything, he must needs screw the head up into the atmosphere of the future, while feet and hands drip dark ichors of despair from the crucifying cross of the crude present — a horrid strain! Far up a nightly instigation of stars he sees: but he may not strike them with the head. If earth were a boat, and mine, I know well toward what wild azimuths I would compel her helm: but gravity, gravity — chiefest curse of Eden’s sin! — is hostile. When indeed (as is ordained), the old mother swings herself into a sublimer orbit, we on her back will follow: till then we make to ourselves Icarian “organa” in vain. I mean to say that it is the plane of station which is at fault: move that upward, you move all. But meantime is it not Goethe who assures us that “further reacheth no man, make he what stretching he will”? For Man, you perceive, is not many, but One. It is absurd to suppose that England can be free while Poland is enslaved; Paris is far from the beginnings of civilisation whilst Toobooloo and Chicago are barbaric. Probably no ill-fated, microcephalous son of Adam ever tumbled into a mistake quite so huge, so infantile, as did Dives, if he imagined himself rich while Lazarus sat pauper at the gate. Not many, I say, but one. Even Ham and I here in our retreat are not alone; we are embarrassed by the uninvited spirit of the present; the adamant root of the mountain on whose summit we stand is based ineradicably in the low world. Yet, thank Heaven, Goethe was not quite right — as, indeed, he proved in his proper person. I tell you, Shiel, I know whether Mary did or did not murder Darnley; I know — as clearly, as precisely, as a man can know — that Beatrice Cenci was not “guilty” as certain recently-discovered documents “prove” her, but that the Shelley version of the affair, though a guess, is the correct one. It is possible, by taking thought, to add one cubit — or say a hand, or a dactyl — to your stature; you may develop powers slightly — very slightly, but distinctly, both in kind and degree — in advance of those of the mass who live in or about the same cycle of time in which you live. But it is only when the powers to which I refer are shared by the mass — when what, for want of another term, I call the age of the Cultured Mood has at length arrived — that their exercise will become easy and familiar to the individual; and who shall say what presciences, prisms, séances, what introspective craft, Genie apocalypses, shall not then become possible to the few who stand spiritually in the van of men.

‘All this, you will understand, I say as some sort of excuse for myself, and for you, for any hesitation we may have shown in loosening the very little puzzle you have placed before me — one which we certainly must not regard as difficult of solution. Of course, looking at all the facts, the first consideration that must inevitably rivet the attention is that arising from the circumstance that Viscount Randolph has strong reasons to wish his father dead. They are avowed enemies; he is the fiancé of a princess whose husband he is probably too poor to become, though he will very likely be rich enough when his father dies; and so on. All that appears on the surface. On the other hand, we — you and I — know the man: he is a person of gentle blood, as moral, we suppose, as ordinary people, occupying a high station in the world. It is impossible to imagine that such a person would commit an assassination, or even countenance one, for any or all of the reasons that present themselves. In our hearts, with or without clear proof, we could hardly believe it of him. Earls' sons do not, in fact, go about murdering people. Unless, then, we can so reason as to discover other motives — strong, adequate, irresistible — and by “irresistible” I mean a motive which must be far stronger than even the love of life itself — we should, I think, in fairness dismiss him from our mind.

‘And yet it must be admitted that his conduct is not free of blame. He contracts a sudden intimacy with the acknowledged culprit, whom he does not seem to have known before. He meets her by night, corresponds with her. Who and what is this woman? I think we could not be far wrong in guessing some very old flame of Lord Pharanx's of Théâtre des Variétés type, whom he has supported for years, and from whom, hearing some story to her discredit, he threatens to withdraw his supplies. However that be, Randolph writes to Cibras — a violent woman, a woman of lawless passions — assuring her that in four or five days she will be excluded from the will of his father; and in four or five days Cibras plunges a knife into his father's bosom. It is a perfectly natural sequence — though, of course, the intention to produce by his words the actual effect produced might have been absent; indeed, the letter of Lord Pharanx himself, had it been received, would have tended to produce that very effect; for it not only gives an excellent opportunity for converting into action those evil thoughts which Randolph (thoughtlessly or guiltily) has instilled, but it further tends to rouse her passions by cutting off from her all hopes of favour. If we presume, then, as is only natural, that there was no such intention on the part of the earl, we may make the same presumption in the case of the son. Cibras, however, never receives the earl's letter: on the morning of the same day she goes away to Bath, with the double object, I suppose, of purchasing a weapon, and creating an impression that she has left the country. How then does she know the exact locale of Lord Pharanx's room? It is in an unusual part of the mansion, she is unacquainted with any of the servants, a stranger to the district. Can it be possible that Randolph had told her? And here again, even in that case, you must bear in mind that Lord Pharanx also told her in his note, and you must recognise the possibility of the absence of evil intention on the part of the son. Indeed, I may go further and show you that in all but every instance in which his actions are in themselves outré, suspicious, they are rendered, not less outré, but less suspicious, by the fact that Lord Pharanx himself knew of them, shared in them. There was the cruel barbing of that balcony window; about it the crudest thinker would argue thus to himself: "Randolph practically incites Maude Cibras to murder his father on the 5th, and on the 6th he has that window so altered in order that, should she act on his suggestion, she will be caught on attempting to leave the room, while he himself, the actual culprit being discovered en flagrant délit, will escape every shadow of suspicion." But, on the other hand, we know that the alteration was made with Lord Pharanx's consent, most likely on his initiative — for he leaves his favoured room during a whole day for that very purpose. So with the letter to Cibras on the 8th — Randolph despatches it, but the earl writes it. So with the disposal of the jewels in the apartment on the 9th. There had been some burglaries in the neighbourhood, and the suspicion at once arises in the mind of the crude reasoner: Could Randolph — finding now that Cibras has “left the country,” that, in fact, the tool he had expected to serve his ends has failed him — could he have thus brought those jewels there, and thus warned the servants of their presence, in the hope that the intelligence might so get abroad and lead to a burglary, in the course of which his father might lose his life? There are evidences, you know, tending to show that the burglary did actually at last take place, and the suspicion is, in view of that, by no means unreasonable. And yet, militating against it, is our knowledge that it was Lord Pharanx who “chose” to gather the jewels round him; that it was in his presence that Randolph drew the attention of the servant to them. In the matter, at least, of the little political comedy the son seems to have acted alone; but you surely cannot rid yourself of the impression that the radical speeches, the candidature, and the rest of it, formed all of them only a very elaborate, and withal clumsy, set of preliminaries to the class. Anything, to make the perspective, the sequence of that seem natural. But in the class, at any rate, we have the tacit acquiescence, or even the cooperation of Lord Pharanx. You have described the conspiracy of quiet which, for some reason or other, was imposed on the household; in that reign of silence the bang of a door, the fall of a plate, becomes a domestic tornado. But have you ever heard an agricultural labourer in clogs or heavy boots ascend a stair? The noise is terrible. The tramp of an army of them through the house and overhead, probably jabbering uncouthly together, would be insufferable. Yet Lord Pharanx seems to have made no objection; the novel institution is set up in his own mansion, in an unusual part of it, probably against his own principles; but we hear of no murmur from him. On the fatal day, too, the calm of the house is rudely broken by a considerable commotion in Randolph's room just overhead, caused by his preparation for "a journey to London." But the usual angry remonstrance is not forthcoming from the master. And do you not see how all this more than acquiescence of Lord Phranx in the conduct of his son deprives that conduct of half its significance, its intrinsic suspiciousness?

'A hasty reasoner then would inevitably jump to the conclusion that Randolph was guilty of something — some evil intention — though of precisely what he would remain in doubt. But a more careful reasoner would pause: he would reflect that as the father was implicated in those acts, and as he was innocent of any such intention, so might possibly, even probably, be the son. This, I take it, has been the view of the officials, whose logic is probably far in advance of their imagination. But supposing we can adduce one act, undoubtedly actuated by evil intention on the part of Randolph — one act in which his father certainly did not participate — what follows next? Why, that we revert at once to the view of the hasty reasoner, and conclude that all the other acts in the same relation were actuated by the same evil motive; and having reached that point, we shall be unable longer to resist the conclusion that those of them in which his father had a share might have sprung from a like motive in his mind also; nor should the mere obvious impossibility of such a condition of things have even the very least influence on us, as thinkers, in causing us to close our mind against its logical possibility. I therefore make the inference, and pass on.

'Let us then see if we can by searching find out any absolutely certain deviation from right on the part of Randolph, in which we may be quite sure that his father was not an abettor. At eight on the night of the murder it is dark; there has been some snow, but the fall has ceased — how long before I know not, but so long that the interval becomes sufficiently appreciable to cause remark. Now the party going round the house come on two tracks of feet meeting at an angle. Of one track we are merely told that it was made by the small foot of a woman, and of it we know no more; of the other we learn that the feet were big and the boots clumsy, and, it is added, the marks were half obliterated by the snow. Two things then are clear: that the persons who made them came from different directions, and probably made them at different times. That, alone, by the way, may be a sufficient answer to your question as to whether Cibras was in collusion with the “burglars.” But how does Randolph behave with reference to these tracks? Though he carries the lantern, he fails to perceive the first — the woman’s — the discovery of which is made by a lad; but the second, half hidden in the snow, he notices readily enough, and at once points it out. He explains that burglars have been on the war-path. But examine his horror of surprise when he hears that the window is closed; when he sees the woman’s bleeding fingers. He cannot help exclaiming, “My God! what has happened now?” But why “now”? The word cannot refer to his father’s death, for that he knew, or guessed, beforehand, having heard the shot. Is it not rather the exclamation of a man whose schemes destiny has complicated? Besides, he should have expected to find the window closed: no one except himself, Lord Pharanx, and the workman, who was now dead, knew the secret of its construction; the burglars therefore, having entered and robbed the room, one of them, intending to go out, would press on the ledge, and the sash would fall on his hand with what result we know. The others would then either break the glass and so escape; or pass through the house; or remain prisoners. That immoderate surprise was therefore absurdly illogical, after seeing the burglar-track in the snow. But how, above all, do you account for

Lord Pharanx's silence during and after the burglars' visit — if there was a visit? He was, you must remember, alive all that time; they did not kill him; certainly they did not shoot him, for the shot is heard after the snow has ceased to fall, — that is, after, long after, they have left, since it was the falling snow that had half obliterated their tracks; nor did they stab him, for to this Cibras confesses. Why then, being alive, and not gagged, did he give no token of the presence of his visitors? There were in fact no burglars at Orven Hall that night.'

'But the track!' I cried, 'the jewels found in the snow — the neckerchief!'

Zaleski smiled.

'Burglars,' he said, 'are plain, honest folk who have a just notion of the value of jewelry when they see it. They very properly regard it as mere foolish waste to drop precious stones about in the snow, and would refuse to company with a man weak enough to let fall his neckerchief on a cold night. The whole business of the burglars was a particularly inartistic trick, unworthy of its author. The mere facility with which Randolph discovered the buried jewels by the aid of a dim lantern, should have served as a hint to an educated police not afraid of facing the improbable. The jewels had been put there with the object of throwing suspicion on the imaginary burglars; with the same design the catch of the window had been wrenched off, the sash purposely left open, the track made, the valuables taken from Lord Pharanx's room. All this was deliberately done by some one — would it be rash to say at once by whom?

'Our suspicions having now lost their whole character of vagueness, and begun to lead us in a perfectly definite direction, let us examine the statements of Hester Dyett. Now, it is immediately comprehensible to me that the evidence of this woman at the public examinations was looked at askance. There can be no doubt that she is a poor specimen of humanity, an undesirable servant, a peering, hysterical caricature of a woman. Her statements, if formally recorded, were not believed; or if believed, were believed with only half the mind. No attempt was made to deduce anything from them. But for my part, if I wanted specially reliable evidence as to any matter of fact, it is precisely from such a being that I would seek it. Let me draw you a picture of that class of intellect. They have a greed for information, but the information, to satisfy them, must relate to actualities; they have no sympathy with fiction; it is from their impatience of what seems to be that springs their curiosity of what is. Clio is their muse, and she alone. Their whole lust is to gather knowledge through a hole, their whole faculty is to peep. But they are destitute of imagination, and do not lie; in their passion for realities they would esteem it a sacrilege to distort history. They make straight for the substantial, the indubitable. For this reason the Peniculi and Ergasili of Plautus seem to me far more true to nature than the character of Paul Pry in Jerrold's comedy. In one instance, indeed, the evidence of Hester Dyett appears, on the surface of it, to be quite false. She declares that she sees a round white object moving upward in the room. But the night being gloomy, her taper having gone out, she must have been standing in a dense darkness. How then could she see this object? Her evidence, it was argued, must be designedly false, or else (as she was in an ecstatic condition) the result of an excited fancy. But I have stated that such persons, nervous, neurotic even as they may be, are not fanciful. I therefore accept her evidence as true. And now, mark the consequence of that acceptance. I am driven to admit that there must, from some source, have been light in the room — a light faint enough, and diffused enough, to escape the notice of Hester herself. This being so, it must have proceeded from around, from below, or from above. There are no other alternatives. Around these was nothing but the darkness of the night; the room beneath, we know, was also in darkness. The light then came from the room above — from the mechanic class-room. But there is only one possible means by which the light from an upper can diffuse a lower room. It must be by a hole in the intermediate boards. We are thus driven to the discovery of an aperture of some sort in the flooring of that upper chamber. Given this, the mystery of the round white object “driven” upward disappears. We at once ask, why not drawn upward through the newly-discovered aperture by a string too small to be visible in the gloom? Assuredly it was drawn upward. And now having established a hole in the ceiling of the room in which Hester stands, is it unreasonable — even without further evidence — to suspect another in the flooring? But we actually have this further evidence. As she rushes to the door she falls, faints, and fractures the lower part of her leg. Had she fallen over some object, as you supposed, the result might have been a fracture also, but in a different part of the body; being where it was, it could only have been caused by placing the foot inadvertently in a hole while the rest of the body was in rapid motion. But this gives us an approximate idea of the size of the lower hole; it was at least big enough to admit the foot and lower leg, big enough therefore to admit that “good-sized ball of cotton” of which the woman speaks: and from the lower we are able to conjecture the size of the upper. But how comes it that these holes are nowhere mentioned in the evidence? It can only be because no one ever saw them. Yet the rooms must have been examined by the police, who, if they existed, must have seen them. They therefore did not exist: that is to say, the pieces which had been removed from the floorings had by that time been neatly replaced, and, in the case of the lower one, covered by the carpet, the removal of which had caused so much commotion in Randolph’s room on the fatal day. Hester

Dyett would have been able to notice and bring at least one of the apertures forward in evidence, but she fainted before she had time to find out the cause of her fall, and an hour later it was, you remember, Randolph himself who bore her from the room. But should not the aperture in the top floor have been observed by the class? Undoubtedly, if its position was in the open space in the middle of the room. But it was not observed, and therefore its position was not there, but in the only other place left — behind the apparatus used in demonstration. That then was one useful object which the apparatus — and with it the elaborate hypocrisy of class, and speeches, and candidature — served: it was made to act as a curtain, a screen. But had it no other purpose? That question we may answer when we know its name and its nature. And it is not beyond our powers to conjecture this with something like certainty. For the only “machines” possible to use in illustration of simple mechanics are the screw, the wedge, the scale, the lever, the wheel-and-axle, and Atwood’s machine. The mathematical principles which any of these exemplify would, of course, be incomprehensible to such a class, but the first five most of all, and as there would naturally be some slight pretence of trying to make the learners understand, I therefore select the last; and this selection is justified when we remember that on the shot being heard, Randolph leans for support on the “machine,” and stands in its shadow; but any of the others would be too small to throw any appreciable shadow, except one — the wheel, and-axle — and that one would hardly afford support to a tall man in the erect position. The Atwood’s machine is therefore forced on us; as to its construction, it is, as you are aware, composed of two upright posts, with a cross-bar fitted with pulleys and strings, and is intended to show the motion of bodies acting under a constant force — the force of gravity, to wit. But now consider all the really glorious uses to which those same pulleys may be turned in lowering and lifting unobserved that “ball of cotton” through the two apertures, while the other strings with the weights attached are dangling before the dull eyes of the peasants. I need only point out that when the whole company trooped out of the room, Randolph was the last to leave it, and it is not now difficult to conjecture why.

‘Of what, then, have we convicted Randolph? For one thing, we have shown that by marks of feet in the snow preparation was made beforehand for obscuring the cause of the earl’s death. That death must therefore have been at least expected, foreknown. Thus we convict him of expecting it. And then, by an independent line of deduction, we can also discover the means by which he expected it to occur. It is clear that he did not expect it to occur when it did by the hand of Maude Cibras — for this is proved by his knowledge that she had left the neighbourhood, by his evidently genuine astonishment at the sight of the closed window, and, above all, by his truly morbid desire to establish a substantial, an irrefutable alibi for himself by going to Plymouth on the day when there was every reason to suppose she would do the deed — that is, on the 8th, the day of the earl’s invitation. On the fatal night, indeed, the same morbid eagerness to build up a clear alibi is observable, for he surrounds himself with a cloud of witnesses in the upper chamber. But that, you will admit, is not nearly so perfect a one as a journey, say, to Plymouth would have been. Why then, expecting the death, did he not take some such journey? Obviously because on this occasion his personal presence was necessary. When, in conjunction with this, we recall the fact that during the intrigues with Cibras the lectures were discontinued, and again resumed immediately on her unlooked-for departure, we arrive at the conclusion that the means by which Lord Pharanx’s death was expected to occur was the personal presence of Randolph in conjunction with the political speeches, the candidature, the class, the apparatus.

‘But though he stands condemned of foreknowing, and being in some sort connected with, his father’s death, I can nowhere find any indication of his having personally accomplished it, or even of his ever having had any such intention. The evidence is evidence of complicity — and nothing more. And yet — and yet — even of this we began by acquitting him unless we could discover, as I said, some strong, adequate, altogether irresistible motive for such complicity. Failing this, we ought to admit that at some point our argument has played us false, and led us into conclusions wholly at variance with our certain knowledge of the principles underlying human conduct in general. Let us therefore seek for such a motive — something deeper than personal enmity, stronger than personal ambition, than the love of life itself! And now, tell me, at the time of the occurrence of this mystery, was the whole past history of the House of Orven fully investigated?’

‘Not to my knowledge,’ I answered; ‘in the papers there were, of course, sketches of the earl’s career, but that I think was all.’

‘Yet it cannot be that their past was unknown, but only that it was ignored. Long, I tell you, long and often, have I pondered on that history, and sought to trace with what ghastly secret has been pregnant the destiny, gloomful as Erebus and the murk of black-peplosed Nux, which for centuries has hung its pall over the men of this ill-fated house. Now at last I know. Dark, dark, and red with gore and horror is that history; down the silent corridors of the ages have these blood-soaked sons of Atreus fled shrieking before the pursuing talons of the dread Eumenides. The first earl received his patent in 1535 from the eighth Henry. Two years later, though noted as a rabid “king’s man,” he joined the Pilgrimage of Grace against his master, and was soon after executed, with Darcy and some other lords. His age was then fifty. His son, meantime, had served in the king’s army under Norfolk. It is remarkable, by the way, that females have all along been rare in the family, and that in no instance has there been more than one son. The second earl, under the sixth Edward, suddenly threw up a civil post, hastened to the army, and fell at the age of forty at the battle of Pinkie in 1547. He was accompanied by his son. The third in 1557, under Mary, renounced the Catholic faith, to which, both before and since, the family have passionately clung, and suffered (at the age of forty) the last penalty. The fourth earl died naturally, but suddenly, in his bed at the age of fifty during the winter of 1566. At midnight of the same day he was laid in the grave by his son. This son was later on, in 1591, seen by his son to fall from a lofty balcony at Orven Hall, while walking in his sleep at high noonday. Then for some time nothing happens; but the eighth earl dies mysteriously in 1651 at the age of forty-five. A fire occurring in his room, he leapt from a window to escape the flames. Some of his limbs were thereby fractured, but he was in a fair way to recovery when there was a sudden relapse, soon ending in death. He was found to have been poisoned by radix aconiti indica, a rare Arabian poison not known in Europe at that time except to savants, and first mentioned by Acosta some months before. An attendant was accused and tried, but acquitted. The then son of the House was a Fellow of the newly-founded Royal Society, and author of a now-forgotten work on Toxicology, which, however, I have read. No suspicion, of course, fell on him.'

As Zaleski proceeded with this retrospect, I could not but ask myself with stirrings of the most genuine wonder, whether he could possess this intimate knowledge of all the great families of Europe! It was as if he had spent a part of his life in making special study of the history of the Orvens.

'In the same manner,' he went on, 'I could detail the annals of the family from that time to the present. But all through they have been marked by the same latent tragic elements; and I have said enough to show you that in each of the tragedies there was invariably something large, leering, something of which the mind demands explanation, but seeks in vain to find it. Now we need no longer seek. Destiny did not design that the last Lord of Orven should any more hide from the world the guilty secret of his race. It was the will of the gods — and he betrayed himself. “Return,” he writes, “the beginning of the end is come.” What end?

The end — perfectly well known to Randolph, needing no explanation for him. The old, old end, which in the ancient dim time led the first lord, loyal still at heart, to forsake his king; and another, still devout, to renounce his cherished faith, and yet another to set fire to the home of his ancestors. You have called the two last scions of the family “a proud and selfish pair of beings”; proud they were, and selfish too, but you are in error if you think their selfishness a personal one: on the contrary, they were singularly oblivious of self in the ordinary sense of the word. Theirs was the pride and the selfishness of race. What consideration, think you, other than the weal of his house, could induce Lord Randolph to take on himself the shame — for as such he certainly regards it — of a conversion to radicalism? He would, I am convinced, have died rather than make this pretence for merely personal ends. But he does it — and the reason? It is because he has received that awful summons from home; because “the end” is daily coming nearer, and it must not find him unprepared to meet it; it is because Lord Pharanx’s senses are becoming too acute; because the clatter of the servants’ knives at the other end of the house inflames him to madness; because his excited palate can no longer endure any food but the subtlest delicacies; because Hester Dyett is able from the posture in which he sits to conjecture that he is intoxicated; because, in fact, he is on the brink of the dreadful malady which physicians call “General Paralysis of the Insane.” You remember I took from your hands the newspaper containing the earl’s letter to Cibras, in order to read it with my own eyes. I had my reasons, and I was justified. That letter contains three mistakes in spelling: “here” is printed “hear,” “pass” appears as “pas,” and “room” as “rume.” Printers’ errors, you say? But not so — one might be, two in that short paragraph could hardly be, three would be impossible. Search the whole paper through, and I think you will not find another. Let us reverence the theory of probabilities: the errors were the writer’s, not the printer’s. General Paralysis of the Insane is known to have this effect on the writing. It attacks its victims about the period of middle age — the age at which the deaths of all the Orvens who died mysteriously occurred. Finding then that the dire heritage of his race — the heritage of madness — is falling or fallen on him, he summons his son from India. On himself he passes sentence of death: it is the tradition of the family, the secret vow of self-destruction handed down through ages from father to son. But he must have aid: in these days it is difficult for a man to commit the suicidal act without detection — and if madness is a disgrace to the race, equally so is suicide. Besides, the family is to be enriched by the insurances on his life, and is thereby to be allied with royal blood; but the money will be lost if the suicide be detected. Randolph therefore returns and blossoms into a popular candidate.

‘For a time he is led to abandon his original plans by the appearance of Maude Cibras; he hopes that she may be made to destroy the earl; but when she fails him, he recurs to it — recurs to it all suddenly, for Lord Pharanx’s condition is rapidly becoming critical, patent to all eyes, could any eye see him — so much so that on the last day none of the servants are allowed to enter his room. We must therefore regard Cibras as a mere addendum to, an extraneous element in, the tragedy, not as an integral part of it. She did not shoot the noble lord, for she had no pistol; nor did Randolph, for he was at a distance from the bed of death, surrounded by witnesses; nor did the imaginary burglars. The earl therefore shot himself; and it was the small globular silver pistol, such as this' — here Zaleski drew a little embossed Venetian weapon from a drawer near him— 'that appeared in the gloom to the excited Hester as a "ball of cotton," while it was being drawn upward by the Atwood's machine. But if the earl shot himself he could not have done so after being stabbed to the heart. Maude Cibras, therefore, stabbed a dead man. She would, of course, have ample time for stealing into the room and doing so after the shot was fired, and before the party reached the balcony window, on account of the delay on the stairs in procuring a second light; in going to the earl's door; in examining the tracks, and so on. But having stabbed a dead man, she is not guilty of murder. The message I just now sent by Ham was one addressed to the Home Secretary, telling him on no account to let Cibras die to-morrow. He well knows my name, and will hardly be silly enough to suppose me capable of using words without meaning. It will be perfectly easy to prove my conclusions, for the pieces removed from, and replaced in, the floorings can still be detected, if looked for; the pistol is still, no doubt, in Randolph's room, and its bore can be compared with the bullet found in Lord Pharanx's brain; above all, the jewels stolen by the "burglars" are still safe in some cabinet of the new earl, and may readily be discovered I therefore expect that the dénouement will now take a somewhat different turn.'

That the dénouement did take a different turn, and pretty strictly in accordance with Zaleski's forecast, is now matter of history, and the incidents, therefore, need no further comment from me in this place.

THE STONE OF THE EDMUNDSBURY MONKS

‘RUSSIA,’ SAID PRINCE Zaleski to me one day, when I happened to be on a visit to him in his darksome sanctuary— ‘Russia may be regarded as land surrounded by ocean; that is to say, she is an island. In the same way, it is sheer gross irrelevancy to speak of Britain as an island, unless indeed the word be understood as a mere modus loquendi arising out of a rather poor geographical pleasantry. Britain, in reality, is a small continent. Near her — a little to the south-east — is situated the large island of Europe. Thus, the enlightened French traveller passing to these shores should commune within himself: “I now cross to the Mainland”; and retracing his steps: “I now return to the fragment rent by wrack and earthshock from the Mother-country.” And this I say not in the way of paradox, but as the expression of a sober truth. I have in my mind merely the relative depth and extent — the non-insularity, in fact — of the impressions made by the several nations on the world. But this island of Europe has herself an island of her own: the name of it, Russia. She, of all lands, is the terra incognita, the unknown land; till quite lately she was more — she was the undiscovered, the unsuspected land. She has a literature, you know, and a history, and a language, and a purpose — but of all this the world has hardly so much as heard. Indeed, she, and not any Antarctic Sea whatever, is the real Ultima Thule of modern times, the true Island of Mystery.’

I reproduce these remarks of Zaleski here, not so much on account of the splendid tribute to my country contained in them, as because it ever seemed to me — and especially in connection with the incident I am about to recall — that in this respect at least he was a genuine son of Russia; if she is the Land, so truly was he the Man, of Mystery. I who knew him best alone knew that it was impossible to know him. He was a being little of the present: with one arm he embraced the whole past; the fingers of the other heaved on the vibrant pulse of the future. He seemed to me — I say it deliberately and with forethought — to possess the unparalleled power not merely of disentangling in retrospect, but of unravelling in prospect, and I have known him to relate coming events with unimaginable minuteness of precision. He was nothing if not superlative: his diatribes, now culminating in a very extravaganza of hyperbole — now sailing with loose wing through the downy, witched, Dutch cloud-heaps of some quaintest tramontane Nephelococcugia of thought — now laying down law of the Medes for the actual world of to-day — had oft-times the strange effect of bringing back to my mind the very singular old-epic epithet, [Greek: aenemoen] — airy — as applied to human thought. The mere grip of his memory was not simply extraordinary, it had in it a token, a hint, of the strange, the pythic — nay, the sibylline. And as his reflecting intellect, moreover, had all the lightness of foot of a chamois kid, unless you could contrive to follow each dazzlingly swift successive step, by the sum of which he attained his Alp-heights, he inevitably left on you the astounding, the confounding impression of mental omnipresence.

I had brought with me a certain document, a massive book bound in iron and leather, the diary of one Sir Jocelin Saul. This I had abstracted from a gentleman of my acquaintance, the head of a firm of inquiry agents in London, into whose hand, only the day before, it had come. A distant neighbour of Sir Jocelin, hearing by chance of his extremity, had invoked the assistance of this firm; but the aged baronet, being in a state of the utmost feebleness, terror, and indeed hysterical incoherence, had been able to utter no word in explanation of his condition or wishes, and, in silent abandonment, had merely handed the book to the agent.

A day or two after I had reached the desolate old mansion which the prince occupied, knowing that he might sometimes be induced to take an absorbing interest in questions that had proved themselves too profound, or too intricate, for ordinary solution, I asked him if he was willing to hear the details read out from the diary, and on his assenting, I proceeded to do so.

The brief narrative had reference to a very large and very valuable oval gem enclosed in the substance of a golden chalice, which chalice, in the monastery of St. Edmundsbury, had once lain centuries long within the Loculus, or inmost coffin, wherein reposed the body of St. Edmund. By pressing a hidden pivot, the cup (which was composed of two equal parts, connected by minute hinges) sprang open, and in a hollow space at the bottom was disclosed the gem. Sir Jocelin Saul, I may say, was lineally connected with — though, of course, not descendant from — that same Jocelin of Brakelonda, a brother of the Edmundsbury convent, who wrote the now so celebrated Jocelini Chronica: and the chalice had fallen into the possession of the family, seemingly at some time prior to the suppression of the monastery about 1537. On it was inscribed in old English characters of unknown date the words:

‘Shulde this Ston stalen bee,
Or shuld it chaunges dre,
The Houss of Sawl and hys Hed anoon shal de.’

The stone itself was an intaglio, and had engraved on its surface the figure of a mythological animal, together with some nearly obliterated letters, of which the only ones remaining legible were those forming the word ‘Has.’ As a sure precaution against the loss of the gem, another cup had been made and engraved in an exactly similar manner, inside of which, to complete the delusion, another stone of the same size and cut, but of comparatively valueless material, had been placed.

Sir Jocelin Saul, a man of intense nervousity, lived his life alone in a remote old manor-house in Suffolk, his only companion being a person of Eastern origin, named Ul-Jabal. The baronet had consumed his vitality in the life-long attempt to sound the too fervid Maelstrom of Oriental research, and his mind had perhaps caught from his studies a tinge of their morbidness, their esotericism, their insanity. He had for some years past been engaged in the task of writing a stupendous work on Pre-Zoroastrian Theogonies, in which, it is to be supposed, Ul-Jabal acted somewhat in the capacity of secretary. But I will give verbatim the extracts from his diary:

‘June 11. — This is my birthday. Seventy years ago exactly I slid from the belly of the great Dark into this Light and Life. My God! My God! it is briefer than the rage of an hour, fleeter than a mid-day trance. Ul-Jabal greeted me warmly — seemed to have been looking forward to it — and pointed out that seventy is of the fateful numbers, its only factors being seven, five, and two: the last denoting the duality of Birth and Death; five, Isolation; seven, Infinity. I informed him that this was also my father’s birthday; and his father’s; and repeated the oft-told tale of how the latter, just seventy years ago to-day, walking at twilight by the churchyard-wall, saw the figure of himself sitting on a grave-stone, and died five weeks later riving with the pangs of hell. Whereat the sceptic showed his two huge rows of teeth.

‘What is his peculiar interest in the Edmundsbury chalice? On each successive birthday when the cup has been produced, he has asked me to show him the stone. Without any well-defined reason I have always declined, but to-day I yielded. He gazed long into its sky-blue depth, and then asked if I had no idea what the inscription “Has” meant. I informed him that it was one of the lost secrets of the world.

‘June 15. — Some new element has entered into our existence here. Something threatens me. I hear the echo of a menace against my sanity and my life. It is as if the garment which enwraps me has grown too hot, too heavy for me. A notable drowsiness has settled on my brain — a drowsiness in which thought, though slow, is a thousandfold more fiery-vivid than ever. Oh, fair goddess of Reason, desert not me, thy chosen child!

‘June 18. — Ul-Jabal? — that man is the very Devil incarnate!

‘June 19. — So much for my bounty, all my munificence, to this poisonous worm. I picked him up on the heights of the Mountain of Lebanon, a cultured savage among cultured savages, and brought him here to be a prince of thought by my side. What though his plundered wealth — the debt I owe him — has saved me from a sort of ruin? Have not I instructed him in the sweet secret of Reason?

‘I lay back on my bed in the lonely morning watches, my soul heavy as with the distilled essence of opiates, and in vivid vision knew that he had entered my apartment. In the twilight gloom his glittering rows of shark’s teeth seemed impacted on my eyeball — I saw them, and nothing else. I was not aware when he vanished from the room. But at daybreak I crawled on hands and knees to the cabinet containing the chalice. The viperous murderer! He has stolen my gem, well knowing that with it he has stolen my life. The stone is gone — gone, my precious gem. A weakness overtook me, and I lay for many dreamless hours naked on the marble floor.

‘Does the fool think to hide ought from my eyes? Can he imagine that I shall not recover my precious gem, my stone of Saul?

‘June 20. — Ah, Ul-Jabal — my brave, my noble Son of the Prophet of God! He has replaced the stone! He would not slay an aged man. The yellow ray of his eye, it is but the gleam of the great thinker, not — not — the gleam of the assassin. Again, as I lay in semi-somnolence, I saw him enter my room, this time more distinctly. He went up to the cabinet. Shaking the chalice in the dawning, some hours after he had left, I heard with delight the rattle of the stone. I might have known he would replace it; I should not have doubted his clemency to a poor man like me. But the strange being! — he has taken the other stone from the other cup — a thing of little value to any man! Is Ul-Jabal mad or I?

‘June 21. — Merciful Lord in Heaven! he has not replaced it — not it — but another instead of it. To-day I actually opened the chalice, and saw. He has put a stone there, the same in size, in cut, in engraving, but different in colour, in quality, in value — a stone I have never seen before. How has he obtained it — whence? I must brace myself to probe, to watch; I must turn myself into an eye to search this devil’s-bosom. My life, this subtle, cunning Reason of mine, hangs in the balance.

‘June 22. — Just now he offered me a cup of wine. I almost dashed it to the ground before him. But he looked steadfastly into my eye. I flinched: and drank — drank.

‘Years ago, when, as I remember, we were at Balbec, I saw him one day make an almost tasteless preparation out of pure black nicotine, which in mere wanton lust he afterwards gave to some of the dwellers by the Caspian to drink. But the fiend would surely never dream of giving to me that browse of hell — to me an aged man, and a thinker, a seer.

‘June 23. — The mysterious, the unfathomable Ul-Jabal! Once again, as I lay in heavy trance at midnight, has he invaded, calm and noiseless as a spirit, the sanctity of my chamber. Serene on the swaying air, which, radiant with soft beams of vermil and violet light, rocked me into variant visions of heaven, I reclined and regarded him unmoved. The man has replaced the valueless stone in the modern-made chalice, and has now stolen the false stone from the other, which he himself put there! In patience will I possess this my soul, and watch what shall betide. My eyes shall know no slumber!

‘June 24. — No more — no more shall I drink wine from the hand of Ul-Jabal. My knees totter beneath the weight of my lean body. Daggers of lambent fever race through my brain incessant. Some fibrillary twitchings at the right angle of the mouth have also arrested my attention.

‘June 25. — He has dared at open mid-day to enter my room. I watched him from an angle of the stairs pass along the corridor and open my door. But for the terrifying, death-boding thump, thump of my heart, I should have faced the traitor then, and told him that I knew all his treachery. Did I say that I had strange fibrillary twitchings at the right angle of my mouth, and a brain on fire? I have ceased to write my book — the more the pity for the world, not for me.

‘June 26. — Marvellous to tell, the traitor, Ul-Jabal, has now placed another stone in the Edmundsbury chalice — also identical in nearly every respect with the original gem. This, then, was the object of his entry into my room yesterday. So that he has first stolen the real stone and replaced it by another; then he has stolen this other and replaced it by yet another; he has beside stolen the valueless stone from the modern chalice, and then replaced it. Surely a man gone rabid, a man gone dancing, foaming, raving mad!

‘June 28. — I have now set myself to the task of recovering my jewel. It is here, and I shall find it. Life against life — and which is the best life, mine or this accursed Ishmaelite’s? If need be, I will do murder — I, with this withered hand — so that I get back the heritage which is mine.

‘To-day, when I thought he was wandering in the park, I stole into his room, locking the door on the inside. I trembled exceedingly, knowing that his eyes are in every place. I ransacked the chamber, dived among his clothes, but found no stone. One singular thing in a drawer I saw: a long, white beard, and a wig of long and snow-white hair. As I passed out of the chamber, lo, he stood face to face with me at the door in the passage. My heart gave one bound, and then seemed wholly to cease its travail. Oh, I must be sick unto death, weaker than a bruised reed! When I woke from my swoon he was supporting me in his arms. “Now,” he said, grinning down at me, “now you have at last delivered all into my hands.” He left me, and I saw him go into his room and lock the door upon himself. What is it I have delivered into the madman’s hands?

‘July 1. — Life against life — and his, the young, the stalwart, rather than mine, the mouldering, the sere. I love life. Not yet am I ready to weigh anchor, and reeve halliard, and turn my prow over the watery paths of the wine-brown Deeps. Oh no. Not yet. Let him die. Many and many are the days in which I shall yet see the light, walk, think. I am averse to end the number of my years: there is even a feeling in me at times that this worn body shall never, never taste of death. The chalice predicts indeed that I and my house shall end when the stone is lost — a mere fiction at first, an idler’s dream then, but now — now — that the prophecy has stood so long a part of the reality of things, and a fact among facts — no longer fiction, but Adamant, stern as the very word of God. Do I not feel hourly since it has gone how the surges of life ebb, ebb ever lower in my heart? Nay, nay, but there is hope. I have here beside me an Arab blade of subtle Damascene steel, insinuous to pierce and to hew, with which in a street of Bethlehem I saw a Syrian’s head cleft open — a gallant stroke! The edges of this I have made bright and white for a nuptial of blood.

‘July 2. — I spent the whole of the last night in searching every nook and crack of the house, using a powerful magnifying lens. At times I thought Ul-Jabal was watching me, and would pounce out and murder me.

Convulsive tremors shook my frame like earthquake. Ah me, I fear I am all too frail for this work. Yet dear is the love of life.

‘July 7. — The last days I have passed in carefully searching the grounds, with the lens as before. Ul-Jabal constantly found pretexts for following me, and I am confident that every step I took was known to him. No sign anywhere of the grass having been disturbed. Yet my lands are wide, and I cannot be sure. The burden of this mighty task is greater than I can bear. I am weaker than a bruised reed. Shall I not slay my enemy, and make an end?

‘July 8. — Ul-Jabal has been in my chamber again! I watched him through a crack in the panelling. His form was hidden by the bed, but I could see his hand reflected in the great mirror opposite the door. First, I cannot guess why, he moved to a point in front of the mirror the chair in which I sometimes sit. He then went to the box in which lie my few garments — and opened it. Ah, I have the stone — safe — safe! He fears my cunning, ancient eyes, and has hidden it in the one place where I would be least likely to seek it — in my own trunk! And yet I dread, most intensely I dread, to look.

‘July 9. — The stone, alas, is not there! At the last moment he must have changed his purpose. Could his wondrous sensitiveness of intuition have made him feel that my eyes were looking in on him?

‘July 10. — In the dead of night I knew that a stealthy foot had gone past my door. I rose and threw a mantle round me; I put on my head my cap of fur; I took the tempered blade in my hands; then crept out into the dark, and followed. Ul-Jabal carried a small lantern which revealed him to me. My feet were bare, but he wore felted slippers, which to my unfailing ear were not utterly noiseless. He descended the stairs to the bottom of the house, while I crouched behind him in the deepest gloom of the corners and walls.

At the bottom he walked into the pantry: there stopped, and turned the lantern full in the direction of the spot where I stood; but so agilely did I slide behind a pillar, that he could not have seen me. In the pantry he lifted the trap-door, and descended still further into the vaults beneath the house. Ah, the vaults, — the long, the tortuous, the darksome vaults, — how had I forgotten them? Still I followed, rent by seismic shocks of terror. I had not forgotten the weapon: could I creep near enough, I felt that I might plunge it into the marrow of his back. He opened the iron door of the first vault and passed in. If I could lock him in? — but he held the key. On and on he wound his way, holding the lantern near the ground, his head bent down. The thought came to me then, that, had I but the courage, one swift sweep, and all were over. I crept closer, closer. Suddenly he turned round, and made a quick step in my direction. I saw his eyes, the murderous grin of his jaw. I know not if he saw me — thought forsook me. The weapon fell with clatter and clangor from my grasp, and in panic fright I fled with extended arms and the headlong swiftness of a stripling, through the black labyrinths of the caverns, through the vacant corridors of the house, till I reached my chamber, the door of which I had time to fasten on myself before I dropped, gasping, panting for very life, on the floor.

‘July 11. — I had not the courage to see Ul-Jabal to-day. I have remained locked in my chamber all the time without food or water. My tongue cleaves to the roof of my mouth.

‘July 12. — I took heart and crept downstairs. I met him in the study. He smiled on me, and I on him, as if nothing had happened between us. Oh, our old friendship, how it has turned into bitterest hate! I had taken the false stone from the Edmundsbury chalice and put it in the pocket of my brown gown, with the bold intention of showing it to him, and asking him if he knew aught of it. But when I faced him, my courage failed again. We drank together and ate together as in the old days of love.

‘July 13. — I cannot think that I have not again imbibed some soporiferous drug. A great heaviness of sleep weighed on my brain till late in the day. When I woke my thoughts were in wild distraction, and a most peculiar condition of my skin held me fixed before the mirror. It is dry as parchment, and brown as the leaves of autumn.

‘July 14. — Ul-Jabal is gone! And I am left a lonely, a desolate old man! He said, though I swore it was false, that I had grown to mistrust him! that I was hiding something from him! that he could live with me no more! No more, he said, should I see his face! The debt I owe him he would forgive. He has taken one small parcel with him, — and is gone!

‘July 15. — Gone! gone! In mazeful dream I wander with uncovered head far and wide over my domain, seeking I know not what. The stone he has with him — the precious stone of Saul. I feel the life-surge ebbing, ebbing in my heart.’

Here the manuscript abruptly ended.

Prince Zaleski had listened as I read aloud, lying back on his Moorish couch and breathing slowly from his lips a heavy reddish vapour, which he imbibed from a very small, carved, bismuth pipette. His face, as far as I could see in the green-grey crepuscular atmosphere of the apartment, was expressionless. But when I had finished he turned fully round on me, and said:

‘You perceive, I hope, the sinister meaning of all this?’

‘Has it a meaning?’

Zaleski smiled.

‘Can you doubt it? in the shape of a cloud, the pitch of a thrush’s note, the nuance of a sea-shell you would find, had you only insight enough, inductive and deductive cunning enough, not only a meaning, but, I am convinced, a quite endless significance. Undoubtedly, in a human document of this kind, there is a meaning; and I may say at once that this meaning is entirely transparent to me. Pity only that you did not read the diary to me before.'

'Why?'

'Because we might, between us, have prevented a crime, and saved a life. The last entry in the diary was made on the 15th of July. What day is this?'

'This is the 20th.'

'Then I would wager a thousand to one that we are too late. There is still, however, the one chance left. The time is now seven o'clock: seven of the evening, I think, not of the morning; the houses of business in London are therefore closed. But why not send my man, Ham, with a letter by train to the private address of the person from whom you obtained the diary, telling him to hasten immediately to Sir Jocelin Saul, and on no consideration to leave his side for a moment? Ham would reach this person before midnight, and understanding that the matter was one of life and death, he would assuredly do your bidding.'

As I was writing the note suggested by Zaleski, I turned and asked him:

'From whom shall I say that the danger is to be expected — from the Indian?'

'From Ul-Jabal, yes; but by no means Indian — Persian.'

Profoundly impressed by this knowledge of detail derived from sources which had brought me no intelligence, I handed the note to the negro, telling him how to proceed, and instructing him before starting from the station to search all the procurable papers of the last few days, and to return in case he found in any of them a notice of the death of Sir Jocelin Saul. Then I resumed my seat by the side of Zaleski.

‘As I have told you,’ he said, ‘I am fully convinced that our messenger has gone on a bootless errand. I believe you will find that what has really occurred is this: either yesterday, or the day before, Sir Jocelin was found by his servant — I imagine he had a servant, though no mention is made of any — lying on the marble floor of his chamber, dead. Near him, probably by his side, will be found a gem — an oval stone, white in colour — the same in fact which Ul-Jabal last placed in the Edmundsbury chalice. There will be no marks of violence — no trace of poison — the death will be found to be a perfectly natural one. Yet, in this case, a particularly wicked murder has been committed. There are, I assure you, to my positive knowledge forty-three — and in one island in the South Seas, forty-four — different methods of doing murder, any one of which would be entirely beyond the scope of the introspective agencies at the ordinary disposal of society.

‘But let us bend our minds to the details of this matter. Let us ask first, who is this Ul-Jabal? I have said that he is a Persian, and of this there is abundant evidence in the narrative other than his mere name. Fragmentary as the document is, and not intended by the writer to afford the information, there is yet evidence of the religion of this man, of the particular sect of that religion to which he belonged, of his peculiar shade of colour, of the object of his stay at the manor-house of Saul, of the special tribe amongst whom he formerly lived. “What,” he asks, when his greedy eyes first light on the long-desired gem, “what is the meaning of the inscription ‘Has’” — the meaning which he so well knew. “One of the lost secrets of the world,” replies the baronet. But I can hardly understand a learned Orientalist speaking in that way about what appears to me a very patent circumstance:

it is clear that he never earnestly applied himself to the solution of the riddle, or else — what is more likely, in spite of his rather high-flown estimate of his own “Reason” — that his mind, and the mind of his ancestors, never was able to go farther back in time than the Edmundsbury Monks. But they did not make the stone, nor did they dig it from the depths of the earth in Suffolk — they got it from some one, and it is not difficult to say with certainty from whom. The stone, then, might have been engraved by that someone, or by the someone from whom he received it, and so on back into the dimnesses of time. And consider the character of the engraving — it consists of a mythological animal, and some words, of which the letters “Has” only are distinguishable. But the animal, at least, is pure Persian. The Persians, you know, were not only quite worthy competitors with the Hebrews, the Egyptians, and later on the Greeks, for excellence in the glyptic art, but this fact is remarkable, that in much the same way that the figure of the scarabaeus on an intaglio or cameo is a pretty infallible indication of an Egyptian hand, so is that of a priest or a grotesque animal a sure indication of a Persian. We may say, then, from that evidence alone — though there is more — that this gem was certainly Persian. And having reached that point, the mystery of “Has” vanishes: for we at once jump at the conclusion that that too is Persian. But Persian, you say, written in English characters? Yes, and it was precisely this fact that made its meaning one of what the baronet childishly calls “the lost secrets of the world”: for every successive inquirer, believing it part of an English phrase, was thus hopelessly led astray in his investigation. “Has” is, in fact, part of the word “Hasn-us-Sabah,” and the mere circumstance that some of it has been obliterated, while the figure of the mystic animal remains intact, shows that it was executed by one of a nation less skilled in the art of graving in precious stones than the Persians, — by a rude, mediaeval

Englishman, in short, — the modern revival of the art owing its origin, of course, to the Medici of a later age. And of this Englishman — who either graved the stone himself, or got some one else to do it for him — do we know nothing? We know, at least, that he was certainly a fighter, probably a Norman baron, that on his arm he bore the cross of red, that he trod the sacred soil of Palestine. Perhaps, to prove this, I need hardly remind you who Hasn-us-Sabah was. It is enough if I say that he was greatly mixed up in the affairs of the Crusaders, lending his irresistible arms now to this side, now to that. He was the chief of the heterodox Mohammedan sect of the Assassins (this word, I believe, is actually derived from his name); imagined himself to be an incarnation of the Deity, and from his inaccessible rock-fortress of Alamut in the Elburz exercised a sinister influence on the intricate politics of the day. The Red Cross Knights called him Shaikh-ul-Jabal — the Old Man of the Mountains, that very nickname connecting him infallibly with the Ul-Jabal of our own times. Now three well-known facts occur to me in connection with this stone of the House of Saul: the first, that Saladin met in battle, and defeated, and plundered, in a certain place, on a certain day, this Hasn-us-Sabah, or one of his successors bearing the same name; the second, that about this time there was a cordial rapprochement between Saladin and Richard the Lion, and between the Infidels and the Christians generally, during which a free interchange of gems, then regarded as of deep mystic importance, took place — remember “The Talisman,” and the “Lee Penny”; the third, that soon after the fighters of Richard, and then himself, returned to England, the Loculus or coffin of St. Edmund (as we are informed by the Jocelini Chronica) was opened by the Abbot at midnight, and the body of the martyr exposed. On such occasions it was customary to place gems and relics in the coffin, when it was again closed up. Now, the chalice with the stone was taken from this loculus; and is it possible not to believe that some knight, to whom it had been presented by one of Saladin's men, had in turn presented it to the monastery, first scratching uncouthly on its surface the name of Hasn to mark its semi-sacred origin, or perhaps bidding the monks to do so? But the Assassins, now called, I think, "al Hasani" or "Ismaili"— "that accursed Ishmaelite," the baronet exclaims in one place — still live, are still a flourishing sect impelled by fervid religious fanaticisms. And where think you is their chief place of settlement? Where, but on the heights of that same "Lebanon" on which Sir Jocelin "picked up" his too doubtful scribe and literary helper?

'It now becomes evident that Ul-Jabal was one of the sect of the Assassins, and that the object of his sojourn at the manor-house, of his financial help to the baronet, of his whole journey perhaps to England, was the recovery of the sacred gem which once glittered on the breast of the founder of his sect. In dread of spoiling all by over-rashness, he waits, perhaps for years, till he makes sure that the stone is the right one by seeing it with his own eyes, and learns the secret of the spring by which the chalice is opened. He then proceeds to steal it. So far all is clear enough. Now, this too is conceivable, that, intending to commit the theft, he had beforehand provided himself with another stone similar in size and shape — these being well known to him — to the other, in order to substitute it for the real stone, and so, for a time at least, escape detection. It is presumable that the chalice was not often opened by the baronet, and this would therefore have been a perfectly rational device on the part of Ul-Jabal. But assuming this to be his mode of thinking, how ludicrously absurd appears all the trouble he took to engrave the false stone in an exactly similar manner to the other. That could not help him in producing the deception, for that he did not contemplate the stone being seen, but only heard in the cup, is proved by the fact that he selected a stone of a different colour. This colour, as I shall afterwards show you, was that of a pale, brown-spotted stone. But we are met with something more extraordinary still when we come to the last stone, the white one — I shall prove that it was white — which Ul-Jabal placed in the cup. Is it possible that he had provided two substitutes, and that he had engraved these two, without object, in the same minutely careful manner? Your mind refuses to conceive it; and having done this, declines, in addition, to believe that he had prepared even one substitute; and I am fully in accord with you in this conclusion.

‘We may say then that Ul-Jabal had not prepared any substitute; and it may be added that it was a thing altogether beyond the limits of the probable that he could by chance have possessed two old gems exactly similar in every detail down to the very half-obliterated letters of the word “Hasn-us-Sabah.” I have now shown, you perceive, that he did not make them purposely, and that he did not possess them accidentally. Nor were they the baronet’s, for we have his declaration that he had never seen them before. Whence then did the Persian obtain them? That point will immediately emerge into clearness, when we have sounded his motive for replacing the one false stone by the other, and, above all, for taking away the valueless stone, and then replacing it. And in order to lead you up to the comprehension of this motive, I begin by making the bold assertion that Ul-Jabal had not in his possession the real St. Edmundsbury stone at all.

‘You are surprised; for you argue that if we are to take the baronet’s evidence at all, we must take it in this particular also, and he positively asserts that he saw the Persian take the stone. It is true that there are indubitable signs of insanity in the document, but it is the insanity of a diseased mind manifesting itself by fantastic exaggeration of sentiment, rather than of a mind confiding to itself its own delusions as to matters of fact. There is therefore nothing so certain as that Ul-Jabal did steal the gem; but these two things are equally evident: that by some means or other it very soon passed out of his possession, and that when it had so passed, he, for his part, believed it to be in the possession of the baronet. “Now,” he cries in triumph, one day as he catches Sir Jocelin in his room— “now you have delivered all into my hands.” “All” what, Sir Jocelin wonders. “All,” of course, meant the stone. He believes that the baronet has done precisely what the baronet afterwards believes that he has done — hidden away the stone in the most secret of all places, in his own apartment, to wit. The Persian, sure now at last of victory, accordingly hastens into his chamber, and “locks the door,” in order, by an easy search, to secure his prize. When, moreover, the baronet is examining the house at night with his lens, he believes that Ul-Jabal is spying his movements; when he extends his operations to the park, the other finds pretexts to be near him. Ul-Jabal dogs his footsteps like a shadow. But supposing he had really had the jewel, and had deposited it in a place of perfect safety — such as, with or without lenses, the extensive grounds of the manor-house would certainly have afforded — his more reasonable rôle would have been that of unconscious nonchalance, rather than of agonised interest. But, in fact, he supposed the owner of the stone to be himself seeking a secure hiding-place for it, and is resolved at all costs on knowing the secret. And again in the vaults beneath the house Sir Jocelin reports that Ul-Jabal “holds the lantern near the ground, with his head bent down”: can anything be better descriptive of the attitude of search? Yet each is so sure that the other possesses the gem, that neither is able to suspect that both are seekers.

‘But, after all, there is far better evidence of the non-possession of the stone by the Persian than all this — and that is the murder of the baronet, for I can almost promise you that our messenger will return in a few minutes. Now, it seems to me that Ul-Jabal was not really murderous, averse rather to murder; thus the baronet is often in his power, swoons in his arms, lies under the influence of narcotics in semi-sleep while the Persian is in his room, and yet no injury is done him. Still, when the clear necessity to murder — the clear means of gaining the stone — presents itself to Ul-Jabal, he does not hesitate a moment — indeed, he has already made elaborate preparations for that very necessity. And when was it that this necessity presented itself? It was when the baronet put the false stone in the pocket of a loose gown for the purpose of confronting the Persian with it. But what kind of pocket? I think you will agree with me, that male garments, admitting of the designation “gown,” have usually only outer pockets — large, square pockets, simply sewed on to the outside of the robe. But a stone of that size must have made such a pocket bulge outwards. Ul-Jabal must have noticed it. Never before has he been perfectly sure that the baronet carried the long-desired gem about on his body; but now at last he knows beyond all doubt. To obtain it, there are several courses open to him: he may rush there and then on the weak old man and tear the stone from him; he may ply him with narcotics, and extract it from the pocket during sleep. But in these there is a small chance of failure; there is a certainty of near or ultimate detection, pursuit — and this is a land of Law, swift and fairly sure. No, the old man must die: only thus — thus surely, and thus secretly — can the outraged dignity of Hasn-us-Sabah be appeased. On the very next day he leaves the house — no more shall the mistrustful baronet, who is “hiding something from him,” see his face. He carries with him a small parcel. Let me tell you what was in that parcel: it contained the baronet’s fur cap, one of his “brown gowns,” and a snow-white beard and wig. Of the cap we can be sure; for from the fact that, on leaving his room at midnight to follow the Persian through the house, he put it on his head, I gather that he wore it habitually during all his waking hours; yet after Ul-Jabal has left him he wanders far and wide “with uncovered head.” Can you not picture the distracted old man seeking ever and anon with absent mind for his long-accustomed head-gear, and seeking in vain? Of the gown, too, we may be equally certain: for it was the procuring of this that led Ul-Jabal to the baronet’s trunk; we now know that he did not go there to hide the stone, for he had it not to hide; nor to seek it, for he would be unable to believe the baronet childish enough to deposit it in so obvious a place. As for the wig and beard, they had been previously seen in his room. But before he leaves the house Ul-Jabal has one more work to do: once more the two eat and drink together as in “the old days of love”; once more the baronet is drunken with a deep sleep, and when he wakes, his skin is “brown as the leaves of autumn.” That is the evidence of which I spake in the beginning as giving us a hint of the exact shade of the Oriental’s colour — it was the yellowish-brown of a sered leaf. And now that the face of the baronet has been smeared with this indelible pigment, all is ready for the tragedy, and Ul-Jabal departs. He will return, but not immediately, for he will at least give the eyes of his victim time to grow accustomed to the change of colour in his face; nor will he tarry long, for there is no telling whether, or whither, the stone may not disappear from that outer pocket. I therefore surmise that the tragedy took place a day or two ago. I remembered the feebleness of the old man, his highly neurotic condition; I thought of those “fibrillary twitchings,” indicating the onset of a well-known nervous disorder sure to end in sudden death; I recalled his belief that on account of the loss of the stone, in which he felt his life bound up, the chariot of death was urgent on his footsteps; I bore in mind his memory of his grandfather dying in agony just seventy years ago after seeing his own wraith by the churchyard-wall; I knew that such a man could not be struck by the sudden, the terrific shock of seeing himself sitting in the chair before the mirror (the chair, you remember, had been placed there by Ul-Jabal) without dropping down stone dead on the spot. I was thus able to predict the manner and place of the baronet's death — if he be dead. Beside him, I said, would probably be found a white stone. For Ul-Jabal, his ghastly impersonation ended, would hurry to the pocket, snatch out the stone, and finding it not the stone he sought, would in all likelihood dash it down, fly away from the corpse as if from plague, and, I hope, straightway go and — hang himself.'

It was at this point that the black mask of Ham framed itself between the python-skin tapestries of the doorway. I tore from him the paper, now two days old, which he held in his hand, and under the heading, 'Sudden death of a Baronet,' read a nearly exact account of the facts which Zaleski had been detailing to me.

'I can see by your face that I was not altogether at fault,' he said, with one of his musical laughs; 'but there still remains for us to discover whence Ul-Jabal obtained his two substitutes, his motive for exchanging one for the other, and for stealing the valueless gem; but, above all, we must find where the real stone was all the time that these two men so sedulously sought it, and where it now is. Now, let us turn our attention to this stone, and ask, first, what light does the inscription on the cup throw on its nature? The inscription assures us that if "this stone be stolen," or if it "chaunges dre," the House of Saul and its head "anoon" (i.e. anon, at once) shall die. "Dre," I may remind you, is an old English word, used, I think, by Burns, identical with the Saxon "dreogan," meaning to "suffer." So that the writer at least contemplated that the stone might "suffer changes." But what kind of changes — external or internal? External change — change of environment — is already provided for when he says, "shulde this Ston stalen bee";

“chaunges,” therefore, in his mind, meant internal changes. But is such a thing possible for any precious stone, and for this one in particular? As to that, we might answer when we know the name of this one. It nowhere appears in the manuscript, and yet it is immediately discoverable. For it was a “sky-blue” stone; a sky-blue, sacred stone; a sky-blue, sacred, Persian stone. That at once gives us its name — it was a turquoise. But can the turquoise, to the certain knowledge of a mediaeval writer, “chaunges dre”? Let us turn for light to old Anselm de Boot: that is he in pig-skin on the shelf behind the bronze Hera.’

I handed the volume to Zaleski. He pointed to a passage which read as follows:

‘Assuredly the turquoise doth possess a soul more intelligent than that of man. But we cannot be wholly sure of the presence of Angels in precious stones. I do rather opine that the evil spirit doth take up his abode therein, transforming himself into an angel of light, to the end that we put our trust not in God, but in the precious stone; and thus, perhaps, doth he deceive our spirits by the turquoise: for the turquoise is of two sorts: those which keep their colour, and those which lose it.’

‘Assurément la turquoise a une âme plus intelligente que l’âme de l’homme. Mais nous ne pouvons rien établir de certain touchant la presence des Anges dans les pierres precieuses. Mon jugement seroit plustot que le mauvais esprit, qui se transforme en Ange de lumiere se loge dans les pierres precieuses, à fin que l’on ne recoure pas à Dieu, mais que l’on repose sa creance dans la pierre precieuse; ainsi, peut-être, il deçoit nos esprits par la turquoise: car la turquoise est de deux sortes, les unes qui conservent leur couleur et les autres qui la perdent.’ Anselm de Boot, Book II.

‘You thus see,’ resumed Zaleski, ‘that the turquoise was believed to have the property of changing its colour — a change which was universally supposed to indicate the fading away and death of its owner. The good De Boot, alas, believed this to be a property of too many other stones beside, like the Hebrews in respect of their urim and thummim; but in the case of the turquoise, at least, it is a well-authenticated natural phenomenon, and I have myself seen such a specimen. In some cases the change is a gradual process; in others it may occur suddenly within an hour, especially when the gem, long kept in the dark, is exposed to brilliant sunshine. I should say, however, that in this metamorphosis there is always an intermediate stage: the stone first changes from blue to a pale colour spotted with brown, and, lastly, to a pure white. Thus, Ul-Jabal having stolen the stone, finds that it is of the wrong colour, and soon after replaces it; he supposes that in the darkness he has selected the wrong chalice, and so takes the valueless stone from the other. This, too, he replaces, and, infinitely puzzled, makes yet another hopeless trial of the Edmundsbury chalice, and, again baffled, again replaces it, concluding now that the baronet has suspected his designs, and substituted a false stone for the real one. But after this last replacement, the stone assumes its final hue of white, and thus the baronet is led to think that two stones have been substituted by Ul-Jabal for his own invaluable gem. All this while the gem was lying serenely in its place in the chalice. And thus it came to pass that in the Manor-house of Saul there arose a somewhat considerable Ado about Nothing.’

For a moment Zaleski paused; then, turning round and laying his hand on the brown forehead of the mummy by his side, he said:

‘My friend here could tell you, and he would, a fine tale of the immensely important part which jewels in all ages have played in human history, human religions, institutions, ideas. He flourished some five centuries before the Messiah, was a Memphian priest of Amsu, and, as the hieroglyphics on his coffin assure me, a prime favourite with one Queen Amyntas. Beneath these mouldering swaddlings of the grave a great ruby still cherishes its blood-guilty secret on the forefinger of his right hand. Most curious is it to reflect how in all lands, and at all times, precious minerals have been endowed by men with mystic virtues. The Persians, for instance, believed that spinelle and the garnet were harbingers of joy. Have you read the ancient Bishop of Rennes on the subject? Really, I almost think there must be some truth in all this. The instinct of universal man is rarely far at fault. Already you have a semi-comic “gold-cure” for alcoholism, and you have heard of the geophagism of certain African tribes. What if the scientist of the future be destined to discover that the diamond, and it alone, is a specific for cholera, that powdered rubellite cures fever, and the chrysoberyl gout? It would be in exact conformity with what I have hitherto observed of a general trend towards a certain inborn perverseness and whimsicality in Nature.’

Note. — As some proof of the fineness of intuition evidenced by Zaleski, as distinct from his more conspicuous powers of reasoning, I may here state that some years after the occurrence of the tragedy I have recorded above, the skeleton of a man was discovered in the vaults of the Manor-house of Saul. I have not the least doubt that it was the skeleton of Ul-Jabal. The teeth were very prominent. A rotten rope was found loosely knotted round the vertebrae of his neck.

To say that there are epidemics of suicide is to give expression to what is now a mere commonplace of knowledge. And so far are they from being of rare occurrence, that it has even been affirmed that every sensational case of felo de se published in the newspapers is sure to be followed by some others more obscure: their frequency, indeed, is out of all proportion with the extent of each particular outbreak. Sometimes, however, especially in villages and small townships, the wildfire madness becomes an all-involving passion, emulating in its fury the great plagues of history. Of such kind was the craze in Versailles in 1793, when about a quarter of the whole population perished by the scourge; while that at the Hôtel des Invalides in Paris was only a notable one of the many which have occurred during the present century. At such times it is as if the optic nerve of the mind throughout whole communities became distorted, till in the noseless and black-robed Reaper it discerned an angel of very loveliness. As a brimming maiden, out-worn by her virginity, yields half-fainting to the dear sick stress of her desire — with just such faintings, wanton fires, does the soul, over-taxed by the continence of living, yield voluntary to the grave, and adulterously make of Death its paramour.

‘When she sees a bank
Stuck full of flowers, she, with a sigh, will tell
Her servants, what a pretty place it were
To bury lovers in; and make her maids
Pluck ’em, and strew her over like a corse.’

[Footnote: Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid’s Tragedy.]

The mode spreads — then rushes into rage: to breathe is to be obsolete: to wear the shroud becomes comme il faut, this cerecloth acquiring all the attractiveness and éclat of a wedding-garment. The coffin is not too strait for lawless nuptial bed; and the sweet clods of the valley will prove no barren bridegroom of a writhing progeny. There is, however, nothing specially mysterious in the operation of a pestilence of this nature: it is as conceivable, if not yet as explicable, as the contagion of cholera, mind being at least as sensitive to the touch of mind as body to that of body.

It was during the ever-memorable outbreak of this obscure malady in the year 1875 that I ventured to break in on the calm of that deep Silence in which, as in a mantle, my friend Prince Zaleski had wrapped himself. I wrote, in fact, to ask him what he thought of the epidemic. His answer was in the laconic words addressed to the Master in the house of woe at Bethany:

‘Come and see.’

To this, however, he added in postscript: ‘but what epidemic?’

I had momentarily lost sight of the fact that Zaleski had so absolutely cut himself off from the world, that he was not in the least likely to know anything even of the appalling series of events to which I had referred. And yet it is no exaggeration to say that those events had thrown the greater part of Europe into a state of consternation, and even confusion. In London, Manchester, Paris, and Berlin, especially the excitement was intense. On the Sunday preceding the writing of my note to Zaleski, I was present at a monster demonstration held in Hyde Park, in which the Government was held up on all hands to the popular derision and censure — for it will be remembered that to many minds the mysterious accompaniments of some of the deaths daily occurring conveyed a still darker significance than that implied in mere self-destruction, and seemed to point to a succession of purposeless and hideous murders. The demagogues, I must say, spoke with some wildness and incoherence. Many laid the blame at the door of the police, and urged that things would be different were they but placed under municipal, instead of under imperial, control. A thousand panaceas were invented, a thousand aimless censures passed. But the people listened with vacant ear. Never have I seen the populace so agitated, and yet so subdued, as with the sense of some impending doom. The glittering eye betrayed the excitement, the pallor of the cheek the doubt, the haunting fear. None felt himself quite safe; men recognised shuddering the grin of death in the air. To tingle with affright, and to know not why — that is the transcendentalism of terror. The threat of the cannon’s mouth is trivial in its effect on the mind in comparison with the menace of a Shadow. It is the pestilence that walketh by night that is intolerable. As for myself, I confess to being pervaded with a nameless and numbing awe during all those weeks. And this feeling appeared to be general in the land. The journals had but one topic; the party organs threw politics to the winds. I heard that on the Stock Exchange, as in the Paris Bourse, business decreased to a minimum. In Parliament the work of law-threshing practically ceased, and the time of Ministers was nightly spent in answering volumes of angry 'Questions,' and in facing motion after motion for the 'adjournment' of the House.

It was in the midst of all this commotion that I received Prince Zaleski's brief 'Come and see.' I was flattered and pleased: flattered, because I suspected that to me alone, of all men, would such an invitation, coming from him, be addressed; and pleased, because many a time in the midst of the noisy city street and the garish, dusty world, had the thought of that vast mansion, that dim and silent chamber, flooded my mind with a drowsy sense of the romantic, till, from very excess of melancholy sweetness in the picture, I was fain to close my eyes. I avow that that lonesome room — gloomy in its lunar bath of soft perfumed light — shrouded in the sullen voluptuousness of plushy, narcotic-breathing draperies — pervaded by the mysterious spirit of its brooding occupant — grew more and more on my fantasy, till the remembrance had for me all the cool refreshment shed by a midsummer-night's dream in the dewy deeps of some Perrhoebian grove of cornel and lotos and ruby stars of the asphodel. It was, therefore, in all haste that I set out to share for a time in the solitude of my friend.

Zaleski's reception of me was most cordial; immediately on my entrance into his sanctum he broke into a perfect torrent of wild, enthusiastic words, telling me with a kind of rapture, that he was just then laboriously engaged in co-ordinating to one of the calculi certain new properties he had discovered in the parabola, adding with infinite gusto his 'firm' belief that the ancient Assyrians were acquainted with all our modern notions respecting the parabola itself, the projection of bodies in general, and of the heavenly bodies in particular; and must, moreover, from certain inferences of his own in connection with the Winged Circle, have been conversant with the fact that light is not an ether, but only the vibration of an ether. He then galloped on to suggest that I should at once take part with him in his investigations, and commented on the timeliness of my visit. I, on my part, was anxious for his opinion on other and far weightier matters than the concerns of the Assyrians, and intimated as much to him. But for two days he was firm in his tacit refusal to listen to my story; and, concluding that he was disinclined to undergo the agony of unrest with which he was always tormented by any mystery which momentarily baffled him, I was, of course, forced to hold my peace. On the third day, however, of his own accord he asked me to what epidemic I had referred. I then detailed to him some of the strange events which were agitating the mind of the outside world. From the very first he was interested: later on that interest grew into a passion, a greedy soul-consuming quest after the truth, the intensity of which was such at last as to move me even to pity.

I may as well here restate the facts as I communicated them to Zaleski. The concatenation of incidents, it will be remembered, started with the extraordinary death of that eminent man of science, Professor Schleschinger, consulting laryngologist to the Charité Hospital in Berlin. The professor, a man of great age, was on the point of contracting his third marriage with the beautiful and accomplished daughter of the Herr Geheimrath Otto von Friedrich. The contemplated union, which was entirely one of those mariages de convenance so common in good society, sprang out of the professor's ardent desire to leave behind him a direct heir to his very considerable wealth. By his first two marriages, indeed, he had had large families, and was at this very time surrounded by quite an army of little grandchildren, from whom (all his direct descendants being dead) he might have been content to select his heir; but the old German prejudices in these matters are strong, and he still hoped to be represented on his decease by a son of his own. To this whim the charming Otilie was marked by her parents as the victim. The wedding, however, had been postponed owing to a slight illness of the veteran scientist, and just as he was on the point of final recovery from it, death intervened to prevent altogether the execution of his design. Never did death of man create a profounder sensation; never was death of man followed by consequences more terrible. The Residenz of the scientist was a stately mansion near the University in the Unter den Linden boulevard, that is to say, in the most fashionable Quartier of Berlin. His bedroom from a considerable height looked out on a small back garden, and in this room he had been engaged in conversation with his colleague and medical attendant, Dr. Johann Hofmeier, to a late hour of the night. During all this time he seemed cheerful, and spoke quite lucidly on various topics. In particular, he exhibited to his colleague a curious strip of what looked like ancient papyrus, on which were traced certain grotesque and apparently meaningless figures. This, he said, he had found some days before on the bed of a poor woman in one of the horribly low quarters that surround Berlin, on whom he had had occasion to make a post-mortem examination. The woman had suffered from partial paralysis. She had a small young family, none of whom, however, could give any account of the slip, except one little girl, who declared that she had taken it 'from her mother's mouth' after death. The slip was soiled, and had a fragrant smell, as though it had been smeared with honey. The professor added that all through his illness he had been employing himself by examining these figures. He was convinced, he said, that they contained some archaeological significance; but, in any case, he ceased not to ask himself how came a slip of papyrus to be found in such a situation, — on the bed of a dead Berliner of the poorest class? The story of its being taken from the mouth of the woman was, of course, unbelievable. The whole incident seemed to puzzle, while it amused him; seemed to appeal to the instinct — so strong in him — to investigate, to probe. For days, he declared, he had been endeavouring, in vain, to make anything of the figures. Dr. Hofmeier, too, examined the slip, but inclined to believe that the figures — rude and uncouth as they were — were only such as might be drawn by any school-boy in an idle moment. They consisted merely of a man and a woman seated on a bench, with what looked like an ornamental border running round them. After a pleasant evening's scientific gossip, Dr. Hofmeier, a little after midnight, took his departure from the bed-side. An hour later the servants were roused from sleep by one deep, raucous cry proceeding from the professor's room. They hastened to his door; it was locked on the inside; all was still within. No answer coming to their calls, the door was broken in. They found their master lying calm and dead on his bed. A window of the room was open, but there was nothing to show that any one had entered it. Dr. Hofmeier was sent for, and was soon on the scene. After examining the body, he failed to find anything to account for the sudden demise of his old friend and chief. One observation, however, had the effect of causing him to tingle with horror. On his entrance he had noticed, lying on the side of the bed, the piece of papyrus with which the professor had been toying in the earlier part of the day, and had removed it. But, as he was on the point of leaving the room, he happened to approach the corpse once more, and bending over it, noticed that the lips and teeth were slightly parted. Drawing open the now stiffened jaws, he found — to his amazement, to his stupefaction — that, neatly folded beneath the dead tongue, lay just such another piece of papyrus as that which he had removed from the bed. He drew it out — it was clammy. He put it to his nose, — it exhaled the fragrance of honey. He opened it, — it was covered by figures. He compared them with the figures on the other slip, — they were just so similar as two draughtsmen hastily copying from a common model would make them. The doctor was unnerved: he hurried homeward, and immediately submitted the honey on the papyrus to a rigorous chemical analysis: he suspected poison — a subtle poison — as the means of a suicide, grotesquely, insanely accomplished. He found the fluid to be perfectly innocuous, — pure honey, and nothing more.

The next day Germany thrilled with the news that Professor Schleschinger had destroyed himself. For suicide, however, some of the papers substituted murder, though of neither was there an atom of actual proof. On the day following, three persons died by their own hands in Berlin, of whom two were young members of the medical profession; on the day following that, the number rose to nineteen, Hamburg, Dresden, and Aachen joining in the frenzied death-dance; within three weeks from the night on which Professor Schleschinger met his unaccountable end, eight thousand persons in Germany, France, and Great Britain, died in that startlingly sudden and secret manner which we call ‘tragic’, many of them obviously by their own hands, many, in what seemed the servility of a fatal imitateness, with figured, honey-smeared slips of papyrus beneath their tongues. Even now — now, after years — I thrill intensely to recall the dread remembrance; but to live through it, to breathe daily the mawkish, miasmatic atmosphere, all vapid with the suffocating death — ah, it was terror too deep, nausea too foul, for mortal bearing. Novalis has somewhere hinted at the possibility (or the desirability) of a simultaneous suicide and voluntary return by the whole human family into the sweet bosom of our ancient Father — I half expected it was coming, had come, then. It was as if the old, good-easy, meek-eyed man of science, dying, had left his effectual curse on all the world, and had thereby converted civilisation into one omnivorous grave, one universal charnel-house. I spent several days in reading out to Zaleski accounts of particular deaths as they had occurred. He seemed never to tire of listening, lying back for the most part on the silver-cushioned couch, and wearing an inscrutable mask. Sometimes he rose and paced the carpet with noiseless foot-fall, his steps increasing to the swaying, uneven velocity of an animal in confinement as a passage here or there attracted him, and then subsiding into their slow regularity again. At any interruption in the reading, he would instantly turn to me with a certain impatience, and implore me to proceed; and when our stock of matter failed, he broke out into actual anger that I had not brought more with me. Henceforth the negro, Ham, using my trap, daily took a double journey — one before sunrise, and one at dusk — to the nearest townlet, from which he would return loaded with newspapers. With unimaginable eagerness did both Zaleski and I seize, morning after morning, and evening after evening, on these budgets, to gloat for long hours over the ever-lengthening tale of death. As for him, sleep forsook him. He was a man of small reasonableness, scorning the limitations of human capacity; his palate brooked no meat when his brain was headlong in the chase; even the mild narcotics which were now his food and drink seemed to lose something of their power to mollify, to curb him. Often rising from slumber in what I took to be the dead of night — though of day or night there could be small certainty in that dim dwelling — I would peep into the domed chamber, and see him there under the livid-green light of the censer, the leaden smoke issuing from his lips, his eyes fixed unweariedly on a square piece of ebony which rested on the coffin of the mummy near him. On this ebony he had pasted side by side several woodcuts — snipped from the newspapers — of the figures traced on the pieces of papyrus found in the mouths of the dead. I could see, as time passed, that he was concentrating all his powers on these figures; for the details of the deaths themselves were all of a dreary sameness, offering few salient points for investigation. In those cases where the suicide had left behind him clear evidence of the means by which he had committed the act, there was nothing to investigate; the others — rich and poor alike, peer and peasant — trooped out by thousands on the far journey, without leaving the faintest footprint to mark the road by which they had gone.

This was perhaps the reason that, after a time, Zaleski discarded the newspapers, leaving their perusal to me, and turned his attention exclusively to the ebon tablet. Knowing as I full well did the daring and success of his past spiritual adventures, — the subtlety, the imagination, the imperial grip of his intellect, — I did not at all doubt that his choice was wise, and would in the end be justified. These woodcuts — now so notorious — were all exactly similar in design, though minutely differing here and there in drawing. The following is a facsimile of one of them taken by me at random:

The time passed. It now began to be a grief to me to see the turgid pallor that gradually overspread the always ashen countenance of Zaleski; I grew to consider the ravaging life that glared and blazed in his sunken eye as too volcanic, demonic, to be canny: the mystery, I decided at last — if mystery there were — was too deep, too dark, for him. Hence perhaps it was, that I now absented myself more and more from him in the adjoining room in which I slept. There one day I sat reading over the latest list of horrors, when I heard a loud cry from the vaulted chamber. I rushed to the door and beheld him standing, gazing with wild eyes at the ebon tablet held straight out in front of him.

‘By Heaven!’ he cried, stamping savagely with his foot. ‘By Heaven! Then I certainly am a fool! It is the staff of Phaebus in the hand of Hermes!’

I hastened to him. ‘Tell me,’ I said, ‘have you discovered anything?’

‘It is possible.’

‘And has there really been foul play — murder — in any of these deaths?’

‘Of that, at least, I was certain from the first.’

‘Great God!’ I exclaimed, ‘could any son of man so convert himself into a fiend, a beast of the wilderness....’

‘You judge precisely in the manner of the multitude,’ he answered somewhat petulantly. ‘Illegal murder is always a mistake, but not necessarily a crime. Remember Corday. But in cases where the murder of one is really fiendish, why is it qualitatively less fiendish than the murder of many? On the other hand, had Brutus slain a thousand Caesars — each act involving an additional exhibition of the sublimest self-suppression — he might well have taken rank as a saint in heaven.’

Failing for the moment to see the drift or the connection of the argument, I contented myself with waiting events. For the rest of that day and the next Zaleski seemed to have dismissed the matter of the tragedies from his mind, and entered calmly on his former studies. He no longer consulted the news, or examined the figures on the tablet. The papers, however, still arrived daily, and of these he soon afterwards laid several before me, pointing, with a curious smile, to a small paragraph in each. These all appeared in the advertisement columns, were worded alike, and read as follows:

‘A true son of Lycurgus, having news, desires to know the time and place of the next meeting of his Phyle. Address Zaleski, at R ——— Abbey, in the county of M ——— .’

I gazed in mute alternation at the advertisement and at him. I may here stop to make mention of a very remarkable sensation which my association with him occasionally produced in me. I felt it with intense, with unpleasant, with irritating keenness at this moment. It was the sensation of being borne aloft — aloft — by a force external to myself — such a sensation as might possibly tingle through an earthworm when lifted into illimitable airy heights by the strongly-daring pinions of an eagle. It was the feeling of being hurried out beyond one's depth — caught and whiffed away by the all-compelling sweep of some rabid vigour into a new, foreign element. Something akin I have experienced in an 'express' as it raged with me — winged, rocking, ecstatic, shrilling a dragon Aha! — round a too narrow curve. It was a sensation very far from agreeable.

'To that,' he said, pointing to the paragraph, 'we may, I think, shortly expect an answer. Let us only hope that when it comes it may be immediately intelligible.'

We waited throughout the whole of that day and night, hiding our eagerness under the pretence of absorption in our books. If by chance I fell into an uneasy doze, I found him on waking ever watchful, and poring over the great tome before him. About the time, however, when, could we have seen it, the first grey of dawn must have been peeping over the land, his impatience again became painful to witness; he rose and paced the room, muttering occasionally to himself. This only ceased, when, hours later, Ham entered the room with an envelope in his hand. Zaleski seized it — tore it open — ran his eye over the contents — and dashed it to the ground with an oath.

'Curse it!' he groaned. 'Ah, curse it! unintelligible — every syllable of it!'

I picked up the missive and examined it. It was a slip of papyrus covered with the design now so hideously familiar, except only that the two central figures were wanting. At the bottom was written the date of the 15th of November — it was then the morning of the 12th — and the name 'Morris.' The whole, therefore, presented the following appearance:

My eyes were now heavy with sleep, every sense half-drunken with the vapourlike atmosphere of the room, so that, having abandoned something of hope, I tottered willingly to my bed, and fell into a profound slumber, which lasted till what must have been the time of the gathering in of the shades of night. I then rose. Missing Zaleski, I sought through all the chambers for him. He was nowhere to be seen. The negro informed me with an affectionate and anxious tremor in the voice that his master had left the rooms some hours before, but had said nothing to him. I ordered the man to descend and look into the sacristy of the small chapel wherein I had deposited my calèche, and in the field behind, where my horse should be. He returned with the news that both had disappeared. Zaleski, I then concluded, had undoubtedly departed on a journey.

I was deeply touched by the demeanour of Ham as the hours went by. He wandered stealthily about the rooms like a lost being. It was like matter sighing after, weeping over, spirit. Prince Zaleski had never before withdrawn himself from the surveillance of this sturdy watchman, and his disappearance now was like a convulsion in their little cosmos. Ham implored me repeatedly, if I could, to throw some light on the meaning of this catastrophe. But I too was in the dark. The Titanic frame of the Ethiopian trembled with emotion as in broken, childish words he told me that he felt instinctively the approach of some great danger to the person of his master. So a day passed away, and then another. On the next he roused me from sleep to hand me a letter which, on opening, I found to be from Zaleski. It was hastily scribbled in pencil, dated 'London, Nov. 14th,' and ran thus:

'For my body — should I not return by Friday night — you will, no doubt, be good enough to make search. Descend the river, keeping constantly to the left; consult the papyrus; and stop at the Descensus Aesopi. Seek diligently, and you will find. For the rest, you know my fancy for cremation: take me, if you will, to the crematorium of Père-Lachaise. My whole fortune I decree to Ham, the Lybian.'

Ham was all for knowing the contents of this letter, but I refused to communicate a word of it. I was dazed, I was more than ever perplexed, I was appalled by the frenzy of Zaleski. Friday night! It was then Thursday morning. And I was expected to wait through the dreary interval uncertain, agonised, inactive! I was offended with my friend; his conduct bore the interpretation of mental distraction. The leaden hours passed all oppressively while I sought to appease the keenness of my unrest with the anodyne of drugged sleep. On the next morning, however, another letter — a rather massive one — reached me. The covering was directed in the writing of Zaleski, but on it he had scribbled the words: 'This need not be opened unless I fail to reappear before Saturday.' I therefore laid the packet aside unread.

I waited all through Friday, resolved that at six o'clock, if nothing happened, I should make some sort of effort. But from six I remained, with eyes strained towards the doorway, until ten. I was so utterly at a loss, my ingenuity was so entirely baffled by the situation, that I could devise no course of action which did not immediately appear absurd. But at midnight I sprang up — no longer would I endure the carking suspense. I seized a taper, and passed through the door-way. I had not proceeded far, however, when my light was extinguished. Then I remembered with a shudder that I should have to pass through the whole vast length of the building in order to gain an exit. It was an all but hopeless task in the profound darkness to thread my way through the labyrinth of halls and corridors, of tumble-down stairs, of bat-haunted vaults, of purposeless angles and involutions; but I proceeded with something of a blind obstinacy, groping my way with arms held out before me. In this manner I had wandered on for perhaps a quarter of an hour, when my fingers came into distinct momentary contact with what felt like cold and humid human flesh. I shrank back, unnerved as I already was, with a murmur of affright.

‘Zaleski?’ I whispered with bated breath.

Intently as I strained my ears, I could detect no reply. The hairs of my head, catching terror from my fancies, erected themselves.

Again I advanced, and again I became aware of the sensation of contact. With a quick movement I passed my hand upward and downward.

It was indeed he. He was half-reclining, half-standing against a wall of the chamber: that he was not dead, I at once knew by his uneasy breathing. Indeed, when, having chafed his hands for some time, I tried to rouse him, he quickly recovered himself, and muttered: ‘I fainted; I want sleep — only sleep.’ I bore him back to the lighted room, assisted by Ham in the latter part of the journey. Ham’s ecstasies were infinite; he had hardly hoped to see his master's face again. His garments being wet and soiled, the negro divested him of them, and dressed him in a tightly-fitting scarlet robe of Babylonish pattern, reaching to the feet, but leaving the lower neck and forearm bare, and girt round the stomach by a broad gold-orphreyed ceinture. With all the tenderness of a woman, the man stretched his master thus arrayed on the couch. Here he kept an Argus guard while Zaleski, in one deep unbroken slumber of a night and a day, reposed before him. When at last the sleeper woke, in his eye, — full of divine instinct, — flitted the wonted falchion-flash of the whetted, two-edged intellect; the secret, austere, self-conscious smile of triumph curved his lip; not a trace of pain or fatigue remained. After a substantial meal on nuts, autumn fruits, and wine of Samos, he resumed his place on the couch; and I sat by his side to hear the story of his wandering. He said:

‘We have, Shiel, had before us a very remarkable series of murders, and a very remarkable series of suicides. Were they in any way connected? To this extent, I think — that the mysterious, the unparalleled nature of the murders gave rise to a morbid condition in the public mind, which in turn resulted in the epidemic of suicide. But though such an epidemic has its origin in the instinct of imitation so common in men, you must not suppose that the mental process is a conscious one. A person feels an impulse to go and do, and is not aware that at bottom it is only an impulse to go and do likewise. He would indeed repudiate such an assumption. Thus one man destroys himself, and another imitates him — but whereas the former uses a pistol, the latter uses a rope. It is rather absurd, therefore, to imagine that in any of those cases in which the slip of papyrus has been found in the mouth after death, the cause of death has been the slavish imitativeness of the suicidal mania, — for this, as I say, is never slavish. The papyrus then — quite apart from the unmistakable evidences of suicide invariably left by each self-destroyer — affords us definite and certain means by which we can distinguish the two classes of deaths; and we are thus able to divide the total number into two nearly equal halves.

‘But you start — you are troubled — you never heard or read of murder such as this, the simultaneous murder of thousands over wide areas of the face of the globe; here you feel is something outside your experience, deeper than your profoundest imaginings. To the question “by whom committed?” and “with what motive?” your mind can conceive no possible answer. And yet the answer must be, “by man, and for human motives,” — for the Angel of Death with flashing eye and flaming sword is himself long dead; and again we can say at once, by no one man, but by many, a cohort, an army of men; and again, by no common men, but by men hellish (or heavenly) in cunning, in resource, in strength and unity of purpose; men laughing to scorn the flimsy prophylactics of society, separated by an infinity of self-confidence and spiritual integrity from the ordinary easily-crushed criminal of our days.

‘This much at least I was able to discover from the first; and immediately I set myself to the detection of motive by a careful study of each case. This, too, in due time, became clear to me, — but to motive it may perhaps be more convenient to refer later on. What next engaged my attention was the figures on the papyrus, and devoutly did I hope that by their solution I might be able to arrive at some more exact knowledge of the mystery.

‘The figures round the border first attracted me, and the mere reading of them gave me very little trouble. But I was convinced that behind their meaning thus read lay some deep esoteric significance; and this, almost to the last, I was utterly unable to fathom. You perceive that these border figures consist of waved lines of two different lengths, drawings of snakes, triangles looking like the Greek delta, and a heart-shaped object with a dot following it. These succeed one another in a certain definite order on all the slips. What, I asked myself, were these drawings meant to represent, — letters, numbers, things, or abstractions? This I was the more readily able to determine because I have often, in thinking over the shape of the Roman letter S, wondered whether it did not owe its convolute form to an attempt on the part of its inventor to make a picture of the serpent; S being the sibilant or hissing letter, and the serpent the hissing animal. This view, I fancy (though I am not sure), has escaped the philologists, but of course you know that all letters were originally pictures of things, and of what was S a picture, if not of the serpent? I therefore assumed, by way of trial, that the snakes in the diagram stood for a sibilant letter, that is, either C or S. And thence, supposing this to be the case, I deduced: firstly, that all the other figures stood for letters; and secondly, that they all appeared in the form of pictures of the things of which those letters were originally meant to be pictures. Thus the letter “m,” one of the four “liquid” consonants, is, as we now write it, only a shortened form of a waved line; and as a waved line it was originally written, and was the character by which a stream of running water was represented in writing; indeed it only owes its name to the fact that when the lips are pressed together, and “m” uttered by a continuous effort, a certain resemblance to the murmur of running water is produced. The longer waved line in the diagram I therefore took to represent “m”; and it at once followed that the shorter meant “n,” for no two letters of the commoner European alphabets differ only in length (as distinct from shape) except “m” and “n”, and “w” and “v”; indeed, just as the French call “w” “double-ve,” so very properly might “m” be called “double-en.” But, in this case, the longer not being “w,” the shorter could not be “v”: it was therefore “n.” And now there only remained the heart and the triangle. I was unable to think of any letter that could ever have been intended for the picture of a heart, but the triangle I knew to be the letter #A.# This was originally written without the cross-bar from prop to prop, and the two feet at the bottom of the props were not separated as now, but joined; so that the letter formed a true triangle. It was meant by the primitive man to be a picture of his primitive house, this house being, of course, hut-shaped, and consisting of a conical roof without walls. I had thus, with the exception of the heart, disentangled the whole, which then (leaving a space for the heart) read as follows:

 ‘mn { anan ... san.’
 { cc

But ‘c’ before ‘a’ being never a sibilant (except in some few so-called ‘Romance’ languages), but a guttural, it was for the moment discarded; also as no word begins with the letters ‘mn’ — except ‘mnemonics’ and its fellows — I concluded that a vowel must be omitted between these letters, and thence that all vowels (except ‘a’) were omitted; again, as the double ‘s’ can never come after ‘n’ I saw that either a vowel was omitted between the two ‘s’s,’ or that the first word ended after the first ‘s.’ Thus I got

‘m ns sanan... san,’

or, supplying the now quite obvious vowels,

‘mens sana in... sano.’

The heart I now knew represented the word ‘corpore,’ the Latin word for ‘heart’ being ‘cor,’ and the dot — showing that the word as it stood was an abbreviation — conclusively proved every one of my deductions.

‘So far all had gone flowingly. It was only when I came to consider the central figures that for many days I spent my strength in vain. You heard my exclamation of delight and astonishment when at last a ray of light pierced the gloom. At no time, indeed, was I wholly in the dark as to the general significance of these figures, for I saw at once their resemblance to the sepulchral reliefs of classical times. In case you are not minutely acquainted with the technique of these stones, I may as well show you one, which I myself removed from an old grave in Tarentum.'

He took from a niche a small piece of close-grained marble, about a foot square, and laid it before me. On one side it was exquisitely sculptured in relief.

'This,' he continued, 'is a typical example of the Greek grave-stone, and having seen one specimen you may be said to have seen almost all, for there is surprisingly little variety in the class. You will observe that the scene represents a man reclining on a couch; in his hand he holds a patera, or dish, filled with grapes and pomegranates, and beside him is a tripod bearing the viands from which he is banqueting. At his feet sits a woman — for the Greek lady never reclined at table. In addition to these two figures a horse's head, a dog, or a serpent may sometimes be seen; and these forms comprise the almost invariable pattern of all grave reliefs. Now, that this was the real model from which the figures on the papyrus were taken I could not doubt, when I considered the seemingly absurd fidelity with which in each murder the papyrus, smeared with honey, was placed under the tongue of the victim. I said to myself: it can only be that the assassins have bound themselves to the observance of a strict and narrow ritual from which no departure is under any circumstances permitted — perhaps for the sake of signalling the course of events to others at a distance. But what ritual? That question I was able to answer when I knew the answer to these others, — why under the tongue, and why smeared with honey? For no reason, except that the Greeks (not the Romans till very late in their history) always placed an obolos, or penny, beneath the tongue of the dead to pay his passage across the Stygian river of ghosts; for no reason, except that to these same Greeks honey was a sacred fluid, intimately associated in their minds with the mournful subject of Death; a fluid with which the bodies of the deceased were anointed, and sometimes — especially in Sparta and the Pelasgic South — embalmed; with which libations were poured to Hermes Psuchopompos, conductor of the dead to the regions of shade; with which offerings were made to all the chthonic deities, and the souls of the departed in general. You remember, for instance, the melancholy words of Helen addressed to Hermione in Orestes:

[Greek: *Kai labe choas tasd'en cheroïn komas t'emas
elthousa d'amphi ton Klutaimnaestras taphon melikrat'aphes galaktos oinopon t'achnaen.*]

And so everywhere. The ritual then of the murderers was a Greek ritual, their cult a Greek cult — preferably, perhaps, a South Greek one, a Spartan one, for it was here that the highly conservative peoples of that region clung longest and fondliest to this semi-barbarous worship. This then being so, I was made all the more certain of my conjecture that the central figures on the papyrus were drawn from a Greek model.

‘Here, however, I came to a standstill. I was infinitely puzzled by the rod in the man’s hand. In none of the Greek grave-reliefs does any such thing as a rod make an appearance, except in one well-known example where the god Hermes — generally represented as carrying the caduceus, or staff, given him by Phoebus — appears leading a dead maiden to the land of night. But in every other example of which I am aware the sculpture represents a man living, not dead, banqueting on earth, not in Hades, by the side of his living companion. What then could be the significance of the staff in the hand of this living man? It was only after days of the hardest struggle, the cruellest suspense, that the thought flashed on me that the idea of Hermes leading away the dead female might, in this case, have been carried one step farther; that the male figure might be no living man, no man at all, but Hermes himself actually banqueting in Hades with the soul of his disembodied protégée! The thought filled me with a rapture I cannot describe, and you witnessed my excitement. But, at all events, I saw that this was a truly tremendous departure from Greek art and thought, to which in general the copyists seemed to cling so religiously. There must therefore be a reason, a strong reason, for vandalism such as this. And that, at any rate, it was no longer difficult to discover; for now I knew that the male figure was no mortal, but a god, a spirit, a DAEMON (in the Greek sense of the word); and the female figure I saw by the marked shortness of her drapery to be no Athenian, but a Spartan; no matron either, but a maiden, a lass, a LASSIE; and now I had forced on me lassie daemon, Lacedaemon.

‘This then was the badge, the so carefully-buried badge, of this society of men. The only thing which still puzzled and confounded me at this stage was the startling circumstance that a Greek society should make use of a Latin motto. It was clear that either all my conclusions were totally wrong, or else the motto mens sana in corpore sano contained wrapped up in itself some acroamatic meaning which I found myself unable to penetrate, and which the authors had found no Greek motto capable of conveying. But at any rate, having found this much, my knowledge led me of itself one step further; for I perceived that, widely extended as were their operations, the society was necessarily in the main an English, or at least an English-speaking one — for of this the word “lassie” was plainly indicative: it was easy now to conjecture London, the monster-city in which all things lose themselves, as their head-quarters; and at this point in my investigations I despatched to the papers the advertisement you have seen.’

‘But,’ I exclaimed, ‘even now I utterly fail to see by what mysterious processes of thought you arrived at the wording of the advertisement; even now it conveys no meaning to my mind.’

‘That,’ he replied, ‘will grow clear when we come to a right understanding of the baleful motive which inspired these men. I have already said that I was not long in discovering it. There was only one possible method of doing so — and that was, by all means, by any means, to find out some condition or other common to every one of the victims before death. It is true that I was unable to do this in some few cases, but where I failed, I was convinced that my failure was due to the insufficiency of the evidence at my disposal, rather than to the actual absence of the condition. Now, let us take almost any two cases you will, and seek for this common condition: let us take, for example, the first two that attracted the attention of the world — the poor woman of the slums of Berlin, and the celebrated man of science. Separated by as wide an interval as they are, we shall yet find, if we look closely, in each case the same pathetic tokens of the still uneliminated striae of our poor humanity. The woman is not an old woman, for she has a “small young” family, which, had she lived, might have been increased: notwithstanding which, she has suffered from hemiplegia, “partial paralysis.” The professor, too, has had not one, but two, large families, and an “army of grand-children”: but note well the startling, the hideous fact, that every one of his children is dead! The crude grave has gaped before the cock to suck in every one of those shrunk forms, so indigent of vital impulse, so pauper of civism, lust, so draughty, so vague, so lean — but not before they have had time to dower with the ah and wo of their infirmity a whole wretched “army of grand-children.” And yet this man of wisdom is on the point, in his old age, of marrying once again, of producing for the good of his race still more of this poor human stuff. You see the lurid significance, the point of resemblance, — you see it? And, O heaven, is it not too sad? For me, I tell you, the whole business has a tragic pitifulness too deep for words. But this brings me to the discussion of a large matter. It would, for instance, be interesting to me to hear what you, a modern European, saturated with all the notions of your little day, what you consider the supreme, the all-important question for the nations of Europe at this moment. Am I far wrong in assuming that you would rattle off half a dozen of the moot points agitating rival factions in your own land, select one of them, and call that “the question of the hour”? I wish I could see as you see; I wish to God I did not see deeper. In order to lead you to my point, what, let me ask you, what precisely was it that ruined the old nations — that brought, say Rome, to her knees at last? Centralisation, you say, top-heavy imperialism, dilettante pessimism, the love of luxury. At bottom, believe me, it was not one of these high-sounding things — it was simply War; the sum total of the battles of centuries. But let me explain myself: this is a novel view to you, and you are perhaps unable to conceive how or why war was so fatal to the old world, because you see how little harmful it is to the new. If you collected in a promiscuous way a few millions of modern Englishmen and slew them all simultaneously, what, think you, would be the effect from the point of view of the State? The effect, I conceive, would be indefinitely small, wonderfully transitory; there would, of course, be a momentary lacuna in the boiling surge: yet the womb of humanity is full of sap, and uberant; Ocean-tide, wooed of that Ilithyia whose breasts are many, would flow on, and the void would soon be filled. But the effect would only be thus insignificant, if, as I said, your millions were taken promiscuously (as in the modern army), not if they were picked men — in that case the loss (or gain) would be excessive, and permanent for all time. Now, the war-hosts of the ancient commonwealths — not dependent on the mechanical contrivances of the modern army — were necessarily composed of the very best men: the strong-boned, the heart-stout, the sound in wind and limb. Under these conditions the State shuddered through all her frame, thrilled adown every filament, at the death of a single one of her sons in the field. As only the feeble, the aged, bided at home, their number after each battle became larger in proportion to the whole than before. Thus the nation, more and more, with ever-increasing rapidity, declined in bodily, and of course spiritual, quality, until the end was reached, and Nature swallowed up the weaklings whole; and thus war, which to the modern state is at worst the blockhead and indecent affaires d'honneur of persons in office — and which, surely, before you and I die will cease altogether — was to the ancient a genuine and remorselessly fatal scourge.

‘And now let me apply these facts to the Europe of our own time. We no longer have world-serious war — but in its place we have a scourge, the effect of which on the modern state is precisely the same as the effect of war on the ancient, only, — in the end, — far more destructive, far more subtle, sure, horrible, disgusting. The name of this pestilence is Medical Science. Yes, it is most true, shudder — shudder — as you will! Man’s best friend turns to an asp in his bosom to sting him to the basest of deaths. The devastating growth of medical, and especially surgical, science — that, if you like, for us all, is “the question of the hour!” And what a question! of what surpassing importance, in the presence of which all other “questions” whatever dwindle into mere academic triviality. For just as the ancient State was wounded to the heart through the death of her healthy sons in the field, just so slowly, just so silently, is the modern receiving deadly hurt by the botching and tinkering of her unhealthy children. The net result is in each case the same — the altered ratio of the total amount of reproductive health to the total amount of reproductive disease. They recklessly spent their best;

we sedulously conserve our worst; and as they pined and died of anaemia, so we, unless we repent, must perish in a paroxysm of black-blood apoplexy. And this prospect becomes more certain, when you reflect that the physician as we know him is not, like other men and things, a being of gradual growth, of slow evolution: from Adam to the middle of the last century the world saw nothing even in the least resembling him. No son of Paian he, but a fatherless, full-grown birth from the incessant matrix of Modern Time, so motherly of monstrous litters of “Gorgon and Hydra and Chimaeras dire”; you will understand what I mean when you consider the quite recent date of, say, the introduction of anaesthetics or antiseptics, the discovery of the knee-jerk, bacteriology, or even of such a doctrine as the circulation of the blood. We are at this very time, if I mistake not, on the verge of new insights which will enable man to laugh at disease — laugh at it in the sense of over-ruling its natural tendency to produce death, not by any means in the sense of destroying its ever-expanding existence. Do you know that at this moment your hospitals are crammed with beings in human likeness suffering from a thousand obscure and subtly-ineradicable ills, all of whom, if left alone, would die almost at once, but ninety in the hundred of whom will, as it is, be sent forth “cured,” like missionaries of hell, and the horrent shapes of Night and Acheron, to mingle in the pure river of humanity the poison-taint of their protean vileness? Do you know that in your schools one-quarter of the children are already purblind? Have you gauged the importance of your tremendous consumption of quack catholicons, of the fortunes derived from their sale, of the spread of modern nervous disorders, of toothless youth and thrice loathsome age among the helot-classes? Do you know that in the course of my late journey to London, I walked from Piccadilly Circus to Hyde Park Corner, during which time I observed some five hundred people, of whom twenty-seven only were perfectly healthy, well-formed men, and eighteen healthy, beautiful women? On every hand — with a thrill of intensest joy, I say it! — is to be seen, if not yet commencing civilisation, then progress, progress — wide as the world — toward it: only here — at the heart — is there decadence, fatty degeneration. Brain-evolution — and favouring airs — and the ripening time — and the silent Will of God, of God — all these in conspiracy seem to be behind, urging the whole ship's company of us to some undreamable luxury of glory — when lo, this check, artificial, evitable. Less death, more disease — that is the sad, the unnatural record; children especially — so sensitive to the physician's art — living on by hundreds of thousands, bearing within them the germs of wide-spreading sorrow, who in former times would have died. And if you consider that the proper function of the doctor is the strictly limited one of curing the curable, rather than of self-gloriously perpetuating the incurable, you may find it difficult to give a quite rational answer to this simple question: why? Nothing is so sure as that to the unit it is a cruelty; nothing so certain as that to humanity it is a wrong; to say that such and such an one was sent by the All Wise, and must therefore be not merely permitted, but elaborately coaxed and forced, to live, is to utter a blasphemy against Man at which even the ribald tongue of a priest might falter; and as a matter of fact, society, in just contempt for this species of argument, never hesitates to hang, for its own imagined good, its heaven-sent catholics, protestants, sheep, sheep-stealers, etc. What then, you ask, would I do with these unholy ones? To save the State would I pierce them with a sword, or leave them to the slow throes of their agonies? Ah, do not expect me to answer that question — I do not know what to answer. The whole spirit of the present is one of a broad and beautiful, if quite thoughtless, humanism, and I, a child of the present, cannot but be borne along by it, coerced into sympathy with it. “Beautiful” I say: for if anywhere in the world you have seen a sight more beautiful than a group of hospital savants bending with endless scrupulousness over a little pauper child, centering upon its frailty the whole human skill and wisdom of ages, so have not I. Here have you the full realisation of a parable diviner than that of the man who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho. Beautiful then; with at least surface beauty, like the serpent lachesis mutus; but, like many beautiful things, deadly too, inhuman. And, on the whole, an answer will have to be found. As for me, it is a doubt which has often agitated me, whether the central dogma of Judaism and Christianity alike can, after all, be really one of the inner verities of this our earthly being — the dogma, that by the shedding of the innocent blood, and by that alone, shall the race of man find cleansing and salvation. Will no agony of reluctance overcome the necessity that one man die, “so that the whole people perish not”? Can it be true that by nothing less than the “three days of pestilence” shall the land be purged of its stain, and is this old divine alternative about to confront us in new, modern form? Does the inscrutable Artemis indeed demand offerings of human blood to suage her anger? Most sad that man should ever need, should ever have needed, to foul his hand in the [Greek: musaron aima] of his own veins! But what is, is. And can it be fated that the most advanced civilisation of the future shall needs have in it, as the first and chief element of its glory, the most barbarous of all the rituals of barbarism — the immolation of hecatombs which wail a muling human wail? Is it indeed part of man’s strange destiny through the deeps of Time that he one day bow his back to the duty of pruning himself as a garden, so that he run not to a waste wilderness? Shall the physician, the accoucheur, of the time to come be expected, and commanded, to do on the ephod and breast-plate, anoint his head with the oil of gladness, and add to the function of healer the function of Sacrificial Priest? These you say, are wild, dark questions. Wild enough, dark enough. We know how Sparta — the “man-taming Sparta” Simonides calls her — answered them. Here was the complete subordination of all unit-life to the well-being of the Whole. The child, immediately on his entry into the world, fell under the control of the State: it was not left to the judgment of his parents, as elsewhere, whether he should be brought up or not, but a commission of the Phyle in which he was born decided the question. If he was weakly, if he had any bodily unsightliness, he was exposed on a place called Taygetus, and so perished. It was a consequence of this that never did the sun in his course light on man half so godly stalwart, on woman half so houri-lovely, as in stern and stout old Sparta. Death, like all mortal, they must bear; disease, once and for all, they were resolved to have done with. The word which they used to express the idea “ugly,” meant also “hateful,” “vile,” “disgraceful” — and I need hardly point out to you the significance of that fact alone; for they considered — and rightly — that there is no sort of natural reason why every denizen of earth should not be perfectly hale, integral, sane, beautiful — if only very moderate pains be taken to procure this divine result. One fellow, indeed, called Nancleidas, grew a little too fat to please the sensitive eyes of the Spartans: I believe he was periodically whipped. Under a system so very barbarous, the super-sweet, egoistic voice of the club-footed poet Byron would, of course, never have been heard: one brief egoistic “lament” on Taygetus, and so an end. It is not, however, certain that the world could not have managed very well without Lord Byron. The one thing that admits of no contradiction is that it cannot manage without the holy citizen, and that disease, to men and to nations, can have but one meaning, annihilation near or ultimate. At any rate, from these remarks, you will now very likely be able to arrive at some understanding of the wording of the advertisements which I sent to the papers.'

Zaleski, having delivered himself of this singular tirade, paused: replaced the sepulchral relief in its niche: drew a drapery of silver cloth over his bare feet and the hem of his antique garment of Babylon: and then continued:

'After some time the answer to the advertisement at length arrived; but what was my disgust to find that it was perfectly unintelligible to me. I had asked for a date and an address: the reply came giving a date, and an address, too — but an address wrapped up in cypher, which, of course, I, as a supposed member of the society, was expected to be able to read. At any rate, I now knew the significance of the incongruous circumstance that the Latin proverb mens sana etc. should be adopted as the motto of a Greek society; the significance lay in this, that the motto contained an address — the address of their meeting-place, or at least, of their chief meeting-place. I was now confronted with the task of solving — and of solving quickly, without the loss of an hour — this enigma; and I confess that it was only by the most violent and extraordinary concentration of what I may call the dissecting faculty, that I was able to do so in good time. And yet there was no special difficulty in the matter. For looking at the motto as it stood in cypher, the first thing I perceived was that, in order to read the secret, the heart-shaped figure must be left out of consideration, if there was any consistency in the system of cyphers at all, for it belonged to a class of symbols quite distinct from that of all the others, not being, like them, a picture-letter. Omitting this, therefore, and taking all the other vowels and consonants whether actually represented in the device or not, I now got the proverb in the form mens sana in ... pore sano. I wrote this down, and what instantly struck me was the immense, the altogether unusual, number of liquids in the motto — six in all, amounting to no less than one-third of the total number of letters! Putting these all together you get mnnnnr, and you can see that the very appearance of the “m’s” and “n’s” (especially when written) running into one another, of itself suggests a stream of water. Having previously arrived at the conclusion of London as the meeting-place, I could not now fail to go on to the inference of the Thames; there, or near there, would I find those whom I sought. The letters “mnnnnr,” then, meant the Thames: what did the still remaining letters mean? I now took these remaining letters, placing them side by side: I got aaa, sss, ee, oo, p and i. Juxtaposing these nearly in the order indicated by the frequency of their occurrence, and their place in the Roman alphabet, you at once and inevitably get the word Aesopi. And now I was fairly startled by this symmetrical proof of the exactness of my own deductions in other respects, but, above all, far above all, by the occurrence of that word “Aesopi.” For who was Aesopus? He was a slave who was freed for his wise and witful sallies: he is therefore typical of the liberty of the wise — their moral manumission from temporary and narrow law; he was also a close friend of Croesus: he is typical, then, of the union of wisdom with wealth — true wisdom with real wealth; lastly, and above all, he was thrown by the Delphians from a rock on account of his wit: he is typical, therefore, of death — the shedding of blood — as a result of wisdom, this thought being an elaboration of Solomon’s great maxim, “in much wisdom is much sorrow.” But how accurately all this fitted in with what would naturally be the doctrines of the men on whose track I was! I could no longer doubt the justness of my reasonings, and immediately, while you slept, I set off for London.

‘Of my haps in London I need not give you a very particular account. The meeting was to be held on the 15th, and by the morning of the 13th I had reached a place called Wargrave, on the Thames. There I hired a light canoe, and thence proceeded down the river in a somewhat zig-zag manner, narrowly examining the banks on either side, and keeping a sharp out-look for some board, or sign, or house, that would seem to betoken any sort of connection with the word “Aesopi.” In this way I passed a fruitless day, and having reached the shipping region, made fast my craft, and in a spirit of diablerie spent the night in a common lodging-house, in the company of the most remarkable human beings, characterised by an odour of alcohol, and a certain obtrusive bonne camaraderie which the prevailing fear of death could not altogether repress. By dawn of the 14th I was on my journey again — on, and ever on. Eagerly I longed for a sight of the word I sought: but I had misjudged the men against whose cunning I had measured my own. I should have remembered more consistently that they were no ordinary men. As I was destined to find, there lay a deeper, more cabalistic meaning in the motto than any I had been able to dream of. I had proceeded on my pilgrimage down the river a long way past Greenwich, and had now reached a desolate and level reach of land stretching away on either hand. Paddling my boat from the right to the left bank, I came to a spot where a little arm of the river ran up some few yards into the land. The place wore a specially dreary and deserted aspect: the land was flat, and covered with low shrubs. I rowed into this arm of shallow water and rested on my oar, wearily bethinking myself what was next to be done. Looking round, however, I saw to my surprise that at the end of this arm there was a short narrow pathway — a winding road — leading from the river-bank. I stood up in the boat and followed its course with my eyes. It was met by another road also winding among the bushes, but in a slightly different direction. At the end of this was a little, low, high-roofed, round house, without doors or windows. And then — and then — tingling now with a thousand raptures —

I beheld a pool of water near this structure, and then another low house, a counterpart of the first — and then, still leading on in the same direction, another pool — and then a great rock, heart-shaped — and then another winding road — and then another pool of water. All was a model — exact to the minutest particular — of the device on the papyrus! The first long-waved line was the river itself; the three short-waved lines were the arm of the river and the two pools; the three snakes were the three winding roads; the two triangles representing the letter #A# were the two high-roofed round houses; the heart was the rock! I sprang, now thoroughly excited, from the boat, and ran in headlong haste to the end of the last lake. Here there was a rather thick and high growth of bushes, but peering among them, my eye at once caught a white oblong board supported on a stake: on this, in black letters, was marked the words, “DESCENSUS AESOPI.” It was necessary, therefore, to go down: the meeting-place was subterranean. It was without difficulty that I discovered a small opening in the ground, half hidden by the underwood; from the orifice I found that a series of wooden steps led directly downwards, and I at once boldly descended. No sooner, however, had I touched the bottom than I was confronted by an ancient man in Hellenic apparel, armed with the Greek ziphos and peltè. His eyes, accustomed to the gloom, pierced me long with an earnest scrutiny.

““You are a Spartan?” he asked at length.

““Yes,” I answered promptly.

““Then how is it you do not know that I am stone deaf?”

‘I shrugged, indicating that for the moment I had forgotten the fact.

““You are a Spartan?” he repeated.

‘I nodded with emphasis.

““Then, how is it you omit to make the sign?”

‘Now, you must not suppose that at this point I was nonplussed, for in that case you would not give due weight to the strange inherent power of the mind to rise to the occasion of a sudden emergency — to stretch itself long to the length of an event; I do not hesitate to say that no combination of circumstances can defeat a vigorous brain fully alert, and in possession of itself. With a quickness to which the lightning-flash is tardy, I remembered that this was a spot indicated by the symbols on the papyrus: I remembered that this same papyrus was always placed under the tongue of the dead; I remembered, too, that among that very nation whose language had afforded the motto, to “turn up the thumb” (pollicem vertere) was a symbol significant of death. I touched the under surface of my tongue with the tip of my thumb. The aged man was appeased. I passed on, and examined the place.

‘It was simply a vast circular hall, the arched roof of which was supported on colonnades of what I took to be pillars of porphyry. Down the middle and round the sides ran tables of the same material; the walls were clothed in hangings of sable velvet, on which, in infinite reproduction, was embroidered in cypher the motto of the society. The chairs were cushioned in the same stuff. Near the centre of the circle stood a huge statue, of what really seemed to me to be pure beaten gold. On the great ebon base was inscribed the word [Greek: LUKURGOS]. From the roof swung by brazen chains a single misty lamp.

‘Having seen this much I reascended to the land of light, and being fully resolved on attending the meeting on the next day or night, and not knowing what my fate might then be, I wrote to inform you of the means by which my body might be traced. ‘But on the next day a new thought occurred to me: I reasoned thus: “these men are not common assassins; they wage a too rash warfare against diseased life, but not against life in general. In all probability they have a quite immoderate, quite morbid reverence for the sanctity of healthy life. They will not therefore take mine, unless they suppose me to be the only living outsider who has a knowledge of their secret, and therefore think it absolutely necessary for the carrying out of their beneficent designs that my life should be sacrificed. I will therefore prevent such a motive from occurring to them by communicating to another their whole secret, and — if the necessity should arise — letting them know that I have done so, without telling them who that other is. Thus my life will be assured.” I therefore wrote to you on that day a full account of all I had discovered, giving you to understand, however, on the envelope, that you need not examine the contents for some little time.

‘I waited in the subterranean vault during the greater part of the next day; but not till midnight did the confederates gather. What happened at that meeting I shall not disclose, even to you. All was sacred — solemn — full of awe. Of the choral hymns there sung, the hierophantic ritual, liturgies, paeans, the gorgeous symbolisms — of the wealth there represented, the culture, art, self-sacrifice — of the mingling of all the tongues of Europe — I shall not speak; nor shall I repeat names which you would at once recognise as familiar to you — though I may, perhaps, mention that the “Morris,” whose name appears on the papyrus sent to me is a well-known littérateur of that name. But this in confidence, for some years at least.

‘Let me, however, hurry to a conclusion. My turn came to speak. I rose undaunted, and calmly disclosed myself; during the moment of hush, of wide-eyed paralysis that ensued, I declared that fully as I coincided with their views in general, I found myself unable to regard their methods with approval — these I could not but consider too rash, too harsh, too premature. My voice was suddenly drowned by one universal, earth-shaking roar of rage and contempt, during which I was surrounded on all sides, seized, pinioned, and dashed on the central table. All this time, in the hope and love of life, I passionately shouted that I was not the only living being who shared in their secret. But my voice was drowned, and drowned again, in the whirling tumult. None heard me. A powerful and little-known anaesthetic — the means by which all their murders have been accomplished — was now produced. A cloth, saturated with the fluid, was placed on my mouth and nostrils. I was stifled. Sense failed. The incubus of the universe blackened down upon my brain. How I tugged at the mandrakes of speech! was a locked pugilist with language! In the depth of my extremity the half-thought, I remember, floated, like a mist, through my fading consciousness, that now perhaps — now — there was silence around me; that now, could my palsied lips find dialect, I should be heard, and understood. My whole soul rose focussed to the effort — my body jerked itself upwards. At that moment I knew my spirit truly great, genuinely sublime. For I did utter something — my dead and shuddering tongue did babble forth some coherency. Then I fell back, and all was once more the ancient Dark. On the next day when I woke, I was lying on my back in my little boat, placed there by God knows whose hands. At all events, one thing was clear — I had uttered something — I was saved. With what of strength remained to me I reached the place where I had left your calèche, and started on my homeward way. The necessity to sleep was strong upon me, for the fumes of the anaesthetic still clung about my brain; hence, after my long journey, I fainted on my passage through the house, and in this condition you found me.

‘Such then is the history of my thinkings and doings in connection with this ill-advised confraternity: and now that their cabala is known to others — to how many others they cannot guess — I think it is not unlikely that we shall hear little more of the Society of Sparta.’

THE SERPENT-SHIP

PHORFOR

To Mistress Beatrice Laws

Dear Beatrice, — The pieces of this inkling of a Book, which, with much longing, I dedicate to you, were not all written in the same night, but separated in their execution by intervals for eating and sleeping; and as you know me to be of at least not less nervous vigour than your sweet self (for in Thee is not vigour gobbled up in sweetness?), so you, too, red ruddes, should read them (in spite of the sub-title), with like intervals, one by one, not gulp them like porridge or a novel, — which, you know, are homogeneous, these being designedly heterogeneous — or you will hardly, I think, get at what one meant to imply (Easily, you know, in the crash of the orchestra, do the light flute-notes lose themselves on the tired ear: a fact which seems to indicate that works of art, especially such as pretend to be more or less musical should be not only pretty short, but separately imbibed; so that the Concert, for one thing, is wrong; and with it, the book, such as this, of short detached pieces, which is a literary Concert; only that here, you have it in your option to extend your concert into as many nights as there are pieces; and your concert-giver, too, hath it more in his dominion what piece shall company with what, and what shall be the precise complexity and information of the whole.) Well, but to maintain the dear fiction of the Winter's Night, I will say this (epistolary — and not as they write big in the volume of the Books, lest you pout): that the curtain having risen, I will present you first a diary-extract of a poor friend now dead; then a little morne drama which I have encountered in the chronicle of one Aventin von Tottenweis; and next a rather dark experience of my own in the dim Northern seas, which, in dream, yet revisits me. Then will be a short interlude for cigarettes, ices, and whispy-lispy, during which will be rendered a piece just splashed down anyway, for a male reader or two, and in some places dull (to you I mean) and in others pretty cheap, — this, however, being a day of cheap things, sweetmeat; you yourself, perhaps, not so over-dear, and only over-dear to the beglamoured eyes of male-made me. This, then, you should skip (recalcitrant roe that thou art on the Mountains of Endeavour!) Go out on the verandah, pig's-eye, and there heave, the open secret of that torse my soul remembers to the chaste down-look of Dian's astonished eye-glass, and the schwärmerei of the winking Stars. But soon, at about midnight, return; for now, to the tinkle of a silver bell, will unfold itself the life-history, very well translated by me from the original, of a poor man of Hindustan, not, I verily believe, unloved of the gods, but loved, you perceive, in their peculiar fashion: those people (as the late Mr. Froude uncommonly said to the dying Carlyle) probably having reasons for their carryings-on, of which we cannot even dream. And truly, dear, this is marvellous in our eyes, or at least in mine. Well, but now, just as that dark Daphne with the gems entangled in her hair turns paling in flight from the red rape of day, I shall (spiritualest wine coming last, you know, as at that Marriage) once more introduce myself in character this time of lover, and tell how I wooed one of the ladies of my heart at world-illustrious Phorfor. Immediately whereupon, Beloved, shall the Day break, and the Shadows flee away. — Yours, pour toujours et une Nuit d'Hiver!

XÉLUCHA

“He goeth after her... and knoweth not...” (From a diary)

THREE DAYS AGO! by heaven, it seems an age. But I am shaken — my reason is debauched. A while since, I fell into a momentary coma precisely resembling an attack of petit mal. “Tombs, and worms, and epitaphs” — that is my dream. At my age, with my physique, to walk staggers, like a man stricken! But all that will pass: I must collect myself — my reason is debauched. Three days ago! it seems an age! I sat on the floor before an old cista full of letters. I lighted upon a packet of Cosmo’s. Why, I had forgotten them! they are turning sere! Truly, I can no more call myself a young man. I sat reading, listlessly, rapt back by memory. To muse is to be lost! of that evil habit I must wring the neck, or look to perish. Once more I threaded the mazy sphere-harmony of the minuet, reeled in the waltz, long pomps of candelabra, the noonday of the bacchanal, about me.

Cosmo was the very tsar and maharajah of the Sybarites! the Priap of the détraqués! In every unexpected alcove of the Roman Villa was a couch, raised high, with necessary foot-stool, flanked and canopied with mirrors of clarified gold. Consumption fastened upon him; reclining at last at table, he could, till warmed, scarce lift the wine! his eyes were like two fat glow-worms, coiled together! they seemed haloed with vaporous emanations of phosphorus! Desperate, one could see, was the secret struggle with the Devourer. But to the end the princely smile persisted calm; to the end — to the last day — he continued among that comic crew unchallenged choragus of all the rites, I will not say of Paphos, but of Chemos! and Baal-Peor! Warmed, he did not refuse the revel, the dance, the darkened chamber. It was utterly black, rayless; approached by a secret passage; in shape circular; the air hot, haunted always by odours of balms, bdellium, hints of dulcimer and flute; and radiated round with a hundred thick-strewn ottomans of Morocco.

Here Lucy Hill stabbed to the heart Caccofogo, mistaking the scar of his back for the scar of Soriac. In a bath of malachite the Princess Eglá, waking late one morning, found Cosmo lying stiffly dead, the water covering him wholly.

“But in God’s name, Mérimée!” (so he wrote), “to think of Xélucha dead! Xélucha! Can a moon-beam, then, perish of suppurations? Can the rainbow be eaten by worms? Ha! ha! ha! laugh with me, my friend: ‘elle dérangera l’Enfer’! She will introduce the pas de tarantule into Tophet! Xélucha, the feminine Xélucha recalling the splendid harlots of history! Weep with me — manat rara meas lacrima per genas! expert as Thargelia; cultured as Aspatia; purple as Semiramis. She comprehended the human tabernacle, my friend, its secret springs and tempers, more intimately than any savant of Salamanca who breathes. Tarare — but Xélucha is not dead!

Vitality is not mortal; you cannot wrap flame in a shroud. Xélucha! where then is she? Translated, perhaps — rapt to a constellation like the daughter of Leda. She journeyed to Hindostan, accompanied by the train and appurtenance of a Begum, threatening descent upon the Emperor of Tartary. I spoke of the desolation of the West; she kissed me, and promised return.

Mentioned you, too, Mérimée— ‘her Conqueror’— ‘Mérimée, Destroyer of Woman.’ A breath from the conservatory rioted among the ambery whiffs of her forelocks, sending it singly a-wave over that thulite tint you know.

Costumed cap-à-pie, she had, my friend, the dainty little completeness of a daisy mirrored bright in the eye of the browsing ox. A simile of Milton had for years, she said, inflamed the lust of her Eye: ‘The barren plains of Sericana, where Chinese drive with sails and wind their cany wagons light.’ I, and the Sabaeans, she assured me, wrongly considered Flame the whole of being; the other half of things being Aristotle’s quintessential light. In the Ourania Hierarchia and the Faust-book you meet a completeness: burning Seraph, Cherûb full of eyes. Xélucha combined them. She would reconquer the Orient for Dionysius, and return. I heard of her blazing at Delhi; drawn in a chariot by lions. Then this rumour — probably false. Indeed, it comes from a source somewhat turgid. Like Odin, Arthur, and the rest, Xélucha — will reappear.”

Soon subsequently, Cosmo lay down in his balneum of malechite, and slept, having drawn over him the water as a coverlet. I, in England, heard little of Xélucha: first that she was alive, then dead, then alighted at old Tadmor in the Wilderness, Palmyra now. Nor did I greatly care, Xélucha having long since turned to apples of Sodom in my mouth. Till I sat by the cista of letters and re-read Cosmo, she had for some years passed from my active memories.

The habit is now confirmed in me of spending the greater part of the day in sleep, while by night I wander far and wide through the city under the sedative influence of a tincture which has become necessary to my life. Such an existence of shadow is not without charm; nor, I think, could many minds be steadily subjected to its conditions without elevation, deepened awe. To travel alone with the Primordial cannot but be solemn. The moon is of the hue of the glow-worm; and Night of the sepulchre. Nux bore not less Thanatos than Hupuos, and the bitter tears of Isis redundate to a flood. At three, if a cab rolls by, the sound has the augustness of thunder. Once, at two, near a corner, I came upon a priest, seated, dead, leering, his legs bent. One arm, supported on a knee, pointed with rigid accusing forefinger obliquely upward. By exact observation, I found that he indicated Betelgeux, the star “a” which shoulders the wet sword of Orion. He was hideously swollen, having perished of dropsy. Thus in all Supremes is a grotesquerie; and one of the sons of Night is — Buffo.

In a London square deserted, I should imagine, even in the day, I was aware of the metallic, silvery-clinking approach of little shoes. It was three in a heavy morning of winter, a day after my rediscovery of Cosmo. I had stood by the railing, regarding the clouds sail as under the sea-legged pilotage of a moon wrapped in cloaks of inclemency. Turning, I saw a little lady, very gloriously dressed. She had walked straight to me. Her head was bare, and crisped with the amber stream which rolled lax to a globe, kneaded thick with jewels, at her nape. In the redundancy of her décolleté development, she resembled Parvati, mound-hipped love-goddess of the luscious fancy of the Brahmin.

She addressed to me the question:

“What are you doing there, darling?”

Her loveliness stirred me, and Night is bon camarade. I replied:

“Sunning myself by means of the moon.”

“All that is borrowed lustre,” she returned, “you have got it from old Drummond’s Flowers of Sion.”

Looking back, I cannot remember that this reply astonished me, though it should — of course — have done so. I said:

“On my soul, no; but you?”

“You might guess whence I come!”

“You are dazzling. You come from Paz.”

“Oh, farther than that, my son! Say a subscription ball in Soho.”

“Yes?... and alone? in the cold? on foot...?”

“Why, I am old, and a philosopher. I can pick you out riding Andromeda yonder from the ridden Ram. They are in error, M’sieur, who suppose an atmosphere on the broad side of the moon. I have reason to believe that on Mars dwells a race whose lids are transparent like glass; so that the eyes are visible during sleep; and every varying dream moves imaged forth to the beholder in tiny panorama on the limpid iris. You cannot imagine me a mere fille! To be escorted is to admit yourself a woman, and that is improper in Nowhere. Young Eos drives an équipage à quatre, but Artemis ‘walks’ alone. Get out of my borrowed light in the name of Diogenes! I am going home.”

“Near Piccadilly.”

“But a cab?”

“No cabs for me, thank you. The distance is a mere nothing. Come.”

We walked forward. My companion at once put an interval between us, quoting from the Spanish Curate that the open is an enemy to love. The Talmudists, she twice insisted, rightly held the hand the sacreddest part of the person, and at that point also contact was for the moment interdict. Her walk was extremely rapid. I followed. Not a cat was anywhere visible. We reached at length the door of a mansion in St. James’s. There was no light. It seemed tenantless, the windows all uncurtained, pasted across, some of them, with the words, To Let. My companion, however, flitted up the steps, and, beckoning, passed inward. I, following, slammed the door, and was in darkness. I heard her ascend, and presently a region of glimmer above revealed a stairway of marble, curving broadly up. On the floor where I stood was no carpet, nor furniture: the dust was very thick. I had begun to mount when, to my surprise, she stood by my side, returned; and whispered:

“To the very top, darling.”

She soared nimbly up, anticipating me. Higher, I could no longer doubt that the house was empty but for us. All was a vacuum full of dust and echoes. But at the top, light streamed from a door, and I entered a good-sized oval saloon, at about the centre of the house. I was completely dazzled by the sudden resplendence of the apartment. In the midst was a spread table, square, opulent with gold plate, fruit dishes; three ponderous chandeliers of electric light above; and I noticed also (what was very bizarre) one little candlestick of common tin containing an old soiled curve of tallow, on the table. The impression of the whole chamber was one of gorgeousness not less than Assyrian. An ivory couch at the far end was made sun-like by a head- piece of chalcedony forming a sea for the sport of emerald ichthyotauri. Copper hangings, parnllled with mirrors in iasperated crystal, corresponded with a dome of flame and copper; yet this latter, I now remember, produced upon my glance an impression of actual grime. My companion reclined on a small Sigma couch, raised high to the table-level in the Semitic manner, visible to her saffron slippers of satin. She pointed me a seat opposite. The incongruity of its presence in the middle of this arrogance of pomp so tickled me, that no power could have kept me from a smile: it was a grimy chair, mean, all wood, nor was I long in discovering one leg somewhat shorter than its fellows.

She indicated wine in a black glass bottle, and a tumbler, but herself made no pretence of drinking or eating. She lay on hip and elbow, petite, resplendent, and looked gravely upward. I, however, drank.

“You are tired,” I said, “one sees that.”

“It is precious little than you see!” she returned, dreamy, hardly glancing.

“How! your mood is changed, then? You are morose.”

“You never, I think, saw a Norse passage-grave?”

“And abrupt.”

“Never?”

“A passage-grave? No.”

“It is worth a journey! They are circular or oblong chambers of stone, covered by great earthmounds, with a ‘passage’ of slabs connecting them with the outer air. All round the chamber the dead sit with head resting upon the bent knees, and consult together in silence.”

“Drink wine with me, and be less Tartarean.”

“You certainly seem to be a fool,” she replied with perfect sardonic iciness. “Is it not, then, highly romantic? They belong, you know, to the Neolithic age. As the teeth fall, one by one, from the lipless mouths — they are caught by the lap. When the lap thins — they roll to the floor of stone. Thereafter, every tooth that drops all round the chamber sharply breaks the silence.”

“Ha! ha! ha!”

“Yes. It is like a century-slow, circularly-successive dripping of slime in some cavern of the far subterrene.”

“Ha! ha! This wine seems heady! They express themselves in a dialect largely dental.”

“The Ape, on the other hand, in a language wholly guttural.”

A town-clock tolled four. Our talk was holed with silences, and heavy-paced. The wine’s yeasty exhalation reached my brain. I saw her through mist, dilating large, uncertain, shrinking again to dainty compactness. But amorousness had died within me.

“Do you know,” she asked, “what has been discovered in one of the Danish Kjökkenmöddings by a little boy? It was ghastly. The skeleton of a huge fish with human—”

“You are most unhappy.”

“Be silent.”

“You are full of care.”

“I think you a great fool.”

“You are racked with misery.”

“You are a child. You have not even an instinct of the meaning of the word.”

“How! Am I not a man? I, too, miserable, careful?”

“You are not, really, anything — until you can create.”

“Create what?”

“Matter.”

“That is foppish. Matter cannot be created, nor destroyed.”

“Truly, then, you must be a creature of unusually weak intellect. I see that now. Matter does not exist, then, there is no such thing, really — it is an appearance, a spectrum — every writer not imbecile from Plato to Fichte has, voluntary or involuntary, proved that for good. To create it is to produce an impression of its reality upon the senses of others; to destroy it is to wipe a wet rag across a scribbled slate.”

“Perhaps. I do not care. Since no one can do it”

“No one? You are mere embryo—”

“Who then?”

“Anyone, whose power of Will is equivalent to the gravitating force of a star of the First Magnitude.”

“Ha! ha! ha! By heaven, you choose to be facetious. Are there then wills of such equivalence?”

“There have been three, the founders of religions. There was a fourth: a cobbler of Herculaneum, whose mere volition induced the cataclysm of Vesuvius in ‘79’ in direct opposition to the gravity of Sirius. There are more fables than you have ever sung, you know. The greater number of disembodied spirits, too, I feel certain—”

“By heaven, I cannot but think you full of sorrow! Poor wight! come, drink with me. The wine is thick and boon. Is it not Setian? It makes you sway and swell before me, I swear, like a purple cloud of evening—”

“But you are mere clayey ponderance! — I did not know that! — you are no companion! your little interest revolves round the lowest centres.”

“Come — forget your agonies—”

“What, think you, is the portion of the buried body first sought by the worm?”

“The eyes! the eyes!”

“You are hideously wrong — you are so utterly at sea — —”

“My God!”

She had bent forward with such rage of contradiction as to approach me closely. A loose gown of amber silk, wide-sleeved, had replaced her ball attire, though at what opportunity I could not guess; wondering, I noticed it as she now placed her palms far forth upon the table. A sudden wafture as of spice and orange-flowers, mingled with the abhorrent faint odour of mortality over-ready for the tomb, greeted my sense. A chill crept upon my flesh.

“You are so hopelessly at fault—”

“For God’s sake—”

“You are so miserably deluded! Not the eyes at all!”

“Then, in heaven’s name, what?”

Five tolled from a clock.

“The Uvula! the soft drop of mucous flesh, you know, suspended from the palate above the glottis. They eat through the face-cloth and cheek, or crawl by the lips through a broken tooth, filling the mouth. They make straight for it. It is the deliciae of the vault.”

At her horror of interest I grew sick, at her odour, and her words. Some unspeakable sense of insignificance, of debility, held me dumb.

“You say I am full of sorrows. You say I am racked with woe; that I gnash with anguish. Well, you are a mere child in intellect. You use words without realization of meaning like those minds in what Leibnitz calls ‘symbolical consciousness.’ But suppose it were so—”

“It is so.”

“You know nothing.”

“I see you twist and grind. Your eyes are very pale. I thought they were hazel. They are of the faint bluishness of phosphorus shimmerings seen in darkness.”

“That proves nothing.”

“But the ‘white’ of the sclerotic is dyed to yellow. And you look inward. Why do you look so palely inward, so woe-worn, upon your soul? Why can you speak of nothing but the sepulchre, and its rottenness? Your eyes seem to me wan with centuries of vigil, with mysteries and millenniums of pain.”

“Pain! but you know so little of it! you are wind and words! of its philosophy and rationale nothing!”

“Who knows?”

“I will give you a hint. It is the sub-consciousness in conscious creatures of Eternity, and of eternal loss. The least prick of a pin not Paeon and Aesculapius and the powers of heaven and hell can utterly heal. Of an everlasting loss of pristine wholeness the conscious body is sub-conscious, and ‘pain’ is its sigh at the tragedy. So with all pain — greater, the greater the loss. The hugest of losses is, of course, the loss of Time. If you lose that, any of it, you plunge at once into the transcendentalisms, the infinitudes, of Loss; if you lose all of it—”

“But you so wildly exaggerate! Ha! ha! You rant, I tell you, of commonplaces with the woe—”

“Hell is where a clear, untrammelled Spirit is sub-conscious of lost Time; where it boils and writhes with envy of the living world; hating it for ever, and all the sons of Life!”

“But curb yourself! Drink — I implore — I implore — for God’s sake — but once—”

“To hasten to the snare — that is woe! to drive your ship upon the light/mouse rock — that is Marah! To wake, and feel it irrevocably true that you went after her — and the dead were there — and her guests were in the depths of hell — and you did not know it! — though you might have.

Look out upon the houses of the city this dawning day: not one, I tell you, but in it haunts some soul — walking up and down the old theatre of its little Day — goading imagination by a thousand childish tricks, vraisemblances — elaborately duping itself into the momentary fantasy that it still lives, that the chance of life is not for ever and for ever lost — yet riving all the time with under-memories of the wasted Summer, the lapsed brief light between the two eternal glooms — riving I say and shriek to you! — riving, Mérimée, you destroying fiend — She had sprung — tall now, she seemed to me — between couch and table.

“Mérimée!” I screamed, “ — my name, harlot, in your maniac mouth! By God, woman, you terrify me to death!”

I too sprang, the hairs of my head catching stiff horror from my fancies.

“Your name? Can you imagine me ignorant of your name, or anything concerning you? Mérimée! Why, did you not sit yesterday and read of me in a letter of Cosmo’s?”

“Ah-h... ,” hysteria bursting high in sob and laughter from my arid lips—“Ah! ha! ha!

Xélucha! My memory grows palsied and grey, Xélucha! pity me — my walk is in the very valley of shadow! — senile and sere! — observe my hair, Xélucha, its grizzled growth — trepidant, Xélucha, clouded — I am not the man you knew, Xélucha, in the palaces — of Cosmo! You are Xélucha!”

“You rave, poor worm!” she cried, her face contorted by a species of malicious contempt.

“Xélucha died of cholera ten years ago at Antioch. I wiped the froth from her lips. Her nose underwent a green decay before burial. So far sunken into the brain was the left eye—”

“You are — you are Xélucha!” I shrieked; “voices now of thunder howl it within my consciousness — and by the holy God, Xélucha, though you blight me with the breath of the hell you are, I shall clasp you, living or damned—”

I rushed toward her. The word “Madman!” hissed as by the tongues of ten thousand serpents through the chamber, I heard; a belch of pestilent corruption puffed poisonous upon the putrid air; for a moment to my wildered eyes there seemed to rear itself, swelling high to the roof, a formless tower of ragged cloud, and before my projected arms had closed upon the very emptiness of insanity, I was tossed by the operation of some Behemoth potency far-circling backward to the utmost circumference of the oval, where, my head colliding, I fell, shocked, into insensibility.

When the sun was low toward night, I lay awake, and listlessly observed the grimy roof, and the sordid chair, and the candlestick of tin, and the bottle of which I had drunk. The table was small, filthy, of common deal, uncovered. All bore the appearance of having stood there for years. But for them, the room was void, the vision of luxury thinned to air. Sudden memory flashed upon me. I scrambled to my feet, and plunged and tottered, bawling, through the twilight into the street.

MARIA IN THE ROSE-BUSH

DREADFULLY LIKE AN immortal goddess i' the face! — Homer

Albrecht Dürer — artium lumen, sol artificum-pictor-calcographus-sculptor-sine exemplo — one day sent, as we know, a black-and-white wash of his face, untouched by pencil, to his friend, a certain Raphaelo Santi at Rome: a piece of work said to have been much admired of the Master. Two years later, Dürer despatched just such another to the morganatic Gräfin von Hohenschwangau — a great lover of Art, herself an artist — and it was the burning of this portrait that was the undoing of the Lord of Schwangau himself and so of all that branch of the race of the Herzogs of Swabia, till now.

The history is in part archived in the Bertha room of the little yellow-stone Schloss which now occupies the heights of the Schwanstein — a spot strange ‘picturesqueness,’ wondered at within the last decade by some of those British pilgrims who have taken the Constance route to see at Oberammergau. One stops at drowsy Füssen on the torrent Lech, and mounting an Einspanner, penetrates five miles into the richly-forested mountains. The new castle, like the one which preceded it, occupies the loneliness of a sharply-defined ridge-summit, and looks down upon the grey old lazy race of swans which haunts the Schwansee below, and upon the vague blue dream of yet three lakes visible from the height; but the oldest castle of all was lower down, near the plain, on the borders almost of the

See. The top of Schwanstein could not, in fact, have contained its massive spread. For gaunt background, the bare breasts of the cleft Säuling.

The incident is, moreover, sketched in a rare old folio of one Aventin von Tottenweis, called: Beiträge zur Kenntniss der mittelalterlichen Malerschulen, mit verschiedenen damaligen Familien-Geschichten.

Matthias Corvinus of Hungary, having the lust to harry Turks south of Danube, had drawn in his wake many a thirsty sword of Southern Wehrfähige from Franconia to utmost Rheinpfalz; and even when only the fame of the Ungarn king still lived, Caspar of Schwangau, observing with disquiet a fleck of rust on his two-handed sword, and a white wire in his long beard, enticed after him a small body, Freiherren, barons, holding, some of them, in feof of his house, and set out on the well-worn route: by no means with injurious intent to any person, but merely in order that that might happen which our Lady of Zugspitze, in her gracious pleasure, might will to happen.

And now, scarce any rough work presenting, the band meeting only with cullions and caitiff curs, and so dispersing by mere centrifugal perversity and dissent, — what more simple than that Caspar, headlong man, should find himself alone with sword and jazeran at Stamboul; cross over into the Troad; thence by the Aegean to the legs of Piraeus; and in the neighbourhood of Colonus, near the very grove, sacrosanct, solemn, where the Semnai gave everlasting rest to way-weary Oedipus, there finally be meshed?

In precipitate fashion, he wooed, and partly won. She was of ancient priestly family, a genuine Hellen of antique descent, unmixed, chaste, and over-tall in the half-revealing draperies of the old daughters of the gods.

Over the Knie-pass, west of Wetterstein, a train of sumpter-mules, following behind them, laboured out of the Tyrol toward the flat table-land of Ober-Bayern, under a burden of precious things, a Hera by Praxiteles, immortal amphorae, MSS, paintings older than the Lyceum. This was the Countess's dot.

The grandeur of the alp must have been novel after sylvan Colonus, and even Caspar's eye was not callous: but Deianira saw here nothing but rudeness. Only, let once a lonely Sennhaus appear, the overhanging roof of thatch weighted with boulders, the variegated Sennerinn herself in thick-waisted shin-frock at the door, and instantly the Greek interest would flutter up at the hint of fitness, the making hand of man, and the artist reined to look with sidling head.

And so they came to the Schloss by the Schwansee; drawbridge and portcullis felt a throe, and through a double hedge of pikes and arquebuses they passed by the base-court to the great black round Keep, tower-flanked; and here in the gloom of the old Ritter-saal, before castle-chaplain, and God, and every saint, Caspar tendered the left hand of a true knight, and his whole passionate and subservient heart.

Said old Wilhelm of the Horneck, garrulous as a rattle, inveterate tri-ped, having shot out an oaken limb ever since the reign of Caspar's father: 'But, Gräfin, you must e'en know that these are not the days that have been. Hey for the fair, gallant times when Wilhelm was tall as the rest; and land and laws were supple to the will of the grand reckless old Adels; and a free imperial knight might e'en marry a scullion, and forthwith have her 'nobled without ado. But Wilhelm is old now, Gräfin, and things do flow to change. There was Lippe-Detwold wedded a wench from the market-place at Strassburg; and there was Heinrich von Anhalt-Dessau married a hind's pullet in Schwarzwald, as indeed nearly every Anhalt-Dessau has stooped to the unebenbürtig since the time of Conrad le Salique. Ennobled! the whole company of them, and nothing said. But now! by the Three Kings, the Empire melts, with your upstart free cities, and the rest. Why, can you credit it, dear lady, that the Elector Frederick himself, a Reichsunmittelbarer-Fürst, who married a ballad-singer from the Court at Munich when I was a lad, can't yet obtain a dispensation, and the children remain what you guess? And here now is our own Herr Graf gone to the diet at Ratisbon to talk with Maximilian, if something cannot be done for you; and there's Maximilian, stubborn as a Lombard mule, or a bürger of Augsburg—'

A luminous narrow lake of grape-purple, clear hyaline, showed gaudily beneath her half-opened lids.

'Is that, then, the reason of the Count's absence?'

'What! did he not tell you? I thought I heard him—'

'Possibly. It can be of no moment.'

'Of no moment! hear her! by the gebenedeite Jungfrau Maria of Eichstadt! and the children then are nothing—'

'What children?'

'The children that are coming, though late — that are e'en now coming, I think — —' Her face was as when a drop of blackest dragon's blood falls and melts into a silver bowl of cream.

'Twittering sparrow that thou art, Wilhelm!'

'Ay, ay, Gräfin, Wilhelm's no eyas — an old fowl. I was burg-vogt of this castle half a score of years before our good lord was born: and right proud of it: and you think me an eyas, a stripling! people have me for an unfledged eyas! I who remember when, near seventy years ago, the grandfather of the wild Wolf of Rolandspitze broke loose over the land, stormed the old palace of the Emperor Arnulf at Regensburg, and carried off gold plate, pictures—'

'Yes? tell me....'

‘Ah, you like to hear about pictures: too much, I think: and the Graf grows jealous — deadly jealous — of all your fine Kram and Putz, and the love you pay them! Say little, see much: that’s my motto: I follow a point with my eye, as the needle said to the tailor. And let old Wilhelm, who has heard more marriage-bells mayhap, ay, and funeral-knells, than you, give you this hint—’

‘But the Wolf! you mean the robber-baron of this region?’

‘The same; he of the Felsenburg on the yon side of Lech; his grandfather sacked Regensburg Palace, seizing much treasure, all which his vile Lanzknechte trundled home—’

‘Do you remember anything in particular?’

‘Remember, ay; old Wilhelm’s memory is as clear to-day.... The varlets took everything: the Blessed Sacrament chalices from the altar of the Doppel-kapelle, and, if you must know, there was one famous picture, spoken of at the time, called the Madonna in der Rosenlaube—’

A luted note escaped her. ‘And has he it now, the Wolf?’

‘They do say it was hung up in the shrine of his chapel of St. Gereon.’

‘Wilhelm! it was a work of your own Meister Stephan, a disciple of Wilhelm von Cöln! Dürer has written me concerning him. But to recover it?’

‘Recover — what? you judge ill of the fangs of Roland of Roland spitze, if you think—’

‘Leave me now. Return later in your Nestor dress — the picture, you see, grows. And prepare me instantly a messenger for Ratisbon to call back the Count.’

The apartment, circular in shape, terminated a long series of darksome corridors from the central Ritter-saal. High up, two Gothic slits in the Cyclopean walls let in a parti-coloured gloom. Within, lychnoi and cressets perpetuated a dim Feast of Lanterns; making vague the majesty of a Zeus Herkeios in the centre; painted French watches; an Isis of Egypt; an open letter, and a drawing in red chalk, from Raphael, on a table of ebony arabesqued with walrus tusk; chryselephantine panels of Byzantium; a deep-blue mackaw from the South Seas, and two small golden serpents, deadly, black-freckled, of Hindostan, in a glazed Doric temple, love-offerings of Venice, the great merchantman, sent in adoration of the exotic beauty-queen of the Schwangau; enamelled pyxes of Limoges, pietas in wax, enoptra (mirrors), tapestries — a whole incrustation, dubious, sheeny, of all that fine Kram and Putz of which old Wilhelm had spoken.

That very night, while the messenger was still on the road to Ratisbon, Caspar broke through the hangings of the doorway, rosy with ardour.

‘Ah, Herzchen, Herzchen — to see you again!’

By the deep low couch where she lay in a peplos of Genoa velvet he fell upon a knee, full of the consciousness of her sex, all-gone anew at the vaguely-lit contrast between the china whiteness of skin, and the thick convolving lips, fierce scarlet, of Rossetti’s apocalypses. He bent to kiss her with a reverent, chivalric slowness, she motionless.

‘And I have lorded it over the best Ortenburg, and Agalolfinger, and Hapsburg of them all — and you are to be Countess of Halsenheim!’

‘Did you not meet my messenger?’

‘Not I: is aught amiss?’

‘Nothing; only I sent to you—’

‘Tell me, tell me, Schätzchen — ah, the boy — when he comes’ — laying close siege to her ear— ‘shall be Graf von Halsenheim, with a ninepearled coronet to his head!’

‘The wolf of Roland-spitze, is he strong?’

‘Strong, ay, with a pack of three hundred faitour jackals of Schwartz-reiters in his black hold. But why?’

‘Does he not fear you?’

‘Not he! not yet! though, by the bones of the Eleven Virgins, the wolf may yet know the meeting of the hound’s teeth on his quarters—’

‘But he loves gold?’

‘Loves it, and takes it on the Duke’s high-road. But why, Liebling, why —’

‘Did you know that he has Stephan’s Madonna in his chapel?’

He let slip from him like cold snow the naked thick arm which he had been kneading with caresses. He stood erect.

‘Pictures again — and already!’

‘Hence I sent for you,’ she answered, with eyes opening slowly wide, ‘it is, or should be, a great work: Albrecht Dürer writes me—’

‘Tell me not of this Dürer — a low-born Bürger Schelm, drubbed, they say, by his own wife—’

‘Base woman. No law of man could make such union good.’

‘Pah! do you not know that the dauber is son to a goldsmith of Ungarn!’

‘He is a son of the gods.’

‘There is but one God, Deianira, and’ — crossing with low head— ‘Jesu Christ whom He hath sent.’

Her eyes smiled and closed. ‘This hunting after beauty, beauty,’ he continued, calming, ‘is not good, Liebling. Best make sure that God and his blessed saints look not upon it as sinful with holy eye askance. What then is this divine ‘beauty’ that you speak so of? By’r Lady, I see it in none of these gimcracks of yours! Give it up, Zuckerkorn! God’s creatures for beauty, say I; look, if you want to see it, all lustrous, grand, in yonder mirror—’

‘But I was not made by man for man’s eyes.’

‘You were made, I swear it, by God for my eyes.’

‘And if you find me perfect, it is, — perhaps, — your eyes that are imperfect. The chance toppling of stones may form a hut, you know; but chance never built a temple to the Endless. The Greek women placed a statue of Hyacinthus in their sleeping-rooms, that their offspring might catch something of its wonder. Nature, you see, is nearly everywhere rude, crude, and waits for the rearranging touch of our hand. Glance only at that’ — she pointed to the Zeus — no man of flesh ever looked so; you certainly never saw one such. Not by the imitation of nature was that shape born to life; but by four-winged imagination, yoked to the divine instinct of loveliness, and riding in paean triumph, scornful almost of nature. The Assyrians copied nature, and you know—’

‘Nay, nay, I am no schoolman in these matters. You want, it seems, this Wolf of the Spitze hunted, and the smudge torn from his claws; well, by St. Hubert, hunted he shall be, and torn it shall be — by power of gold — or secret nightfall — or open storm — —’

He had succumbed again to her side. She, inclining to him, bore a dead kiss to red pyre in his beard.

A page entered with a packet. An adventurer Italian, Count della Torre de Tasso (now great Thurn und Taxis) had lately set up a riding-post throughout the Empire. His courier had reached thus far from Nürnberg.

The packet flew open. First there was Brunehild, princess of the Visigoths, mortal bane of ten princes of the Merovingians, carved in hone-stone, and initialed ‘A.D.’; the furrows of eighty years of crime; the blood-dabbled grey hairs tied to a horse’s tail; the indignant hoofs spurning to broken death their guilty incubus; the triumph-smile of young Clothair near. Next, a letter in Latin, flourished at the end with a couplet from Ovid; and next, a curling folio of canvas, washed with a head. She held it open with her two extended arms.

‘This then is he!’

Caspar had leant over to look. ‘The burger-son of Nürnberg?’

‘Dürer.’

‘Well, he has a goodly, pleasant face enough. But methinks the fellow presumes, Herzchen. A bonfire of these child’s toys, if you wish to pleasure me! And a letter interdicting—’

‘Nay, the next letter,’ she said, smiling an arch câlinerie, ‘will be a boast that I have the Stephan Madonna of the Rose-bower — safe!’

The Dürer-head, stretched on a framing, took rank by the couch. The light of a fierce, fond criticism beat upon it, and Caspar, entering unawares, was witness how, sitting on the edge, she searched the pale azure eyes with intent forgetfulness, so that he touched her before she knew. And he frowned to see the swell of sudden pink which leapt to her throat.

And the next day when, fulminant with rage, he broke into the room, Dürer had vanished, and he noticed it: but his mind was of such sort as to bear the stress of only one disquiet at a time, and he said nothing of the daub. In his hand he flourished a document; a torrent of invective came from him.

‘The blasphemous Frevler! His weasand for it, as I am true knight and Christian gentleman! See, Herzchen, see, this he has sent me — he — he — the meanest Mittel-frei, self-styled Graf and Wolf! His great-grandfather’ — stamping to and fro — ‘dugged the trench round his five-acre farm with his own hands. And this to me! His life for it — I will worry, worry, worry the poisonous rat from his stench-hole, by the Holy Mother of God! Self-styled Count! Slitting throats at noontide! claiming right to coin money in his own vile lair, like an Adeliger! taking of tolls! tribute from the villages!

Walpurgis-tax — Michaelmas-tax — hearth-shilling — Frohn-arbeit — levied all upon other men's bauers — and his own grandfather a lubber-lipped Landsasse! Deems himself rechtsfähig, by — ! Ha, Sir Count!' — with robust emphasis of foot— 'thy weasand for it, then! I did but write, Herzchen, making stipulation for the stolen Madonna you wot of in return for honest Schwangau money rendered. He replies by a threat to harry me — harry me—'

Her eyes were wide. 'But you will obtain the Madonna?'

'Ah, that will I, and within the sennight!'

'By strategy and surprise, then — not by open assault.'

'How so?'

'For the sake of your own safety; and partly lest the man, having warning, destroy the work.' She made her arms a lulling charm, and slowly cooled his judgment to the temper of hers. Long after a windy night-fall, a picked body of cavaliers crept through the dripping woods of the heights above Füssen, taking their secret way to the Felsenburg.

The enterprise was as hardy as could be. Caspar only realised the steepness of the danger he had dared when he stood once more within his own good castle-gate. It was then breaking day. Helmeted still, visor down, glistening in wetted armour-plates, he winged his feet with the good news towards the bed-chamber of Deianira. As often, she had passed a sleepless night; her bed was unruffled. Thence with eager outlook he hurried to the apartment where the lychnoi, in a sleepy twilight inviolate as yet of the crude day, laved the empty couch of the Greek. An angry 'wetter!' broke from him. In a corridor he came upon Wilhelm of the Horneck, always a shaker before the cock, a heap of age, built upon his staff.

'How, now, Wilhelm? The Gräfin!'

'Not in her chamber, and not in her Kunst-kammer?'

‘In neither, man, by my faith.’

The old fellow, sudden and quick in jealousy for his over-lord’s dignity, looked bilious, suspecting truth.

‘Follow me,’ he said, ‘old Wilhelm’s eyes — old Wilhelm’s wits— ’twas always so — the dagger to cut every knot — from the time when your grandfather, Otto, took to too fluent rouses of Hochheimer grape—’

‘Come, come, old man, less of lip and more of limb!’

Wilhelm led the way up the steep, unequal steps of a turret, along a dark passage, and pointed. Caspar stood before the open door of an extremely small room cut from the wall. Within, on a low table — almost an altar — of pierced bone, burned a right flank of three long vestas, stuck on pricket-candlesticks; a left flank of three; and, somewhat retired from them, a centre of three; and beyond them, hanging to the wall, a washed head; and before them, priestess of this shrine, the breast-banded back-view of Deianira, the gorgeous grace of her samite peplos, she erect, with perked head, searching, searching the pale azure eyes. She had not heard the clinking approach of Caspar’s armour.

A harsh ‘Ha!’ broke from him.

She started into pink confusion, and then, instantly calm again, ‘Ah, you have brought it then, the Madonna!’

The rattle of his metal broke an awful silence as he turned and marched to her apartment, she clinging expectant to his side. A not very large parcel, placed by a halberdier, lay in wrappings on the floor.

‘Help, help me!’ she cried, eagerness trembling in her fingers as she undid it; and then, ‘but, oh! see there! fie! you have defaced it,’ and now, after a moment’s breathless inquisition, ‘but — it is not — beautiful — not supremely; it lacks — not scrupulousness — certainly not that — but the —

This is not Art, thought, — it is Nature, impulse! I am sorry I gave you the pains.’

Caspar stood tapping the frown of his resentment to ultimate smoothness beneath the tip of his steel boot, till she, remembering that he needed reconquest, set herself leisurely to the work. His bonderie lasted till mid-day, and then he was hers again.

Falconry, and the dear delights of woodcraft in the forest near, filled his mornings; and once, when the Madonna had been relegated to forgotten obscurity, she rose to meet him as he entered the door of the art-room, plumed, horn by horn, holding still the spear and straight short sticker, faintly streaked with dry blood of the boar.

‘Tell me, have you had good venery this morning?’

She lavished on him the whole Aegean incantation of her loveliness, languishment of kisses, listening with quite disproportionate interest to details of the chase, the halloo, conduct of pack and prickers, the bringing to bay, the dimensions of the quarry. Then suddenly:

‘Tell me, where is — Arras?’

‘Arras? In Frankland, surely. But what now?’

‘They make tapestry there?’

‘Ay.’

‘And you have heard of Raphael? You must, I think, — in Welschland?’

‘Well, well, Herzchen.’

‘Raphael, you know, highest of all — he has lately executed, so Pietro Perugino writes me, ten great works, altogether immortal, on cartone, at the invitation of your Pope, and these have been sent to Arras and the factory there to be woven into fabric. You see now the full connection? You see? And I hear that now their purpose is served, little account is made of them, and they lie dust-grown, neglected; to be purchased, therefore — think of it!

— perhaps for little, by a wily bargainer, crafty to hide his eagerness of acquisition. Ah, and you will go! You will go!’

‘Now, by St.—’

The name of the saint fainted on his lips, as a wind at the caress of a pearl-shelled grotto of roses, and down a steep incline, topped by angry impatience, and based by growling complaisance, slid Caspar; so that after not many days, accompanied by a very few pikes, he rode his moody way over the plain of the Schwangau. The sentinels on the turrets saw the little band swallowed by a glade of the forest, as they wound slowly forward on their long journey to Frankreich.

It was shortly after this that Albrecht Dürer — most dreamy-wandering of bürger-sons — his whole life a pious Wanderjahr — arrived.

Passing near on foot, he hoped for the minute-measured privilege of some talk with the exalted lady who had been pleased to approve him. Old Wilhelm of the Horneck himself, with no overflow of courtesy — eyeing yellowly, with rheumy eye, the dusty hose, and belted wamms, and short cloak, all of rather worn brown stuff — led him from the base-court, up to the Saal, and so along the corridors. A satchel, hanging diagonally, contained butter-brod, and two pieces of chalk. Deianira, just emerging from the hangings of her sanctuary, saw, and knew; and uttered a bated cry.

Dürer, too, knew, and his heart, failing, sank; regretting his rashness. More blushes than a girl’s covered him. A sudden noon-day sun could not have dazzled and winded him more.

Some little time before this, while on his Italian trip he had written to a friend: ‘In Italy I am a gentleman; in Germany a parasite.’ Add to this that the genius was, by nature, shyer than a kid.

She greeted and led him to the chamber with a heart-simple old majesty, beyond anything he saw in the high dames who sailed athwart his eyesight in his humble Hofmaler attendance at the court of Maximilian and (afterwards) of Charles. Climaxes of crimson rushed every moment across his face. She sitting over against him. Andromache in his eyes, Helen, Artemis' self; and she said unexpectedly this:

‘Well! you have come in lucky time: within — shall I say three weeks? — Raphael's Sistine cartoons will be here! Ten of them — a banquet of wine. And I know you will not think of going without seeing them!’

He could evoke nothing but a murmur of thanks.

Airy German magi, Novalises, idealists, will not hear of Time; for if the condamné actually finds a night eternity, and the Monk Felix one hundred years a second — whose shot brings down the volatile truth? Both, or rather neither, they say; for the thing computed is in each case reflexive of the computer merely, externally inane. Albrecht and Deianira, with their quick brains, might well have realised some such thought, had they compared the pace of these weeks of waiting with others past and to come. But crowded speculations of a different sort were insistent upon their attention.

At first, it was all decked words, picked turns of phrase, some of the open bashfulness remaining on the one side, the secret diffidence on the other; a continuous torrent of mere opinions; the world-old dogmatism of the artist, self-sure, but with claws now tucked-in;

Deianira's theories quite different from his, yet seeming almost to coincide, by means of trimmed, only half-expressed convictions, on this hand and that.

Everything was gazed into; Stephan produced. ‘What curious work! so minute; but—’ and she stopped.

‘He is my favourite of the Cöln school,’ said Durer; ‘his limpid piety seems so to illumine all he did. Wynrich I place on a much lower grade: you never saw his Sancta Veronica in the Munich Pinacothek? No? Rather an inanity. And yet the old Cöln tempera was so excellent that he ought—'

'You place a very high value on medium, do you not?'

'Well, as a workman, a fairly high value, perhaps. You, I daresay, do not — —'

'Not so high, maybe.'

'But this of Stephen is fine — ah, delicate, virgin. He painted the Dombild, too, in the Cathedral, but that, you would see, is much immaturer; here he is at his perfectest — the chastity of detail — of the crown, of the cherubs in the medallion — but you, doubtless, do not—'

'The Greek writers, painters, sculptors' — evading direct reply— 'placed, I think, little value in details by themselves, except in so far as they conduced to the intended effect of the whole as a whole.'

This was a point of view new to Dürer. He blushed. And timidly: 'You think they were right?'

'They may have been wrong,' she said, and smiled.

Thus to begin. But the rapid days brought rapid realisation of the equality of all infinite things, and so a full resumption of self-reverence, and so greater freedom of thought and speech; the words falling out now less knit, foreknown — and more, ever more, of them, torrents laughing with light and feeling. No more careful retraction of claws, but roughish play, the free fraternity of two natural, high-strung people, conscious of themselves and of each other. Dürer had been everywhere, looking at things through the crystal simplicity of a devout, open intellect; lowliest pilgrim to Venice, to the Flemish cities: a lynx in the castle of Barbarossa at Gelnhausen, and among the ruins of the great old Charlemagne palaces at Aachen and Engelheim. The quattrocentisti had hewn their work, and ended; and out of that strength was coming, had come, sweetness as of ambrosia; Botticelli, the Holbeins, Buonarroti, all breathed the same new air; the Van Eycks had been painting in their wonderful new oil-varnish medium at Binges. All this movement, art-life, the delicate young monk-mind had felt, cutting clean the rein of aspiration, dreaming dreams, high but pure. Raphael had sent him two life-studies in chalk. He poured into the ear of Deianira fairy tales of art-history, gleams, hints, half cabalistic in their effect; secret treasures stored in monasteries grey as the dawn of German things; suspected gems in the vaults of the church of the Augustines at Nürnberg, and in the cloisters of St. Catherine at Augsburg; old Abbots — Alfred and Arinam of Bayern; Gosbert and Absolom of Triers — mixing in their tempera occult substances, dying with their selfish arcana; the splendid art of the Hohenstaufens; the rich gold-ground honey-medium work of the thirteenth century; the perfect impasto of John van Eyck; protégés of the old Emperors at Prague; the Maastricht school; subtle distinctions between Rhine-men and Westphalia-men, Dutch and Flemish; Israel von Meckenen; and the beauties of Wurmsur and Veit Stoss, and the only three-quarter beauties of Martin Schoen; a whole snow-flake cataclysm of wanton words.

‘Do you know,’ he asked, ‘what di Cosimo mixed in his colours for the Death of Procris? Only guess!’

‘And what does it matter what he mixed?’ she answered, freely pouting now, a long-legged Aphrodite playing angry at baby-tricks of little Eros.

They parted lingeringly late in the night, and lay dreamlessly dreaming of the next day’s bacchanal of reason, the word-orgy, and dancing rivulet of fancies.

For him she threw off something of the anchorite quiescence, and there were days when they took long walks together over the plain, and so into the shade of the forest; Albrecht’s temper, naked to all influences of nature, softening at the great old trees, and deep glens, and dank, religious gloom;

she maintaining the Greek coldness, feeling nothing. And long-drawn floats on the lake filled the halt twilight. A steep flight of stone steps at the back of the castle, mossy underfoot, over-arched every-way with a wide wilderness of bindweeds, led at this point down the hillside, and so plumped into the See. By this way they reached the high-prowed little shallop, itself a swan, moored to the platform.

Albrecht sometimes flung from a zither an old psalm-air or dainty-tripping Minne-lied to the drugged breezes and wavelets of the See. Not yet had Jacob Stainer gone through the forest with little tapping steel-hammer, and found that ever the oldest tree had in it the mellowest Memnon- music: Mittenwald and the violins were therefore future; but every peasant of Bavaria, even then, was a maker and twanger of the zithers whose universal twitter filled the land with sounds.

‘Look!’ cried Deianira, ‘see — see how the presence of a man’s hand reforms the callous landscape!’

It was the 23rd of June. Here and there, on the heights round Schwangau, cones of flame, smoke-plumed, burned upward to the deepening sky.

‘Sonnenwandfeuer,’ said Albrecht, ‘lit by the bauers. It is the Eve of St. John.’ ‘St. John! — why, it is the celebration of a solar myth — this, you know, is the summer solstice — the myth which underlies the story of Oedipus.’

‘Hardly, I think. We light the fires because St. John—’

‘And yet — they lack — arrangement. A supreme artist might so place them in reference to each other as actually to lift the scene into ideality. Chance does nothing.’

This banne camaraderie fructified into intimacy. Albrecht put a modest hand into the wallet of his brown cloak, and drew out the MS. of his little book, not yet completed, De Symmetriâ Partium; she envisaging him, sitting on the couch-edge, elbows meeting draped knees, chin joisted on fisted hands. And he read — Monk-Latin, with acolyte intonation — and she, with sure scalpel of inward criticism, listened, searching, searching his face. Now, the figures of Dürer in the ‘Trinity with Heavenly Host’ and the ‘Christian Martyrs,’ painted by himself, as well as his still surviving two heads, are beautiful indeed, but probably not true of his face, for his gift was never the presentation of a superlative degree of human ‘prettiness.’ The painter had, in fact, the spiritual face of a stripling seraph; such a face, that, had he been Italian, had his life passed in Florence and not Nürnberg, he must have been Raphael and not Dürer. A crinkled head of long, gossamer, auburn hair was the pensive playmate of every breath; and blushing maidenhood, and the innocent eyes of old recluses, and the kiss-compelling lips of Byron, transfigured him to the meek beauty of Leonardo da Vinci’s John at the Last Supper.

And in fond repayment of the Symmetriâ Partium, Deianira produced from an alcove her own work of the last three years: a triptych with the rape of Persephone; old Wilhelm as Nestor; and, large on chestnut panel, a return of a sennerinn on Rosenkranz Sunday from Almen-leben on the heights; the bell-cow decked with edelweiss and rhododendron; the crowned sennerinn on its back; the train of meek kine, calved; the gratulatory length of village-street full of the laughter poured from every gossiping doorway; the bashful lover, broad-faced, in felt steeple-hat, presenting to Gretel the necessary nosegay — reward of all her lonesome ward of love. And she had only seen it once, crossing the Alp to Schwangau, years before. Albrecht, without a word, self-abased, looked at it, she smiling at his blank face. What spurred his wonderment was the lifefulness — he well knew the scene — and then, far above all, the unlikeness to any life anywhere. Never Bavarian peasant, or peasant or man in the world, owned such meaning traits, look so strange and high. Here, then was contact with a new school, perpetuated by one disciple, grandest of all, the school of Apelles, and old Rhodian masters of the Doric Hexapolis. It was shortly after this revelation that Dürer wrote to his friend Melanchthon that sentence so full of pathetic meekness: 'admirator sum minime meorum, ut olim; et saepe gemo meas tabulas intuens, et de infirmitate meâ cogitans.'

And now change was manifest in the spirit of their intercourse; a third distinct phase, like the evolved presentments of a planet's face — so natural, self-unconscious. The penumbra of a profound melancholy fell upon these souls — penumbra, because though poignant, it was not painful, but, on the contrary, full of luxury. Without shadow of apparent cause, they walked continually on the borders of the misty-dripping lake of tears, by the twilight banks of a spectral river of sighs. The art-talk dropped utterly; and, in its place, talk of life; and especially of death; and all mournful things. Albrecht had secretly wondered whither had vanished the present of his washed head: but exploring alone one day, he saw the square of deeper darkness on the wall of the little cell; entered, knew, looked at the nine extinguished tapers on the low altar-table; and frowned down a tingling tumult of ecstasy and pang which rushed through all his frame. Soon subsequent to this the doleful mood grew on.

'Pirene,' said Deianira, 'wept and wept, so bitterly wept, that she melted into a fountain.'

'And Kriemhild,' said Albrecht, 'when she heard of the death of Siegfried, so bitterly laughed, that the ringing rafters made the house to tremble.'

Here was intensity for intensity; deep calling to deep. Deianira had been no dyspeptic worm in painted Hoch-deutsche MSS., new-printed books. They droned of old German women; Thusnelda, the magnificent;

Rumetrude, misty-weird; Carolus and his paladins in the romaunts; tragic bignesses of Niebelungen-lied; the true heart of Bertha; lily-chastity of Theodelinda; all the ah and pain of woe-worn Tannhäuser of the Hörselloch. They fell into comparisons between Ajax and Amadis; asked which was the pitifulest, Hercules Furens or Orlando, not yet ‘Furioso.’

‘Read to me,’ he said. ‘What?’

‘Something sad.’

She filled the night with a reading-from-the-scroll of the long lamentation and wringing of hands of Euripides’ Trojan Women.

At home with Plato and Aristotle, less familiar with the Tragedies, he caught perhaps not half; but the half filmed his eyes with a constant moisture. As the slow, variegated words, each a perfect round messenger from her, wafted clean and light like bubbles from a pipe, floated about him — rhythmic chorus, and pomp of sententious rhesis — he then first realised the Greek language, and all the fresh joy and wonder it is. And as all modes of beauty are akin — beauty of form to beauty of sound to beauty of odour — these need but approximation under right conditions to blend into harmonies, and so produce the ultimate delight. Albrecht, listening, drank an exhalation from her of mingled frangipane and ambergris, and roamed from the Paphian face of sea-foam white, to the braided bosom, to the fine linen zonè, to the broken billow of draperies at her feet, to the dainty arrangement of sandal-straps; and again back to the dead-white face. A rare exaltation — verging on tears — like the rarest flame of interstellar ethers — ached through his physic man.

The invitation had been that he should stay to see the Raphael cartoons. Looking now, each saw in the other’s eyes that this must not be.

He slung his satchel, containing the chalk-sticks and the butter-brod crusted now to stone, upon his back.

The setting sun was the very genius of gold on the waters of the Schwansee. Languid undulations curved into purple and saffron and crimson before the breasts of the swans, and the beaked prore of the shallop. From the terraced garden which sloped to the edge of the See on the castle side, an oppression of violet-beds and roses pervaded the whole spirit of nature. Yet not a breath ran upon the water. All was a conflagration; the bordering tree-tops burned unconsumed; yellow streaks stretched quite up to the zenith; the sun and his immediate train stepped down incarnadine to couchée and purple bed, pumped and appanaged like dormituriert old queens of Assyria, drunk with blood and wine.

Their most commonplace words were uttered in a tone of profoundest sadness.

‘Helen,’ said Dürer, splashing one of the birds, ‘had for father — a swan. Her mother Eurotian Leda. I seem to see a perfect fitness in the myth.’

‘The poets,’ she answered, looking never at him, ‘would have pawned their hope of Elysium for power to give a higher impression of her beauty; and as of her beauty, so of the pain, the tragedy of her.’

‘The pain, the tragedy! So it is, then, and must be, with beauty! Calvary is witness.’

‘Cursed be it, I say; and the hunger of it!’

She hid from him the sudden passion of her face.

The sun set; the mist and melancholy of a morne twilight grew deepening down upon the lake. A flight of crows, the sad fate of a nightingale in a grove near, the flap of a swan, were evidence of the silence. They heard distinctly a change of sentries at the turret-portal next the see.

‘You return to Nürnberg?’

‘Not yet. I am a wanderer, you know, a confirmed wanderer.’

‘Rest is best.’

‘For myself I look for one rest henceforth — the rest that remaineth to the people of God.’

‘I meant what you mean.’

‘A roam among the alp-heights, perhaps — some sketching—’

‘You will be still near me then.’

‘Near you? Ah yes! still near you.’

The mournful mood of Gethsemane was in them; the old torrent of words ran low. Moving red lights gleamed through the barred window-slits of the donjon. It was night. A faint breeze arose, and wooed to truancy hairs of Deianira’s filleted, uncovered head, and was heavy at a perfume it met around her, and died at the sweet tumult it won from the old gilt Aeolian phorminx, seven-stringed, which lay since the previous night in the shallop. She took it, and the insistence of the plectrum won from her a softly-sung hymn of Andromache.

Hector, the harmer

Moan’d at the night of thee; Myrmidon armour

Paled at the light of thee.

(Your lutes of lotus wood

Libyan wail for him!

Your lutes with wax conglued

Sweetness exhale for him!)

Ploughman of blessings!

Whelp-son his lingering,

Tears his expressings,

Harps knew his fingering!

Zeus! who through Ancient Night

Urgest thy travelling,

Yet metest ever right
Doom of thy ravelling;
Red has the flame of noon,
Rushed to obscurity — Rash let the crapèd moon
Rend up her durity!

‘Ah! that was a chillier wind.’

The moon, which had uttered a scared face, drew quickly the grey curtains of the night and disappeared.

‘It grows cold for you; you must go now within the Schloss.’

‘It is lonely there.’

‘Is it lonely?’

‘And I am not cold. Touch my hand.’ At his touch she shivered. A single drizzle-spray fell upon each of them.

‘Still I must go,’ he said.

A sob!

‘We may meet again.’

‘You will never come again.’

‘Time and tide happeneth to us all, you know.’

‘But — you will never come again.’

They had reached the platform of the bowered stair. He stepped from the shallop and stood with her. The mizzle had become clearly sensible. The moon had utterly vanished.

Her hand was in his. He stooped and kissed it — on back, in palm — ready to be mad as she. Luckily, her face was quite turned from him.

‘God—’ he said.

From her working lips came no sound. Her bosom rowed like two oarsmen struggling for life from the suck of the whirlpool.

He was gone. She stood and watched him to the other side of the lake, and the embankment there. He made fast the boat. A curtain of masonry ran here parallel to the See to defend the castle-back. Before he reached it the mist had swallowed him. As he finally disappeared from her, she buried her face in the voluming folds of her left arm, and the thin, low wail of a little child welled from her. Slowly she ascended the stairs.

The end would have been different, had Dürer, like Deianira, been all artist; but the Nürnberg painter was first of all saint, and artist after.

But there was evil news at the Schloss of Schwangau in those very days. The old nose of Wilhelm perked high, sniffing danger on the wind. Bauers and yeomen from round Füssen and Eschach, leaving their farms, came crying to the Burg-vogt for protection. Sathan himself was loose. At Hopfen a whole street had burned, the church of St. Magnus been pillaged. Two villages flamed together. Roland of Rolandspitze, biding his time, collecting his forces, had not forgotten his Madonna.

He was a species of Swabian Epplein von Gailingen, a Sud-deutscher Wild Boar of Ardennes.

On the third day Caspar arrived — almost by stealth — with his little band of men-at-arms. He had heard tidings of trouble on the way. His blood was up.

Flushed with enthusiasms, high passions, he came to where the wool stood bundled before heron the distaff. ‘Ah... ah... ah!’ was all he could say, as he did, and did again, perfervid violence to her lips; she enduring with pensive patience. ‘But you look not so well, täubchen — not so well — a look of care — to be expected now, perhaps — and I have brought the smudges — aha! that pleases it then? Ah... ah... sugary ecstasy that thou art! — three of them — yes, only three — the other seven lay buried in some hole — the factory is a monstrous place, you must know — and they showed me there scant courtesy, by'r Lady; but three, by much entreaty, and a threat or two thrown in, I did get — these being easily unearthed — for a few gulden. Ha! and here they come.'

Two waiting-men bore-in a long narrow box, opened; the cartoons had been cut into strips. Deianira rose, and adjusted them on the floor: Stephen stoned; Paul in prison at Philippi; the light at noon-day 'above the brightness of the sun.' For a minute, over each, the impeccable energy of her scrutiny worked intensely; then, without fail, she knew the truth of form, composition, drapery, effect. Coming to him, she rewarded him with a cold kiss. And coldly she said:

'Thank you — they are very lovely.'

Even he could see it, and went away wondering at her inertness, the death of her enthusiasm. But action, action was the word — no dallying over daubs! 'Come, man, news, news!' he cried to Wilhelm, towing the three-goer into a small room. Wilhelm, who was directness itself where the talk touched upon the old trade of war, was minute on the defences of the castle, ammunition, provisions, his own share in everything, the ravages of the Wolf. Only a few hours before a Wappen-herald had arrived at the gate, demanding the return of the Maria, loud with threats of siege.

'His strength, man?'

'Over three hundred, they say.'

'And ours?'

'A hundred and twenty, beside a flock of bauers.'

'And gold in our coffers?'

'Scarcity of that till harvest.'

'Ha! and where is now my cousin of Swabia?'

'At Augsburg they say.'

‘Good! a despatch to him instantly, requisitioning succours, and the same to every friendly burggraf of the region. The ripped bowels of this Verräther, Wilhelm! And other news?’

‘Nothing — only—’ the old man halted, half loving his suzerain’s quiet mind, and half the solace of the oily tongue.

‘Well, Wilhelm, well—’

‘Nothing — a visitor to the castle — the painter of Nürn—’

‘Now, by—’

‘For more than two weeks—’

‘Ha!’

‘Two weeks,’ the conciseness melting before a fervour of doddering communicativeness, ‘and never by my goodwill, either— ’tis not till now that Wilhelm of Horneck has waited to see the back of a noble house broken by some strolling troubadour or runaway bauer’s pup with fair face. You may have heard of Trautmandorfs wife and the mummer nigh a century gone. And did ye ever know old Wilhelm to predict you false? With right jealous eye, I tell you, I looked upon the long intimacies of speech — and wantonness of glides on the lake — by night — with worrying of — harps and zithers—’

‘Enough, Herr of Horneck, enough—’ Caspar had drawn back a foot, and was frowning into the old man’s soul.

‘Worrying of harps — and confluence of bent heads over Kram and Putz — and now that he is gone, the rekindling of the tapers before the painter-head — put your trust in old Wilhelm’s eyes for seeing! — nine of them — burning continually, like the fires which they used to say the prince-bishop of Bruchsal plenished near the tombs of the Emperors in the crypts of Spires Cathedral — and the door of the cell kept locked, and a daily double-visit paid to the head—’

‘Enough, man, I say—’

‘But, for that matter, ’tis a left-handed wedlock — you are not bound. Well I remember the case—’

‘Traitor! Silence!’ His roar was the lion’s; the old man cowered, silent; Caspar walked away. It was then late in the day. That very night a fresh troop of bauers fled into the castle, with tidings of added woes. At dawn the plain before Hohenschwangau was dotted grey, well beyond artillery range, with the leaguering tents of Roland.

And there was brisk work before long. The Burgh-wache, though insufficient to make even the proper show of strength, had no lack of fire, through hope of speedy help, and confidence in Caspar’s generalship. He was in every place, a strong, ubiquitous spirit of disposition, inspiration. Two parallel bastioned curtains defended the front and sides of the donjon; before each of these a fosse and drawbridge; and before the outermost drawbridge an out-work barbican. Upon this last the chief besieging party, under Roland himself and his brother Fritz, concentrated their efforts with scaling-ladders, petards and grenadoes, potent enginery; and upon this detachment Caspar in person, from a bastion of the first curtain, directed a saker and culverin hail-rain. But before nightfall the out-work had fallen to the reverberating hochs!’ of the brigands.

Early the next day the storm reopened. The enemy, with manifold advance and retreat, now attempted the bastions of the first escarpment. Still no sign of Swabian support. A sigh for sleep, only for sleep, arose among Caspar’s men. During the night a strain in the relief of sentinels had made itself felt, so meagre the garrison. Caspar himself had mounted guard.

In the afternoon, passing by Deianira’s room, tired, he entered, pining for her. Hardly since his coming back had he seen her. Freely now, from his heart, he forgave her the entertainment of the bürger-son, knowing well her child's love for pictures and suchlike. Here in these recesses the volleying of howitzer and mortar, saker and falconet, whizz of arrows, smiting of pikes, was only buzzingly audible. She lay on the couch at full length, beautifully asleep, or only on the borderland of wakefulness. In this dim state, hearing the ghost of his footstep, she stretched out her arms, both of them, at full length before her, inviting to the luxury of her embrace; and he, smiling ineffably, trusting, gentle, came to her, bending himself down, happy at the sweet, voluntary friendship of her arms about his neck. She, in her half-sleep, murmured:

‘Albrecht, Albrecht, thou art come...’

Caspar stumbled backward with that pale, distorted rigidity of face seen in the agonised brave fellows on the bastions when a sudden arrow entered their hearts. He reeled like a dying man from the chamber.

Deianira, vaguely conscious of disturbance, slowly opened her eyes, and was alone.

But in little time Wilhelm of Horneck came dashing into the room, youth in every third projected leg, and before her fell prone to his old knees, with outstretched clasped hands, a world of prayer in his eyes.

‘O Gräfin — save the Count — you only can — for the love of God! Gräfin! There may be yet time — he thinks to make a sally — stark mad, raving! And the men, seeing certain death, refuse to follow him. Some devil, some furious devil, rides him. Save him! Only some fifty against three hundred! Gräfin! his eyes are two rolling suns of flame; and help must come to-night — tomorrow — for very certain, if he would only wait—’

She, surprised, rose. Outside they met men rushing hither and thither with wild looks. One said:

‘They are gone — just passed the inner Fallbrücke. God help them!’

The desire to see overcame her, and, mounting the steps of a turret, she took a seat on a planchette within the boldly-projecting machicolation near the battlements, looking through an aperture. Here she was alone, the donjon being as yet safe from shot. The small band — multifariously armed, hellebardiers, brigandined archers, carabiniers, Caspar at their head — were then issuing from the outer bridge. Just now there had come a lull to the storm; the enemy were in lager. The sun was low, hidden behind a crag of Säuling. The castle party moved down a gentle slope.

A flourish of trumpets, a shout, arose — two — triumphant on one side, death-challenging on the other. Quickly before the lager-tents sprang a crop of dragon's teeth; midway they met.

Deianira's eyes rested only upon Caspar. A certain unusual tingling feeling, vaguely working, was struggling into form within her — akin to admiration. To the minute when the fight began her face was calm. Then she saw him in the thick of things, firm, Actè-bluff when thunder-bolts are abroad, and breakers break upon its rock. The first dawn of a smile rose orient upon her lips. A small body of men — the very pick of the castle — surrounded now every-way by the enemy — formed his immediate entourage; the rest, blocked, sustained the shock of the brigands. Every minute a life ended — two to one on the side of the besiegers, who did double-battle with the dogged despair of Caspar's men. He, it was clear, was bent upon some object away from him; his sword the very tooth of pestilence in his hand, his helmet-plume floating above all heads, certain token of coming death. The dawn spread to Deianira's eyes; an eager lustre grew gradually radiant in them. And soon the end of Caspar's quest was evident — the Wolf himself, distinguished by his raucous shouts of cheer, huge battle-axe, suit of fluted armour. The brool of Caspar's roar rang challenging out; they were near now. Roland, a towering bulk, nothing loth, rabid with the taste of blood, struck spur to charger; casting axe, drawing sword. They dashed together. The warring Lanzknechte made way, and left large field: it was a recoil of the wave from the basalt, like the scampering of chaff from flails. The two men fought alone. Deianira drew a deeper breath.

It was at this precise moment that the sun, sinking hitherto behind a fork of the Säuling, burned forth a perfect red circle in the inter-space between the riven rock. Its beams, falling upon Caspar panoplied in plated steel mail, made him rich, splendid; a luminous molten glory of cuirass and gorget, arm-piece and helmet and greaves; it welded him to his bossed and prancing war-horse, and turned them, him and it, into a homogeneous Centaur of fluent and refulgent gold.

‘O! — but it is beautiful!’ The effect was so sudden. It took her breath away. Her hands clasped, rigidly. A swelling wave of feeling flowed in her. Beautiful! And why? This, as usual, was the first question of her analytical mind. As she faintly heard the ringing outcries raised from the clattered metal of the warriors, saw the swift avenging flash of Caspar’s blade, she knew quickly why. It was in the nature of a revelation to her. The doer, then, was great as the maker? Conduct as art? Marathon lovely as the Parthenon? The Crusades as Aphrodite? Caspar as Raphael? Was it so, then? And if not, how came this sight so to lift her bosom with the beauty-sense — with love perhaps? It was more than a revelation — it was a regeneration, the birth of a little child, as natural, as definite, as the conversion of Lydia. Not since their meeting-day to this hour had Caspar appealed unconquerably to the predominant in her — her abandonment to beauty. Now he loomed in quite another light: he was immense — he was thrilling! With an aesthetic inquisitiveness, she peered at the illumined interchange of tierce and quart, shrewd thrust, ponderous hew: the two men were nicely parallel in skill, virulence; Caspar not quite so tall, his war-horse larger. Only to look at him, facing so great danger, at so great odds, with so great manfulness, was joy! And now the thought rose bitingly within her that this all was for her sake; of all the pillaged Madonna of Stephan was the inception; and his boy-like sincerity of affection, his minute love for her, races on her errands over Europe, all seemed precious and different, now. She would design, in the fulness of her gratitude, a highly-finished pattern, and send it to Milan to be gold-embossed in arabesque on a suit of plated armour for him, great son of Peleus that he was! She would make her arms a constant ensorcelment about him! But now, sudden fears took hold upon her: — if he never returned? Of this she had not thought. She turned a bitter face from the sight of his cleft helm. But immediately afterwards Caspar, executing a demi-volte on his charger, hewed with his whole momentum, and Roland the Wolf toppled with centrifugal brains from his saddle.

Deianira stood up, most tall, laughing, with clapping hands.

Seeing the fall of his brother, Fritz with a body of cavaliers galloped towards the Count. But the restes of Caspar's band, some twenty men, closed round him. They effected, still fighting, a slow retreat, till the ordnance of the bastions covered them. They reached in safety the castle-gate.

Deianira with haughty, crimson face — proud of him — of herself, that she was his, he hers — had descended the steps of the turret. As she passed along the corridor, she came to the shrine of the Dürer-head; stopped, thinking; then took from her bosom a key, unlocked the door, and entered. For a long time she stood, searching the painter's face; his innocent, azure eyes. Then, slowly, she extinguished the tapers, — all except one; which she held uplifted in her hand.

She waited presently for him on the couch of her own sanctum, devising garlands of gratulation with which to crown him. He came, striding rapidly, his face bloody, passing through to another part, almost forgetful of her in the flush and heat of the moment. And she held out wide arms to him. He started into fury: — just so — just so — she had looked before! The action goaded him to a memory so bitter, that he stamped, with the one roar:

‘Woman!’

Caspar’s stamp was like the tramp of a shod bull. The flooring shook. A box of tarsia-work slid with clatter from an inclined plane to the ground; an enamelled chasse; a little hung marble temple fell to fragments; and among the fragments writhed the black-speckled gold of two small serpents, presents from Venice, the great merchantman. He saw and did not crush them with his foot. Raging, he dashed from the room.

But, already, in the corridor, he stopped. Such was the depth and power of his love for her. There was something fatherly in it — she so much younger than he! And this time, at least, she had wished to embrace him — this time she did not dream. The thought somewhat relaxed the tension of his wrath. What had maddened him above all was the shame of it — to his father’s house — to his own son that was to be. A goldsmith of Ungarn’s cub! But still, he would return to her — later on. Only first, the daubed head! The swift smoking-out — as of a pest — of that and every other memory of the bürger from the castle; and then he would see.

With masterful stalk he ascended to the alcove. A sensation of pleasure suffused him when he found it in darkness. He groped on the table; struck light to one of the tapers; raised it to apply the flame to the canvas; and — started so, that his armour rattled.

The picture was already consumed.

He could see the burned edges within the frame where the fire had died. In a flash the whole truth illumined him — the whole brave story of her struggle — self-conquest — sacrifice. He threw down the light, and ran — rapidly ran — toward her room, remembering now, with sudden vividness, the Doric temple of marble. As he fell in, she lay stretched on the couch, with closed eyes, the purple gloom of the lychnoi on her face, an arm overhanging the edge. On the back of her hand, peering near, he discerned a minute piqure....

High in a tower of the donjon sat Caspar of Schwangau. The chamber was a small oval one, ponderously hung with old figured tapestry; and it was hot and bright with a multitude of burning wax tapers; and its air was heavy with the breath of flowers. Flowers were everywhere — rose, and narciss, and lily, and jasmine — sprays of yew, and bitter rosemary, and rue — piled on the floor, heaped high against the tapestry, covering the bed where the body lay. He was alone, and it was late in the night. The door was twice locked. He felt no pain — only a dull, nightmare speculation rode him. A slow, endless inquiry as to Beauty, and the nature of it, infinitely repeating itself in a numbed brain. What was it, what was it, at all? He propped the frown of his brow on his hand, thinking it out. It was an oppressive word to him merely. She knew, but slept. On her waking he would exact from her minute exegesis. Only in some far-away, lotus-choked region of his consciousness did he know her verily dead. Her face was not stern to him — still soft, and white. Her hair underspread her wide to the knees. His anxiety now was that she should look her very loveliest on the bed — he knew that to be a care to her. Twice he had taken from her black head a garland of yellow roses, which he had discarded for another of white, and then for one of red; and then he had yielded to endless doubts, and replaced the yellow. And why roses at all? Why not violets? lilac?

Choice of all lay round him; and one or other, to the ideal eye, was beautifulest, best — but which? She, in her heart, knew exactly. On her waking he would learn without fail. The unnoticed hours of the night passed over him. He sat in shirt and hose, bootless, thinking it out. Every now and again he would rise to readjust something on the quiet bed. Chance, she often said, ‘does nothing’ — one must create Beauty by wise, directed energy of soul. He unstrapped her sandals, deeming her bare feet fittest; and in a few minutes was bent upon replacing them, but stopped, deciding again that it was best so. He rearranged fifty times the folds of her violet robe. Then the room grew so hot that mechanically he opened a narrow casement. A fulgor of watching constellations brooded steadily over the hushed morning hour. The window looked sheer upon the lake. A swan chased his flapping mate over the ruffled surface, with noises. Water and death — wherein lies their intimacy? This was a new question for him. There is a relation. The funeral-train which winds by the sea-shore is ever the saddest of funerals. But how so? Could it be that she — those artist folk — had shrewdness to know the reading of riddles so quaint and dubious? For him it was wholly a hopeless matter.

Wearied to death with the day’s battles, he fell to a nodding sleep on a chair. But with earliest dawn he sprang, the senility quite gone, raving at all things, himself most, and the foul murder he had done. He ran in disorder to the base-court, distraught of eye, stuttering and spluttering through a frantic clarion. Sixty men volunteered to follow him on a fresh sally, remembering the partial success of the day before, thinking his rashness knightly, rather than the demented rage of whom the god destroys. Caspar dissipating a random fury was among the first to fall, done to death by the sword of Fritz. When Swabian help before dawn of the next day at last arrived, the castle was a smoking desolation.

Fritz made a point of saving from the wreck his Madonna of Stephan, which later on somehow found its way to the Cathedral at Cologne. The Raphael cartoons flamed with the rest. It was so that Hohenschwangau was anticipatory of South Kensington; and thus did Albrecht Dürer's washed head, and its burning, become the undoing of a house.

About thirty years later a small new castle seems to have been built near the old site on the heights of the Schwanstein by some other branch of the Swabian ducal family. This was purchased by the late King Maximilian of Bavaria for a sum, I have heard, of about one hundred and fifty florins (fifteen pounds). It was then demolished, and a little yellow so-called 'Schloss' erected in its place. The modern building is decorated throughout with paintings representing the life-turmoil of famed Lohengrin, the Swan-Knight. When the editor passed by it, it was used as the occasional Residenz of the sombre and mysterious Ludwig, and his queen-mother. And to some such end it may still serve.

VAILA

E caddi come l'uome cui sonno piglia. — Dante.

A GOOD many years ago, a young man, student in Paris, I was informally associated with the great Corot, and eye-witnessed by his side several of those cases of mind-malady, in the analysis of which he was a past master. I remember one little girl of the Marais, who, till the age of nine, in no way seemed to differ from her playmates. But one night, lying a-bed, she whispered into her mother's ear: "Maman, can you not hear the sound of the world?" It appears that her recently-begun study of geography had taught her that the earth flies, with an enormous velocity, on an orbit about the sun; and that sound of the world to which she referred was a faint (quite subjective) musical humming, like a shell-murmur, heard in the silence of night, and attributed by her fancy to the song of this high motion. Within six months the excess of lunacy possessed her.

I mentioned the incident to my friend, Haco Harfager, then occupying with me the solitude of an old place in S. Germain, shut in by a shrubbery and high wall from the street. He listened with singular interest, and for a day seemed wrapped in gloom.

Another case which I detailed produced a profound impression upon my friend. A young man, a toy-maker of S. Antoine, suffering from chronic congenital phthisis, attained in the ordinary way his twenty-fifth year. He was frugal, industrious, self-involved. On a winter's evening, returning to his lonely garret, he happened to purchase one of those vehemently factious sheets which circulate by night, like things of darkness, over the Boulevards. This simple act was the herald of his doom. He lay a-bed, and perused the feuille. He had never been a reader; knew little of the greater world, and the deep hum of its travail. But the next night he bought another leaf.

Gradually he acquired interest in politics, the large movements, the roar of life. And this interest grew absorbing. Till late into the night, and every night, he lay poring over the furious mendacity, the turbulent wind, the printed passion. He would awake tired, spitting blood, but intense in spirit — and straightway purchased a morning leaf. His being lent itself to a retrograde evolution. The more his teeth gnashed, the less they ate. He became sloven, irregular at work, turning on his bed through the day. Rags overtook him. As the greater interest, and the vaster tumult, possessed his frail soul, so every lesser interest, tumult, died to him. There came an early day when he no longer cared for his own life; and another day, when his maniac fingers rent the hairs from his head.

As to this man, the great Corot said to me:

“Really, one does not know whether to laugh or weep over such a business. Observe, for one thing, how diversely men are made! Their are minds precisely so sensitive as a cupful of melted silver; every breath will roughen and darken them: and what of the simoon, tornado? And that is not a metaphor hut a simile. For such, this earth — I had almost said this universe — is clearly no fit habitation, but a Machine of Death, a baleful Vast. Too horrible to many is the running shriek of Being — they cannot bear the world. Let each look well to his own little whisk of life, say I, and leave the big fiery Automaton alone. Here in this poor toy-maker you have a case of the ear:

it is only the neurosis, Oxyecoia. Splendid was that Greek myth of the Harpies: by them was this man snatched — or, say, caught by a limb in the wheels of the universe, and so perished. It is quite a grand exit, you know — translation in a chariot of flame. Only remember that the member first involved was the pinna: he bent ear to the howl of Europe, and ended by himself howling.

Can a straw ride composedly on the primeval whirlwinds? Between chaos and our shoes wobbles, I tell you, the thinnest film! I knew a man who had this peculiarity of aural hyperaesthesia: that every sound brought him minute information of the matter causing the sound; that is to say, he had an ear bearing to the normal ear the relation which the spectroscope bears to the telescope. A rod, for instance, of mixed copper and iron impinging, in his hearing, upon a rod of mixed tin and lead, conveyed to him not merely the proportion of each metal in each rod, but some strange knowledge of the essential meaning and spirit, as it were, of copper, of iron, of tin, and of lead. Of course, he went mad; but, beforehand, told me this singular thing: that precisely such a sense as his was, according to his certain intuition, employed by the Supreme Being in his permeation of space to apprehend the nature and movements of mind and matter. And he went on to add that Sin — what we call sin — is only the movement of matter or mind into such places, or in such a way, as to give offence or pain to this delicate diplacosis (so I must call it) of the Creator; so that the ‘Law’ of Revelation became, in his eyes, edicts promulgated by their Maker merely in self-protection from aural pain; and divine punishment for, say murder, nothing more than retaliation for unease caused to the divine aural consciousness by the matter in a particular dirk or bullet lodged, at a particular moment, in a non-intended place! Him, too, I say, did the Harpies whisk aloft.”

My recital of these cases to my friend, Harfager, I have mentioned. I was surprised, not so much at his acute interest — for he was interested in all knowledge — as at the obvious pains which he took to conceal that interest. He hurriedly turned the leaves of a volume, but could not hide his panting nostrils.

From first days when we happened to attend the same seminary in Stockholm, a tacit intimacy had sprung between us. I loved him greatly; that he so loved me I knew. But it was an intimacy not accompanied by many of the usual interchanges of close friendships. Harfager was the shyest, most isolated, insulated, of beings. Though our joint ménage (brought about by a chance meeting at a midnight séance in Paris) had now lasted some months, I knew nothing of his plans, motives. Through the day we pursued our intense readings together, he rapt quite back into the past, I equally engrossed upon the present; late at night we reclined on couches within the vast cave of an old fireplace Louis Onze, and smoked to the dying flame in a silence of wormwood and terebinth. Occasionally a soirée or lecture might draw me from the house; except once, I never understood that Harfager left it. I was, on that occasion, returning home at a point of the Rue St. Honoré where a rush of continuous traffic rattled over the old coarse pavements retained there, when I came suddenly upon him. In this tumult he stood abstracted on the trottoir in a listening attitude, and for a moment seemed not to recognise me when I touched him.

Even as a boy I had discerned in my friend the genuine Noble, the inveterate patrician. One saw that in him. Not at all that his personality gave an impression of any species of loftiness, opulence; on the contrary. He did, however, give an impression of incalculable ancientness. He suggested the last moment of an aeon. No nobleman have I seen who so bore in his wan aspect the assurance of the inevitable aristocrat, the essential prince, whose pale blossom is of yesterday, and will perish to-morrow, but whose root fills the ages. This much I knew of Harfager; also that on one or other of the bleak islands of his patrimony north of Zetland lived his mother and a paternal aunt; that he was somewhat deaf; but liable to transports of pain or delight at variously-combined musical sounds, the creak of a door, the note of a bird. More I cannot say that I then knew.

He was rather below the middle height, and gave some promise of stoutness. His nose rose highly aquiline from that species of forehead called by phrenologists "the musical," that is to say, flanked by temples which incline outward to the cheek-bones, making breadth for the base of the brain; while the direction of the heavy-lidded, faded-blue eyes, and of the eyebrows, was a downward droop from the nose of their outer extremities. He wore a thin chin-beard. But the astonishing feature of his face were the ears: they were nearly circular, very small, and flat, being devoid of that outer volution known as the helix. The two tiny discs of cartilage had always the effect of making me think of the little ancient round shields, without rims, called clipeus and peltè. I came to understand that this was a peculiarity which had subsisted among the members of his race for some centuries. Over the whole white face of my friend was stamped a look of woeful inability, utter gravity of sorrow. One said “Sardanapalus,” frail last of the great line of Nimrod.

After a year I found it necessary to mention to Harfager my intention of leaving Paris. We reclined by night in our accustomed nooks within the fireplace. To my announcement he answered with a merely polite “Indeed!” and continued to gloat upon the flame; but after an hour turned upon me, and said:

“Well, it seems to be a hard and selfish world.”

Truisms uttered with just such an air of new discovery I had occasionally heard from him; but the earnest gaze of eyes, and plaint of voice, and despondency of shaken head, with which he now spoke shocked me to surprise.

“À propos of what?” I asked.

“My friend, do not leave me!”

He spread his arms. His utterance choked.

I learned that he was the object of a devilish malice; that he was the prey of a hellish temptation. That a lure, a becking hand, a lurking lust, which it was the effort of his life to eschew (and to which he was especially liable in solitude), continually enticed him; and that thus it had been almost from the day when, at time age of five, he had been sent by his father from his desolate home in time sea.

And whose was this malice?

He told me his mother’s and aunt’s.

And what was this temptation?

He said it was the temptation to return — to fly with the very frenzy of longing — back to that dim home.

I asked with what motives, and in what particulars, the malice of his mother and aunt manifested itself. He replied that there was, he believed, no specific motive, but only a determined malevolence, involuntary and fated; and that the respect in which it manifested itself was to be found in the multiplied prayers and commands with which, for years, they had importuned him to seek again the far hold of his ancestors.

All this I could in no way comprehend, and plainly said as much. In what consisted this horrible magnetism, and equally horrible peril, of his home? To this question Harfager did not reply, but rose from his seat, disappeared behind the drawn curtains of the hearth, and left the room. He presently returned with a quarto tome bound in hide. It proved to be Hugh Gascoigne's Chronicle of Norse Families, executed in English black-letter. The passage to which he pointed I read as follows:

“Nowe, of thise two brethrene, tholder (the elder), Harold, beying of seemely personage and prowesse, did goe pilgrimage into Danemarke, wher from he repayred againward boom to Hjaltlande (Zetland), and wyth hym fette (fetched) the amiabil Thronda for hyss wyf, which was a doughter of the sank (blood) royall of danemark. And his yonger brothir, Sweyne, that was sad amid debonayre, but far surmounted the other in cunnying, receyued him with all good chere. Butte eftsones (soon after) fel sweyne sick for alle his lust that he hadde of Thronda his brothir's wyfe. And whiles the worthy Harold, with the grenehede (greenness) and foyle of yowthe, ministred a bisy cure aboute the bedde wher Sweyne lay sick, lo, sweyne fastened on him a violent stroke with swerde, and with no lenger taryinge enclosed his hands in bondes, and cast him in the botme of a depe holde.

And by cause harold wold not benumb (deprive) hymself of the gouernance of Thronda his wif, Sweyne cutte off boeth his ere[s], and putte out one of his iyes, and after diverse sike tormentes was preste (ready) to slee (slay) hym. But on a daye, the valiant Harold, breking hys bondes, and embracinge his aduersary, did by the sleight of wrastlyng ouerthrowe him, and escaped. Nat-with- standyng, he foltred whan he came to the Somburgh Hed not ferre (far) fro the Castell, and al-be-it that he was swifte-foote, couth ne farder renne (run) by reson that he was faynte with the longe plag[u]es of hyss brothir. And whiles he ther lay in a sound (swoon) did Sweyne come sle (sly) and softe up on hym, and whan he had striken him with a darte, caste him fro Samburgh Hede in to the See.

“Nat longe hereafterward did the lady Thronda (tho she knew nat the manere of her lordes deth, ne, veryly, yf he was dead or on live) receyve Sweyne in to gree (favour), and with grete gaudying and blowinge of beamous (trumpets) did gon to his bed. And right soo they two wente thennes (thence) to soiourn in ferre partes.

“Now, it befel that sweyne was mynded by a dreme to let bild him a grete maunsion in Hialtland for the hoom-cominge of the ladye Thronda; where for he called to hym a cunnigne Maistre-worckman, and sente him hye (in haste) to england to gather thrals for the bilding of this lusty Houss, but hym-self soiourned wyth his ladye at Rome. Thenne came his worckman to london, but passinge thennes to Hialtland, was drent (drowned) he, and his feers (mates), and his shippe, alle and some. And after two yeres, which was the tyme assygned, Sweyne harfager sente lettres to Hialtlande to vnderstonde how his grete Houss did, for he knew not the drenchyng of the Architecte; and eftsones he receiued answer that the Houss did wel, and was bildinge on the Ile of Vaila; but that ne was the Ile wher-on Sweyne had appoynted the bilding to be; and he was aferd, and here fel doun ded for drede, by cause that, in the lettres, he saw before him the mannere of wrytyng of his brothir Harold. And he sayed in this fourme: ‘Surely Harolde is on lyue (alive), elles (else) ben thise a lettres writ with gostlye hande.’ And he was wo many dayes, seeing that this was a dedely stroke. Ther-after, he took him-selfe back to Hjalt-land to know how the matere was, and ther the old Castell on Somburgh Hede was brek doun to the erthe. Thenn Sweyne was wode-worthe, and cryed, ‘Jhesu mercy, where is al the grete Hous of my faders becomen? allas! thys wycked day of desteynye.’ And one of the peple tolde him that a hoost of worckmen fro fer partes hadde brek it doun. And he sayd:

‘Who hath bidde them?’ but that couth none answer. Thenne he sayd agayn; ‘nis (is not) my brothir harold on-lyne? for I haue biholde his writinge’; and that, to, colde none answer. Soo he wente to Vaila, and saw there a grete Houss stonde, and wharm he looked on hyt, he saye[d]: ‘this, sooth, was y-bild by my brothir Harolde, be he ded, or bee he on-lyue.’ And ther he dwelte, and his ladye, and his sones and hys sones sones vntyl now. For that the Houss is rewthelesse (ruthless) and withoute pite; where-for tis seyed that up on al who dwel there faileth a wycked madncss and a lecherous agonie; and that by waye of the eres doe they drinck the cuppe of the furie of the erelesse Harolde, til the tyme of the Houss bee ended.”

I read the narrative half-aloud, and smiled.

“This, Harfager,” I said, “is very tolerable romance on the part of the good Gascoigne; but has the look of indifferent history.”

“It is, nevertheless, genuine history,” he replied. “You believe that?”

“The house still stands solidly on Vaila.”

“The brothers Sweyn and Harold were literary for their age, I think?”

“No member of my race,” he replied, with, a suspicion of hauteur, “has been illiterate.”

“But, at least, you do not believe that mediaeval ghosts superintend the building of their family mansions?”

“Gascoigne nowhere says that; for to be stabbed is not necessarily to die; nor, if he did say it, would it be true to assert that I have any knowledge on the subject.”

“And what, Harfager, is the nature of that ‘wicked madness,’ that ‘lecherous agonie,’ of which Gascoigne speaks?”

“Do you ask me?” He spread his arms. “What do I know? I know nothing! I was banished from the place at the age of five. Yet the cry of it still reverberates in my soul. And have I not told you of agonies — even within myself — of inherited longing and loathing...”

But, at any rate, I answered, my journey to Heidelberg was just then indispensable. I would compromise by making absence short, and rejoin him quickly, if he would wait a few weeks for me. His moody silence I took to mean consent, and soon afterward left him.

But I was unavoidably detained; and when I returned to our old quarters, found them empty.

Harfager had vanished.

It was only after twelve years that a letter was forwarded me — a rather wild letter, an excessively long one — in the well-remembered hand of my friend. It was dated at Vaila. From the character of the writing I conjectured that it had been penned with furious haste, so that I was all the more astonished at the very trivial nature of the voluminous contents. On the first half page he spoke of our old friendship, and asked if, in memory of that, I would see his mother who was dying; the rest of the epistle, sheet upon sheet, consisted of a tedious analysis of his mother’s genealogical tree, the apparent aim being to prove that she was a genuine Harfager, and a cousin of his father. He then went on to comment on the extreme prolificness of his race, asserting that since the fourteenth century, over four millions of its members had lived and died in various parts of the world; three only of them, he believed, being now left. That determined, the letter ended.

Influenced by this communication, I travelled northward; reached Caithness; passed the stormy Orkneys; reached Lerwick; and from Unst, the most bleak and northerly of the Zetlands, contrived, by dint of bribes to pit the weather-worthiness of a lug-sailed 'sixern' (said to be identical with the 'langschips' of the Vikings) against a flowing sea and a darkly-brooding heaven. The voyage, I was warned, was, at such a time, of some risk. It was the Cimmerian December of those interboreal latitudes. The weather here, they said, though never cold, is hardly ever other than tempestuous. A dense and dank sea-born haze now lay, in spite of vapid breezes, high along the waters enclosing the boat in a vague domed cavern of doleful twilight and sullen swell. The region of the considerable islands was past, and there was a spectral something in the unreal aspect of silent sea and sunless dismalness of sky which produced upon my nerves the impression of a voyage out of nature, a cruise beyond the world. Occasionally, however, we careered past one of those solitary 'skerries,' or sea-stacks, whose craggy sea-walls, cannonaded and disintegrated by the inter-shock of the tidal wave and the torrent currents of the German Ocean, wore, even at some distance, an appearance of frightful ruin and havoc. Three only of these I saw, for before the dim day had well run half its course, sudden blackness of night was upon us, and with it one of those tempests, of which the winter of this semi-polar sea is, throughout, an ever-varying succession. During the haggard and dolorous crepuscule of the next brief day, the rain did not cease; but before darkness had quite supervened, my helmsman, who talked continuously to a mate of seal-maidens, and waterhorses, and grülies, paused to point to a mound of gloomier grey in the weather-bow, which was, he assured me, Vaila.

Vaila, he added, was the centre of quite a system of those rösts (dangerous eddies) and cross-currents, which the action of the tidal wave hurls hurrying with complicated and corroding swirl among the islands; in the neighbourhood of Vaila, said the mariner, they hurtled with more than usual precipitancy, owing to the palisade of lofty sea-crag which barbicaned the place about; approach was, therefore, at all times difficult, and by night fool-hardy. With a running sea, however, we came sufficiently near to discern the mane of surf which bristled high along the beetling coast-wall. Its shock, according to the man's account, had oft-times more than all the efficiency of a bombing of real artillery, slinging tons of rock to heights of several hundred feet upon the main island.

When the sun next feebly climbed above the horizon to totter with marred visage through a wan low segment of funereal murk, we had closely approached the coast; and it was then for the first time that the impression of some spinning motion in the island (born no doubt of the circular movement of the water) was produced upon me. We effected a landing at a small voe, or sea-arm, on the western side; the eastern, though the point of my aim, being, on account of the swell, out of the question for that purpose. Here I found in two feal-thatched skeoes (or sheds), which crouched beneath the shelter of a far over-hanging hill, five or six poor peasant-seamen, whose livelihood no doubt consisted in periodically trading for the necessaries of the great house on the east. Beside these there were no dwellers on Vaila; but with one of them for guide, I soon began the ascent and transit of the island. Through the night in the boat I had been strangely aware of an oppressive booming in the ears, for which even the roar of the sea round all the coast seemed quite insufficient to account. This now, as we advanced, became fearfully intensified, and with it, once more, the unaccountable conviction within me of spinning motions to which I have referred. Vaila I discovered to be a land of hill and precipice, made of fine granite and flaggy gneiss; at about the centre, however, we came upon a high table-land sloping gradually from west to east, and covered by a series of lochs, which sullenly and continuously flowed one into the other. To this chain of sombre, black-gleaming water I could see no terminating shore, and by dint of shouting to my companion, and bending close ear to his answering shout, I came to know that there was no such shore: I say shout, for nothing less could have prevailed over the steady bellowing as of ten thousand bisons, which now resounded on every hand. A certain tremblement, too, of the earth became distinct. In vain did the eye seek in its dreary purview a single trace of tree or shrub; for, as a matter of course, no kind of vegetation, save peat, could brave, even for a day, that perennial agony of the tempest which makes of this turbid and benighted zone its arena. Darkness, an hour after noon, commenced to overshadow us; and it was shortly afterward that my guide, pointing down a precipitous defile near the eastern coast, hurriedly set forth upon the way he had come. I frantically howled a question after him as he went; but at this point the human voice had ceased to be in the faintest degree audible.

Down this defile, with a sinking of the heart, and a most singular feeling of giddiness, I passed.

Having reached the end, I emerged upon a wide ledge which shuddered to the immediate onsets of the sea. But all this portion of the island was, in addition, subject to a sharp continuous ague evidently not due to the heavy ordnance of the ocean. Hugging a point of cliff for steadiness from the wind, I looked forth upon a spectacle of weirdly morne, of dismal wildness.

The opening lines of Hecuba, or some drear district of the Inferno, seemed realized before me. Three black 'skerries,' encompassed by a fantastic series of stacks, crooked as a witch's fore-finger, and giving herbergage to shrill routs of osprey and scart, to seal and walrus, lay at some fathoms' distance; and from its race and rage among them, the sea, in arrogance of white, tumultuous, but inaudible wrath, ramped terrible as an army with banners toward the land. Leaving my place, I staggered some distance to the left: and now, all at once, a vast amphitheatre opened before me, and there burst upon my gaze a panorama of such heart-appalling sublimity, as imagination could never have conceived, nor can now utterly recall.

"A vast amphitheatre" I have said; yet it was rather the shape of a round-Gothic (or Norman) doorway which I beheld. Let the reader picture such a door-frame, nearly a mile in breadth, laid flat upon the ground, the curved portion farthest from the sea; and round it let a perfectly smooth and even wall of rock tower in perpendicular regularity to an altitude not unworthy the vulture's eyrie; and now, down the depth of this Gothic shape, and over all its extent, let bawling oceans dash themselves triumphing in spendthrift cataclysm of emerald and hoary fury, — and the stupor of awe with which I looked, and then the shrinking fear, and then the instinct of instant flight, will find easy comprehension.

This was the thrilling disemboisement of the lochs of Vaila.

And within the arch of this Gothic cataract, volumed in the world of its smoky torment and far-excursive spray, stood a palace of brass... circular in shape... huge in dimension.

The last gleam of the ineffectual day had now almost passed, but I could yet discern, in spite of the perpetual rain-fall which bleakly nimbused it as in a halo of tears, that the building was low in proportion to the vastness of its circumference; that it was roofed with a shallow dome; and that about it ran two serried rows of shuttered Norman windows, the upper row being of smaller size than the lower. Certain indications led me to assume that the house had been built upon a vast natural bed of rock which lay, circular and detached, within the arch of the cataract; but this did not quite emerge above the flood, for the whole ground-area upon which I looked dashed a deep and incense-reeking river to the beachless sea; so that passage would have been impossible, were it not that, from a point near me, a massive bridge, thick with algae, rose above the tide, and led to the mansion. Descending from my ledge, I passed along it, now drenched in spray. As I came nearer, I could see that the house, too, was to half its height more thickly bearded than an old hull with barnacles and every variety of brilliant seaweed; and — what was very surprising that from many points near the top of the brazen wall huge iron chains, slimily barbarous with the trailing tresses of ages, reached out in symmetrical divergent rays to points on the ground hidden by the flood: the fabric had thus the look of a many-anchored ark; but without pausing for minute observation, I pushed forward, and dashing through the smooth circular waterfall which poured all round from the eaves, by one of its many small projecting porches, entered the dwelling.

Darkness now was around me — and sound. I seemed to stand in the very throat of some yelling planet. An infinite sadness descended upon me; I was near to the abandonment of tears. “Here,” I said, “is Kohreb, and the limits of weeping; not elsewhere is the valley of sighing.” The tumult resembled the continuous volleying of many thousands of cannon, mingled with strange crashing and bursting uproars. I passed forward through a succession of halls, and was wondering as to my further course, when a hideous figure, bearing a lamp, stalked rapidly towards me. I shrank aghast. It seemed the skeleton of a tall man, wrapped in a winding-sheet. The glitter of a tiny eye, however, and a sere film of skin over part of the face, quickly reassured me. Of ears, he showed no sign. He was, I afterwards learned, Aith; and the singularity of his appearance was partially explained by his pretence — whether true or false — that he had once suffered burning, almost to the cinder-stage, but had miraculously recovered. With an expression of malignity, and strange excited gestures, he led the way to a chamber on the upper stage, where having struck light to a vesta, he pointed to a spread table and left me.

For a long time I sat in solitude. The earthquake of the mansion was intense; but all sense seemed swallowed up and confounded in the one impression of sound. Water, water, was the world — nightmare on my chest, a horror in my ears, an intolerable tingling on my nerves. The feeling of being infinitely drowned and ruined in the all-obliterating deluge — the impulse to gasp for breath — overwhelmed me. I rose and paced; but suddenly stopped, angry, I scarce knew why, with myself. I had, in fact, found myself walking with a certain hurry, not usual with me, not natural to me. The feeling of giddiness, too, had abnormally increased. I forced myself to stand and take note of the hall. It was of great size, and damp with mists, so that the tattered, but rich, mediaeval furniture seemed lost in its extent: its center was occupied by a broad low marble tomb bearing the name of a Harfager of the fifteenth century; its walls were old brown panels of oak.

Having drearily observed these things, I waited on with an intolerable consciousness of loneliness; but a little after midnight the tapestry parted, and Harfager with hurried stride, approached me.

In twelve years my friend had grown old. He showed, it is true, a tendency to corpulence; yet, to a knowing eye, he was, in reality, tabid, ill-nourished. And his neck protruded from his body; and his lower back had quite the forward curve of age; and his hair floated about his face and shoulders in a disarray of awful whiteness. A chin-beard hung grey to his chest. His attire was a simple robe of bauge, which, as he went, waved aflaunt from his bare and hirsute shins, and he was shod in those soft slippers called rivlins.

Rude Impression of Harfager

To my surprise, he spoke. When I passionately shouted that I could gather no fragment of sound from his moving lips, he clapped both palms to his ears, and thereupon renewed a vehement siege to mine: but again without result. And now, with a seemingly angry fling of the hand, he caught up the taper, and swiftly strode from the chamber.

There was something singularly unnatural in his manner — something which irresistibly reminded me of the skeleton, Aith: an excess of zeal, a fever, a rage, a loudness, an eagerness of walk, a wild extravagance of gesture. His hand constantly dashed the hair-whiffs from his face.

Though his countenance was of the saffron of death, the eyes were turgid and red with blood — heavy-lidded eyes, fixed in a downward and sideward intentness of gaze. He presently returned with a folio of ivory and a stylus of graphite hanging from a cord about his garment.

He rapidly wrote a petition that I would, if not too tired, take part with him in the funeral obsequies of his mother. I shouted assent.

Once more he clapped palms to ears; then wrote: “Do not shout: no whisper in any part of the building is inaudible to me.”

I remembered that, in early life, he had seemed slightly deaf.

We passed together through many apartments, he shading the taper with his hand. This was necessary; for, as I quickly discovered, in no part of the shivering fabric was the air in a state of rest, but seemed for ever commoved by a curious agitation, a faint windiness, like the echo of a storm, which communicated a gentle universal trouble to the tapestries. Everywhere I was confronted with the same past richness, present raggedness of decay. In many of the chambers were old marble tombs; one was a museum piled with bronzes, urns; but broken, imbedded in fungoids, dripping wide with moisture. It was as if the mansion, in ardour of travail, sweated. An odour of decomposition was heavy on the swaying air. With difficulty I followed Harfager through the labyrinth of his headlong passage. Once only he stopped short, and with face madly wild above the glare of the light, heaved up his hand, and uttered a single word. From the shaping of the lips, I conjectured the word, "Hark!"

Presently we entered a very long black hall wherein, on chairs beside a bed near the centre, rested a deep coffin, flanked by a row of tall candlesticks of ebony. It had, I noticed, this singularity, that the foot-piece was absent, so that the soles of the corpse were visible as we approached. I beheld, too, three upright rods secured to the coffin-side, each fitted at its summit with a small silver bell of the kind called morrice pendent from a flexible steel spring. At the head of the bed, Aith, with an appearance of irascibility, stamped to and fro within a small area.

Harfager, having rapidly traversed the apartment to the coffin, deposited the taper upon a stone table near, and stood poring with crazy intentness upon the body. I too, looking, stood. Death so rigorous, Gorgon, I had not seen. The coffin seemed full of tangled grey hair. The lady was, it was clear, of great age, osseous, scimitar-nosed. Her head shook with solemn continuity to the vibration of the house. From each ear trickled a black streamlet; the mouth was ridged with froth.

I observed that over the corpse had been set three thin laminae of polished wood, resembling in position, and shape, the bridge of a violin. Their sides fitted into grooves in the coffin-sides, and their top was of a shape to exactly fit the inclination of the two coffin-lids when closed. One of these laminae passed over the knees of the dead lady; another bridged the abdomen; the third the region of the neck. In each of them was a small circular hole. Across each of the three holes passed vertically a tense cord from the morrice-bell nearest to it; the three holes being thus divided by the three cords into six vertical semicircles. Before I could conjecture the significance of this arrangement, Harfager closed the folding coffin-lid, which in the centre had tiny intervals for the passage of the cords. He then turned the key in the lock, and uttered a word, which I took to be, "Come."

At his summons, Aith, approaching, took hold of the handle at the head; and from the dark recesses of the hall a lady, in black, moved forward. She was very tall, pallid, and of noble aspect. From the curvature of the nose, and her circular ears, I conjectured the lady Swertha, aunt of Harfager. Her eyes were red, but if with weeping I could not determine.

Harfager and I, taking each a handle near the coffin-foot, and the lady bearing before us one of the candlesticks, the procession began. As we came to the doorway, I noticed standing in a corner yet two coffins, inscribed with the names of Harfager and his aunt. We passed at length down a wide-curving stairway to the lower stage; and descending thence still lower by narrow brazen steps, came to a portal of metal, at which the lady, depositing the candlestick, left us.

The chamber of death into which we now bore the coffin had for its outer wall the brazen outer wall of the whole house at a point where this approached nearest the cataract, and must have been deep washed by the infuriate caldron without. The earthquake here was, indeed, intense. On every side the vast extent of surface was piled with coffins, rotted or rotting, ranged upon tiers of wooden shelves. The floor, I was surprised to see, was of brass. From the wide scampering that ensued on our entrance, the place was, it was clear, the abode of hordes of water-rats. As it was inconceivable that these could have corroded a way through sixteen brazen feet, I assumed that some fruitful pair must have found in the house, on its building, an ark from the waters; though even this hypothesis seemed wild. Harfager, however, afterwards confided to me his suspicion, that they had, for some purpose, been placed there by the original architect.

Upon a stone bench in the middle we deposited our burden, whereupon Aith made haste to depart. Harfager then rapidly and repeatedly walked from end to end of the long sepulchre, examining with many an eager stoop and peer, and upward strain, the shelves and their props.

Could he, I was led to wonder, have any doubts as to their security? Damp, indeed, and decay pervaded all. A piece of woodwork which I handled softened into powder between my fingers.

He presently beckoned to me, and with yet one halt and uttered "Hark!" from him, we traversed the house to my chamber. Here, left alone, I paced long about, fretted with a strange vagueness of anger; then, weary, tumbled to a horror of sleep.

In the far interior of the mansion even the bleared day of this land of heaviness never rose upon our settled gloom. I was able however, to regulate my levées by a clock which stood in my chamber. With Harfager, in a startlingly short time, I renewed more than all our former intimacy.

That I should say more, is itself startling, considering that an interval of twelve years stretched between us. But so, in fact, it was; and this was proved by the circumstances that we grew to take, and to pardon, freedoms of expression and manner which, as two persons of more than usual reserve, we had once never dreamed of permitting to ourselves in reference to each other.

Down corridors that vanished either way in darkness and length of perspective remoteness we linked ourselves in perambulations of purposeless urgency. Once he wrote that my step was excruciatingly deliberate. I replied that it was just such a step as fitted my then mood. He wrote:

"You have developed an aptitude to fret." I was profoundly offended, and replied: "There are at least more fingers than one in the universe which that ring will wed.”

Something of the secret of the unhuman sensitiveness of his hearing I quickly surmised. I, too, to my dismay, began, as time passed, to catch hints of loudly-uttered words. The reason might he found, I suggested, in an increased excitability of the auditory nerve, which, if the cataract were absent, the roar of the ocean, and bombast of the incessant tempest about us, would by themselves be sufficient to cause; in which case, his own aural interior must, I said, be inflamed to an exquisite pitch of hyperpyrexial fever. The affection I named to him as the Paracosis Willisii. He frowned dissent, but I, undeterred, callously proceeded to recite the case, occurring within my own experience, of a very deaf lady who could hear the fall of a pin in a rapidly-moving railway-train.* To this he only replied: “Of ignorant persons I am accustomed to consider the mere scientist as the most profoundly ignorant.”

[* Such cases are known, or at least easily comprehensible, to every medical man. The concussion on the deaf nerves is said to be the cause of the acquired sensitiveness. Nor is there any limit to such sensitiveness when the concussion is abnormally increased.]

Yet that he should affect darkness as to the highly morbid condition of his hearing I regarded as simply far-fetched. Himself, indeed, confided to me his own, Aith's, and his aunt's proneness to violent paroxysms of vertigo. I was startled; for I had myself shortly before been twice roused from sleep by sensations of reeling and nausea, and a conviction that the chamber furiously spun with me in a direction from right to left. The impression passed away, and I attributed it, perhaps hastily (though on well-known pathological grounds), to some disturbance in the nerve-endings of the “labyrinth,” or inner ear. In Harfager, however, the conviction of wheeling motions in the house, in the world, attained so horrible a degree of certainly, that its effects sometimes resembled those of lunacy or energumenal possession. Never, he said, was the sensation of giddiness wholly absent; seldom the feeling that he stared with stretched-out arms over the verge of abysmal voids which wildly wooed his half-consenting foot. Once, as we went, he was hurled, as by unseen powers, to the ground; and there for an hour sprawled, cold in a flow of sweat, with distraught bedazzlement and amaze in eyes that watched the racing house. He was constantly racked, moreover, with the consciousness of sounds so very peculiar in their nature, that I could account for them upon no other hypothesis than that of tinnitus highly exaggerated. Through the heaped-up roar, there sometimes visited him, he said, the high lucid warbling of some Orphic bird, from the pitch of whose impassioned madrigals he had the inner consciousness that it came from a far country, was of the whiteness of snow, and crested with a comb of mauve. Else he was aware of accumulated human voices, remotely articulate, contending in volubility, and finally melting into chaotic musical tones. Or, anon, he was stunned by an infinite and imminent crashing, like the huge crackling of a universe of glass about his ears. He said, too, that he could often see, rather than hear, the parti-coloured whorls of a mazy sphere-music deep, deep, within the black dark of the cataract's roar. These impressions, which I ardently protested must be purely entotic, had sometimes upon him a pleasing effect, and long would he stand and listen with raised hand to their seduction; others again inflamed him to the verge of angry madness. I guessed that they were the origin of those irascibly uttered "Harks!" which at intervals of about an hour did not fail to break from him. In this I was wrong: and it was with a thrill of dismay that I shortly came to know the truth.

For, as once we passed together by an iron door on the lower stage, he stopped, and for several minutes stood, listening with an expression most keen and cunning. Presently the cry "Hark!"

escaped him; and he then turned to me, and wrote upon the tablet: "You did not hear?" I had heard nothing but the monotonous roar. He shouted into my ear in accents now audible to me as an echo heard far off in dreams: "You shall see."

He lifted the candlestick; produced from the pocket of his garment a key; unlocked the door.

We entered a chamber, circular, very loftily domed in proportion to its extent, and apparently empty, save that a pair of ladder-steps leaned against its wall. Its flooring was of marble, and in its centre gloomed a pool, resembling the impluvium of Roman atriums, but round in shape; a pool evidently deep, full of an unctuous miasmal water. I was greatly startled by its present aspect; for as the light burned upon its jet-black surface, I could see that this had been quite recently disturbed, in a manner for which the shivering of the house could not account, inasmuch as ripples of slimy ink sullenly rounded from the centre toward its marble brink. I glanced at Harfager for explanation. He signed to me to wait, and for about an hour, with arms in their accustomed fold behind his back, perambulated. At the end of that time he stopped, and standing together by the margin, we gazed into the water. Suddenly his clutch tightened upon my arm, and I saw, not without a thrill of honor, a tiny ball, doubtless of lead, but smeared blood-red by some chymical pigment, fall from the direction of the roof and disappear into the centre of the black depths. It hissed, on contact with the water, a thin puff of vapour.

"In the name of all that is sinister!" I cried, "what thing is this you show me?"

Again he made me a busy and confident sign to wait; snatched then the ladder-steps toward the pool; handed me the taper. I, mounting, held high the flame, and saw hanging from the misty centre of the dome a form — a sphere of tarnished old copper, lengthened out into balloon-shape by a down-looking neck, at the end of which I thought I could discern a tiny orifice. Painted across the bulge was barely visible in faded red characters the hieroglyph:

“harfager-hous: 1389 — 188”

Something — I know not what — of eldritch in the combined aspect of spotted globe, and gloomy pool, and contrivance of hourly hissing ball, gave expedition to my feet as I slipped down the ladder.

“But the meaning?”

“Did you see the writing?”

“Yes. The meaning?”

He wrote: “By comparing Gascoigne with Thrunster, I find that the mansion was built about 1389.”

“But the final figures?”

“After the last 8,” he replied, “there is another figure, nearly, but not quite, obliterated by a tarnish-spot.”

“What figure?”

“It cannot be read, but may be surmised. The year 1888 is now all but passed. It can only be the figure 9.”

“You are horribly depraved in mind!” I cried, flaring into anger. “You assume — you dare to state — in a manner which no mind trained to base its conclusions upon fact could hear with patience.”

“And you, on the other hand, are simply absurd,” he wrote.

“You are not, I presume, ignorant of the common formula of Archimedes by which, the diameter of a sphere being known, its volume may be determined. Now, the diameter of the sphere in the dome there I have ascertained to be four and a half feet; and the diameter of the leaden balls about the third of an inch. Supposing then that 1389 was the year in which the sphere was full of balls, you may readily calculate that not many fellows of the four million and odd which have since dropped at the rate of one an hour are now left within it. It could not, in fact, have contained many more. The fall of balls cannot persist another year. The figure 9 is therefore forced upon us.”

“But you assume, Harfager,” I cried, “most wildly you assume! Believe me, my friend, this is the very wantonness of wickedness! By what algebra of despair do you know that the last date must be such, was intended to be such, as to correspond with the stoppage of the horologe? And, even if so, what is the significance of the whole. It has — it can have — no significance! Was the contriver of this dwelling, of all the gnomes, think you, a being pulsing with omniscience?”

“Do you seek to madden me?” he shouted. Then furiously writing: “I know — I swear that I know — nothing of its significance! But is it not evident to you that the work is a stupendous hour-glass, intended to record the hours not of a day, but of a cycle? and of a cycle of five hundred years?”

“But the whole thing,” I passionately cried, “is a baleful phantasm of our brains! an evil impossibility! How is the fall of the balls regulated? Ah, my friend, you wander — your mind is debauched in this bacchanal of tumult.”

“I have not ascertained,” he replied, “by what internal mechanism, or viscous medium, or spiral coil, dependent no doubt for its action upon the vibration of the house, the balls are retarded in their fall; that is a matter well within the cunning of the mediaeval artisan, the inventor of the watch; but this at least is clear, that one element of their retardation is the minuteness of the aperture through which they have to pass; that this element, by known, though recondite, statical laws, will cease to operate when no more than three balls remain; and that, consequently, the last three will fall at nearly the same moment.”

“In God’s name!” I exclaimed, careless what folly I poured out, “but your mother is dead, Harfager! You dare not deny that there remain but you and the lady Swertha!”

A contemptuous glance was all the reply he then vouchsafed me.

But he confided to me a day or two later that the leaden balls were a constant bane to his ears; that from hour to hour his life was a keen waiting for their fall; that even from his brief slumbers he infallibly startled into wakefulness at each descent; that, in whatever part of the mansion he happened to be, they failed not to find him out with a clamorous and insistent loudness; and that every drop wrung him with a twinge of physical anguish in the inner ear. I was therefore appalled at his declaration that these droppings had now become to him as the life of life; had acquired an intimacy so close with the hue of his mind, that their cessation might even mean for him the shattering of reason. Convulsed, he stood then, face wrapped in arms, leaning against a pillar. The paroxysm past, I asked him if it was out of the question that he should once and for all cast off the fascination of the horologe, and fly with me from the place. He wrote in mysterious reply: “A threefold cord is not easily broken” I started. How threefold? He wrote with bitterest smile: “To be enamoured of pain — to pine after aching — to dote upon Marah — is not that a wicked madness?” I was overwhelmed. Unconsciously he had quoted Gascoigne: a wicked madness! a lecherous agonie! “You have seen the face of my aunt,” he proceeded; “your eyes were dim if you did not there behold an impious calm, the glee of a blasphemous patience, a grin behind her daring smile.” He then spoke of a prospect, at the infinite terror of which his whole nature trembled, yet which sometimes laughed in his heart in the aspect of a maniac hope. It was the prospect of any considerable increase in the volume of sound about him. At that, he said, the brain must totter. On the night of my arrival the noise of my booted tread, and, since then, my occasionally raised voice, had caused him acute unease. To a sensibility such as this, I understood him further to say, the luxury of torture involved in a large sound-increase in his environment was an allurements from which no human strength could turn; and when I expressed my powerlessness even to conceive such an increase, much less the means by which it could be effected, he produced from the archives of the house some annals, kept by the successive heads of his race. From these it appeared that the tempests which continually harried the lonely latitude of Vaila did not fail to give place, at periodic intervals of some years, to one sovereign ouragan — one Sirius among the suns — one ultimate lyssa of elemental atrocity. At such periods the rains descended — and the floods came — even as in the first world-deluge; those rösts, or eddies, which at all times encompassed Vaila, spurning then the bands of lateral space, shrieked themselves aloft into a multitudinous death-dance of water-spouts, and like snaky Deinotheria, or say towering monolithic in a stonehenge of columned and cyclopean awe, thronged about the little land, upon which, with converging débâcle, they discharged their momentous waters; and the loebs to which the cataract was due thus redoubled their volume, and fell with redoubled tumult. It was, said Harfager, like a miracle that for twenty years no such great event had transacted itself at Vaila.

And what, I asked, was the third strand of that threefold cord of which he had spoken? He took me to a circular hall, which, he told me, he had ascertained to be the geometrical centre of the circular mansion. It was a very great hall — so great as I think I never saw — so great that the amount of segment illumined at any one time by the taper seemed nearly flat. And nearly the whole of its space from floor to roof was occupied by a pillar of brass, the space between wall and cylinder being only such as to admit of a stretched-out arm.

“This cylinder, which seems to be solid,” wrote Harfager, “ascends to the dome and passes beyond it; it descends hence to the floor of the lower stage, and passes through that; it descends thence to the brazen flooring of the vaults, and passes through that into the rock of the ground.

Under each floor it spreads out laterally into a vast capital, helping to support the floor. What is the precise quality of the impression which I have made upon your mind by this description?”

“I do not know!” I answered, turning from him; “propound me none of your questions, Harfager. I feel a giddiness...”

“Nevertheless you shall answer me,” he proceeded; “consider the strangeness of that brazen lowest floor, which I have discovered to be some ten feet thick, and whose under-surface, I have reason to believe, is somewhat above the level of the ground; remember that the fabric is at no point fastened to the cylinder; think of the chains that ray out from the outer walls, seeming to anchor the house to the ground. Tell me, what impression have I now made?”

“And is it for this you wait?” I cried— “for this? Yet there may have been no malevolent intention! You jump at conclusions! Any human dwelling, if solidly based upon earth, would be at all times liable to overthrow on such a land, in such a situation, as this, by some superlative tempest! What if it were the intention of the architect that in such eventuality the chains should break, and the house, by yielding, be saved?”

“You have no lack of charity at least,” he replied; and we returned to the book we then read together.

He had not wholly lost the old habit of study, but could no longer constrain himself to sit to read. With a volume, often tossed down and resumed, he walked to and fro within the radius of the lamp-light; or I, unconscious of my voice, read to him. By a strange whim of his mood, the few books which now lay within the limits of his patience had all for their motive something of the picaresque, or the foppishly speculative: Quevedo's Taca — o; or the mundane system of Tycho Brahe; above all, George Hakewill's Power and Providence of God. One day, however, as I read, he interrupted me with the sentence, seemingly à propos of nothing: "What I cannot understand is that you, a scientist, should believe that the physical life ceases with the cessation of the breath" — and from that moment the tone of our reading changed. He led me to the crypts of the library in the lowest part of the building, and hour after hour, with a certain furore of triumph, overwhelmed me with volumes evidencing the longevity of man after "death." A sentence of Haller had rooted itself in his mind; he repeated, insisted upon it: "sapientia denique consilia dat quibus longaevitas obtineri queat, nitro, opio, purgationibus subinde repetitis..."; and as opium was the elixir of long-drawn life, so death itself, he said, was that opium, whose more potent nepenthe lulled the body to a peace not all-insentient, far within the gates of the gardens of dream. From the Dhammapada of the Buddhist canon, to Zwinger's Theatrum, to Bacon's Historia Vitae et Mortis, he ranged to find me heaped-up certainty of his faith. What, he asked, was my opinion of Baron Verulam's account of the dead man who was heard to utter words of prayer; or of the leaping bowels o' the dead condamné? On my expressing incredulity, he seemed surprised, and reminded me of the writhings of dead serpents, of the visible beating of a frog's heart many hours after "death." "She is not dead," he quoted, "but sleepeth." The whim of Bacon and Paracelsus that the principle of life resides in a subtle spirit or fluid which pervades the organism he coerced into elaborate proof that such a spirit must, from its very nature, be incapable of any sudden annihilation, so long as the organs which it permeates remain connected and integral. I asked what limit he then set to the persistence of sensibility in the physical organism. He replied that when slow decay had so far advanced that the nerves could no longer be called nerves, or their cell-origins cell-origins, or the brain a brain — or when by artificial means the brain had for any length of time been disconnected at the cervical region from the body — then was the king of terrors king indeed, and the body was as though it had not been.

With an indiscretion strange to me before my residence at Vaila, I blurted the question whether all this Aberglaube could have any reference, in his mind, to the body of his mother. For a while he stood thoughtful, then wrote: “Had I not reason to believe that my own and my aunt’s life in some way hinged upon the final cessation of hers, I should still have taken precautions to ascertain the progress of the destroyer upon her mortal frame; as it is, I shall not lack even the minutest information.” He then explained that the rodents which swarmed in the sepulchre would, in the course of time, do their full work upon her; but would be unable to penetrate to the region of the throat without first gnawing their way through the three cords stretched across the holes of the laminae within the coffin, and thus, one by one, liberating the three morrisco bells to a tinkling agitation.

The winter solstice had passed; another year opened. I slept a deep sleep by night when Harfager entered my chamber, and shook me. His face was ghastly in the taper-light. A transformation within a few hours had occurred upon him. He was not the same. He resembled some poor wight into whose unexpected eyes — at midnight — have glared the sudden eye-balls of Terror.

He informed me that he was aware of singular intermittent straining and creaking sounds, which gave him the sensation of hanging in aerial spaces by a thread which must shortly snap to his weight. He asked if, for God's sake, I would accompany him to the sepulchre. We passed together through the house, he craven, shivering, his step for the first time laggard. In the chamber of the dead he stole to and fro examining the shelves, furtively intent. His eyes were sunken, his face drawn like death. From the footless coffin of the dowager trembling on its bench of stone, I saw an old water-rat creep. As Harfager passed beneath one of the shortest of the shelves which bore a single coffin, it suddenly fell from a height with its burthen into fragments at his feet. He screamed the cry of a frightened creature, and tottered to my support. I bore him back to the upper house.

He sat with hidden face in the corner of a small room doddering, overcome, as it were, with the extremity of age. He no longer marked with his usual "Hark!" the fall of the leaden drops. To my remonstrances he answered only with the words, So soon! so soon! Whenever I sought I found him there. His manhood had collapsed in an ague of trepidancy. I do not think that during this time he slept.

On the second night, as I approached him, he sprang suddenly straight with the furious outcry:

"The first bell tinkles!"

And he had hardly larynxed the wild words when, from some great distance, a faint wail, which at its origin must have been a most piercing shriek, reached my now feverishly sensitive ears. Harfager at the sound clapped hands to ears, and dashed insensate from his place, I following in hot pursuit through the black breadth of the mansion. We ran until we reached a mound chamber, containing a candelabrum, and arrased in faded red. In an alcove at the furthest circumference was a bed. On the floor lay in swoon the lady Swertha. Her dark-grey hair in disarray wrapped her like an angry sea, and many tufts of it lay scattered wide, torn from the roots. About her throat were livid prints of strangling fingers. We bore her to the bed, and, having discovered some tincture in a cabinet, I administered it between her fixed teeth. In the rapt and dreaming face I saw that death was not, and, as I found something appalling in her aspect, shortly afterwards left her to Harfager.

When I next saw him his manner had assumed a species of change which I can only describe as hideous. It resembled the officious self-importance seen in a person of weak intellect, incapable of affairs, who goads himself with the exhortation, “to business! the time is short — I must even bestir myself!” His walk sickened me with a suggestion of ataxie locomotrice. I asked him as to the lady, as to the meaning of the marks of violence on her body. Bending ear to his deep and unctuous heard, “A stealthy attempt has been made upon her the skeleton, Aith.”

My unfeigned astonishment at this announcement he seemed not to share. To my questions, repeatedly pressed upon him, as to the reason for retaining such a domestic in the house, as to the origin of his service, he could give no lucid answer. Aith, he informed me, had been admitted into the mansion during the period of his own long absence in youth. He knew little of the fact that he was of extraordinary physical strength. Whence he had come, or how, no living being except Swertha had knowledge; and she, it seems, feared, or at least persistently declined, to admit him into the mystery. He added that, as a matter of fact, the lady, from the day of his return to Vaila, had for some reason imposed upon herself a silence upon all subjects, which he had never once known her to break except by an occasional note.

With a curious, irrelevant impressment, with an intensely voluntary, ataxic strenuousness, always with the air of a drunken man constraining himself to ordered action, Harfager now set himself to the ostentatious adjustment of a host of insignificant matters. He collected chronicles and arranged them in order of date. He tied and ticketed bundles of documents. He insisted upon my help in turning the faces of portraits to the wall. He was, however, now constantly interrupted by paroxysms of vertigo; six times in a single day he was hurled to the ground. Blood occasionally gushed from his ears. He complained to me in a voice of piteous wail of the clear luting of a silver piccolo, which did not cease to invite him. As he bent sweating upon his momentous futilities, his hands fluttered like shaken reeds. I noted the movements of his muttering and whimpering lips, the rheum of his far-sunken eyes. The decrepitude of dotage had overtaken his youth.

On a day he cast it utterly off, and was young again. He entered my chamber, roused me from sleep; I saw the mad gaudium in his eyes, heard the wild hiss of his cry in my ear:

“Up! It is sublime. The storm!”

Ah! I had known it — in the spinning nightmare of my sleep. I felt it in the tormented air of the chamber. It had come, then. I saw it lurid by the lamplight on the hell of Harfager’s distorted visage.

I glanced at the face of the clock. It was nine — in the morning. A sardonic glee burst at once into being within me. I sprang from the couch. Harfager, with the naked stalk of some maniac old prophet, had already rapt himself away. I set out in pursuit. A clear deepening was manifest in the quivering of the edifice; sometimes for a second it paused still, as if, breathlessly, to listen.

Occasionally there visited me, as it were, the faint dirge of some far-off lamentation and voice in Ramah; but if this was subjective, or the screaming of the storm, I could not say. Else I heard the distinct note of an organ's peal. The air of the mansion was agitated by a vaguely puffy unease.

About noon I sighted Harfager, lamp in hand, running along a corridor. His feet were bare. As we met he looked at me, but hardly with recognition, and passed by; stopped, however, returned, and howled into my ear the question: "Would you see?" He beckoned before me. I followed to a very small window in the outer wall closed with a slab of iron. As he lifted a latch the metal flew inward with instant impetuosity and swung him far, while a blast of the storm, braying and booming through the aperture with buccal and reboant bravura, caught and pinned me against an angle of the wall. Down the corridor a long crashing bouleversement of pictures and furniture ensued. I nevertheless contrived to push my way, crawling on the belly, to the opening. Hence the sea should have been visible. My senses, however, were met by nothing but a reeling vision of tumbled blackness, and a general impression of the letter O. The sun of Vaila had gone out. In a moment of opportunity our united efforts prevailed to close the slab.

"Come" — he had obtained fresh light, and beckoned before me— "let us see how the dead fare in the midst of the great desolation and dies irae!" Running, we had hardly reached the middle of the stairway, when I was thrilled by the consciousness of a momentous shock, the bass of a dull and far-reverberating thud, which nothing conceivable save the huge simultaneous thumping to the ground of the whole piled mass of the coffins of the sepulchre could have occasioned. I turned to Harfager, and for an instant beheld him, panic flying in his scuttling feet, headlong on the way he had come, with stopped ears and wide mouth. Then, indeed, fear overtook me — a tremor in the midst of the exultant daring of my heart — a thought that now at least I must desert him in his extremity, now work out my own salvation. Yet it was with a most strange hesitancy that I turned to seek him for the last time — a hesitancy which I fully felt to be selfish and diseased. I wandered through the midnight house in search of light, and having happened upon a lamp, proceeded to hunt for Harfager. Several hours passed in this way. It became clear from the state of the atmosphere that the violence about me was being abnormally intensified. Sounds as of distant screams — unreal, like the screamings of spirits — broke now upon my ear. As the time of evening drew on, I began to detect in the vastly augmented baritone of the cataract something new — a shrillness — the whistle of an ecstasy — a malice — the menace of a rabies blind and deaf.

It must have been at about the hour of six that I found Harfager. He sat in an obscure apartment with bowed head, hands on knees. His face was covered with hair, and blood from the ears. The right sleeve of his garment had been rent away in some renewed attempt, as I imagined, to manipulate a window; the slightly-bruised arm hung lank from the shoulder. For some time I stood and watched the mouthing of his mumblings. Now that I had found him I said nothing of departure. Presently he looked sharply up with the cry “Hark!” — then with imperious impatience, “Hark! Hark!” — then with rapturous shout, “The second bell!” And again, in instant sequence upon his cry, there sounded a wail, vague but unmistakably real, through the house. Harfager at the moment dropped reeling with vertigo; but I, snatching a lamp, hastened forth, trembling, but eager. For some time the high wailing continued, either actually, or by reflex action of my ear.

As I ran toward the lady's apartment, I saw, separated from it by the breadth of a corridor, the open door of an armoury, into which I passed, and seized a battle-axe; and, thus armed, was about to enter to her aid, when Aith, with blazing eye, rushed from her chamber by a further door. I raised my weapon, and, shouting, flew forward to fell him; but by some chance the lamp dropped from me, and before I knew aught, the axe leapt from my grasp, myself hurled far backward. There was, however, sufficiency of light from the chamber to show that the skeleton had dashed into a door of the armoury: that near me, by which I had procured the axe, I instantly slammed and locked; and hasting to the other, similarly secured it. Aith was thus a prisoner. I then entered the lady's room. She lay half-way across the bed in the alcove, and to my bent ear loudly croaked the râles of death. A glance at the mangled throat convinced me that her last hours were surely come. I placed her supine upon the bed; curtained her utterly from sight within the loosened festoons of the hangings of black, and inhumanly turned from the fearfulness of her sight. On an escritoire near I saw a note, intended apparently for Harfager: "I mean to defy, and fly. Think not from fear — but for the glow of the Defiance itself. Can you come?" Taking a flame from the candelabrum, I hastily left her to solitude, and the ultimate throes of her agony.

I had passed some distance backward when I was startled by a singular sound — a clash — resembling in timbre the clash of a tambourine, I heard it rather loudly, and that I should now hear it at all, proceeding as it did from a distance, implied the employment of some prodigious energy. I waited, and in two minutes it again broke, and thenceforth at like regular intervals. It had somehow an effect of pain upon me. The conviction grew gradually that Aith had unhung two of the old brazen shields from their pegs; and that, holding them by their handles, and smiting them viciously together, he thus expressed the frenzy which had now overtaken him. I found my way back to Harfager, in whom the very nerve of anguish now seemed to stamp and stalk about the chamber. He bent his head; shook it like a hail-tormented horse; with his deprecating hand brushed and barred from his hearing each recurrent clash of the brazen shields.

“Au, when — when — when—” he hoarsely groaned into my ear, “will that rattle of hell choke in her throat? I will myself, I tell you — with my own hand! — Oh God...” Since the morning his auditory inflammation (as, indeed, my own also) seemed to have heightened in steady proportion with the roaring and screaming chaos round; and the râles of the lady hideously filled for him the measured intervals of the grisly cymbaling of Aith. He presently hurled twinkling fingers into the air, and with wide arms rushed swiftly into the darkness.

And again I sought him, and long again in vain. As the hours passed, and the slow Tartarean day deepened toward its baleful midnight, the cry of the now redoubled cataract, mixed with the throng and majesty of the now climactic tempest, assumed too definite and intentional a shriek to be longer tolerable to any mortal reason. My own mind escaped my governance, and went its way. Here, in the hot-bed of fever, I was fevered; among the children of wrath, was strong with the strength, and weak with the feebleness of delirium. I wandered from chamber to chamber, precipitate, bemused, giddy on the up-buoyance of a joy. “As a man upon whom sleep seizes,” so had I fallen. Even yet, as I approached the region of the armoury, the noisy ecstasies of Aith did not fail to clash faintly upon my ear. Harfager I did not see, for he too, doubtless, roamed a headlong Ahasuerus in the round world of the house. At about midnight, however, observing light shine from a door on the lower stage, I entered and found him there. It was the chamber of the dropping horologe. He half-sat, swaying self-hugged, on the ladder-steps, and stared at the blackness of the pool. The last flicker of the riot of the day seemed dying in his eyes. He cast no glance as I approached. His hands, his bare right arm, were red with new-shed blood; but of this, too, he appeared unconscious. His mouth gaped wide to his pantings. As I looked, he leapt suddenly high, smiting hands, with the yell, “The last bell tinkles!” and galloped forth, a-rave.

He therefore did not see (though he may have understood by hearing) the spectacle which, with cowering awe, I immediately thereupon beheld: for from the horologe there slipped with hiss of vapour a ball into the torpid pool: and while the clock once ticked, another! and while the clock yet ticked, another! and the vapour of the first had not utterly passed, when the vapour of the third, intermingling, floated with it into grey tenuity aloft. Understanding that the sands of the house were run, I, too, flinging maniac arms, rushed from the spot. I was, however, suddenly stopped in my career by the instinct of some stupendous doom emptying its vials upon the mansion; and was quickly made aware, by the musketry of a shrill crackling from aloft, and the imminent downpour of a world of waters, that a water-spout had, wholly or partly, hurled the catastrophe of its broken floods upon us, and crashed ruining through the dome of the building.

At that moment I beheld Harfager running toward me, hands buried in hair. As he flew past, I seized him. “Harfager! save yourself!” I cried— “the very fountains, man, — by the living God, Harfager” — I hissed it into his inmost ear— “the very fountains of the Great Deep....!” Stupid, he glared at me, and passed on his way. I, whisking myself into a room, slammed the door. Here for some time, with smiting knees, I waited; but the impatience of my frenzy urged me, and I again stepped forth. The corridors were everywhere thigh-deep with water. Rags of the storm, irrageous by way of the orifice in the shattered dome, now blustered with hoiden wantonness through the house. My light was at once extinguished; and immediately I was startled by the presence of another light — most ghostly, gloomy, bluish — most soft, yet wild, phosphorescent — which now perfused the whole building. For this I could in no way account. But as I stood in wonder, a gust of greater vehemence romped through the house, and I was instantly conscious of the harsh snap of something near me. There was a minute's breathless pause — and then — quick, quick — ever quicker — came the throb, and the snap, and the pop, in vastly wide circular succession, of the anchoring chains of the mansion before the urgent shoulder of the hurricane.

And again a second of eternal calm — and then — deliberately — its hour came — the ponderous palace moved. My flesh writhed like the glutinous flesh of a serpent. Slowly moved, and stopped: — then was a sweep — and a swirl — and a pause! then a swirl — and a sweep — and a pause! — then steady industry of labour on the monstrous brazen axis, as the husbandman plods by the plough; then increase of zest, assuetude of a fledgeling to the wing — then intensity — then the last light ecstasy of flight. And now, once again, as staggering and plunging I spun, the thought of escape for a moment visited me: but this time I shook an impious fist. “No, but God, no, no,” I cried, “I will no more wander hence, my God! I will even perish with Harfager! Here let me waltzing pass, in this Ball of the Vortices, Anarchie of the Thunders! Did not the great Corot call it translation in a chariot of flame? But this is gaudier than that! redder than that! This is jaunting on the scoriac tempests and reeling bullions of hell! It is baptism in a sun!”

Recollection gropes in a dimmer gloaming as to all that followed. I struggled up the stairway now flowing a steep river, and for a long time ran staggering and plunging, full of wild words, about, amid the downfall of ceilings and the wide ruin of tumbling walls. The air was thick with splashes, the whole roof now, save three rafters, snatched by the wind away. In that blue sepulchral moonlight, the tapestries flapped and trailed wildly out after the flying house like the streaming hair of some ranting fakeer stung gyratory by the gadflies and tarantulas of distraction.

The flooring gradually assumed a slant like the deck of a sailing ship, its covering waters flowing all to accumulation in one direction. At one point, where the largest of the porticoes projected, the mansion began at every revolution to bump with horrid shiverings against some obstruction.

It bumped, and while the lips said one-two-three, it three times bumped again. It was the levity of hugeness! it was the maenadism of mass! Swift — ever swifter, swifter — in ague of urgency, it reeled and raced, every portico a sail to the storm, vexing and wracking its tremendous frame to fragments. I, chancing by the door of a room littered with the débris of a fallen wall, saw through that wan and livid light Harfager sitting on a tomb. A large drum was beside him, upon which, club grasped in bloody hand, he feebly and persistently beat. The velocity of the leaning house had now attained the sleeping stage, that ultimate energy of the spinning-top. Harfager sat, head sunk to chest; suddenly he dashed the hairy wrappings from his face; sprang; stretched horizontal arms; and began to spin — dizzily! — in the same direction as the mansion! — nor less sleep-embathed! — with floating hair, and quivering cheeks, and the starting eye-balls of horror, and tongue that lolled like a panting wolf's from his bawling degenerate mouth. From such a sight I turned with the retching of loathing, and taking to my heels, staggering and plunging, presently found myself on the lower stage opposite a porch. An outer door crashed to my feet, and the breath of the storm smote freshly upon me. An élan, part of madness, more of heavenly sanity, spurred in my brain. I rushed through the doorway, and was tossed far into the limbo without.

The river at once swept me deep-drowned toward the sea. Even here, a momentary shrill din like the splitting asunder of a world reached my ears. It had hardly passed, when my body collided in its course upon one of the basalt piers, thick-cushioned by sea-weed, of the not all-demolished bridge. Nor had I utterly lost consciousness. A clutch freed my head from the surge, and I finally drew and heaved myself to the level of a timber. Hence to the ledge of rock by which I had come, the bridge was intact. I rowed myself feebly on the belly beneath the poundings of the wind. The rain was a steep rushing, like a shimmering of silk, through the air.

Observing the same wild glow about me which had blushed through the broken dome into the mansion, I glanced backward — and saw that the dwelling of the Harfagers was a memory of the past; then upward — and lo, the whole northern sky, to the zenith, burned one tumbled and fickle-undulating ocean of gaudy flames. It was the aurora borealis which, throeing at every aspen instant into rays and columns, cones and obelisks, of vivid vermil and violet and rose, was fairly whiffed and flustered by the storm into a vast silken oriflamme of tresses and swathes and breezes of glamour; whilst, low-bridging the horizon, the flushed beams of ‘the polar light assembled into a changeless boreal corona of bedazzling candor. At the augustness of this great phenomenon I was affected to blessed tears. And with them, the dream broke! — the infatuation passed! — a hand skimmed back from my brain the blind films and media of delusion; and sobbing on my knees, I jerked to heaven the arms of grateful oblation for my surpassing Rephidim, and marvel of deliverance from all the temptation — and the tribulation — and the tragedy — of Vaila.

PREMIER AND MAKER

Give him the Nectar!
Pour out for the Poet,
Hebe, pour free!
Quicken his eyes with celestial dew,
That Styx the detested no more he may view,
And like one of us Gods may conceit him to be,
Thanks, Hebe! I quaff it! Io Paeon! I cry.
The wine of the immortal
Forbids me to die.

— Coleridge (Imitation of Schiller).

My friend, Mr. O'Malley Phipps, is a young man of good principles and ancient family, but one who, owing to his indolent habits, and an incurable weakness for dispensing among the poor munificences wildly disproportionate to his 'means,' seems to live at perpetual loggerheads with Fortuna on the Money Question. It is to his profound, and apparently quite unaffected, contempt for 'public opinion' that I owe permission to publish the following piece. Having lately made a small essay of perceptible, but (as I must think) somewhat crude, genius, he thought fit to despatch a copy thereof to the then Prime Minister, together with the following extraordinary note:

‘My Lord, — I herewith send you a copy of my little book, Life and the Poppy, which, if you can read at all so well as I can write, will not fail to renovate and translate you. I have, my Lord, many designs half peeping within me — hair-tearings, delights — which it may not be so well for England if I do not utter. But I am, my Lord, impecunious— ‘without cattle’; certain aspre-minded persons, exquisitely called ‘gentle,’ having usurped all the lands on which one might feed one’s possible cattle; and these things, my Lord, I have not even the slightest intention of uttering for England (which, as you know, depends upon her Celtic and Celticised population for her great and half- great men), if England do not, to begin with, grant me reasonable ease and leisure for that purpose. If you care, however, to offer me a sine-cure, I might possibly be content to accept it. I have always fancied, my Lord, that between your destiny and mine subsisted some affinity, since the day on which you formally opened the street now known as X — Avenue; that day was my birthday, the 21st of July, which, as you perceive, is the Third Seventh day of the Seventh month; in that street I then resided. This, however, has nothing to do with the case. — I am, my Lord, your sincere,

‘O. O’Malley Phipps.’

A month later, when Mr. Phipps pretends to have quite forgotten the fact of this letter, he received the following reply:

‘Sir, — I am instructed by Lord X — to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th ult., together with a copy of your book, Life and the Poppy.

This work his Lordship now directs me to say he has read with very considerable interest; and if you will be good enough to call at his Lordship's town residence, No. 11A. M — St., W., at 11 A.M. on Wednesday next, the 7th inst., his Lordship will be glad of a few hours' private converse with you.

I am, Sir, Your obdt Serv^t,
E ——— L — , Private Secy'

On Wednesday at 11 A.M., London was black with fog. Mr. Phipps was, however, punctual in presenting himself at the Premier's residence, where, in spite of the menial's surprise at the rather shabby character of his attire, lank hair, four-cornered coif of threadbare velvet, and a general appearance of the mediaeval poor-scholar, he was at once led forward and ushered into an inmost chamber, the centre of a labyrinth, in which, hardly aided by the glow of two tapers made, like Zobeide's, of aloes-wood and ambergris, he could at first discern nothing. He presently perceived, however, that the room was Moorish, full of small tables of woods ivory- inlaid, and liberal with crystal, porcelain, mirrors, stuffs of Mecca, shawls of India, and a profusion of cushions; the tapestries being panelled in coloured velvets embroidered with sentences from the poet Sadi; also that, with an arm leaning on the plush of an ottoman near, and the other held out in greeting, the Premier squatted sartorial at one end of a rug on the floor. His Lordship wore a dressing-gown of crocus satin, widely-cylindrical pantaloons of cerulean silk, slippers which curled high at the toes, and a close gold-wrought cap for calpac and turban. His shaven face, though ruddy, looked not un-Moorish in the dimness. After indicating a similar robe, he motioned Mr. Phipps to occupy the cushion at the other end of the rug, upon which the author accordingly proceeded to deposit himself in like Turkish fashion. Silence reigned. On two tripods of tortoise-shell stood sherbet of orange in ice; and from one of the crystals his Lordship, laying down the stem of his hookah, took occasional lazy sips. Mr. Phipps also, finding a narghil at his elbow, rosily drew through rose-water the smoke of the tobacco of Philippi. No sound was in the room, but the faint stuttering of a distant grate. Presently an Oriental person imported three dishes containing almond patties and two creams of pomegranate, one fennel-yellow, one light pink, freckled each with spices; followed by another with tiny white-china cups of Mocha coffee, yellow-black, boiled with cloves and saffron. The attendants having made a salaam, retired backwards.

No sound was in the room. An hour passed. As a bitter pelican broods solitary on a mid-sea crag at even-fall, so gravity was fathomful in the contemplation of the two: you would have said that, through the closed lids of a death stiff between them, they gazed into the vague orbits of eternity. Once only the premier, looking up, nodded sagely to the maker, a salutation which Mr. Phipps returned in kind. It was only after yet half-an-hour that the minister, as if surging from nirvana, waved high fluctuant the flag of his left eyebrow, and, sighing, said:

‘What can you do?’

‘I can write a shorthand.’

‘What else?’

‘I can write decent Monk-Latin; think in the best Attic Greek.’

‘Proceed.’

‘I can swim in water.’

‘Let not your voice sink in air.’

‘I can read in many sciences, algebras, calculi.’

‘My ear is a hostelry.’

‘I can trample to death a short distance with the toes of an extremely rapid run.’

‘Spurt on.’

‘I can read the Hebrew Scriptures; which, in my case, more or less implies the Arabic, Syriac, Aethiopic, and Samaritan.’

‘My ear cerumenously waters.’

‘I can make women and children obey me.’

‘My ear is a word-perceiving Eye which never shuts in sleep.’

‘I can delight them with whimsies, and histories, and conceited anomalies.’

‘I am swallowed by my middle ear.’

‘I can discourse tolerably on English, Celtic, French, German, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Danish, Anglo-Saxon, old Hoch-Deutsch, old Icelandic, Rabbinical, Basque and Norse literatures.’

‘My ear is an only half-filled museum.’

‘I can ride a horse.’

‘Trot on.’

‘I can make very pretty pictures with black-lead pencil and Chinese white on tinted paper.’

‘My ear is a pit of receptiveness.’

‘I can pick out the ‘The Heavens are Telling’ with my right forefinger on the harpsichord.’

‘Stump on.’

‘I can write a book on the rationale of musical laws, in which I should have three quite new theories to propound; and a relation to demonstrate between the nature of the mind and a new species of rhyme.’

‘Proceed.’

‘I can make a boy to hate vileness; to love culture and goodness.’

‘My ear is a miser’s purse.

‘I can exactly tune an embrace or a conversation to the momentary temperament of a woman: I am of the same height as she at every altitude.’

‘My ear opens like a flower-calyx to the breeze of your mouth.’

‘I can govern this kingdom wisely and humanly.’

‘You?’

‘I here. I can frame a fabric of law upon the foundations of the universe
—’

‘What can you not do?’

‘I cannot spin a top.’

‘Proceed.’

‘I cannot add up rows of figures, nor comprehend the money columns in the newspapers. ‘My ear is a word-trap.’

‘I cannot, in some moods, understand why Odysseus did not abide immortal with Calypso, or at the Aeaeon Isle.’

‘Proceed.’

‘I cannot conceive, though they appear in all the MSS., that Sophocles really wrote the words ‘akestera chalinon’ (the healing bridle): the expression seems complex, Hebraic, for a Greek.’

‘My ear proves the pangs of a longing woman.’

‘I cannot remember the British being who wrote of ‘the haughty Romans and the insolent Greeks’ without an itching energy in my hide-bound ends.’

‘How so?’

‘Because the Greeks were not insolent.’

‘No?’

‘And because, if he had ransacked the lexicons of language, he would have met no adjective half so libellous upon a people with whom to be suave and kind and simple and joyous was religion.’

‘Do not lengthen speech. What else?’

‘I cannot understand how a woman can live from year to year without hearing me. How forlorn that poor man who grows old and never loved me!’

‘Your mouth is an ear-syringe, sedatively expressive of warm jets of language.’

‘I cannot sleep at night.’

‘Is ‘t so! Then there is some affin—’

‘Do not mention it. It becomes too obvious.’

‘When can you sleep?’

‘At noon: when some matter leans upon vigilance.’

‘When else?’

‘At morn: when tappings rhyme reveille.’

‘Proceed.’

‘When summer has me: and falling water droops a red pennant to the breathless sunset.’

‘Persist.’

‘When sermons thump and thunder: so Napoleon slumbered on the battle-field.’

‘You attend divine service?’

‘I have done so a boy.’

‘What distinguished thing have you since achieved?’

‘I have written a Book,’

‘Every one has. I myself.’

‘Not every one: I know two.’

‘What are they?’

‘Novelists.’

‘What restrains them?’

‘Self-respect, and a morbid craving for distinction.’

‘You have achieved what else?’

‘I have sighed at Don Quixote and Le Tartuffe; I have laughed at Cato and Polyeucte.’

‘Proceed.’

‘I have taught a dog to spare a mouse — to reverence and love it.’

‘My ear is the sponge of eloquence.’

‘I have said to broad-faced Jove: ‘Abnormal! Appear now before me, and I will push a spear—’

‘Why did you so speak?’

‘At sunset I had an opaline opium-dream; through the long night I paced, racking remembrance; at daybreak my worn brain grew impious, and I cried: ‘Abnormal! appear now—’

‘He did not appear?’

‘He knows what a pillow is my bosom for his head — and he knew that I had no spear.’

‘You had other weapons.’

‘You cannot attack the immortals with a quill.’

‘The challenge was quixotic. He is Spirit.’

‘Yet, by night, in a lonely upper chamber by the sea, I have seen.’

‘So? And what did you?’

‘I wept. His hair dripped a dew, and his beard, new-drenched with the storms of Saturn. He is more beautiful, I say to you, than a palace of margarita pillowed upon rainbows in mid-air, and from every ranked window there becks a wine-stained concubine of Sibmah. I, shrinking self-loathed from the long kisses of his mouth, sobbed:

‘Oh that I knew how I might bind thee to my posts, and load thee with fetters in my chamber!’ I wept till I was water.’

‘Did you speak?’

‘There was long familiarity of talk. I said: How went it with Sirius last night? And was it well with Aldebaran? Does old Neptune still retch those old belches of hell? or has a moon of Vega, swift-wheeling as the clay, slipped exorbitant of late from the treadled wheel of thy pottering? Which of the tribes of thy pasture lacks forgotten grain of thee this night, and for this whisp of me, too, can it be verily so that thou thinkest? At that he glanced the reproach of Love, and for a moment our hearts burst and flowed together: there was no division between us. He said I was not such a very whisp as I thought, because cubic bulk is nothing at all, and a soul casts a sweller shadow than a planet, the measure of things being the amount of spirit they contain. He told me I was not to trouble about Mr. Matthew Arnold and those people, at heart, most of them, philosophers; because philosophers are always wrong, and all men wrong, except one man only — the Poet! the Music-maker! right he in his errors. He assured me that he is ‘a magnified non-natural man in the clouds’ — and more — and elsewhere; but at least that and there, so that those who have thought so of him were not wrong! The Egyptians symbolised him by the cat, and he said he is that, too — and more; and a lark, and a lion — and more; and Thoth, and Pasht, and Phthah — and Nisroch and Adramalech — and whatsoever shape of Ape, or soaring Hippogriff or sideways-rearing Ram, or crouching Mixoparthenon, our whim can lend to him — and more. He told me then to call him not so much ‘Not-Myself which makes for righteousness,’ as, Abh, and Nurse, and Aītas; for that when a human male, with eyes drowning like some strong swimmer, surnames him so, that soft-soaps and overcomes him; and it is as though one stroked an infinite cat; the universe goes purring for comfort. And many killing things he said of men. He told me that he had noticed with interest my little efforts to produce beautiful things, and that if I persevered in my passion for goodness, I should yet make one little great work of high perfectness, which should be recognised as such, not only by myself and him, but by five other cultivated persons now living; also that he had appointed a place where he would meet with me when I am older, and there open me a secret, by the knowledge of which the mystery involved in certain weird discords of the Harp would cease to be a mystery to me.'

'You are prolix.'

'I am precise.

'You have achieved what else?'

'I have 'invented' three mechanical puzzles for children.'

'Proceed.'

'I have given my last actual and foreseen six-pence to a street-lass for toffee.'

'And dreamed yourself vastly magnificent, no doubt!'

'It was magnificent. It was as grandly dissolute as the economics of Jesus or Shelley. I dreamed it so.'

'The ear is feminine: the mouth is masculine: I lie naked and wanton to your aggressions.'

'I have discovered an altogether novel raison d'être for serpent-worship; also for the serpent being represented by the autochthones as yoked to the car of Demeter and Triptolemus; also that Microbius was quite wrong in thinking the serpent-limbs of the giants typical of their debased emotions.'

'I am like a corn-field bending ears to the wide-whispered breaths of summer.'

'I have discovered that if Mr. Ruskin, and I, and Mr. Gladstone, and you, and Mr. Balfour, and the Harcourt sirship, all died suddenly on the same day, considerable were thereby the disaster to England; but less than the disaster caused by the birth into England of one unhealthy child.'

'My ear is a weighing-machine.'

'I have gone forth to see the world: and I saw the wrong that was done: the hand of the murderer was stained; the harlot glanced behind her; by night intruded the thief. And this, having returned to my chamber, I said: In the period of the universe is a day for every dark, and in the breadth of its paradise a herb for every hurt; but the strong man who, for three running days, oppresses a weak, is an exile from Grace.'

'My ear is the Gothic door of a gloomy hermit's vault, ajar for every pilgrim.'

'I have invented a New Commandment, which, for the next two hundred years I wish to take precedence of all the commands of all the law-givers; for it includes them all, and more.'

'What is it?'

'It is hard to understand now; yet will be understood.'

'But what is it?'

'Thou shalt be a good Citizen.' 'There is no thoroughfare between my ears; all words attempting to pass undergo arrest.'

'I have kissed a lovely Nun.'

'My ear is the belly of vacuity!'

'I have seen three women bathe in a lakelet, and their beauty like a soul was born again in the inverted baptism of the water.'

'You interest me strangely!'

'I perceive it.'

'Tell me! where were you?'

'I was behind the oval copse that lipped the lake.'

'And you peered? You really saw?'

‘I saw.’

‘Did they look like nymphs at Tempe?’

‘They resembled British women.’

‘Tell me! what did they?’

‘The water hissed and spurted. There was hoop-hoop and laughter.’

‘Did they see you?’

‘They sniffed me — on the morning breeze. Have you observed the startled herd of antelopes, instinct wide in their darting eyes?’

‘By the Prophet! — were they ladies?’

‘One was a young viscountess — all, for the moment, were washerwomen.’

‘You are a democrat.’

‘I am a revolutionnaire — a thing it may be ordained that you shall yet be.’

‘You answer everything.’

‘You spoke.’

‘In the multitude of words is folly.’

‘But a close-fitting answer is like a plaster to the broken skin, or stays to the pappy mammae.’

‘You are a revolutionnaire, then. What else?’

‘A philosopher.’

‘Proceed.’

‘A poet.’

‘Persist.’

‘A Puritan Don Juan.’

‘Define ‘Puritan.’’

‘A sane miser.’

‘Define ‘Don Juan.’’

‘A body-genius.’

‘Define ‘genius’ the man.’

‘He is humanity in the kettle-spout: as steam to water to ice, so he to mankind to the brute.’

‘Define ‘genius’ the thing.’

‘Tertiary diplopia of the brain.’

‘Why tertiary?’

‘ ‘All life is disease’ — optic-nerve-obliquity. In the brute it is primary, in mankind secondary, in genius tertiary.’

‘You are what else?’

‘A pantheist.’

‘Define ‘pantheist.’”

‘A believer in God.’

‘You are what else?’

‘A humanist.’

‘Define ‘humanist.’”

‘A Christian.’

‘Define Christianity.’

‘It is the success of the attempt of which modern Gothic art is the woful failure: it is the idealisation of the commonplace.’

‘True; but I fancy trite.’

‘It is the apotheosis of the courtesan: Phryne made a constellation no less than Helen; Nana star-throned amid the galaxies no less than Stella Mans.’

‘You are apt.’

‘I am curiously felicitous.’

‘You are self-opinionated.’

‘To be felicitous is easy. To be curiously felicitous is extremely difficult.’

‘I am also curiously felicitous.’

‘What do you do for a living?’

‘I make works of fine art.’

‘What is a work of fine art?’

‘A self-consciously-wise product of the pure imagination.’

‘What is imagination?’

‘It is Euclid grown Orphic, it is winged Reason, it is the mathematics of fancy.’

‘Explain yourself.’

‘I might have said mathesis: it is fancy grown précieux, purposeful, architectural, nay, self-creative. In this last function it greatly resembles, or is, that divine Essence by which the worlds stood forth; so that a man so engaged may, for the moment, without presumption, call himself God and Elohim.

‘And what is fancy?’

‘The adventure-luck (Abenteuer-Glück) of the touring soul. ‘What else do you?’

‘I make works of gross art.’

‘What is a work of gross art?’

‘A self-consciously-wise product of the observation, more or less assisted by the fancy; or (in some branches of art) of the fancy alone.’

‘Not of the observation alone?’

‘I cannot imagine such a thing ‘self-consciously-wise.’ A blue book is not a work of art.’

‘But when the fancy alone is thus wise, is it not then imagination?’

‘I cannot answer you both shortly and convincingly. But this I will say: I have looked at a work and decided definitely in myself: this is only fancy, not imagination; dream, not apocalypse; and yet it is self-consciously-wise. Gulliver is an instance.’

‘Of the two kinds I need not ask which you consider the highest.’

‘They are not comparable: one is high as height itself: the other no higher than shoe-clouting (which also is high).’

‘The highest is, of course, the hardest.’

‘They are not comparable: one is the hardest of the possible matters upon which the spirit of a man may engage: it is the snatching of flame from the heavenly gods: premiering, for instance, being a trifling business in comparison. The other, to the practised, is, or should be, cheaper than — matches.

‘Do not spread your answers. To distinguish between the two kinds, you should first of all define art in general. Is it definable?’

‘Those moustachio slippers — the gleaming of yonder tapers — are not so cleanly definable.’

‘It is not then a vague something, the precise nature of which nobody (or only a few mysteriously sage persons) quite knows?’

‘Its precise nature has over and over again been well known to everybody then living.’

‘What then is it?’

‘As the etymology of the word betokens, it is simply a ‘fitting-together.’”

‘So if I adjust this stem in my hookah, and thus effect a fitting-together, that is art?’

‘Yes, that is art; if, in doing so, you have, and accomplish, a specific purpose other than smoking.’

‘Well, define it. My ear is a barren old womb.’

‘Art, then, is the production, by elaborate new contrivance, of intended effects upon intended minds.’

‘That is your inclusive-exclusive definition?’

‘It is.’

‘It is short.’

‘It is exhaustive. It swaddles the universe. And it is the Greek radical conception.’

‘The notion of fitting-together is, I presume, contained in your word ‘contrivance’?’

‘Yes. But I apologise for ‘elaborate.’ I do not quite mean what I say. I do not, for example, mean ‘complex.’ By ‘elaborate’ I half mean elaborate and half deliberate. Perhaps ‘laboured’ would be better; yet I somehow prefer ‘elaborate.’”

‘You speak of intended minds.’

‘Yes; for though the scarecrow was a work of art, it is not one for wingless me; Peterborough would affect a Tahitian, or a Tahitian-like Englishman, but not produce the effect intended by the architect; while The Creation would produce no effect at all except a humming bewilderment. So a friend of mine writes tales only for persons who are drunk, and to such his works accordingly give great delight; and I have myself written a piece which no one uninfluenced by the sulphate of morphia could fully appreciate. You know, too, how the highest kind of poetry, the Greek myths for instance, seems simply silly to unpoetical people. So, too, there are passages in Milton and Euripides which, from a certain lack of humour or time-spiritedness, could be poetry to no living person, and yet, I think, are good art: poetry to some of their contemporaries.’

‘You speak of intended effects.’

‘Yes; for a work may produce an admirable effect, yet if not the effect intended by the maker, or if he had no precise intention on planning the work, then the work is clearly not a work of art, but of something else.’

‘Your definition is exclusive: thus we speak of the Physician’s Art, the Art of War.’

‘We speak wrongly. Art is the production of effects upon minds. The steam-engine is not a work of art; but the scarecrow is.’

‘But if a general causes the enemy to think him in one place when he is in another?’

‘That is art — if his contrivance be new.’

‘Or if by his conduct, he strike terror into the foe, or inspire his own troops?’

‘That is art — if his conduct be purposeful of those effects.’

‘Alexander at the Hydaspes annihilated with a wretched army the masses of Porus and his elephants.’

‘Supposing Arrian exact, that was one part art, and nine parts mechanical ingenuity. Jay Gould or Mr. Edison could have done it — or nine parts of it.’

‘You speak of new contrivance.’

‘Yes; for it is clear that, though the inventor of the three-card trick (whatever that be) was a genuine artist, no one would call the second operator by such a name.’

‘But suppose some one now invents a similarly wise new fraud with cards?’

‘He indeed. I do not, of course, mean that the whole paraphernalia of an art-work must be new. The second man who painted a picture was not altogether novel.’

‘What then do you mean?’

‘Only that the chain of thought, starting from a knowledge of the mind to be acted upon, which precedes the execution of the work, must in the main be new; must be not such as has, in the main, been previously welded in one's own or another's mind.'

'And now for fine art and gross art; how are they known?'

'By their effects.'

'Explain.'

'The effect of one is fine; the effects of the other are gross.'

'What are fine effects? what gross?'

'The child on being born, weeps, and laughs, is afraid, scratches himself, and physically lusts. He needs no work to teach him these things. Nor does any such work add at all to his culture. To Fear, Laughter, etc., were temples at Sparta — but not at Athens.'

'Proceed. My ear—'

'The characteristic of a gross work of art is this: that though its contrivance is new, its effects are old. It merely reincites in the man emotions the same as, or similar to, those which arose spontaneously in the child. Broadly speaking, its ultimate effects are muscular, rather than nervous. It never wins the mind into a state it dreamed not of before; into the doing of a thing it did not before.'

'Laughter, tears, horror, lust, etc., you call gross: and yet some of our highest artists, our Dickens, and Thackeray and Zola—'

'Ne me citez pas ces gens-là!' 'You are angry.'

'Two know better. For the third hot knowledge waits.'

'You believe in a Lake — —'

'No. But I believe that a man, or a nation, cannot take a fluent, or haphazard, or vulgar book, and say: I will go lounge and complacently dram-drink this for titillation: it will do me no good: it can work me no harm. In truth, it will work harm. It is ordained that the man, the nation, shall be more fluent, more haphazard, vulgar.'

‘And you think that the person who writes such in large quantities—’

‘Does a big thing!’

σχέτλια έργα!

If there are pains and penalties reserved, they are for him.’

‘But people are not compelled to read—’

‘Yes. Mr. Matthew Arnold, indeed, has told them to read ‘only the best’; and that, as you know, is one of those lucky sayings whose unexpected wisdom does not fail to surprise one the longer one thinks of it: wise — but quite futile: until this other counsel be added: See, somehow, that nothing but the best be written in your nation. For Mr. Arnold might just as well have said: ‘Drink nothing but mountain-lymph,’ to a people upon whom the gin-shop presses omnipresent from birth, for all the world like a law of nature. The people, of course, will not drink mountain- lymph, until you close the shop-doors — with a bang, too, of such crude fanatic violence, that it shall go sounding through the nations, and reach the very throne of Heaven, giving pleasure there. Now, a person who, knowing that there are too many, keeps open an old shop, is, of course, a bad citizen but how of him who opens a new one? he, surely, is a great criminal. And with regard to books, I say this: That you will never persuade Lord Tom and Mr. Dick really to study Dante (who will make them cultured), until you find means to induce, or compel, M. Zola (who makes them fallow) to write — for the love of God — no more. And if I seem to you to speak strongly, it is not that I speak strongly, but that you do not suffer from a weakness of which I, by no effort, can rid myself: the weakness of dearly loving Tom and Dick, and of cordially detesting the foolish or knavish person who, for his own pleasures, does them hurt.’

‘By ‘fluent’ do you mean ‘wordy’?’

‘That, and if there is anything worse, then that: cataclysmic incontinence, salivation, letter- writing literature, pen-talk. The tongue, you know, was made for talking; the pen, on the other hand, is the modern substitute for the graver on stone, and, in literature, should be used with the same agony of curiosity. The Ten Commandments did not, you know, fill many Minerva volumes, for each letter was the work of a day. But how, says Thackeray, do the thoughts, unsuspected before, flow to us when once we take pen in hand! Notice the insolent us. Us, one hopes, meant only self, Dickens, and crew; for being a reader of Greek and Hebrew books, he must have known that some of us know very well what we must say long before we take the pen in hand, and know too that any addition of ‘happy thoughts’ to that will mean the hopeless ruin of our clean undertaking.’

‘But ‘Shabby-genteel People’ is certainly very pleasant rea—’

‘Do not speak in that way. ‘Sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind;’ take that phrase, whoever made it, as a model of good writing, and believe that all art-writing which essentially differs from it is more or less base. Here you have agonised reticence — and with it, ‘opium’ enough, halo, — the few (twelve) words producing a super-abundant impression, expressing, as it were, vastly more than they say. They paint a picture, not for the mind’s-eye, but for the inner mind’s-eye of fantasy; are not really picturesque at all (as I think Coleridge said of Milton), but musical; related, that is, less to the art of painting than to the art of sounds, and so are directed to the mind’s ear; or say again, are not a word-picture but a word-aria. Which of your ‘happy-thought’ men, forgetful of the denunciation against spoken idle words (aimed how much more against written?), but would have whelmed the world with a chapter of vulgar incident and small-talk, or the deluge of half a volume, to produce the complete effect of that one word “Operos”?’

‘But you are severe—’

‘Not, you mean. Have you considered the significance of the fact that not one of the really decent minds of our century, the Carlyles, etc., will have anything to do with prose fine art, ashamed and scared from any species of association with the singular crew who purport to practise it? In consequence of which, the word ‘novelist’ or ‘fictionist’ has now got to carry with it a certain slight social opprobrium, like the words ‘coroner’ ‘butcher,’ ‘lord-mayor,’ ‘policeman;’ so that you, for instance, now think somewhat less of a gentleman after hearing that he is a person of that trade than before hearing. I at least do. Thus have we debased the Holy of Holies; and to such a point brought it with our floods of words. Says Plutarch: We are pleased with perfumes and purple, while dyers and perfumers appear in the light of mean mechanics. And Hosea: Because thou hast rejected knowledge, therefore have I rejected thee that thou be no priest to Me. You know, too, how one at least of the men you have mentioned thought it nothing odd to go about proclaiming, with a species of city-clerk pride, his innocence of — Greek!’

‘But we hardly still consider that inability fatal—’

‘It is, however. Imagine a Christian preacher who had never heard of the Bible! Greek art is, of course, the Bible of artists; in so much that some people could not string a dozen decent English sentences on the same day on which they had not read some sort of Greek writing. So, too, you are a Prime Minister: is it likely that you will effect the supreme in statecraft, if you have not soaked yourself with the supremest done in that line from the beginning? Except indeed you be a man of altogether stupendous intellect.’

‘But I notice you prolix. You are long-winded in your answers.’

‘Not willingly. You force me by your dulness.’

‘Dull me no dulness.’

‘Long-wind me no long-windedness.’

‘Let us proceed. We have now spoken of gross art and its gross effects; what are the fine effects of fine art?’

‘Its effect is always uniform.’

‘You surprise me.’

‘Uniform, I mean, as to genus, not as to species. The genus of the effects produced by two beautiful women is the same; their species different.’

‘What is the uniform genus of its effect?’

‘An effect of Beauty.’

‘This cream of pomegranate appears beautiful to my senses: is my chef then a fine artist in reference to me?’

‘No. The beauty of the custard lacks two qualities which, did it possess them, would prove your chef a fine artist.’

‘So that not any beauty will do for the fine artist? but only a certain special beauty having two invariable qualities?’

‘That is so.’

‘What then are they?’

‘Novelty (or Uniqueness); and Infinity.’

‘Novelty. That then makes yet a difference between the work of gross and of fine art? For whereas the gross is novel in its contrivance, but old in its effects; the fine is novel both in its contrivance, and the species of its effect. Is ‘t so?’

‘You are observant and exact.’

‘Why must the gross be novel in its contrivance?’

‘By definition and three-card illustration: otherwise it were not art.’

‘And now Infinity. What do you mean?’

‘Only that the task of the better kind of artist is not to create ‘new forms of beauty’; but to create new forms of such beauty as shall suggest, in some manner, at some point, were it but for a moment, what includes, and is more than, the allgemein, that is to say, the Infinite.'

'But I do not understand this of Infinity. I am practical. You are vague.'

'Earth is of the same hue as the skies, though a taint of yellow infects her azure to terrestrial green; yet, even so, the sea, you know, regains the celestial chrome. Or say again: Man is but a little lower than the angels; the veil that divides them may, here a little, there a little, be lifted. The hint, then, of every great art-work is this: Homo is, or may be made to suggest, a tremendous fellow — a head higher than his collar! — important to the gods! He looks most absurdly small, but only unbosom your tape and try the shadow of him athwart the abysms. His body is more than raiment, his life is more than breakfast-table Autocracies, genialities! And if you want certain proof of the very high humour that is in him, just cast a glance at this very woof which I, a man, have been weaving here! That, I think, is what the Greek tragedies wanted to say, and said, and could not utterly say.'

'Do you make Fine Art a kind of 'handmaid to religion'?'

'Nonsense. It is religion itself.'

'You consider De Rerum Naturâ and Queen Mab religious?'

'Quite infinitely.'

'Explain yourself.'

'If laborare is orare, how much more is elaborare?'

'I begin to see.'

'Operosa parvus carmina lingo.' — I, little chiel, potter my toilsome songs. Is not that religion? How humble, haughty. Suppose your chef sits him down, and, meekly believing that there dwells in man an infinite spirit, shall so build upon his knowledge of your nature a fabric of deliberate reasoning, that he shall thereby evolve a novel custard, of which you, tricked, shall exclaim: This, of a surety, is none other than own sister to that ambrosia of the heavens, which, if a man eat, he shall never die! then is he a fine artist. Fail not to sinecure him. He has made you a cultured man, he has saved your soul alive.'

'I see. And this, you say, is an effect only to be wrought by imagination.'

'Only so, when it is a genuine art-effect. But it may also be wrought by inspiration.'

'Why may it not be wrought by observation?'

'Because one invariable element of all high beauty is, as has so often been said, a certain divine 'strangeness.' We do not, you know, kiss a hand to the sun at noon: but to the White-One, walking in shining? and to her, because she is queer-eyed, and dishevelled, and lunatic. And the midnight sun again? And that furious world, the sunset? And that most weird aenigma of Mrs. Langtry's charitoblepharous eyes? Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven. Have you observed the very singular character of the landscape in Burne-Jones's 'Looking-glass'? Or those 'Golden Stairs' which never curved on earth?... Now, let it be admitted at once that there is nothing more 'strange' than the commonplace — a sphinx not a whit more than a cat: only, the common-place cannot by any goading be made to seem strange, and since art is the production of seemings, that is why you find all the great art of the ages concerned with sphinxes, and never at all with cats. A cat it certainly is, you know, and not a sphinx, which Thackeray would have set up at the Pyramids; and he would have made a monstrous big one, too, and a very knowing-looking one, to the whiskers; just such a one as he one day chanced to see on some Dowager's lap; so that people would have flocked, crying: 'See now, how like a real cat, and how startling a cat-knower have we with us, subtil to catch in stone the very simper of dowager-cats!' The Egyptians, however, though not themselves the greatest artists, yet immeasurably greater than Thackeray, thought differently, and gave to the world what you know. So you see that he who reports his observations must necessarily report the antithesis of the ‘strange,’ that is to say, the commonplace; and even when his selection of the things reported is most scrupulous and wise, he will fail to produce an impression of true loveliness, since all, or nearly all, his parts being of one genre, his whole cannot be of another.’

‘Why cannot such an effect be wrought by fancy?’

‘Because another invariable element of all high beauty is a certain accuracy, an exact justice of its parts: and this impression can only be produced by a faculty mathematical in its operations — possessing a delicate conscience of error and fitness. A square moon, or Hermes with the beard of Jove, would be still beautiful, but no longer divinely so. In reading Gulliver, people say: ‘This is good, yet had I written it, I had written it different; and better.’ But no one ever studied, the earlier books of the Odyssey without a feeling that they different were they spoiled; they seem, in fact, as minutely just as the intergravitation of the planets, and have all the look of construction by a being half machine, half man, and half — something higher.’

‘He was thus a Homer and a half.’

His third was his ‘better half’: it was that spirit of loveliness to which he was wed.’

‘And this, you say, is an effect only to be wrought by the pure imagination? Yet the Odyssey, at least, undoubtedly contains much that was once ‘commonplace,’ and so must have been partly a work of ‘observation.’”

‘You are wrong. The subject of Art is not Man, but his shadow. Homer makes all his fine artists blind, incapable of contemporary ocular observation; was himself blind. ‘Blind Thamyras, blind Maeonides, and

Teirisias and Phineus, prophets old.’ Similarly every fine artist must be blind; having ‘converted’ eyes,— ‘dead’ or blind to the earthly vulgar, and ‘alive’ or seeing to the heavenly lovely.’

‘But why? The Aphrodite of Praxiteles was a work ‘infinite’ in beauty, producing an intense degree of ‘novel’ rapture upon the ‘intended’ minds:* a product therefore of the pure imagination. Yet the statue stands upon two legs, not upon one nor three. Was not this due to the fact that the artist had ‘observed’ that women in general have two legs?’

[* If I remember right, people ran agape from all over cultured Greece to see this stone. Yet Mr. Ruskin says that there was nothing specially ‘beautiful’ in Greek sculpture, and thence infers that there are people now living lovelier than the loveliest of the Greeks. It would be weird if this were so. But Mr. Ruskin confutes himself when he proceeds to assert that body is only the expression of mind; for if this be true, then an average Greek must have been as much lovelier than the loveliest of moderns, as Euclid or Archimedes (to say nothing of Plato) was more radically cunning than Mr. Ruskin. I say average, for not mind, but body, seems to have been the sphere of their highest development. It is, in fact, almost certain that they were lovelier than they were mental; and everybody, except Dryden, knows that they were mentaler than the mentalest.]

‘But do not the waves yield to the homely sense of a little paraffin?’

‘You seek to puzzle me: that is clear. Better seek to gyve the whirlwind with withes. You cannot, you know, instil into the wild zebra the love of poppy; nor teach the tossing limbs of ocean to swear allegiance to mandrake.’

‘The oil must be genuine mineral; bilge-water will not do. And if you are not wrong as to all this, you are at least wrong-headed. Imagination, from its very nature, is a faculty which does not work in collaboration with another. It is sole. Its attitude is, if anything, one of hostile superiority to nature. Herr God made cold meat, Mrs. Lazenby pickles. I praise both, but give the apple to the lady. But there is one little bit of nature to which imagination pays devoutest homage: the nature, namely, of the mind which it seeks to influence. Now, it is a principle of this mind that in animal-figures it shall perceive the highest beauty when the animal has two legs, not more, nor less. And to the artist's consciousness of this fact, not to his observation that women have two legs, was due the shape of the Aphrodite. Nor must you think this a mere quibble, the result being the same, anyway; for, on the contrary, here you have the very radix of the difference between gross art and fine; and oftentimes the result is far from being the same, anyway; inasmuch as not all things that we see are utterly fit, as is the number of a woman's legs. And if the Creator had made the mistake of giving to her three legs, or, still worse, only one, be sure that Praxiteles, whatever Giotto might have done, would have detected the slip, and given to his Aphrodite two. Nay, even where the arrangement of nature is utterly fit, imagination sometimes does not hesitate, in attacking the mind on some of its sides, to take the law into its own hands, and with victorious masterfulness bid total defiance to nature: thus Homer gave to Odysseus two eyes, but to the Cyclops only one; nor must you think either more triumphant, credible, deep-rooted, than the other. In the relief at Ellora, too, of the beauteous Parvati and Siva, the latter has four arms, not two. And this one gets to feel to be right.'

'But has not George Eliot said something about the duty of the artist to reproduce the world as it stands; to see life 'without opium'?'

'Yes, she seems to have been a lightsome hen, that lady. Imagine Gounod writing a Serenade, Shakespeare a Winter's Tale, Euripides a Hippolytus, without opium! Stockbrokers, you know, see life 'without opium'; doctors, jurymen, prime ministers; and see it, from birth, without opium, because without effort. The artist, sacer vates, or whatever you call him, used to consider himself greater than all these, because to him alone of men was granted force to scale Olympus, to descend even into the dim house of Aides, in order, as if by fire, to come at some little opium: so remotely shy a thing is opium; so difficult to be sure that one has not, after all one's trouble, clutched nothing but the mere thin nauseating ghost of it.'

'You advocate, then, the 'opium-traffic'?'

'Human life were impossible without it. Richly (in places) has it been used by the Arch-Poet in his plan of the world. You know very well what your wife is, what Helen was: a mass of gore and livery carrion — glamoured over with a pink skin. Not that the skin was really pink, or the sky blue, or that there is any sky there: but only pink, and there, and blue to our eyes. Nay, that very skin, I now hear, was full of worms, and little objectionable creatures living at ease, but so cunningly adapted to the opiated eyes of Paris, that sacred Troy has fallen, and to you life becomes possible and even musical. Putrescence, then, if we abolish that too languishing traffic.'

'Imagination, by your suggestions, must be uncommon among men?'

'In England, a reviewing gentleman tells me, there are now published annually hundreds of fiction-works and pictures, which are bad all through; in which, he means, there is not anything richly good (a new product of human industry, I fancy, for the sun to see), and in every one of these, if you look, you will probably find traces of imagination — a certain impotent imagination, unconscious of itself.'

'The faculty is common then?'

'If every man has it not, then nearly every man.'

'What then is precious?'

‘Poetical imagination: imagination so freely, yet fastidiously imaginative, that its product becomes poetical, musical (μουσικός) in its effect. One sort amuses, ‘gives pleasure’ to vulgar people, and refined people in low moods; the other bemuses, gives translation to refined people.’

‘Illustrate yourself.’

‘Contrast Don Quixote with Round the World in Eighty Days; contrast L’Homme Qui Rit with Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde; Astarte Syriaca with Leighton’s Solitude or some one’s Doctor; the Doge’s Palace with the Tour Eiffel!’

‘And that higher imagination is, you say, rare?’

‘It is always rarer than platinum; it is generally rarer than rubidium; it is sometimes as rare as the dodo.’

‘But is not this imagination that you call ‘impotent,’ or ‘non-poetical’ or ‘non-musical’ closely akin to mere unyoked fancy?’

‘You are right. They are, in fact, hardly distinguishable. And yet, by looking into myself, I feel certain they are distinct.’

‘And now tell me: what is the reason of the scarcity, if they are scarce, of these ‘fine effects’ of which you speak among us?’

‘There are many. The age is iron, art-infidel, Assyrian.’*

[* Very curious, in truth, is the resemblance between, say, the modern novel, and the sculptures of Nineveh; nor could any one to whom it was once pointed out fail to notice it; the crude, and revolting (because absolute) fidelity to life in the hinder parts of the winged bulls especially, and the fingers of the kings, is very instructive. Add to the lifelikeness of the bulls the raw instinctive reaction against mere imitation of nature indicated by the incoherent fancy of their wings, and you have the modern novel. It seems, however, that a certain indefinable supremacy of vulgarity was reserved by the ages for the contemporaries of M. Zola.]

‘That is vague.’

‘The Greeks, I have said, were gentle and joyous, and kind. Their hearts were most simple, sensitive, religious. With all their dreadful tragedies, they could not bear a murder on the stage. When Telemachus sneezed (horrid was the hoop-hoop!) Penelope laughed. Only such people are fancy-free: and fancy is the raw material of fine art.’

‘Another.’

‘We, artists and nation, think more of a hundred pound avoir-du-poids, and the gold of Paz and Kharûts, than of an all-wifely adjective, or a wraithly metaphor, or the symmetry of a right tale, or the flight of a continent curve; love money and éclat better than the perfection of beauty.’

The Greeks confessedly loved money and éclat.’

‘That is so. Most corn-eating men. But if you see no world of difference between their love and ours, you are a bad reader, and your instincts are awry.’

‘Another.’

‘Partly, I suppose, owing to the character of our thoughts, the nations have not yet attained to a high degree of physical beauty. From childhood our senses grow hardened to all forms of terrestrial poverties, cruelties, horrors.’

‘Proceed.’

‘The audience of our fine artists is small — few and hardly fit. They work only for a ‘tenth’ — and the only unimportant tenth — of mankind. The mass, who, in the end, might possibly be stern and right critics, do not study such work for two reasons.’

‘What?’

‘They are still too poor; and still too rude.’

‘Do they not read and understand Dickens? Jan van Beers?’

‘But not Tennyson and Rossetti; they appreciate the ‘music-hall’; Beethoven is the buzz-oozing sea-shell to their ear. The Greek proletariat, on the contrary, seems to have appreciated to the full the very highest art.’

“‘Buzz-zoozing’ is beau. It is nicely onomatopoeic without being nonsense, like the ‘shattering’ trumpet. Is it original?’

‘Yes. It deserves a permanent place in the memory of man. But do not suppose that nonsense makes ‘shattering’ less beautiful. Both words are absolute, right. They depend for their production upon faculties far finer and more venerable than those which won Austerlitz, or invented the phonograph. They are more precious than the corals of P’ninim, or the ruby of Sultan Giamschid, or the collars of Mahmood’s—’

‘Let another man praise thee, and not thy own mouth!’

‘But if you want a thing well done, you must do it yourself: you must not leave it to others. For maxim, you see, I wreak you maxim, for parable, parable. Besides, you must not think me weak enough to praise myself: it is Homer that I praise, the poet, the party of God.’

‘Another reason.’

‘Women, now first in history, attack in large numbers high-art subjects. This must degrade not only women, but art.’

‘But! — I strongly differ from you. Why so?’

‘If you are going to differ from me, you should cease your questioning. You cannot suppose that I would wilfully mislead you, and you may well give me credit for knowing the rudimentary facts of a subject, the inner secrets of which I might be supposed to know for certain.’

‘Yet you make two statements: prove them. Why does it degrade woman?’

‘The Maker, in his making, was not often an artist: the sun, quinine, cat’s-meat, for instance, he made not so much for the admiration of the eyes which perceive them as for vastly other reasons. Occasionally, however, he said: Come now, we will do something for the Nerve! And then, the thing produced was so excessively effective, that a danger of lunacy, moon-sickness, overtook the intended beholder. Now, of such kind was our weaving dear, the loaf-giver; the penumbra of this place of shadow; our hint of light; a work of fine art— ‘unique’— ‘infinite.’ Here, certainly, the Artist outdid himself. He blushed shame for his crude tinkering upon the seraphs when he saw completed Woman. So far he overshot, that man found it necessary to veil her glory, to her very face in some countries, lest at her nakedness the world rush into frenzy of admiration; and to this day, if a young man meet a maid in the lanes of spring, broad-faced Jove, where he sits, pondering upon the sum of things, knows what is pending. He smiles. The father of gods and men is not without a sense of humour. He says: ‘That old sex-idea of mine, though far-fetched- seeming at first, has turned out a fine success, after all, and still works. I shall now watch those two into the glades of the forest, and see what shall there grow up.’ Now, this I say: that when woman produces to the utmost this complex fine-art effect upon the world, as does not fail whenever her functioning is pure womanly and intended, then is she at her supremest, fulfilling the law of her being; and that it is pure womanly and intended when it is felt to be so by the intended minds, and when not felt to be so, not so; but if she subtract at all from herself, you get an effect of hair-cutting; and if she add at all to herself, you get an effect of rouge; and it is as though one added to, or subtracted from, the Odyssey — the result, anyway, degradation.’

‘Why does the art of woman degrade art?’

‘Because it can only have the effect of causing the proportion of low-class work to vastly preponderate over the high: always a great calamity when it occurs in a nation.’

‘But that surely is not a final answer. For what reason must their work be low?’

‘Every work of art is a new, self-sure experiment — nothing fundamentally resembling it was yet seen. And this from the very meaning of the word Art. That is to say, art is more inventive than the son of Maia, it is more aggressive than war, than piracy. And women are, by structure, non-aggressive, non-inventive.’

‘That is opinion. You cannot prove it.’

‘Not opinion as to aggressiveness, surely? but aggressiveness is one element of inventiveness: and a thing cannot exist without all its elements. Nor do I even mean that women are never aggressive: for I see daily that they are somewhat so, and Moses would contradict me with one too fearful example: but only that she is not naturally so: that if she step forward alone, she will, by some sure instinct, do it with a certain ataxic gaucherie, as when she throws a stone; that her aggression is transgression. Milton makes our general mother plunge her leg into a deepish vacuum by taking a morning walk alone, I think? Makes her, you know, more aggressive than our general ancestor, goody Adam; but whereas it is she who hits upon the idea of eating the wrong pulp, it is he who invents right clothes. Not rightly aggressive then, not rightly inventive. And I can prove, at any rate, that to this hour a woman has not invented anything — not even the needle, not the distaff, not the pot. And this, if you look into yourself, you will find that you know by instinct. Miriam and ‘all the women’ went out with timbrels and with dances; but we know that the timbrels were the invention of a man; and, if the dances were very good, then the dances.’

‘Sappho and her sapphics?’

Do not refer to that poor lady — she pined for me, and I was long in being born; hence these tears and sapphics. I have a fancy (though one knows little of Sappho) that you would hit nearer the mark if you said crude Emily Brontë, or even narcotic Jane Porter. But every savage knows that the world’s hardest work, its fighting, and ploughing, and prophesying, must be done by men; and we, too, know it, and instinctively decide that women lack force to make good premiers: and if premiers, how much more high artists? And this last fact also we should know, were it not for a radical misconception in our nineteenth-century minds as to the awful venerableness and difficulty of fine art. If you cannot, however long you try, produce so great a poem, or new-musical-thing-made, as ‘Il Penseroso’ or ‘Lewti,’ you may be sure that the reason is that Milton and Coleridge were better premiers than you: for from their very decent flying, you may conclude their admirable running, and their all-surpassing walking. So when I tell you that I cannot spin a top, nor add up figures, I want you to understand that I can spin and add them much better than Lord Tom or Mr. Dick — if I could be persuaded to try. Now this I say of Sappho and her sapphics: that the Almighty has ordained that there shall be one thing impossible for a man, possible for a woman: to gestate, to bear; and, in compensation, one thing impossible for a woman, possible for a man: to beget, create; the outward structure, to the very skull-shape, thigh-bone, being, in each case, an expression of the inner. Of course, you may have mental, as you have physical, hermaphrodites; but the characteristic of such a being is not, you know, that it performs both the male and female functions equally well; but that, on the whole, it performs neither well; being, in truth, a neutrality, or No Thing.’

‘But—’

‘Why, after all, ‘but’ me? You must know that what I say is true; and if you do not know it, read too-didactic Milton and the rest of them; and if you gashly think that you know better than He, then neither will you be persuaded though one rose from the dead.’

‘But do you not then consider that women should be professional persons, doctors, and the like?’

‘That question takes me beyond the sphere of my special knowledge. I am not sure. But does not Mr. Ruskin, who seems to be an expert in ladies, point out that Helen, Circe, etc., were excellent druggists? They did not, indeed, sell their knowledge of drugs, for they were genuine ladies, or loaf-givers; but if you can once get over your objection to a lady of your family selling herself, I should think that women, with their preternatural powers of observation, quick brains, and infallible little peepy wisdom, might make splendid scientists, and discoverers in science. But she cannot beget a child; she cannot make a new thing.’

‘But do not women write excellent novels?’

‘You are right. And the mere fact that so many women write such excellent novels, should be an indication to a waking mind that there is something fearfully and wonderfully wrong with the novel; that it is not, in fact, a true art-form; or, in any case, has long since ceased to be novel, or capable of novelty. The idea of presenting a picture of contemporary life in book-shape, though a good historical or scientific motif, was not at any time, in my opinion, a good art-motif — especially when that contemporary life happened to be the last possibility in the way of hideousness; but, at any rate, the idea once contained this great art-element — that it was new: and that this was its chief merit in the eyes of its inventor and his contemporaries is proved by the name ‘novel,’ which they gave to its product. But when this motif had been used for the second, the tenth time?

Why then, its only merit had vanished, and with it the thing's reason for existence. And as a matter of fact, so base a century as the eighteenth (for you cannot count Belphegor and the like) could not have been expected to produce an art-form at the same time new and good. So that he who would now be both fictionist and fine-artist must revert, like the Norwegian, to the old forms, or begin to cast about him for entirely new forms, or, at least, for characters and incidents of a wholly different kind, very much less life-like — equally alive — very much more artificial, artistic.'

'Unlifelike, and yet alive?'

'It is difficult, because high; but not, of course, impossible. I know a gentleman who is a great writer. He is well-to-do. He does not publish. But he causes to be made four copies of each of his productions, which he distributes to four friends who form his public. His aim in life is to produce five or six short pieces in prose which shall be in no way inferior to any of the works of God; and, in fact, those of his works which I have seen have all the self-assurance and heiterkeit, the coherence and profundity, of works of Nature. (They are inferior, of course, in mere bulk; but bulk is nothing at all: for if the world had been made orange-size, and all else in the universe to correspond, nothing would have been lost.) Now, this is his way: the name of each of his tales is a place-name with the word 'At' prefixed — the name of some conceived environment, or say rather, of some imagined world, which is never really this world, though it purports to be; nor are his characters really men, though they purport to be. They are more unlifelike than Lear, than Oedipus, and as alive, coherent, as Scott's crude Louis, or Plutarch's younger Cato: that is to say, are creations — makings out of nothing: words not wholly meaningless when applied to the operations of a divinely-gifted human spirit which thinks it not robbery to be equal with God. He is, indeed, a disciple of God, and imitates the methods of his Master, but does not copy his work: for why, he says, should that which is once done be twice done? As to the execution of his conceptions, everything is artificial, nice; a sentence, a detail, transposed from one piece to another would spoil both; he has no invariable ‘style’ of his own — and would regard with some contempt a critic who spoke of his ‘style’ — for each tale is written in a different ‘literary manner’ (itself sometimes an invention, or else borrowed from some Greek), the manner of all others, best suited to the hue of that particular world; nay, one part of one piece is written this way, another that: for here he is concise as a précis-writer, there all ordered flowers and fancies, anon he pretends to be bitingly philosophic, and yonder you find him bawling like hell. And the whole is the complete expression and impression of a new mood; that is to say, does what a piece of music does; and is, in fact, a piece of music; apparently as perfect, and certainly as unique, as Mars or Venus, a-singing their diverse ‘angel-songs.’”

‘Another reason.’

‘You cannot conceive how amusingly fast we all work. Olympus quivers with gay, immortal paunches; the very apes and turkey-cocks stutter merriment.’

‘The very apes, you say—’

‘Yes. Agatharcus said: I despatch my pictures without over-travail. Zeuxis replied: If I boast, it shall be of the long-drawn slowness with which I enter upon mine. The better sort of artist, at that time, not at all considering himself called upon to produce the good (which is easy), but to produce the best (which is nearly impossible).’

‘Almost you persuade me.’

‘Do you remember the meaning of the contemptuous Greek word autoschediastes? No? It is a word well worth adoption into English. You should use it in a speech against some one. It means, 'one who speaks or works off-hand; a novice.' Very well; that is what we are. Not trembling eremite fitters-together of things born and pining for approximation, and choicely culled by winged adventure from the four quarters of the searched universe — but happy-go-lucky ones — persons with note-books (of all things) — trusters in the god of chance, and in that epidemic of most cheap appreciation which is now working the moral, artistic, and political hurt of Europe — content, and teaching the world contentment, with the approximate, the passable, and everywhere shooting the thin, plenteous excrement of our dysenteric brains — improvisers — naturists, not artists — autoschediastae.'

'How do you prove all—'

'Consider only: almost any one of our prominent fictionists probably produces more, numbering the words, in a year or two than one of the old fellows in a lifetime; and more in a lifetime than all the Greeks in their added lifetimes. The reason may be, of course, that we possess vastly more brain-power than they. Do you think that is the reason?'

'Ha! ha! ha! no.'

'Ha! ha! ha!'

'Ha! ha! ha!'

'He! he! no — I agree with you — that can hardly be the reason.'

'It seems alarming.'

'It seems like the beginning of the end of something or other.'

'But the Greeks wrote mostly rhythm?'

'And is rhythm then so much harder than prose? You cannot mean that. Its flight indeed is somewhat higher, but remember that they are both flight: for if prose be not flight, then what is it at all? and whyever is it written, except for scientific and news-giving purposes? And have you considered in what lies the special difficulty of rhythm? Milton says it must be ‘simple, sensuous, and in trouble’ (he used the word ‘passionate,’ but meant in trouble, or empressé there being no English ‘passion’ in the Odyssey, or in Milton’s greatest: P. Regained). In a late age, however, it must be a fourth thing, as Milton well knew: it must be solemn or usual, or its effect will be a laugh; but it must also be novel, or it will not be art; and it is in the nice conciliation of these two hostile claims that the difficulty of the architectural part of modern poetry seems to lie. Our poets, I must say, appear to me to err on the side of usualness; on the other hand, in the personage Whitman, potentially one of the greatest of poets, but without cultivated intimacy with literature, and so without any notion of the difficulty of fine art in general and the need of solemnity in particular, you have a man aiming at being a music-maker, and succeeding indeed in being poetical or musical, but not in being a poet or maker at all. Now prose, almost freed from this conflict between solemnity, or usualness, and novelty, is yet all the more burdened with the necessity of being novel: and it is easier to be solemn than to be novel. Moreover, the temptation to fly loosely is always greater in prose, and since there is always pain in resisting temptation, that is an added hardship. But however all that be, it seems to me the merest axiom that the sum-total of a nation’s art should be small in bulk, small and precious. If it is large, then you have a proof that the nation is vulgar; and you have a cause of ever accelerated vulgarity.

‘Do you and your contemporaries call this voluminous work fine art?’

‘I am not sure, but I fancy so. We sometimes even unbosom to the public papers, with exquisite lack of humour and dignity, yet with the darkly mysterious unbendings of hierophants, the precise way in which we do our thaumaturgies. One illustrious, as by some chance I have read, avows that, about to ‘invent’ a work, he sits crouched over a fire, smoking a pipe, ‘for a few hours, thinking hard;' rises then, victory sitting on his brow, crying, 'I have done it!' Can fancy frame you a more droll, yet pathetic figure than that poor carle sitting there, unable to answer the question: why? yet bent, islanded in smoke, with eye stern, hair revert, mindless, yet thinking 'hard,' miraculously believing in his light cube-root of a heart that he is doing 'it'? It, mind you — not something which has been done many times before ad nauseam, and which there is not the slightest necessity to do again, if it be not to fill the illustrious man's own unamiable void places. It cannot, you know, be a very light matter to give a new impression to Mr. Gladstone after his eighty years of art-gluttony: yet that is what 'it' has got to do (or have reasonable hopes of doing), or strictly speaking, it is an 'idle word,' and has no right to appear in a world already piled with the perfect fine art of ages, from Moses to Tennyson; a world, too, in which land longs (or ought to) for the plougher, and leather cries out (or ought to) for the awl of the stitcher.'

'But you are too—'

'Not at all. Sometimes, I am told, a great personage will even fanfare that he is accomplishing more than one undertaking at the same time. I have even heard of three together, six. Now, if Pallas and Apollo do not laugh at that, then, like the fool, I am prepared to say that there is no Pallas and Apollo. A pregnant ecstatic hen, conceiving the notion that the universe perished for lack of tiny eggs, went gashly cackling her resolve to lay, at her next visitation, not one large egg, but six equivalent small ones — and to do that very thing, or die! In the end she did neither. Six putrid spurts, not having any resemblance to small eggs, was the limit assigned by nature to her success.'

'Did not the six monstra sell?'

'I am pretty certain that they sold. But eggs or books are not successful when they sell, but when God knows that they are very good.'

‘I am myself flotsam on the current of that opinion. But what, think you, is the root of all this rank blossoming?’

‘The root is this: the existence of an artist-class who live only or mostly upon the proceeds of their art. I cannot think that in a well-ordered state such an arrangement would be tolerated. At any rate, where, in a crowded age, you have such a class, you get base art.’

‘Can you prove that?’

‘It seems to me so obvious. Men are such, that if you say to a man: ‘Do this, and I will give you fame, and a hundred pound avoir-du-poids,’ he will not do it so well as if you say to him: ‘Do this, and I will give you infamy and death; albeit you will benefit your race.’ And this I say not of your Newtons, great men, of whom it is obvious, but of common Lord Tom and Mr. Dick, if uncorrupted by bad institutions. I mean that a man cannot work divinely well for wages. Precious things must be given away, or sold only for a wreath of wild olives, or something of that sort.’

‘But I notice you apt to substitute opinion for argument. All that is mere —’

‘Proof is easy. For when you have a class living by their art, the question arises: Of what kind must my art be, so that I may live well? And the answer is always uniform: It must be voluminous, and such as to give ‘pleasure.’ The giving of ‘pleasure,’ then, becomes the chief aim of art. Now, it is easy to give ‘pleasure,’ because men and women are so made, that it is, in general, a positive pain for them to sit still and do absolutely nothing; and into the hand of a person so sitting, if you put a straw, a cigarette, a French novel, a mirror, anything that is not hot, it will give ‘pleasure.’ And if you want certain evidence that much of modern art has, in fact, become easy, you have only to consider two things; first, that it is largely photographic, and secondly, that of all trades the photographer’s is by far the easiest to acquire and practise; whereupon the reason of the ‘success’ in, say literature, (the second hardest of the arts) of every foolish young woman, crass and unenchanted, who chooses to take pen in hand, will become clear to you. Where, therefore, is such a class, art becomes easy; and I might go on to show that when it is easy it is necessarily base, but this is perhaps so axiomatic from the very constitution of the world that I need not do so. Where, therefore, is such a class, art is, or rapidly becomes, base; and instead of a noble, Rechabite band of artists, eaten up with a holy, self-forgetful zeal for art, and belief in the possibility of art, you are apt to get a mere chance rabble of little blind mouths, bitterly stale citizens of Clapham and Monte Video, happy yahoos, with hardly more genuine mother-wit, radical ingenuity, and no more genuine cark for the well-being of mankind, than that other rabble which fills your prisons.’

‘But by a principle of weeding-out, and survival of the fittest, do you not always get some few—’

‘Do not repeat that poor old scientific catchword. It is not true. Among individual men, at any rate, the general rule of Nature, so far, seems to be the survival of the unfittest. I cannot understand in what way Paris was fitter than Hector — except ‘fit’ means ‘flexible,’ cartilaginous, and so inorganic, base: yet Hector dies, Paris thrives; Jesus dies, Barabbas thrives; Agis, Gracchus, Cato die, Sulla and Newcastle thrive; Chatterton, Poe, Keats, Byron die, and die scornfully, triumphantly; Monsieur Zola and Mr. H. R. Haggard thrive. That is survival of the fittest after a piquant fashion, I think?’

‘But tell me — how, think you, came that six-work man by his notion that Art is easy? It surely never used to be considered so.’

‘I cannot even guess. The opinion has somehow arisen. Thackeray, you know, in one of his books says that the painter’s business is a ‘delightfully easy' one. In his case the superstition, I fancy, arose from the fact that he found the writer's (and the illustrator's!) craft so unexpectedly easy. Both, however, are hard. On a leaf picked up in the street, I find the following put into the mouth of a primitive artist by Mr. R. Kipling, a well-known writer of this century: 'Take this wisdom for your use, which I learned when deer and moose nightly roared where Paris roars tonight: there are nine and thirty ways of composing tribal lays, and every single one of them is right!' Now, this species of raw optimism, as of a man deep in the wine-cup at midnight, lends itself, one must admit, to very genial jingle in the hand of the writer — if only the mind could resist the suspicion that it is meant not at all for jingle, but for 'wisdom' whereupon it cannot be kept from exclaiming: How! every single one of those thirty-nine ways right? Not one wrong? And Mr. Kipling's fortieth, too? and my forty-first? It needs a scribbler of this century to believe it! I, on the other hand, without having seen any of the forty, am bold to say that not one single one of those forty-one ways is right — or if one right, then only one — the best way, namely — the canonical way — but probably all wrong; it being understood that that way is wrong in art, which, if different, would be better for its purpose, and only that right, which, if different, would be not so good. So that I say: Not easy! as elephantine old Carlyle has it, but 'hard' — even for the most gifted; the world being so made — so framed and fenced about, — that nothing greatly good shall be smuggled into it, from a healthy child, to a Roman race, to a perfect song, without travail most sore — throe on throe — and 'pangs that wrung me till I could have shrieked, but would not."

'Is that your own experience?'

'Do not ask. I wish that I could even split dead on the rack of aspiration — but the cold clay, and the 'burning marl' — alternate Eros, and the opium-dream — But for this at least you may give me credit, that until I do thole such pangs, I shall never permit myself to be deluded, either by myself or others, into the notion that I have done anything worth two perfect pennies. For this advantage I have over delightfully-easy, four-eyed Thackeray: that I have been to the Mint, and there seen that the pennies, anyway, are the product of brisk thumps, headstrong forces; and I have also stood and watched the grinning teeth of a woman's trouble, and there learned how close a thing is genuine Birth in a world not made of soap-suds and New Suppurations, Humours; but of something else. By all which I only mean to say that what we call Art is either toying and trifling, or it is not: if it is (as Thackeray and Herr Nordau, rare twinity, say and illustrate), then it is a shame that strong, two-handed men should spend their parasite lives in practising it; if it is not (as Goethe and his kind say and illustrate), then it must be very difficult indeed, and a thing to be handled only by consecrated hands.'

'But that old Presbyterian idea of being 'called' to a business has now been ousted by the rush of our modern life. You can hardly expect it to survive alone among painters, scribblers and the like?'

'It should, however — because they, surely, and not the bishops, are the oracle of God. If they be silent, indeed, no harm is done, the world being already full of the finest art which their inferior work keeps somebody or other from studying: but if they speak and speak basely, of earth, and not of heaven, then much, or all, as they say in France yonder, is, for the moment, base and earthly. But how if you hear one old artist saying to another not so old: Do not 'waste' all your good 'ideas' upon short pieces: be more 'economical' — draw them out, and make Books of them! In other words, do not consider, with agony of a thousand doubts, knowing that the history of literature somewhat depends upon your decision, what is the ideally right form of drama, lyric, conte, in which to cast your special 'idea' (such as it is — to begin with an ‘idea’ at all being to begin at the wrong easy end); but consider how you may make most pounds and fame by it; or again, do not serve God in your little attempt at writing; serve Mammon! or lastly, if you insist upon serving God, as most decent people do, then do it not with a single eye to his glory, but with a triple eye to your own weighing-machine and soon-dying éclat also. There you have that Presbyterian idea in a somewhat astral state, I fancy.’

‘But have we, then, in your opinion, absolutely no perfect art among us to-day, except—’

‘Do you say perfect?’

‘Yes.’

‘Plenty of that.’

‘Give an example.’

‘A London penny novelette — most Sunday morning sermons — a novel of Zola — a Sardou or Adelphi melodrama — many advertisements—’

‘You surprise me! Can you really mean that these productions are artworks as near perfection as the Odyssey or Oedipus Coloneus?’

‘Nearer perhaps. You must not suppose, because it is easy to write such, that this has any the least relation to their claim to be called either art or the perfection of art. It was not, for instant, difficult to make a scarecrow, which, you know, is perfect art.’

‘What, then, is your test of perfection?’

‘Have you not observed some poor citizen’s advertisement of ‘pink pills for pale people’? That, if it was deliberate, and not merely a ‘happy thought,’ is perfect art. (Notice the suasiveness, epieikeia, then the contrast, then the alliteration, and the combination of these.) Here you have nicest adaptation, fitting-together, between an object and the eyes that see it; in other words, you have an object producing in a high degree the very effect it was intended to produce upon the very minds intended. If upon me and you these things produce no effect but one of sea-sickness, remember that they were not made for me and you. Servant-girls really weep — with the genuine art-frenzy — over the novelette; country-defenders blubber and roar at the melodrama. If, then, they are art at all, I say their perfection is more emphatic and definite than that of Oedipus.’

‘You say, if they are art at all.’

‘I only mean that I am not quite sure whether the ‘contrivance’ — as, for example, the aristocratisation of the characters in the novelette — is ever now sufficiently in the nature of a novel contrivance on the part of the writer to admit of the label ‘art.’ It certainly once was. Loosely speaking, they may still be called art. They are about as novel as Dickens.’

‘But it seems to me — do you not make art nothing more than mere artfulness directed toward a mind?’

‘Quite so — nothing more. It never was anything more. Only, I hope you do not imagine that there is any higher thing possible to man, or angel, or final God, than this ‘mere artfulness.’ By mere artfulness was the earth seated, and, lo, He fastened the Heavens with Artfulness.

Venerable is it to me, even when tellingly exhibited on the low plane of the common thief — and so, too, you remember, it was to the Greek. For mere artfulness, and ever more of it, till I tingle musical with it, rises day and night my prayer to Hermes.’

‘I take it, then, from what you have now said, that the production of genuine and perfect, though gross, art, may be a commonplace every-day affair?’

‘Yes — except in the two highest branches of art, which, when genuine and serious, are never gross.’

‘Which is the highest?’

‘Music.’

‘Why so?’

‘Because it habits the highest aethers.’

‘That is vague.’

‘Because, of the three factors, observation, fancy, imagination, it does not employ the lowest. It is fanciful or imaginative. Its production has no relation to what is called ‘life’ (that is to say, to existing phenomena), except only to the existing nature of the mind which it influences.’

‘And am I to understand that in proportion as the other branches of art cease to be observational — that is, to be in close relation with actual ‘life’ — in that proportion they rise to the height of the highest, or music?’

‘You are shrewd. That is just so.’

‘The art of music, then, you say, is of two kinds — fanciful or imaginative.’

‘I did not say the art of music.’

‘What did you say?’

‘Music.’

‘Explain yourself.’

‘Think of Gounod’s Serenade, and the Symphony in B Flat. If at first both seem to you like the alalabs of archangels, afterwards you feel a difference. One I call the highest imagination disporting itself in the highest element; the other I call fancy. One art; the other not.’

You cannot mean that painful Beethoven was not an artist?’

‘I do mean something like that. The Pythoness, delirious with the waters of Cassotis, was not called by the Greeks an artist. Though her doomings rived her with hell-agonies, yet was she not an artist. Beethoven was a seer — drunk with God. A man who forgets his own name and address is not an artist, but a seraph. Inspiration is, of course, not art. Art is successful aspiration, right reasoning.'

'Which is the highest: this inspired fancy, or the imagination of Gounod?'

'They are both infinitely, and therefore equally, divine. One I call the working of Nature; one of Art. Turner, you know, was not less sublime than the sunset; Hugo than the hurricane. A tall man — on tip-toe — may be near the summit of God.'

'You spoke of the two highest branches of art: which is the next highest?'

'The invention of new dances, times, measures, rhythms.'

'Not a very prosperous art to-day, I think?'

'No. It is in abeyance. It dies at an iron age, as a ditty in the lanced throat. It lately found a fitting winding-sheet in the draperies of the 'serpentine' lime-lit cloud-compeller. It will reappear: and, I think, flourish above all others with the serious advent of a more social society.'

'The next highest.'

'Literature.'

'Proceed.'

'Then architecture, house-decoration, and landscape-disposition.'

'Persist.'

'Then drawing.'

'My ear is holy.'

'Painting.'

'My ear is a watering mouth for the tit-bits of utterance.'

'Sculpture.'

'I lust.'

'Play-acting.'

'I pine.'

‘Dancing.’

‘My ear is Mahlström!'/p>

‘Flirting.’

‘My body bursts into blossom with ears!’

‘Piano-strumming, fiddling, singing, dress, cookery, jugglery, etc.’

‘But! — what of Oratory?’

‘Forgive me for seeming to forget you.’

‘For seeming?’

‘I only seemed. Oratory is a grosser literature, its pen flabby, its eye haliotoid. When at its best, its ultimate effects generally consist in the muscular actions of blowing the nose, or clapping the hands. Yet great, as you well know, is its power. So goody Cicero made Caesar change a lachrymose mind.’

‘But state-craft is surely an art?’

‘When its effects are directly mental, and are intended to be what they prove. It then comes under the head of flirting or jugglery; as does war, swindling,* etc.’

[* It is, of course, highly illustrative of the Greek radical view of Art that Hermes, the first of artists, was also the prince of swindlers. There is also an Altheof (All-thief!) in Scandinavian mythology: but I do not know what his significance was. There may be some significance, however, in the fact that Jubal-Cain was the grandson of Cain, the inventor of sudden death in other people.]

‘You include acting. Has that not been called into question?’

‘Only by persons who have forgotten, or never knew, what art is.’

‘Prove your position.’

‘The mere fact that the same drama performed by two different companies will produce, not different effects indeed, but different intensities and tones of the same effect, should be sufficient to show that the actor has room for ‘elaborate new contrivance,’ and so may be an artist.’

‘The general effect is never, then, a new effect of the actor’s own?’

‘No.’

‘His is therefore a gross art.’

‘That, at least, goes without saying. He is fettered on every hand to the already existing facts of ‘life’: to the written play, the appropriate costume, the whole properties and paraphernalia of the stage. His work must be more or less ‘observational.’ It can never be so imaginative as to be musical.’

‘Yet the acted drama undoubtedly produces ‘fine’ effects.’

‘They are, in every case, the effects of the play-architect; not of the play-actor.’

‘You are sure of that?’

‘I could give you a hundred reasons why it must be so, if I had time. If you, a cultured person, read OEdipus or Sardanapalus, and then see it acted, this is what will happen to you: the work will enormously gain in vividness, but somewhat lose in ethereal fineness of effect. If you see A Winter’s Tale, you weep more, laugh more — but sigh less, smile less. For this loss of musicalness the corporeal actor is responsible. So far is his art from being ‘fine.’”

‘You speak of his work being more or less observational.’

‘I only mean that he need not be a mere lens for photographing life, if original-minded: that the stage does afford him scope — though little — for doing something higher than holding a mirror up to nature; and that in proportion as he faithfully holds this mirror, so his art becomes more and more gross, if more and more vivid. When he holds it to perfection, he ceases, of course, to be an artist, and the dramatist is all in all.’

‘That is hardly Shakespeare’s view.’

‘Powerful, uneducated people sometimes feel grandly, but never think exactly. Now, Shakespeare, rude-thinking, and not himself an artist, might be depended upon to go wrong on the theory of such a subject (just as he might be depended upon to go instinctively right in the practice of it). That he differed from me may therefore be taken as a rough proof that I am right. A mirror-holder is not an artist, but a mirror-holder. A blue-book is not an artwork.’

‘You ban boldly.’

‘Not boldly. Whoever supposes him an artist must have strange notions of word-meanings. Words, of course, have fixed meanings, which no amount of loose talk can alter. Will did not think that of himself. The nightingale is not an artist. Art is self-conscious; Will was luxuriously self-unconscious. He was a jolly, many-gifted fellow, full of high musics and instincts; resembling Beethoven. Goethe has partly shown how an artist would have constructed Hamlet. What Will showed was his real divinity in coasting, with sails filled by the voluntary afflatus of the heavens, so tremulously near the ideal artistic, without the careful oars of art.’

‘The danseuse, too, you make a gross artist.’

‘As genuine as the actor; but grosser; and gross for the same reasons.’

‘The daughter of Herodias, dancing, did so exalt the mind of Herod, that she seduced him to the sublimity of an oath. She, surely, was a fine artist?’

‘Yes — if she invented her own dance. So is the wise actor if he writes his own fine drama; or the wise violinist if he writes his own fine music. If, on the contrary, her synthesis of motion was the invention of another, then what she really did was this: by her wise and novel presentment of the inventor’s thought, she so incited an animal animation in the spectator — not a novel effect, you observe, but one already well known to Herod — that she thus became the means, in the end, of laying his whole being with the ethereal, and infinite, and novel effect intended by the inventor — an effect which culminated in the outburst of the oath.’

‘You are very prolix. Suppose the dance was impromptu?’

‘In that case there was no ‘deliberate contrivance,’ and no art, gross or fine. The sylphs and the graces are not artists.’

‘I now clearly know all you think about art?’

‘You know little that I think. You gather shells on the sea-shore.’

‘I know something: I know that you make your living by gross art and fine art: and what these are. How else?’

‘I ‘invent’ things.’

‘What?’

‘Puzzles, toys, and witty articles.’

‘What have you thereby gained?’

‘Fifteen shillings.’

‘What have you spent on patents, etc?’

‘Forty-five pounds.’

‘You have lost then?’

‘You are a budget-man: the problem is not insoluble to meditation.’

‘What else?’

‘I prosecute people civilly.’

‘Proceed.’

‘I pawn Paphian pipes — for the sake of the alliteration.’

‘Persist.’

‘I act as shorthand writer and messenger-boy to myself; receiving a weekly stipend from myself.’

‘Are you regularly paid?’

‘Payments are in arrear.’

‘You do not prosecute yourself civilly?’

‘To prosecute Vacuity is to plunge into the Infinite: I am willing, but gravitation restrains me.’

‘What else?’

‘I write magazine simplicities.’

‘Your words are honeybees; my ear their waxy cell.’

‘I keep a staff of rich wedded sisters.’

‘My ear resembles them, for like a staff, it understands you.’

‘I milk a maiden aunt.’

‘That is impossible.’

‘She yields a catarrh: I milk her ‘through the nose.’”

‘Proceed.’

‘I beg.’

‘Persist.’

‘I borrow.’

‘You do not steal?’

‘I have stolen.’

‘How often?’

‘Thrice.’

‘How much?’

‘Two cigars, and a threepenny bit.’

‘What for?’

‘The cigars to smoke; the bit to buy a war-ship.’

‘Who were your victims?’

‘My father as to the cigars; my mother as to the bit.’

‘You were young.’

‘No. I was six.’

‘You speak willingly of children. You are fond of them?’

‘I am myself a child. Everything that is simplex and azure I love.’

‘What else?’

‘A sick dog.’

‘Proceed.’

‘The solitude of a grey cave by the seashore.’

‘My ear is a harbour-basin for the fleets of Yourmouth.’

‘A tall ship, nothing but a wide-winged whiteness: and, as the blue-eyed beck and nod elusive so she, lenient, trips and fawns and curtsies to the offing-breeze.’

‘You delight in the salt-water?’

‘My father was a ship-owner. We dwelt on the summit of an island. He went often down from us. Nothing restrained him to the land. When he rarely returned, we said: He is come! One meeting another a-crag or a-field, said: How droll! he is here and you did not know it. Simple he was, sensuous too, passionate enough. Ocean heaved and billowed in his brain. If it lightened, he was sublime. If thunder cracked brittling through the heaven of heavens, battle-joy it was to drink the rich brool of his challenging cry. God was his turbulent friend. The full hurricane made him Prometheus.’

‘He is dead?’

‘Yes — he fell a victim to the choragic exigencies of heaven.’

‘You love what else?’

‘Anything that is drowning.’

‘Proceed.’

‘A young virgin.’

‘Persist.’

‘An old man.’

‘These above all?’

‘Yes.’

‘Why so?’

‘A young virgin, unlike the grown woman, or the boy, is quite whole and untarnished. An old man wonderfully knows. He has seen man and God. Do not suppose that tsar or shah is half so reverend as he. He is on the brink of promotion in the ranks of being. Much is not secret to him.’

‘You have known some?’

‘I knew one. She was six. She came to my bedside in the early morning, bearing a message of illness. I had not seen her before. She stood, winter-gloved, wonderfully stout and neat. I said: Who are you? She replied: A little girl. I said: Where lurks the cabala of your surety? Her hung head simpered infinite things.’

‘You smiled?’

‘I comprehended the world.’

‘Another.’

‘I knew another. He was ninety-five. Every Tuesday he received two shillings from the ‘Parish.’ He said: Is this relief-day? I replied: No — it is Saturday. He said: Well, really, I don’t know how the Time is going; and spread his hands.’

‘You smiled?’

‘I grovelled and kissed his feet.’

‘He is dead?’

‘They took him away to the workhouse: the same day he died.’

‘You wept?’

‘I laughed.’

‘Another.’

‘Another translated Horace at eighty-six.’

‘That was great.’

‘It was sweet. It had upon me the effect of perfect fine art.’

‘What, the translation?’

‘No: the translation was even poorer than the original so often is; but the knowledge that he translated.’

‘Another.’

‘Another — but time wears.’

‘Will you go?’

‘I must go.’

‘I like you.’

‘You love me.’

‘You are Celtic, yet Greek; you are proud, yet meek; you are human, yet unique.’

‘Therein have you kneaded what is rare: a dough of both rhyme and reason.

‘What sins do you commit?’

‘No sins.’

‘You are perfect?’

‘Yes. I may have coveted a neighbour’s wife, or daughter, or maid-servant.’

‘But for that you would be perfect?’

‘I am perfect in spite of that! The under-will is crystal! Argon is not so negative and simple. Strike me, and your tympanum shall tingle you testimony of a flawless gold. If I do a wrong, Jove reconsiders himself: he says: Well, the thing was right after all, for he, the poet, in his purity, has done it. Every time I find myself, and man, Well Makered.’

‘Well, I say that I like you.’

‘If you do not love me, it is that you do not understand me.’

‘You shall be my private secretary.’

‘The post is filled.’

‘The filler shall filer.’

‘I dread his fillips.’

‘What sort of fillips?’

‘His lipic fillips.’

‘Define ‘lipic fillip.’”

‘A Philippic.’

‘But you accept?’

‘I am unused to steady labour.’

‘To what are you used?’

‘Like Cato and Epictetus I permit myself to grow wedded to nothing — least of all to steady labour.’

‘The work shall be made erratic.’

‘I may nibble at it.’

‘You shall! You shall banquet at my table! You shall wed my daughter, Florrie!’

‘I have said that, like Cato and Epictetus, I permit myself to grow wedded to nothing — least of all to steady—’

‘Yet to my daughter, Florrie, shall you grow wedded!’

‘Is she lovely?’

‘She resembles me.’

‘Well — but how old is Florrie?’

‘Seventeen.’

‘That is too old for me.’

‘You shall have Alexandrovna.’

‘How old?’

‘Fifteen.’

‘Let the nuptials be hastened, then. Farewell.’

‘But you will come to-morrow?’

‘I cannot subsist on cream of pomegranate. I must go write simplicities for my living: must work. I am not in the Cabinet.’

‘Do we not work in the Cabinet?’

‘You perorate.’

‘We work.’

‘You attitudinise.’

‘We work!’

‘You strut!’

‘But you will come?’

‘I may.’

‘Yes! Then shall we contemplate sherbet and Mocha, and rosily smoke upon vague discourse.’

‘Farewell, then!’

‘Adieu!’

‘Salaam!’

NOTE. — It is perhaps unnecessary to add, for the sake of Lord X— ‘s well-established reputation as a connoisseur, that all the details of this matter, except the mere personality and photograph of my friend, are altogether imaginary, or rather, not to give big adjectives to little things, nothing more, as Mr. Phipps himself would say, than the adventure-luck (or the adventure-bad-luck, surely) of my own touring soul.

TULSAH

[Translation of a Scorched Hindoo MS.]

MOST WONDERFUL, I often think, must have been the dower of vitality originally vouchsafed me. The passage of one hundred and twenty years has not availed to bleach a single hair of these raven masses. My memory is still, as it was, almost more than that of men. Undimmed is my eye. Yet the end is surely near. A hundred and twenty was the age at which the great Boodh, prince of Oude, passed into unending muckut; at such age, too, died he whom they called my father, and, they say, his father also; and, for what I know — but such speculations are frivolous.

It is singular that none of my subjects ever heard of, or even suspected, the undoubted connection which exists between Boodh and my race. He was one of its sons, and one of its fathers. Here in the profundity and gloom of this subterrene, I now for the first time in modern days commit this tremendous secret to parchment.

I have spoken of my memory: yet on one side at least the tree is bare of blossom or leaf. All my first youth has passed from me as completely as though I never had a first youth. Many and many are the days which I have spent, unconscious of the universe, rapt in contemplation of this mystery. But no intensest effort could bring one ray of remembrance. I can recall, indeed, the circumstance of my awaking to self-knowledge; but as to all that preceded it, there is the blackness of darkness. In a chamber hollowed out of the face of the natural rock I opened my eyes. I lay on my back in a coffin of red stone. A reddish cloth, studded with jewels, enwrapped my body, but the convolutions extended far below my feet, as though the swaddling had been intended for one of much greater stature than I. The coffin itself was large enough to contain the body of a man. Long I lay, first in listless dream, then with the burgeoning consciousness of entity. I rose from the coffin; I cast off the cerements; I crawled from the chamber of rock. I looked at my limbs, the limbs of a well-grown boy, and saw that they were perfect, and withy, and beautifully brown. I could have exclaimed at all the marvel and delight. But the lion's voice broke upon my ear. I at once felt terror, understanding him an enemy. The sun was setting. I was in the midst of the jungle of the unfathomable forest.

I passed during the night through the million-fold life of the wild. I exulted when I eluded the mad elephant and the prowling tiger-cat by the sinuousness of my limbs; I looked without fear upon the ape and the untamed zebu; but when I saw the serpent — heinously leprous — then hatred and loathing thrilled me, and I climbed, breathless in panic, to the branches of a tree.

With the light of the morning I came, on the edge of the forest, to a stately town, full of aëry edifices, traceried light as vision; it lay in a valley enclosed by a circle of high blue mountains, down which brawled many a rill; the whole mirrored in an oval lake which nearly occupied the rest of the valley. It was at this sight that, so far as I can now remember, the conception of Time first arose in my brain: I went back aeon upon aeon, and connected this city with memories, penumbral but real, and old, it seemed, as the world. The town is situated in the centre of Hindostan, is exceedingly ancient, a kingdom by itself, unvisited.

An aged priest met me on the outskirts. He looked with a quick intentness upon my face, and spoke some words to me. I did not understand, nor could I answer him. He led me to the temple where he ministered, and for three years concealed me in its recesses from the eyes of all. At the end of this time he made me lead him to the chamber of rock, and commanded me to point out the coffin in which I had opened my eyes. This satisfied him fully: it was the coffin of the maharajah of the city, who, he told me, had died a year before my awaking. The maharajah was then very old; he had acquired, it was said, the sum of human wisdom. His people had, by his own explicit directions, instead of burning the body, laid it to its rest in the sarcophagus, at the spot where conscious life, as far as I could recollect, was first born within me. Adjeebah, the Brahmin gooroo who had instructed me, announced me as the son, hidden by him till then, of the dead rajah. None could doubt it: to doubt would have been the insanity of unbelief: I was the living likeness of the dead! A day came when I mounted the throne of the palace as sovereign of Lovanah amid the acclamations of the people.

Among the first things I learned was that all my ancestors had been known and revered during life as men who had attained the holy calm of yug; that a long tradition had handed it down that, without exception, they had left the cares of durbar (or state) to their ministers, in order to muse in the interior palace upon the deep things of wisdom. The same instinct rose spontaneously and irresistibly within me. I became a species of Yati, resolving to search out knowledge and the nature of things, if so be I might arrive at the comprehension of the ultimate mystery. The years fled rapidly. Many languages I learned; the wisdom of the Hellenes; the zoomorphism of the Egyptians; the heights of the pyramids of Chufu and Shafra. In intense meditations passed my leaden days. I read in the Hebrew scroll of that Melchisedec, King of Salem, priest of the Most High God, without father, without mother, having neither beginning of days nor end of life. I learned how Boodh, too, who was of my kin, was delivered of his mother Maia in a manner most marvellous. I was convulsed at the thrilling secrets of the world; my tongue shuddered, my eye rolled, in ecstasy on ecstasy. I tracked the vanity and sublimity of Man to their hiding-place; I sought out the meanings of religions, whence they come, whither they go.

I lighted, many years after my accession to the kingdom, upon a document, deep among the mouldening archives, and yellow with the accumulation of ages. Having read it, I swooned upon the agate floor, and lay through the long day and night as dead. It was a narrative inscribed on biblion, and by it I learned the dark fate which befel the first of my race. He was called Obal, and went out from his home a century before ever that Abram, from whom the Hebrews sprang as the sands of the sea, had yet departed out of Haran. The object of his pilgrimage was to know wisdom, and learn the modes of men. He travelled onward till he reached Hur of the Chaldees, one of the first cities built by the hand of the mason and the smith. It was in Mesopotamia, which was called Naharaïm. Here dwelled the votaries of that Zabaism from which is derived the Parsee hierology. The doctrine has its origins deep in the roots of the universe. Loosely allied to it is phallic, and — very much more intimately — serpent, worship: for, inasmuch as the mist of constellations in the farthest heaven assumes the form of a serpent in its uneasy writhings, here have we a connection — profound enough, terrible enough — between Flame and the Serpent; and since Flame is torture, so is the Serpent the fit emblem of Hell. Hence the wisdom of the Hebrew serpent-myth of the temptation and fall of man; and hence, too, came it, that the Zabians, worshipping in the first instance the heavenly hosts of fire, were also worshippers of the snaky uncleanness. At Hur the heart of Obah was seduced by the specious beauty of Star and Moon: he became a devotee to the fire and the serpent. For many years he lived there a life of study and peace; not till he was a very old man did the consummation of Fate overtake him. In a forecourt of a temple of Ashtoreth he saw a maiden priestess whose loveliness kindled his sere heart. Her name was Tamar. She was vowed to chastity. How foul the crime to draw her from the service of the Goddess Obal knew. But he seems to have been a man of daring eye and headlong lust. He found occasion to speak with the maiden; the abomination of love became mutual between them; he wedded her. Had he not been a great man in Hur, he, with the apostate woman, would without doubt have been stoned to death. But they lived — so long, and so securely — that it seemed as though the heavens were oblivious of the sacrilege. At last Tamar died. Obal was full of years. On the night preceding her journey to the tomb, the patriarch slept by her side — for the last time — on the couch of ivory where she stiffly lay. He slept. In the morning his eunuchs, coming to the chamber, found him dead. His face, his staring eyes, were black with imprisoned blood. Around his throat had coiled itself a serpent, red of colour, as though a flame perfused its veins. The body of Tamar was not seen.

I have said that I swooned upon the floor, and lay as dead. This was singular, for I had so far travelled upon the road of knowledge as to be aware of the ancientness and universality of superstition, manifesting itself always by a certain historical metabolism. The tendency of my mind was indeed toward the exact. While the Jookaja believes that nothing exists but knowledge, things being only the forms thereof; and the Medheemuck that both knowledge and things, are sun, or cipher, and the All itself but a visionary vesture half concealing the eternal Glare; I, admitting the seemliness of these syntheses of dogma, must say that my own mental trend was the other way, toward a full belief in matter, and the truthfulness of the senses. I was therefore more and more inclined to assert that no impression of life is explicable save by facts in their essence 'natural.' And yet this unauthenticated tale of the old and vanished world rent my soul, 'like a veil,' in twain. Let me not attempt to explain this mystery. Here is a secret too dark — too dark — for speech. The nations of the far West blab of a Deity who travails and travails and travails for ever — just as though the bursting brain of a man could realize that thought and live! The yellow Brahmin, on the other hand, shaves his head, and with light heart full of craft, discusses a lazy Brimmah, omniscient, but clothed in inertia as in a mantle. I will say nothing. It is a subject full of fear. In the one doctrine at least is safety: in the other — could it be realized — is the frenzy eternal. Let me not therefore be understood to maintain this other: for who would believe if I say that memory was the secret of the effect which the tale of Obal wrought upon me? Would I not sputter the babblings of a maniac, did I assert that — vaguely, but really — afar off, but with no dubiety — I remembered — from beginning to end — ah! but at this mystery let silence cover with her hand the mouth of rashness!

I now set myself diligently to the study of the race of kings who had reigned since the beginnings of the over Lovanah. The facts which confronted me were startling. It was then that I first learned that the Boodh, who, like Obal, had left his home mad with the passion for wisdom, was of us. Of fifty kings in the direct line I found that all had lived to ages far beyond the ordinary span of human life; that more than half had taken as wives, not Hindoos, but believers in the Zend-Avesta, followers of Zoroaster, fire-worshippers; that at least ten had deserted their kingdom, and wandered far over Asia — in obscurity, poor — hounded by the criminal lust of our race for the cabala of knowledge; that at least twenty-five — among them my own predecessor — had met their death by the stings of venomous serpents; that all of them had married; and that the death of not one of them had preceded in order of time the death of his consort.

It was when I had understood the sinister meaning of these things that, in the dim chamber which I had made my abode, I fell upon my face to the ground, and swore in my heart three oaths, to which I called every power of the Universe to witness; I would moderate, and, if necessary, quench, the zeal to know which inflamed me; I would never for any purpose wander abroad from the land, from the house in which I then found myself; no daughter of man would I ever espouse. This I swore, and thus did I resolve to break in my person the continuity of that destiny which hunted my race.

I called to my presence my dewan and two other ministers of state, and ordered them to publish abroad a proclamation offering a reward of ten rupees of silver to the slayer of every serpent within my dominion.

‘Your father published the identical proclamation,’ answered the chief minister. I started.

‘And,’ said another, ‘its only visible result was an enormous increase in the number of serpents in the district.’

‘An increase,’ added the third, ‘which was above all conspicuous in the multiplication of an unknown species, distinguished by its very remarkable colour, and extreme rancour.’

These announcements did not fail to have their full effect upon me. I had then arrived at the age of perhaps fifty. From thenceforth I shut myself from mankind with even greater-persistency than ever, and to lull into quiescence my too restive brain, I now abandoned my body to the delight of the lotus pipe, and the peace of the sleepy bhang. As the Jain, tangled in a mesh of religious frivolities, never slaying a living thing, seeks by strong crying to Parswanath, and the practice of self-torment, to enter forcibly into nirvana; so I, by another and a broader gate, entered the nirvana of vision.

Thirty years passed over me as a watch in the night, opaline with vague prismic hues. I was a confirmed hermit: in a year hardly two of my servants saw my face: the active memory of me passed from men. I still studied — sought — thought — but over the intensity of research was shed the appeasing glamour of the long, long, trance, the hyperborean dream.

I walked one night in an out-court of the palace, and admired that ‘crooked serpent’ which trails in everlasting length athwart the heaven. It was the first time for many years that I had passed from the gloom of my chamber. I was alone. The sound of voices in a neighbouring field reached my ear. I walked pensive toward a gate, and chanced to see a concourse of people standing some little distance away. Long it was since I had mingled with my fellow: I walked quietly toward the crowd, and saw it grouped round a funeral-pile, on which lay stretched the body of a man. It was a suttee. In their midst stood a very young woman — most god-like tall — surpassing lovely — delirious with opiates; her body perfumed; her head sprinkled with sandal- powder; the wife of the dead maim, who had devoted herself to the flames which were to consume him. Tulsah! — dame of my life — sovereign mistress of my destiny — Tulsah! then first, under the moon, did my eye light upon that serpentine form, that iridescent grace! I beheld how with wavy ease she ascended the pyre — the imponderable limbs of spirit composed themselves beside the shape of the dead — her eyes closed; from a corner of the resinous pile I saw the red flame dart upward, upward! Already I was aged — but strong too, and lithe: I dashed forward — with victorious energy I tore her from the lick of the tongues of the fire, and to the murmuring mob I cried aloud:

‘Back, fools — I am the Maharajah!’

I know not what extremity of change now accomplished itself within me. My disenchained spirit danced and danced in the ecstasy of a new youth.

True, I had vowed — I had vowed. But Tulsah had that dear quality of the eyes to which the Greek artists gave the name ôû ýãñüí, ‘liquidity.’ This impression they produced in their statues by a slight raising of the underlid. Man is folly itself. Let this one fact only be considered: those same Greeks believed that they alone of the nations possessed the thing they called philosophia — the love of the subtleties of wisdom; and even while they were thus believing, the Vedic Hymns had been sung; the Brahmin had codified the intricate activities of the Attributes Sut, Raj, and Tum; and the Boodh had denied that Brahma, Vishnu, and Mahadeva were emanations of the Spirit of God. Such is the inborn vanity and shallowness of man.

And I, too, was vain and shallow! My oath I flung to the winds. The passions of a youth, intensified a million-fold, pulsated within my bosom. My zenana, so long tenantless, at last received an inmate — and her name was Tulsah!

Little cared I for the prejudices — deep, religious, though they were — of my uncultured people, who declared that I had robbed her from the dead. I loved to recline through the sluggish hours by her side, and watch the ichor that swelled and swelled her veins. Surely her skin was not the skin of the Hindoos: but I cannot remember that I ever definitely learned her origin. I know only that Tulsah adored me. We passed our lives together in the twilight of a perfect and happy solitude; and never did I surfeit of her ethereal presence, or tire of gazing upon the strangely delicate streaks of reddish hue which mingled with her jet-black hair, or upon the torpidly-indolent and sinuous movements of her exquisitely soft, and supple, and undulating form.

In an evil hour one day, when, heavy with opiates, I lay in waking trance, by her side I revealed to her the history of the tragedy of the patriarch Obal.

She listened to the whole with agitation, with heaving bosom, and an intense alertness for which I could not account.

‘He seduced her,’ she said after a long time, speaking bitingly, and gazing afar— ‘he seduced her from her devotion to the heavenly hosts—’

‘Ay! — Tulsah! — he snatched her from her ministry upon the eternal flames—’

‘And you—’

‘I, my Tulsah? I! I!’

‘Yes — you — you snatched me, a devotee to the flames, from the very flames themselves—’ I folded her panting to my lean bosom.

‘Angel! angel!’ I shrieked, ‘yet does the Power not live whose craft could prevail to change thy dear perfection into the viper’s tooth!’

In such manner we spent our life. The years multiplied themselves and passed. Tulsah approached the borders of age. Her beauty waned — markedly waned. As she grew older the sinuosity of her muscular and osseous systems became, I must say it, too pronounced to be longer fascinating. A singular affection of the skin covered her body with a multitude of regularly-shaped small dull-red erythemata. Her eyes reddened, uttering a rheumy mucus. I looked for the whitening of her hair. My disappointment was bitter. The heavy surges which, once black, billowed like a torrent to her feet, and wide overflowed the floor like the surf of a sea of ink, gradually at first — then rapidly — took on the gorgeous, and the farouche, and the unhuman semblance of a mantle of vivid flame.

She died. With my own hand I swaddled her corpse, and helped to place it upon the pyre. Death among our Eastern nations is surely never a comely sight: yet it was with sorrow rather than with loathing that I looked for the last time upon the wan face of my Tulsah.

We were alone together in a court of the palace. The fulsome gloat of moon and stars shone over and about us. I held a torch to the pile: a sheet of flame shot up, crackling, around the beloved sacrifice.

To this day I know not how it was: either the fire consumed its victim with a rapidity inconceivable, or a suspension of consciousness, due to the anodynes which I had that day freely imbibed, deprived me of sight: but from the moment when I applied the torch to the moment when I again looked at the pile was an interval which seemed so short as to be inappreciable; and yet within it, in sharp disproof of my estimate of its length, both the pyre and its occupant had passed, utterly consumed, from before my eyes.

I stood amazed, gazing at the column of blue smoke which rolled up from the very small heap of ashes into the air: and now a new impression — born perhaps of my own fantasy — or born of the despotism of drugs — or born of the more dread despotism of reality — an impression this the of absolute terror — forced itself upon my mind. I beheld, or thought so — the blue of the ascending reek turn to the sanguine hue of Sardius; and now with a spasmodic jerk the whole high and solid pillar of the reddened smoke split itself into innumerable dismemberment; and I saw every wreath, and curl, and tortured tendril stand apart in definite isolation, and shape itself into a changing snaky form, till the whole vast nest, coalescing, writhed together in infinite implication, with hollow eye, and extruded fang.

Aghast at the illusion, I hurried from the spot. I entered the palace. Through a secret corridor I passed to the chamber where Tulsah and I had spent the years of our love. A light shed itself from a vessel of oil in the ceiling. I sank doddering to a seat, and covered my face. Hours went by, and still I sat. All the past was around me — she herself. How like a dream the whole mystery of her coming, her abiding, her going! Tulsah! — I groaned her name. I lifted up my voice weeping. ‘Where now remote in some green sanctity of ocean cave or azure fold of space broods thy ethereal presence?’ I rose to throw my despairs upon the couch where she had been wont to lie, when, in the gloom, I saw — within the palsy of horror saw — coiled thick upon the bed, with gorge erect above a foul vast base of clotted wreaths, and palpitant through all its mucous swelth, the fat and lazar loathliness of a monstrous Snake, whose ruby eyes regarded me.

I ran from the palace! A secret portal led me to the borders of the forest. Here I came upon the traces of a highway, the windings of which I followed. The rising sun of the next day found me still fugitive — hasting in wildest panic — already many a mile from the towers of Lovanah.

I had thus broken the second of my vows, which bound me to my home. It was not till long afterwards that this thought occurred to me. But there remained the third: never, by my own seeking, to penetrate the ultimate secret of the world: and by this I have faithfully abided.

Ten years passed and left me, as they found me, vagabond over India. I journeyed from city to city, meditating on the manners of men, and begging my bread from the charitable. I have wandered in the streets of that Benares to which Boodh first retired from the world; I have stood beneath the great granite mosque of Jumna Musjid at Delhi; and through all the cities of the north I have passed.

But my pilgrimage was very far from purposeless. I sought with intense scrupulousness — as for hid treasures — after something. I hoped to find a retreat in which, with absolute security from the designs of destiny, I might lay me down, and die the natural death of the rest of men.

I came at last, in the vale of Cashmere, to a lonely Hindoo temple — one of the great vihâras — consisting of a long oblong chamber. The roof was supported by two rows of huge stone pillars connected by vaulted architraves, and at the farthest end, semicircular in shape, stood a colossus of the seated Boodh. The temple had been chiselled out of the base of the Himalaya.

Through a burning lamp hung from a pillar, the sanctuary seemed deserted. I entered, and passed up the broad central nave. At the extremity, near the statue, where the vihâra might be expected to end, I happened to find an open door. I walked through it, and descended a long stairway which brought me to a second temple; all was now the intensity of darkness; but happening to meet with another door-way, I descended still farther — down and down — until, in this way, I had traversed six stairways of equal descent. I must by this time have travelled a very considerable distance both into the interior of the mountain and the depths of the earth.

Yet another series of steps, and I came to a passage, at the end of which was a circular apartment: here was clearly the termination of this great excavation. From its roof hung a lamp which distilled a vermilion light. I could see from the appearance of the chamber that it had been unvisited perhaps for ages, and I was unable to conjecture by what means the lamp was kept alive, except it were by means of feeding pipes from the far outermost temple of all; but, at any rate, it showed me that the key-contrivance of the door of the chamber was on the outside. With the deliberate purpose of there ending my days, I passed into the apartment, and pulled the door toward me. I heard with joy the click of the fastening which sealed my fate.

In the room is a small stone table and a stool. I had brought with me parchment, and the materials for writing. This history, as far as it has now gone, has by these means been recorded. I shall leave it to moulder beside my bones. As the half-pleasurable pangs of hunger, and the languor of coming disease, invade my body, I may add yet a phrase or two.

I have now observed that this chamber is not of stone, as far at least as its interior lining is concerned. It is certainly extraordinary; but there can be no doubt that the flooring and ceiling are of wood, and that the circular sides are of old iron-plate panelled at regular intervals with narrow wooden laminae. The faintness of the lamp's scarlet glow doubtless prevented me from noticing this singularity from the first.

I have brought with me a quantity of opium. On the lap of an ocean of rainbows will I embark when the great hour comes.

The opium works well in stanching the current of the blood, and in overdriving the spent heart to its final throbbings. It will thus quicken the action of the hunger. The past five or six hours I have spent in a coma full of luxuriousness.

Spare me! Spare me! frail man that I am! This chamber, in which — with my own hand — I have imprisoned myself, is the nethermost hell itself! Happening to rise from my seat, I saw — in the shadow thrown by the table — a sight! the skeleton of a man; having a burnt appearance; old as the mountain; dismembered now in the lower limbs, the ribs in fragments; but the cervical vertebrae still cohering, and around them — coiled — in perfect preservation, in hideous symmetry, the vertebrae of a great — No! not that word again! I dashed my body against the door of my prison; for a full hour of frenzy beat my life against its adamant: then fell to the ground.

As I lay on the floor, my senses having returned to me, I seemed to hear a very faint sound, proceeding apparently from beneath the casing of wood. I bent down my ear. It was a gentle crepitant sound, as though a rat gnawed the wood.

But this it could hardly have been which made me leap up with an alacrity so frantic. The action was involuntary; but I soon recognized its reason. On placing the palm of my hand upon the boarding, a marked degree of warmth communicated itself to my skin. I have also touched the iron casing of the chamber all round, and find the same condition.

This apartment must be at a great depth in the bowels of the earth. Can it be that huge geologic forces, volcanic in character, are tumbling in Acherontic travail around me? The heat of the floor and walls slowly but steadily increases.

Seventy years ago I made a threefold vow. Forty years ago I broke the first, and wedded. Ten years ago I broke the second, and left my home. Three days ago I broke, thou seeing God, the third, when, within my own hand, I closed upon me this tomb of woe. For now — at last! — I know — with clear precision — the ultimate, the flaming, the maddening secret of being.

It is old: it has been heard from the beginning; but heard as an incredible tale. Upon no heart of man has its intolerable incubus ever rested as now it rests upon mine; no eyeball has its excess of light so scorched and blasted into ashes. And this I say in foolish and feeble words; that there is knowledge, and there may be things; but gibbering spectres of this One Thing only: an Eye that glares and glares for ever! And wise are they who call it Hammon, Brimmah, Zeu-Ya, and Ra, and Allah; but wiser they who say Saranyû (i.e. ‘Eninyes,’ Counteraction).

The scraping and gnawing sound has multiplied itself a million-fold, amid is now clamorous and constant. At every point beneath the flooring — along the length of every wooden panel — over all the wooden ceiling, it is heard. An army of creatures boring, boring their invincible way to reach me....

The floor I can no longer touch with my feet; the table of stone itself grows hot; the iron casing of the chamber, even under the scarlet gleam of the lamp, now emits the redding glow of heated metal....

Tulsah! — that name again! — the fiery furnace of intensest hell — ah bitter, bitter love! to the centre it blazes. And now — ah now — from a thousand apertures — around, above, beneath — a thousand small and crimson serpent-heads extrude! convulsive — O bile of God! — in ecstasy — they expel and retract their salamandrine necks! Crimson, crimson, is their name! But what a Babel of hissing! Once, in sleep, did I not see her tongue loll black and long — And now — wage, wage of lawless love! — now — O Majesty — they come — that flaming fault in worms — now — ten thousand forked and jagged (three words of doubtful meaning follow).

THE SERPENT-SHIP

‘O THAT I knew where I might find Him! that I might even come into His presence!’

‘My help!’
the Emperor called,
‘the bard!
 With teaching touch who toucheth the harp, and teacheth the heart,
 to harp.’

Nor long:
a rhapsody brave of song:
 A hive of breath;
 and busy amongst,
 the lyrical buzz and throng: —

‘Good-bye!’
the Viking his Gerd — a-pressed:
 Two sobs that kiss —

then life is a sail —
then life is a-blurr, and mist.

Ten years:
the consequent times
revolved:

But Hrolf, in Logres, with Heracles moils, was making the world for God.

‘That night,’
so, spinning, to Gurth,
the churl,
The lady glozed,
‘how fine was his calm, when Hakon besieged the burg!’

And Gurth:
‘but that was a day,
at Dvaiss!

I wounded fell,
pernicious as Thor,
he hewed me a lane,
and saved.’

So she:
‘he loved thee at heart, poor Gurth!

A heart, though strong, yet kingly infirm with fatherly lodes, and throes.'

And Gurth:

'but where can his Sail
be spread?

His Bones where white? or plies he till now his continent rage with men?'

She laughed:

'reblooms in the night
a gourd!

He, thrilling plumb,
like shuttlecocks falls;
recurs like the moons his Sword!

'What Bones!

I know that my warrior lives!

Yet O, that Nord
would wing me with winds, their wings to the winds who gives!'

At last a rumour from God has vogue:

A myth, a breath:
at Thanet he lies,
his wounds unaneled,
unmoaned.

Nor long:
a schip from the burg-
-bay runs:

Her sixty oars unanimous troop, voluminous hoops
her lug.

In vain!
at Thanet was void,
and ah:
One knew — one thought — he'd fared for the Franks he'd passed to the Picts — afar!

'No more?
and will he no more be kind?

Then Gurth,' she cries,
'the wave be my world,

though waste be its ways,
and wild!’

She cruised:

at London is nought,

but germ:

At Hythe no news —

at Wyht he has stormed —

at Dwyght he was yet — to storm.

When Day — his cyclops inflamed

enlaved:

When fairy Night,

in lazuli grot,

her lamp-lit bazaar unveiled;

Till dawn,

the swarm of her wake

she notes:

Her sea-bitch hunts,

a-hunt is the moon,

and solves in gavottes

the coast.

‘How droll!’

so, pious and boon,

she taled:

‘On Triss, my mare,
when tipsy one day,
his feet on the ground he trailed.’

And Gurth:

‘but that was a day,
at Fahl!

Our yolle capsized, and there was his head, like echoes and claps
a-laugh!’

So she:

‘you men in his train were rich!

The world, and woes,
were made for his sake, to furnish with realm a prince.’

And Gurth:

‘but where can his sword be groans?

Or south, or north,
with Logresman or Scot, or rolls with the flood his Bones?’

She smiled:

'he wounds, but himself is Balm!

'Tis said, you know,
the hair of a hound,
though bitter the bite,
can salve.

I wait

a Silence through things is spun:

The first of men
was made in the night, and skipped when he saw the sun.'

Three years:

the seas with her oars were thronged:

But Hrolf, returned, in haven was heaved, and home-sick at home was strong.

Then four:

the voluble times returned:

A fame had steered to Zetland her helm:

at Zetland was void, and dearth.

He mourned:
all patient, adult,
arrived:

His glance was worth,*
and expert his heart, and chaste from the rods of Time.

[* Weorthan = werden, become]

He mourned:
a warrior crowned,
and trite:

His hair was hoar, his warrings were o'er,
his war-gear he wore and died.

And rich —
with breastplate of gold, and targe,

And broidered zone, — his mort they propose, sublime on his poop,
and huge.

All day,
like mourners with griefs
a-rave,

The crooning surfs to funeral troop, and funerals taint
the rain.

At eve:
his rovers the shore
bethrong:

The torch they use,
the moorings they loose,
the holocaust moves,
is gone!

How grand!
thou mariners' Nurse,
though wet,
Berock him now!
with languidest waft they hail him a last Fare-well!

Afar,
the desert a Sign acclaims:

Between the hills
a Pillar of Cloud, with banner of blue,

her sail.

A-rave, up sun-smears in oils
she glides:

The buxom swell
she glibly excels, a Pillar of Flame
she rides.

But lo! —
by flurry applied, her flame —
the billows' bursts and cataracts quench:
her peril she slips,
though scathed.

'Twas night:
and Gerda from Zet-
-land works:
The sea-room's lurch her governing oar, andante her cords,
beskirl.

It chanced — when Imbrifer sets* in murk,

And sea, and sky,
with dribbly rheums
and equinox squalls,
conturbs.

[* In October.]

She fronts,
sedate on the deck,
the storm:

The spoil of hope,
though foundered in night,
instinctive of light,
her orbs.

And thus,
inclining her head,
to Gurth:

‘I saw, one night,
a mist in his eye,
when Dagmar, the scald, rehearsed.’

And Gurth:

‘but that was a day,
at Voss!

He felled an oak,
which fell on a thrall, and fell on the trunk, and sobbed.’

So she:

‘a typical man, and tall!

His social wo —
his musical weird...
but talk not of oaks
— that fall.’

And Gurth:

‘but who shall his Se-cret guess?

Or far, or near,
his Dragon he steers, or broads to the kites his Breast?’

She wept:

‘the world is its own redress!

Its orb, though dark, is starlight afar,
and smiles like a bride
a death.

‘The past,
like throeings and growth,
we slight;

The future dark may,
dazzling dark,

be dark with excess of bright.

‘And say:
that sockets for eyes
he keep:

And worst be truth:
an outcome’s innate;
from death-beds a babe
may creep.

’Twas morn:
a sail through the squall they spy:

Some pirate keel?
upon them he bears!
she, thoral below,
bids fly.

He looms —
a ‘serpent-schip’ lank, and high:

But slighter she — and ruffling in stays,
she yaws on the yeast,
and flies.

And now — with sea-winds my tale
I wet:

In down-hill glee,
each following threat
she wins to her use, adept.

Their flow with melting reserves
she rides:

By noon he's air:
they breathe from the oars:
a westering blotch
he hides.

Away! affairé on Ahs
the Vault:

The self-sick sea
its bosom bespues:
unearthly the world,
and salt.

The prow its dissolute Ghost
— out-pants!

The eddies pair in scampering reel
the regiment stalks, and tramps.

And bleak, — comes brooding the dark, like doom:

A rift remains,
and darkling bleak, that wraith through the rift relooms.

One eve —
(the Dead-sea terrasse
I roamed) —

I saw a form,
and still as I fled,
a presence that form
I found;

So they:
and plies them a name-
-less cark!

He steadfast drifts,
and rudderless steers,
an Argonaut blind,
his bark.

There is — engraved in the deep — a place,

With eddies vext,
a caldron morose,

all ringstraked with froths, that race;

And midst,
circumference vast,
— it yawns!

And harab dark,
that staggering void,
and wails from its whorls
a swan.

To this — for foul was the night, — they drive:

To this that ship,
as sheep-dogs the sheep's, had shiftily shaped their flight.

As bent — his jennet some fla-
-grant steed

Pursues a-marsh, with scattery scamp,
rotatory tramp,
a-ramp.

And soon — that influence wild involves:

She twists, she shoots, —
a maenad of death,
she planets, remote,
that orb.

He too: to lightning my tale
I link!

A-keel they wing, and fluttering poised,
with shuddering joys,
they wing.

As hunts —
a drake his unwife-
-ly bird,
(Their heads are far, — — and half on the lake — — and half on the wing — they churn.)

So he:
a cable-length late,
he throes:
And round, and round,
in mizmazy rote,
in blackness secerned,
they roam.

When lo!
in rufous she bursts the tomb!

Some shattered lamp —
in Tophet is dawn;
pregnated he, too,
— up-blooms!

But yet — not yet does she dream him nigh —

(As round, and round, in narrowing whorls,
in volutes of flame,
they fly.)

Till now —
That chiselled extreme they reach;

(Those satin depths with shimmering shafts, like Seraphim swords,
they parch.)

Then first!
then first does she dream
him close!

His streaming flag
— with wondering awe —

— his bulk on the pyre —
she notes.

As when — some chymist his drugs combines:

He waits, he frowns,
the menstruum fails;
but rallies the world,
he smiles:

So she — dismays from her eyes dismay,

As trance of dawn at sunset arrests the withering eye of day.

'Tis Hrolf!
Reclaimant! how deep!
and strange!'

(He whispers dumb,
and Gorgon he smiles;
surmising her heart, and sage.)

And swift!
she runs the blockade of reek —

With poising arms, like tottering bairns,
her prow she attains
— and leaps.

Nor fails:
for courtly he holds his poop:
 Bonanza rare!
 She falls on his Length! and down to the skies
 they swoop.

He ceased:
but silence with song
was rife:
 The world's a star!
 more stringèd a psalm than trills on the ear, its life.

PHORFOR

Αἶ! Αἶ! τὰν Κυθέρειαν!

They reckon ill who leave Me out!
When me they fly — I am the Wings!
I am the Doubter and the Doubt;
And I the hymn the Brahmin sings.

— R. W. Emerson

At that more sombre season called Opora, which fills the interval between the rising of Sirius and the rising of Arcturus, when the cycled year dying as the phoenix, forest-leaves glow red- reflective of the conflagration, and birds fly migratory from the world-wide majesty of the pyre — I passed on horse-back over the blue and high-surging undulations of the Orchat Mountains, whose broad swell is as the Eastern heave of a jeweled bosom; thence through lower- lying slopes, and delicious groves of citron, almond, and maple; and thence through a seine of streams, over-waved by that bulbous Nile-lily which the Greeks called ‘lotus’; till, entering the domain of Phorfor, I drew up, as night fell, at the entrance of the far-reaching castle by the sea.

The ancient home! I had worn its dark forests as an easy old garment; listened through the whole dead summer-day by its brook-banks to the abstracted talk of my cousins Sergius and Areta, children then like me; splashed in the waters of its day. But a sudden pride, quickened by another’s malice, impelled me to wide wanderings over the world, from which, after too many years, I now returned with little won — a knowledge of constitutions, modes, of the swellings of cities, artfulness of art; and a longing beyond language for heavenly message of the eyes of Areta, and the benign wisdom of the lips of Sergius.

A letter of announcement had preceded me by some days. An old serving-man waited me at the entrance. I recognized him well, but to my smile he returned no answering smile. In silence he led the way, doddering with prone neck and angled knees, through a series of lofty glooms, till in the recesses he stopped before a high, embossed, and arched brazen gateway, to the curtained wicket of which he pointed, bowed, and retired.

I passed inwards. Here sight groped with somewhat more surety; though a thick odour of the smoke of myrrh smothered out the atmosphere. On a cushion on the ground I saw Areta sit: an easel before her. On the easel a square of ivory, in the centre of which, by medium of coccus, the scarlet dye of the kermes-berry, she stained a small head. The brush was between her fingers. Wide and wild over the marble dalles of the flooring were spent the light purplish largesses of her main. Her back was towards me.

‘Areta!’

Eagerly she painted. But she was conscious of my voice, for, without turning, she said in a thick, hurried murmur:

‘You are come, then. See — your work.’

She pointed with the handle, and continued her task. I, looking, saw in misty distances of the chamber — a bed. But how my work? I drew gently near it. It was strewn with splinters of fragrant agalloch-wood. I saw a noble, cold forehead. The body was robed in splendid volutions of cloth-of-gold; the red lamp of a ruby glowed large at his breast; the head was crowned with daphne: an expression all this, as I knew, of Count Zinzendorf’s whim, that death, so far from being the chill passage through any valley of any shadow, is, without metaphor, a jubilant bursting from sleep at day-break. But how my work? Wherein was I guilty? That question I asked myself. A coffin of sarcophagic limestone lay on chairs beside the low bed.

Eagerly Areta painted. From behind I saw that the effort was to preserve the august likeness in death; and already I was able to predict failure: no truth could an eye so wild interpret to a hand so unstable. I sat near her in the numbness of awe, and hours of the night rolled over us.

Later, I crept from the room. As I passed through one of the outer halls, a stupendous stalking figure moved diagonally across a far corner of it. The light was dim, but his step slow, and my eyes searched him fully. I knew the Elder, Theodore. A simple garment of blood-red silk, with amice of orphreyed black, tuned on the marble an intermittent musing to his strides. A mist of hair, crowned with the fanon, floated in wide white vagueness over his back. A great veil of yellow cloth covered his face, as a veil covered the face of the Prophet of Khorassan. I cannot at this moment picture forth all that passed within me at this sight: the intense impressions of first youth stamped themselves once more deep upon me. Once more it was Theodore, the omnipotent, that I saw. And though his head was immobile aversion as he passed through, I knew that he knew my presence.

I inquired of the old serving-man who attended me in my room at supper an hour later as to the arrangements for the burial of Sergius. He answered, ‘At the next rise of dawn he was to have been interred in the vaults of the rock-chapel.’

‘Was to have been?’ ‘But since your arrival — within the hour, in fact — time Elder Theodore has come in person from the Tower, and suggested to the lady Areta that the body be embalmed.’

I started, understanding enmity — a deadly thrust at my own heart. ‘And she?’

‘Eagerly consented. The constant presence of the body will be her unhopd consolation. The Elder, skilled, sir, in all designs, has himself undertaken the work, and the coffined frame has even now been conveyed by boat across the water to the Tower.’

I retired weary to my bed. But though morning was near, sleep was an ambition merely. I lay and swept clean the house of memory, building in the deep the old life up again. Of Sergius I thought, and his singular likeness to the boy, Christ; his questionings, answers, parables; his sibylline intensity of interest in sounds, and strata, and the shapes of things, and the hues of birds; how eagerly he accepted anything out of the ordinary course as a doubly-direct revelation of Omnipotence to himself. After a time, every appearance was to him a rune: like old augurs and aeonoscopi, he followed within musing eye the course of all winged creatures. The fragments of a rainbow had pythmic meanings for him. He contrasted the notes from the vocal organs of many living things; showed how this sound or odour was really identical with that appearance, and how the difference of their mode of occurrence was not intrinsic, but due merely to the differentiation of our own sense-organs. His little museum was full of strangely sorted specimens of this and that: seeds, zoolites, spotted eggs, fuci, spawn, spongiadae, chips of chert, bars of bast. Once, having spent the night in the forest, he came at dawn to where I, enfolding Areta, sat on the sea-terrace. His white brow was radiant. He told how all the night he had listened in a thicket to the song of a nightingale: a song which, he said, was not her native. I long remembered the impression which the quaint high things he thereupon uttered made upon us. And I thought of his smooth-mindedness, as of that Jesus whom he aped. If by chance he encountered rudeness, dullness, it was good to see within how light-like a power he appeased it. I would often cavil at the obscure and loosely-metred extravaganzas which he sometimes sang to us; and always would he graciously pause to show how under the appearance of ease lay a strenuously-reached fitness; how beyond the cloud was light. 'To what metre,' he asked one day, 'do earth-sent angels tune the dithyrambs of their exultation?'

'To a metre,' I answered. 'which 'ear hath not heard,' nor can hear.' But he: 'Oh yes! heard indeed, but with scentless and purblind ears.' He then took jewels of different sizes and colours; laid them in a line. All the syllables of each foot of the metre he marked by stones of the same hue; the length of the syllables he indicated by the varying sizes of the stones. No sooner had he done this, than Areta, perceiving a vision of some beauty in the combination, clapped hands; while I, observing indeed a picturesqueness, ended. 'You here see,' said Sergius, 'that the first foot is a trochee (long followed by short syllable), while the last is an iambus (short followed by long): a symbolism, you will at once say, of the fall and rising again of Man; and, if you compare nearly all the Shemitic dialect-versions of the hymn I have in my mind, you will find the same general alternation: a beginning of long-and- short, and an ending of short-and-long, or long-and-long.' And then, with exquisite clearness of rhythm, he proceeded to chaunt in Hebrew an improvization of the angel-song of the Gospel, beginning, 'Fear not,' and ending, 'shall be called the Son of God.' Night-dews gathered in the eyes of Areta as the melody rose from him; myself not all unmoved. Nor did Sergius ever leave the reason restive. He pointed out now, for example, the coincidence that in the Greek version, too, of the words their alpha is a trochee, and their omega an iambus, and so even in later versions, as the Latin, French, English, and many others. It was at moments such as this that Areta would rescue her hand from mine with a rashness almost angry, and sidling towards her brother, lean a passionate face to peace on his bosom; and many hours, many longing days, might pass, before her dear favour returned to me. In such constant rivalry for her lived Sergius and I. I have won her from him by a hairataghan of agates, a cameo of onyx, or a bird from the sunset, spoil of my skill with the bow; and he back again by the solution of some problem in ciphers or lines, by a psalm, on earnest chansonnette. A very slight divergence, I remember, once occurred in the march of their thought. It was the custom at the time for one or other to read aloud by a deep-shadowed brook in the Wood, the ‘Giornale di un Viaggio di Constantinopoli in Pohonia,’ by the idealist mathematician Ruggiero Boscovich: a book of books for my cousins. During one such séance, Areta set up claim to Boscovich as supporting the cosmothetic view of the impressions of the senses, her own strongly marked leaning being toward that subjective idealism of Fichte which attributes the orderly succession of sensible changes to the nature of the individual mind in which they are perceived. To Sergius, on the contrary all was directly God — every event, sight, sound, God’s quite special act: and hence it was, perhaps, that in his eyes the Bishop of Cloyne loomed immense, as the greatest who ever breathed. The divergence, I say, was slight, for to neither mind, as a thing of course, did any such idea as the absolute existence or agency of matter ever occur: yet Sergius frowned at the interruption — a sign in him of strong displeasure. Boscovich, he said, austere, was ‘other than she thought.’ Morning redness over-swept Areta: a vice caught her nether lip. For a week she abandoned herself wholly to me. Deep in the glens and bowers we wandered, hiding through the night in the darkness of caves, folded together. Sergius was a mateless bittern by the pool. One other singularity I may mention as often noticed in my love: her bird-like flightiness of motion, giving sometimes the impression of translation through space. Walking with her along the path of the wood, I have lifted my head to a squirrel's perch, or stooped to a fallen catkin, and turning again, lo, have seen her rapt well beyond me, beckoning airily perhaps from the summit of a rising ground. Her computations, too, of the dial's variations were not always in strict harmony with common notions; when, after my long absence, I returned as related to Phorfor, she said, 'You are come, then,' and the murmur had precisely that intonation with which one speaks of an interval of hours.

I lay in the darkness, and I swept clean the house of memory. Of the Elder Theodore I thought. We children called his name in pious, lower voices. Vast powers over nature, vast mystery of lore, we gave to him. Our imagination crossed itself at him. Only at night, on every seventh day, in the reluctant gloom of the rock-chapel, did we come at sight of the hem of his garment; for our awful lids would not lift to his veiled face. Here, kneeling, we took from his hands the elements of the Holy Supper; whereupon he made haste to disappear into the black adyla of the sanctuary. He was, Sergius hinted, of Aramaean, or Syro-Chaldean race; or else he derived from among the priests of the Cophti. The veiling of the face might be due to some disease of the blood which rendered him all too chill a horror for the glance of a fellow-mortal. The Tower was his solitary abode: a tall structure rising from the sea of our land-locked bay, about two stone-throws from the beach; it tapered upward pyramid-wise in seven brick terraces, each lacquered in a glaring colour. By day it cast on the vapouring purple water the reflection of a gaudy basking lizard. Above all was the observatory. There the sun sometimes fired through narrow openings a tangled refulgence of sextants, armillary spheres, gimbals, the cannon of a telescope, azimuth compasses, pictured charts. In the deepest night we opened the eyes and thrillingly knew that the Elder pored into the ever-written red-letter scroll of the past and the to-come. Neither I nor the orphans ever understood what had been his precise relation to their parents; that they had revered him above mortal we understood; also that the guardianship of our lives was in some sort bequeathed to his hands. But was it by childish sure instinct, or a series of trivial and now forgotten incidents, that I came to know that I was by no means included in the scheme of Theodore's providence? that I, the waif, the Hagarson, might become, perhaps was, an obstacle to the unfolding of that elaborate forethought? This consciousness at any rate grew gradually mine. When at last I fled from Phorfor, I was a missile from the suggestion, tense, compelling, secret, of the Elder of the Tower.

Thus I built in the deep. But with the morning I despatched a note to Areta, asking if I might hope that day for the sight of her face, but for a word from her. She apparently did not receive, or read, the paper; for I waited without reply. The galleries, park, gardens, fed my memory with here an ancestral effigy, there a grove or stream. Another day passed, and another. But at the fourth dusk, a boat lay moored at the water-steps of the terrace. Its benches sustained in a glazed coffin of light pagodite the body of Sergius already cured to perpetuity by a miracle of asphaltum, natron, bitumens; a dwarf rower of dark skin held the skulls of the bow; fastened to the stern by a twine floated a little shallop of mother-of pearl. I, standing near, waited. Areta in purity of white came slowly from the portico of the mall, walking down an aisle of the double xystum of Corinthian columns which lined the terrace; palms on either hand over-shaded her; and she came the full and sudden moon through the palms, walking in shining. My hand touched my mouth; I was at once abashed and excited at her developed splendour. As she passed, she extended laterally her left hand, without seeming to see me. I burned it within a kiss. She descended the stairway, looked upon the steadfast face of Sergius, and stepped into the shallop. I following, the dwarf began to paddle.

Here the sands and the low cliffs all along the two folded claws of the bay are of a very pale pink colouring; the sea being an extremely vivid purple resembling the hue of the dye called Phoenician, and remarkably shallow throughout. Here and there the cliffs project bluffly quite into the bay, thus blocking the continuity of the sand. The water is but very slightly brackish. A bright-hued sea-weed, scallops, and star-fish visibly carpet the bottom; while moon leaved water- growths cluster into groups of silvery greenness over the surface. From the terrace our rower slowly conveyed us a hundred yards to the left, and there turned into a opening in the coast-rock about four feet wide through all its length; up this the sea, far-winding, slumbers in breathless gloom, covered thick with the drowsy grace of Egyptian lotus-lily. Three wide steps near the end of the inlet lead into a low square chapel excised from the mountain-rock, its roof being supported by the ebony columns of twin stylobats.

Areta had not spoken. Her face was the uttermost expression of a rigid woe. Arrived at the chapel entrance, she looked up, and stepped readily from the shallop. The dwarf and I bore the now lightened body in its shell to trestles near a purple catafalque before the altar-rail. On the craped altar itself a taper on either side of the pyx nimbused itself with a little sphere of little rays, giving all of light we had. The black hangings of gold-fringed velvet made the distant places of the excavation a vastness of darkness.

Areta, seating herself on the altar-step near the body, motioned to us to leave her. I, seeming to obey, retired; ordered the dwarf back to the Tower; and took my place in the obscurity of a recess. Hence I could watch her tearless pain. She leaned her head on the rail sideways, and watched obliquely the steadfast dead. She did not move. As the spaces of the night marched by, the taper-flames began to leap duskily, and one of them puffed suddenly out. She rose then; and opening a cista behind the altar, obtained two others; and was about to light them, when I, buying up the opportunity, stepped boldly forth. I took the tapers and lit them, and adjusted them to the candlesticks. She showed no surprise at my bodily presence near her. We sat together on the altar-step by the coffin; together we gazed. The face before us was unchanged and Sergius's own; a mournful richness of gold involved him. Her hand did not refuse the ring of warmth in which till morning I fostered it.

When the deeper shadows had thinned to a twilight in the chapel, she rose and walked to the doorway. I, entering with her paddled in the shahlop down the winding way, and so out to the sea. The sun was now bright above the circling blue mountains of Phorfor; nature looked wide-eyed in pricked alertness; the water a flushed and many-gifted soul under the blaze of light and the roughening reel of routs of zephyrs, morning home-returners. White, long-necked birds, scarlet-legged, flew hither and thither, uttering a swancall akin to the viola-note. I watched anxiously to read the countenance of Areta. For a moment the throes of vacillation had her; for a moment she struggled to maintain the grey face of grief — but a single sobbing gasp of laughter burst suddenly forth from her bosom, and instantly the hilarity of the sky, and the frolic of the world was in her look. She hurriedly buried a crimson face in the draperies of her arm.

To this I had looked forward with the precision of certainty — if she remained at all the same Areta that I knew. Never was Areta other than the unfailing exactest mirror of environment; a condition which no doubt arose from her belief — so deep as to be part of herself — that environment was, in fact, the exact mirror of herself; and this again from her disbelief in the existence of matter. Now, it is no doubt true that most cultivated people of the outer world accept such non-existence as an intellectual thesis, whether tentatively in the form presented by Malebranche, Geulinx, and the so-called Cartesian school; or in the form of the absolute phenomenalism of Hume, Browne, and the middle German teaching; but in most minds, as I imagine, a lingering half-faith in Lockes 'thing in its real essence' (Kant's 'thing in itself') must persist to the end, for the very reason that the fancy, by long habit of youth, has already grown to hold the earth-rock genuine solid, and the sun very 'substance.' To my cousins, however, even from the first dawn of thought, all was pure spirit; the one 'substance' the consciousness of their own inner souls; the world a thin picture on the senses, resolvable as mirage. And this knowledge, so far from being an affair of the mere reasoning understanding, was their very life itself. To them no other possibility suggested itself. The slightest change in the environment of Areta would indicate to her a preceding change in her own mental being. Sergius, looking up, would question the causing Mind; she, looking inward, asked, How has the alteration been produced in me? I remember them thus affected by the disappearance of many things around them. In the bursting Spring I have known Areta a wild ass's colt on the hills with twinkling feet and bacchant stare; in the chiller season puritan and wise. That her consciousness should now evolve a gay picture of nature, she, feeling the discord within her sorrow for Sergius, doubtless marked as a strangeness in herself.

Having arrived at the terrace-steps, she raised her face, and leapt to the land. I proceeded to make fast the shahlop, but on reaching the top of the hanging-stage, saw her already beneath the pediment of the portico, on the point of disappearing within the castle. There I heard that she had retired to a distant part, and would be seen no more until sunset.

It was dark when she reappeared at the waterside. We then proceeded as before to the chapel, and renewed our silent vigil. Her face had lost nothing of its hard misery. She seemed not to know me, though I clasped her hand. Within the intrusion of the morning, I suggested that we should return to the castle. She slowly turned her head, and within the raised eyebrows of surprise, looked at me fully; then, frowning, said, 'Leave me! leave me!'

I could not but obey. Later I heard that on the preceding day a side-apartment of the chapel, of which there were many, had been fitted up as a chamber for her. This then was to be her constant abode of gloom.

In the evening I returned. She frowned, but did not deny me place by her side. There watching through the slow circle of the night, I was near happiness, for I was near her. Yet she was far from me. So months, many months, passed over us. Every sun divided us, but with the drawings of the moon we flowed together again. Upon the steadfast face of Sergius our gazes fell.

Rarely at midnight would the Elder Theodore step from a boat at the entrance, and walking toward the sacrarium, reappear huge at the altar within chrisam and plaque and chalice, bearing the Host and Wine of the Eucharist. Blessed then it was, as we knelt, to see the face of Areta, adoring spirit's more than woman's. We sang no hymn; a few muffled Greek words rumbled like the echo of a reverberation from Theodore; whereupon his feet resought the way they had come. Areta might then melt somewhat; speak a word to me; her kindled pity for the Redeemer's trouble seeming to suage into twilight the starlessness of her own crude night. She might produce from her chamber hooks, and I at her bidding would read, perhaps von Hardenberg's Hymn to the Night commencing: 'Once when I was shedding bitter tears; standing by the grave which hid the Form of my Life; chased by unutterable woes; forward could not go nor backward; lo, from the azure distance fell chill breaths of Twilight; and the band of Birth, the fetter of Life, was rent asunder; thou, Night's inspiration, Slumber of Heaven, overcamest me; to a cloud of dust that grave expanded; through the cloud I beheld the transfigured features of my Beloved'; or the mystical aphorisms of Siris would fit her mood; or Arthur Collier's ideality in Clavis Universalis. And sometimes within the passing months I would tremble to see her wan face dimple fleetingly into the very smile of Areta; and noticing one night her spinning-wheel of electrum — quick-gleaming alloy of gold and silver — stand by contrivance of my artifice with violet-dark wool on distaff near the coffin, she did at length stretch out doubting fingers, and commence a woven undertaking. And the droning incessant circle bred a stirring in the roots of speech. At last — I shot a glance of triumph at Sergius — she yielded to the impulse of words.

'He had long, you know, been ailing: phthisis was his worm. And the intense contemplation of sleepless weeks was its fattening aliment. For the last few months of life the spirit might be said to sway half-disembodied; but eschewing his bed, he still studied and roamed. I never left him. You know the unspeakable sympathies which from our dual birth united us; but now for the first time our two souls lost definiteness, and hovered into one. I was lifted at times into awful heights to share his apocalypse of the world. Nothing seemed any longer secret to him. The illusion of Time, for instance, ceased to cloud him: he knew the past and the future. He rearranged his little museum, changing the relative position of this and that, into a quite wonderful beauty; then locked the door, and threw the key into a hot sulphur-spring in the forest. Once, as he lay in languid sleep at noonday, I heard him twice call your name, 'Numa! Numa!' When he woke he said, 'Numa, I know, is moved toward us again; but I could wish he were now here; I could then commit you, with confidence, to him.' Speech was now a gasping difficulty with him, and I wondered especially that he should speak so of you and me. He seemed to forecast — I know not what. Soon subsequent, absolute powerlessness confined him to an easy-chair in the chamber where you first saw his body. I read to him through the day from the Hebrew scriptures, from his beloved Bishop Berkeley, and the hymns of Pindar. At every sunset he swooned to sleep; and slept happily to the next noon. Once, surprising from a mid-day trance, he dictated to me runningly in Hebrew three of those his imponderable metrical capriccios, and then fell back wearily to instant sleep again. I had followed him far, but as to these last words, the meaning was of subtler element than my spirit, and out-soared me. They may have been simple prophecy of quite simple events; they may have been parable or rhapsody, or prayer. His dear hand could no longer lift the pencil's weight; his eyes were two twice-illuminated moons. A little yellow bird called Beatrix, which it had been his whim to overpaint to a sombre grey hue, fluttered constantly in his breast, shrilling his name. He had so trained it from its motherless birth. I have everywhere sought it since his death, but in vain. At the beginning of the last week he again sighed your name; and henceforth every noon hoped aloud for you. On the third day he minutely directed me to draw a Key on paper, which, when it was finished, I immediately recognized as the 'key' figured in Wilhelm Meister's Wanderjahre; beneath this he told me to write the opening words of the angels' song in the Gospel of Luke beginning 'Fear not.' These two, the former above the latter, were to be inlaid in gold on the headpiece of his inner coffin; and this, as you see, has been properly accomplished by the Elder. On the next day he called me close; I kneeling before him, his hand rested upon my head. 'I do not doubt,' he said in the whisper of the dying wind, 'that he for whom I wait will come speedily. The hoofs of the rider's horse are urgent on the mills. I bless you then, Areta, and say good-bye.

Yield yourself utterly to God, little one. Give to every passion its wine, to every pulse its throb, to every song its dance. He, in truth, is pulse and blood, song and singer. Yield freely to him. If you would be perfect in divinity, let the Wind, passing, win from the whole intense gamut of your chords a wafture of richest perfected humanity. Ah, little sister, quick — my harp! my harp!’ Quickly I reached him his kithara; held it before him; handed him the quill plectrum. He faintly delved from it a distant air — ah me, an air known even in the highest cycle of heaven — which since childhood I had not heard from him. He then had measured it to the Gospel words: ‘Fear not... he shall be great... . and shall be called the Son of God.’ Ardently did I pray that while the harmony still clung in the web of my consciousness I might have opportunity to transcribe it into musical signs; but at that moment a hot messenger entered with your note of announcement. Even while I glanced through it, Sergius knew its meaning; and having uttered a sigh of rest, the visual body slid from him.’

‘But the melody?’

‘Passed utterly from me. In vain have I mined into myself for it. If I could hear it again — ah me, but once again — I think that the love and the hope of life, which seem dead within me, might yet — again—’

Sudden tears shined from her uplifted eyes. Her hands clasped rigidly.

So she spoke with me through the show circle of the nights, spinning. The chiller season passed, and the spring, and the leafiest weeks of summer. She had settled into an unvarying morne mood; words she uttered, only livid in hue, and pregnant always with the odour of the grave from which they winged. But to sit always and watch her loveliness, so sad, so lunar, was already the dizziness of frenzy. She had dressed herself in the mourning of loose purple draperies, made of a very flimsy diaphanous cloth. A fillet of gold circled her head. My blood railed at its channels; with torrent fury I leapt the barriers, and spoke to Areta — of our old loves among the caves and crannies — of the wild hopes which had led me back to Phorfor. I think she did not at all comprehend my meaning; quite simply, with mournful gaze upon the dead, she said: ‘Our whole love is hid in him now — yours and mine; conscript to the memory of what he was, and to this little all that remains to us of him.’ It was then that I knew that Sergius, living, was strong; dead, was invincible; and it was then that I called down upon that Argus cunning which, on my coming, had impregnated his body with eternity, the bale of every imprecation.

Yet, I too, won my small triumph. For on an afternoon of beginning autumn, when the sun had sunk not yet below the west-looking harbour-hills, I — induced her with me to the terrace! It was my tingling Marathon. ‘Bright! bright!’ she cried, hiding her face. Blood surged to her lewd limbs; visible to me was the ravelling of the cerements from the risen, pulsing flesh. We sat on a couch of alabaster on the lowest stratum of the terrace, quite near to the marble balcony-rail overlooking the bay. In the circling pink arms of the sands the purple basin of sea looked a dew-splashed violet cosy in the heart of a rose. Areta lived again. Sweet-linked waftings from the parterres set out staggering-adventurous to reach her, and reached her fainting. The sun, all glory-clouds and shekinahs, like the God of some mad universe belalalah’d en route, with cymbals and with dances, flamed down afloat in the gluth of a passion which he never assumes but when he would enkindle to mutual ardours the light-thoughted mother-hills of Phorfor.

Areta was simple childhood itself. Looking abroad on the rich vision, she laughed a laugh of perfect bonne camaraderie; nested herself snakily at the end of the seat; I reclining at length, watching close the spiritual play of her face. And we really spoke at last of things other than Sergius and his mummy.

‘See,’ I said, ‘how the sun’s rim demarks into seven contrasts of fire the colours of the tower. The glazed bricks have the appearance of red and blue and yellow heat.’

Looking, she laughed. ‘Mens agitat molem.’

‘The Elder’s mind—’

‘No, the sun-god’s: kindled by us; and kindling by means of us.’

‘And in another sense the Elder’s, too, — from within.’

‘In literal truth, yes: man, as Novalis without metaphor said, being a sun, of which his senses are the planets. In the case of such as Theodore above all.’

‘Singular man!’

‘He walks his uplifted way alone: dead to sorrow, hope, desire; in a strict sense king of the world.’

‘But listen, Areta: you miss the mark here: Theodore, I know, is not dead to desire.’ ‘Not? Then to what desire not dead?’

‘The conservation in his hands—’

‘Of the meanings of the stars.’

‘Of the opulent territories of Phorfor.’

‘Fie! of the revelations of God.’

‘The keeping of you safe—’

‘From what?’

‘From me.’

An oval ‘O!’ of lower’ comedy answered nine. ‘And I tell you truth, Areta, the day may come when you will confront the necessity of choosing between me, your cousin, and the Elder Theodore, whose face you never beheld.’

‘Really so? and whom think you I would choose — my father’s prophet, the guiding forefinger of my brothers thought, grey hunter in old alchymy and astrologies — or you, a worldly wanderer, lithe hopper in every grass?’

‘I know well whom you would once have chosen; but as to now, of course” Sweetly she smiled.

‘And am I then so greatly changed in — how many years? — six, I think? You are, as of old, ‘Numa’; a light-footed boy, I remember, somewhat empty of thought, lengthened now only by a sixfold growth of the leopard’s beard — which also could be sheared.’

‘Call the beard ‘fantasy of your dream,’ and me still rubious Numa, capricious with you in the long grasses of the valley.”

“What other than ‘fantasy of my dream’? and yet to me very hyacinthine real.’

“Card it with carding fingers: I promise you no dream but substance enough.’ “If my finger’s would but assume the office of the carder’s comb! But is feeling then less fantasy than sight? You do not mean this that you say of ‘substance.”

‘So men speak and think in the world, Areta.’ ‘You mean among savage tribes?’

‘No, but among races considered civilized.’

‘The gravers of their great men must scratch a shallow tracery on this ‘world’ of yours!’

‘Oh, very shallow indeed! There are many conflicting voices, you know; the writings cross and re-cross on the basalt; and as they rather lack the genius of sharp distinction between the really great and the only seeming, so confusion comes, and continual movement in a circle in place of locomotion.’

‘But you do not mean that they have a genuine conception of a material universe?’ ‘Extremely genuine and material, in the case of the great majority at least.’

‘They are not Christian?’

‘Oh yes!’

Areta’s laugh had a resemblance to the chirping of the cicada: so shining, and lalling, and dry. ‘Not Christian: for what account can they possibly render themselves of the many feats of magic performed by Jesus?’

‘The feeding of the multitude, and so on? I hardly know. Some disbelieve them; some nebulous-shruggingly neither believe nor disbelieve; some, in a fury of faith, charge them to the conniving leger-de-main of Omnipotence.’

‘The con — ! but these last are either hypocrites or self-deluders. They cannot conceive the inconceivable. If nature be phenomenon and nothing else, it is conceivable how one mind may, by its forceful action upon other minds, effect in them a sense of variation from the usual succession of phenomena. With such a hypothesis, magic becomes natural and easy. But like only can conceivably act upon like; you cannot, for instance, feed mind with broths, or blood with thoughts. Where therefore you introduce a conception of packed matter, the conceivability of magic — or indeed of any action whatever of spirit, divine or not, upon the phenomena perceived by other spirits — utterly collapses. And in the case of those who only half believe in the eyewitnessed performances of Jesus, there is, of course, no pretension to belief—’

‘But there is: many of these last indeed cling on with quite riotous vigour to the rest of the torn Book.’

The sun had set, Areta’s profile looked duhhwan, a misty crescent in the sudden dusk. Her drooped lash was as a trait of sea-weed dark on the spume of breakers under the Cyprian moon. Her voice tuned every moment to a lower sadness.

‘Yet Jesus was the most ideal of the idealists. ‘Matter’ to him was less than the dream of a dream. What, for instance, do these persons make of his saying: he that hath his spirit in such and such a way shall announce to the mountain: Be thou plucked-up! and it shall obey him? They must either think that he had a meaning, or hold him for a rhetorician — or, lower still, an orator.’

‘But the world, Areta,’ I said, ‘does not, you understand, call itself a thinking world, but an acting. Very slowly indeed, in its preoccupation, do the thoughts of its deep ones filter through the whole: and the reason is that pointed out by Des Cartes in Principia, and I think also by Malebranche, that the faculties we have are few, and designed for support and pleasure, rather than to penetrate the essence of things.’

‘But — I like your distinction between thinking and action. If there be nothing but spirit, upon what can action act, and by means of what? There is in truth no action but thought; to aspire is to be an adventurer; to dream is to be practical; to feel is to be a man of affairs; and when your world calls itself an acting one, it may simply use a euphemism for vague or wrong thinking. As for the Cartesian view which you mention, compare with it Berkeley’s saner one: that ‘some truths there are so near and obvious that a man need only open his eyes to see them; and such I take this one to be, that all the choir of the heavens and the furniture of the earth, have not any substance without a mind; that their being consists in being perceived.’ And now, having proved that, say, fire is nothing more than a particular combination of colour and form, and that colour and form can no more exist without a seeing spirit than a sound without an ear, Berkeley, you know, disdains to proceed to prove that this purely notional appearance cannot, for example, burn: merely remarking that that at least is obvious; and this is certainly the conclusion of Hume, Comte, and the rest. So that the faculties would seem to require no very ‘penetrative’ acumen for the perception of truths so superficial.’

‘And yet,’ said I, baiting my hook, glad at the drone and harping of her voice, ‘I venture to say that these truths are in fact so far from ‘obvious’ to the untrained mind, that they may even seem rather ridiculous to it.’

‘And why? Does the untrained mind then suppose that fire or rock is anything more than colour and form? and if so, what? what invisible, inconceivable thing does the colour and form hide from us? They would, at least, make the same impressions upon us, if this singular thing of which we are never cognisant were not there: and we cannot, therefore but assume it to be absent; since, too, we cannot imagine the unimaginable, to speak of it is to use words without meaning. If, moreover, a thing perceived be really nothing more than colour and form, the ‘untrained mind may readily arrive at the certainty that it can neither burn, nor do anything whatever; and hence that no power, as no substance, can be other than spiritual. As to how, in such case, phenomena have the ‘power’ of producing impressions upon our consciousness, one opinion may differ from another. Singular Jonathan Edwards in his Original Sin is, you know, actually driven to assume the constant re-creation of all existing objects for the purpose of reimpresing us at every moment; but to me there seems no necessity for the creation or recreation of anything; it is only necessary that we should be, and should dream. Only in the mysterious loom of the spirit can the woof of the world be spun; for if phenomena were in truth external, how could they, not being spirit, make impressions upon spirit, unlike upon unlike, especially as, being passive, they can do ‘nothing whatever’? There may indeed be a law of our mind that every time we are conscious of proximity between a form and colour called ‘hand’ and a form and colour called ‘fire,’ we shall also be conscious of pain: as to which, Sergius, you know, declared that every such consciousness of pain was the special act of the Divinity, — thus bringing Him in very deed ‘closer than breathing,’ ‘in our hearts and in our mouths.’ But at any rate, we can have no certainty that such law is universal, or that such special acts are inevitable: for is it not too probable that there are fingers in the universe which, plunged into flame, would feel torture indeed, but the torture of Arctic cold? the flame then must be without property, substance: and only substantial the nervous, visionary ich. And even for us, the law, if it exists, may not be always strict; the dream of yesterday was well-ordered; but as sometimes happens in the less lucid visions of the night, the phantasmagory of to-morrow may melt and writhe into strange distortions. Nay, on a night, I actually had the trance that he, my splendid dead king, held to the furnace a barchment which, like the bush of Moses, burned unconsumed. Ah, but let us return — to him!’

She stood upright, tall and grey. The moon was abroad in the heavens. I, conquering her hand in the trouble of love, kissed it.

‘Areta! Areta! this one night grant me, I implore! Do not return. For one night only leave Sergius to his death. Sleep, for me, in the castle!’

She smiled at my zeal with a shaken ‘No!’

‘Only this one night, for me?’

‘Shall we not go and sit together by him?’

‘My first prayer since I have come back to you: ah, Areta!’

‘Really your first?’

‘You know.’

‘You make it late.’

‘Then grant it early!’

‘Always wilful of bead, little Numa! and a lubricant for persuasiveness! It was really night. I, twining round her arm, led her pouting recalcitrant, to the portico. Far within the halls she must needs part from me; mounted on wings the marble stairway, torch in hand; waved me a swift spirit's good-night; calling, 'the second may be harder i' the winning!'

I had no hope, no wish for sleep. Plying the paddle of the shallop, I circled many times the basin of the bay, now halting in the shadow of a bill, now basking in the moon's utmost noon. A red light, steadfast to the changing hours, burned through a slit of the ripple on the shelly sands. I peace, low-sobbed, of an night tense in an agony of stars, distraught of eye as the patient stricken ox, and dumb with the pains of its passion, as I with the pains of Areta. Her words, the odour of her, her sweet yielding, had purged my blood to the ultimate element of flame; her name was nightmare in my aching gorge. I came to the inlet; passed upward. It was midnight. Here no gloating ardour of the heavens trenched upon the supremacy of Shadow in which the reach of fan-shaped lotus, close-clustering, slept a perfect nepenthe. I stepped from the shallop; entered the chapel. The darkness was complete. Long on the altar-step, on the spot, where she sat, I sat. Aloud now I found utterance to call her name. Then falling to my knees, I overcast the coffin with my arms, my head fallen above his head, beseeching him as a god. 'Sergius! if death have ears, solitudes! if ghosts be veined with the ichor of human pitifulness! open your lean and lungless bosom — stretch your adamant arms of Polar ice: grant me, still quick, lustful, craft to wrest her from your mortality! give her back to me!' A sudden glimmer like a taper-light seemed to glance behind me. I sprang panting to my feet: but all was dark as before. I returned to the shallop, and so out upon the bay. The steeply-slanting constellations, stepping foot and foot with the night, were evidence of its revolving. Having surfeit of the water, I came to land; and finding beneath the portico a hung heptachord, took it, and made a circuit of the spread castle. I was faint with the long sickness of desire; my lips lay dead for lack of the carnal life-flame of her kiss. To the East I stood beneath a square turret in a garden of spices. In a chamber on the second stage I knew that Areta slept. It was beginning morning: night, throeing with dissolution, spread out, like old misers on lamp-lit death-beds of velvet, a gluttony of bulging jewels; a languid, low-looming moon wrapped in elfin satins the crimson of pomegranate, and the grey-green of the tower, and the sardius of asphodel-berries, and the purple of myrtle-fruit. Here in galaxies fireflies poise uncertain, sun-birds and droning coccinellae dart. Turtles and nightingales hang their harps upon its willows. Inconsequent hints of zephyrs, hoth with the fragrance of clove and jasmine, came with healing in their wings to my parched lips and forehead. I sent up from the lyre a lullaby, tuned to the splash of a fountain which gushed from a basin of cipolin — a cold white spirit in the midst of the garden; muttering; wreathing with aureoles of the lunar rainbow her far-tossed hair of dew. I sent up the melody, and with it my soul, hoping for her face at the window: when a sudden consciousness of danger, a sense of some luminous descending mass, appalled me. My eyes being turned upward, I clearly saw whence it came — from a window of the third stage, that immediately above Areta. I had but the to rush backward before it fell to the earth. It appeared in the moonlight to be a great quantity of grey powder; and almost immediately on contact with the ground, it uttered a fremor of froth, and burst vividly forth into a carmine flame, mingled with writhing tongues of cobalt.

I hurried to the terrace. The red light burned steadfastly in the topmost Tower. Till morning I watched in vain to see a huge expected form emerge from the castle. Expected, I say, and yet with endless doubts; for Theodore's boat was a visible spot of blackness floating by the Tower- wall. I was confounded. Was his arm, I asked myself, indeed longer than the arm of man? Soon after the full dawn, the dwarf set out from the Tower, broom by side, towards the chapel. I beckoned him to me.

‘Is the Elder Theodore,’ I asked, ‘now in the Tower?’

He nodded.

‘And has been throughout the night?’

‘Ha, master! that I do not know.’

‘You know with what knot you last moored the boat; has she been since removed?’

‘Not, for certain.’

I loitered for some hour or two among the parterres. It was a dank, secretive morning. The mountains donned grey veils of pudicity, low-lashed matin nuns after the glut and riot of a night. Areta came to the portico, looked abroad, her face sedate. My heart leapt to see the purple mourning gone, and a peplos of saffron in its stead. A broader regency of gold chapleted her head. The mists seemed to rarify at the yellow sun of her. I went and took her hand.

‘I heard your sleepless moonings.’ ‘And did not show a face?’

‘Being sleepier than you! and their end, moreover, was so abrupt.’ I said nothing of my narrow escape.

We walked to the parapet. Just then the dwarf, paddling near the shore, was returning from the chapel.

‘Call him that he may take us back,’ she said. ‘Already, Areta — already!’

‘It is fitting now. Let us look with quiet joy—’ ‘Give me till noon.’

‘Till noon, persistent Numa? Well, till noon. You shall read to me in the castle. Call him that he may fetch the book.’

‘I will myself bring it. What book?’ ‘John Norris.’

I set off rapidly in the shallop, passing on the way the dwarf, who was making for the terrace. In the chapel I lingered a very long time, and when I returned, returned without the book. I had forgotten it. Strong agitation, half joy, half fear, throbbed within me.

Areta, looking, saw my pale face, and caught its pallor, fore-knowing. As I sprang to the stage, the dwarf, coming with a weighted basket from the castle, descended the steps to the boat.

‘You were even now in the chapel?’ I said to him. “Yes, master.’ ‘Did you miss sight of nothing?’

‘Of nothing, sir.’

‘And all you found as usual?’

“Yes, master.’

‘What is it? What is it?’ cried Areta. I sprang to her side.

‘Areta — love — I know not how — I swear to you — but the coffin and the body of your Sergius have vanished from the chapel.’

Never could I have expected such result. With the sudden curvature of a cankered lily, her head drooped forward. Heavy she lay on me as a white column of Corinth aslant in arms of a bower of bindweeds. I bore her to a couch in the castle, and there till the gathering of darkness watched the wanness of her apathy.

She rose, a straining, a luminous strange questioning in her deep eyes; dashed back her hair; Niobe bereft; and instantly fled from the room. Swiftly as I followed, she was already far in the shallop when I reached the landing-stage. Having no boat, I sprang to the sands, and ran along them till stopped by a projecting cliff; thence made my way to the inlet through the sea, which at no point reached me above the middle. On the altar of the chapel a light glowed. Areta, sitting on the altar-step, pored upon chasms, a pity to see. Sergius had left not a rack. It was a second death of the beloved to her; a twice-whetted knife piercing home from breast to back; acuter than at first, suddenness lending point. She was such that her heart was as a quicksand, deep-sective of every cherished object. Excision implied always the drawing of blood, and, it might be, the tapping of life. And the vitality of her ideal view of the world was oil to these flames; the loved thing, held the creation of her own soul, grew into the substance of its god, pant of her pulse, beat of her blood. And the embalmed body was all she had possessed of her Sergius; for the unfinished stained head of her attempt had been thrown aside as worthless. Thinking so, I stood near, moved with pity. She lifted her eyes and saw me; flashed a ray of mistrust at me.

‘How of the body, Numa?’

I started.

‘Were it not well to question as to that the Elder Theodore?’

‘The Elder? No! The Elder was in the Tower: I, standing by the parapet, saw no one pass on the water: the dwarf had the boat: left all as usual in the chapel! his strength could not have sufficed to move the weight: then you went to the chapel—’

Her head followed her wringing hands downwards. I was appalled at the close welding of this chain of inference.

‘You suspect me? Areta! With what motive—’

‘Alas! it is hard to tell: with no motive but one unworthy our race! Except indeed my fantasy be all awry — my love to him unknowingly estranged — or his to me — some punishment for I know not what—’

She stopped suddenly short, and together we darted wild eyes around the chapel in the infinity of new surprise. A voice in the air, in liquidest falsetto, in breathless impatience, called: ‘Sergius! Sergius! Sergius!’ And instantly from the depths of the black recess behind the reredos of the altar there slid like slanting light-rays through the air a little creature, a tenuous grey bird, an embodied breeze, a flash of life. It settled, still minstreling its luted sibboleth, to a fluttering rest in the panting bosom of Areta.

‘Beatrix! Beatrix!’ she called, in a note lucid-high as that of the tiny thing she fondled, ‘Beatrix! little herald! whisperer of his secret! fledged dove of my comfort! Thou art come then?’ Close she hugged it, trouling, laughing, trilling, light-wheeling to the hint of a dance, a maiden-canephorus tripudiary in the comus of the Dionysia. The transit from despair to frolic was perfect. No question she asked as to whence the bird of Sergius had come after so long an interval. It was a heavenly benison — a dear revelation — unaccountable but real: she made no scrutiny. The slim-sloping little bird, nothing but a winged voice, unappeasably garrulous of its Becket vocabulary, throated and throated again its shrill euion of Sergius! Sergius! — and every twittered sesame availed to open wide the heart of Areta to ever a fresh flood of Libyan buoyancies. Breast fluttering to breast, she flitted and whirled with the new love to the door of the chapel; and, heedless quite of the old, floated rapidly in the shallop down the inlet. Following, I dimly saw her disappear behind a winding of the rock; heard yet a last echo of the ceaseless pipe. Then walked drearily backward, as before, through the sea.

After this very many weeks passed away before I again looked upon the face of my love.

I won from the mysterious tongue of an old stepdame almost daily whisperings of her; how she spent herself upon the bird; fed it at every hour from her own hand; slept only tranquilly when it lay warm in the happy valley of her breasts; laughed with it, danced with it, was a wanton in the abandonment of her kisses; never wearied of the hypocrite zeal of its monotone. How sometimes, she would descend by a narrow stair to a side-garden of the castle, high-walled between two buttresses; daily there an hour or two; but how, as the suave winter of Phorfor drew on, her chamber had her always. This I learned. Several letters I wrote to her, protesting my innocence in the matter of the mummy; my constant longing for her; and once received a verbal reply that she would see me shortly. Hope burst at once into flower within me; but after many days of straining outlook, I dropped limp from my watch-tower, and fell to wide listless roamings over the domain. During all this time I was wary as to my life, knowing it in danger; kept circumspect eyes; barred my doors; never slept twice following in the same bed.

When the mourning-doves had once more resumed the practice of their elegies in the copses, I stood often near the small side-garden; and when spring had blown into still freshest summer, I quickened every day more ears at the gate than Typhon guardian-eyes before the garden of the daughters of Hesperus. Areta came at last one noon; I heard her step on the shells of the walk; the call of the bird. Outside I bent listening to her stirrings; listened till, after an hour, she walked back into the castle. At the same hour of the next day she returned. I, procinct with the sword of adventure, tapped at the wicket. She instantly lifted the latch, opened, and was before me, laughing cascades and carillons.

‘Little Numa! you? say ‘little Numa! little Numa!’

‘Sergius! Sergius!’ shrilled Beatrix, picking a crush of grapes and rose-buds from her lips, upturned.

She was dressed only in a thin llama Greek robe of umber brown, and through the shaken folds her limbs glanced, bluish to aspiration’s eye, as limbs of new-sprung Aphrodite mirrored fluctuant among brown sea-weed in the Paphian shallows. Her head thrown far back gave me view of the full convex of her throat, white as brandished legs of hamadryads in Apidamian glens by moonlight. Blue-blooded Areta! long-legged! — she was younger than the summer; she was the hopeless Ideal to the spring of the folie of perfect loveliness.

We sat beneath an almond-tree in blossom, obstinate snow beneath the universal sweat and glister of the sun. Before us a monarch-peacock, Argus-tailed, stormed its little hour on the path. The air of the garden was full of roses.

‘And Numa has not been to see us!’ she cried, billing to Beatrix, larks prattling to the sunlight in her voice.

‘Sergius! Sergius!’ ‘Areta! — you are light with me.’

‘Not at all: I have been here: you might have come.’ ‘But could I know —’

‘You have been brooding upon the death of Sergius! He has been giving way to melancholy broodings upon the death of our sw-e-et, sw-e-et Sergius!’

‘Sergius? Sergius?’

‘I! — you certainly mistake me as to that. Sergius is dead, Areta — dead as flint — as carrion—’ ‘He vibrantly lives!’

‘Dead, Areta! and so long ago—’

‘Fie! you let the delude you so? It was yesterday as much as a year ago, a thousand aeons ago. Time is the counter by which ploughmen — and little sw-e-et Beatrixes — reckon the number of their successive ideas; we surely should feel in subtler algebras.’

‘That is so, Areta: that I know to be so: yet, as you must see this same Time is the fated element in which we breathe. And Sergius, as men reckon, actually did die—’

‘Did I tell you that he dictated three far-meaning fantasias to me just before death? One of them had clear reference to this subject of Time, though of none have I been able to follow more than a footprint or two.

Would you hear them?’

‘Them — or anything you say to me.’

She repeated the compositions, slinging a knee between catapult arms, looking up, wondering at distance. Two of these, on later familiarity with them, I tried to translate into common English verse from the rhythmic Hebrew in which they were dictated; but I found their metrical parallelism packed with those archaisms and Chaldee-Aramaean enrichments (often obscure) in which the prophets delighted; so that owing to this, as well as to the extreme tenuity of their meaning at all points, I failed in the attempt. In the case of the opener third, however, I may have come somewhat better out of the thicket:

‘Shapes in the Fire come and go:
an orb from Scorpio swoons —
(empurpled woe!)
and horns hath she, and eyes,
and lethal trance, and voice, that as she hies,
the swan’s death-nocturne tunes.

I see a headlong Messenger:
her robe a crocus flame —
(confide in her!)
thrills shake her plumes amain:
her passion’s load, the burthen of her pain,
is the burthen of A NAME.’

There smiles a lady, veiled, in death;
bright angels round her chaunt — (mellifluous breath!);
she, from the VIIth sphere,
regards the VIth where gleams her lovely bier,
and sighs her ancient haunt.

List to the Organ's roaring throat!
Hymen's loud euois swell —
(triumphal note!):
this day two souls entwine:
their purple orgies drenched in aphrian wine,
and Priap loves, a-dell.

'I doze below four lax-zoned moons:
nude wails of woman rave —
(lugubrious tunes!);
nude, by a beach of bones,
their pallid pomp in torchlit dolor moans,
seeking a new-oped grave.

'Lo! — one I see — a child of man!
his outlines laved in light —

(complete in plan!);

eternal smiles he wears:

no clothing on his chiselled lustre bears, and yet is clothed in White.’

So for a long time I sat by Areta; she lithe as phosphorescence, and full of aery, moth-winged words; yet words infect always with the lues of Sergius and his mortality. And the next day she again admitted me to the garden; and so at every noon we sat beneath the almond-tree; amid saw the long-trained peacock, proud as a lady, step; and talked together in the interludes of the Corybant orgia of Beatrix. Once she came with me beyond the garden-gate. It was a morning magnificently broad and bright. Deftly I snatched the bird from her finger, and before she knew my meaning, ran backwards with it to the castle; passed up a stone stairway, along three corridors, and so to her chamber; saw all windows closed; posited the bird up on her square low bed, of ivory, arabesqued in a fan-tracery of gold; reclosed the door; and flew back to regain her. She, coming to meet me, stood: rather scared to see at first: then, guessing my thought, with the shaken pendulum-shoulders of half-comic reluctance. Further and further that long day did I first, then she, beck like folly-fire into the glades of the forest; umbrageous valleys of Phorfor thick with dewes and gloom; Calypso-antrums dishevelled with maiden-hair, for all that diamond intergleams of stalactics pin the frivolous tresses; azure-brown steep-banked rills we knew of old; boskets dim and tremulous and secret as the soul of treasure-finders; and where, at midnight, dumb footfalls heat to syrinxal lutings not of men, and routs of freakish aegipeds chase eyesidling Kupris under the tense-lipped leer of the witched, subconscious moon. Areta, finding herself in the very lap of summer, was impotent; resigned herself; fled before me, unattainable, calling; was a town-bred grisette rolling concupicent in feathery beds of heather. Not till dusk did we return, languid; passed slowly by the terrace; saw the shallop bobbing in the quiet twilight by the landing-stage; and the large boat by the Tower-steps; round in the little garden fell wearily to the seat, she leaning a pale face against the tree-trunk; then, with closed eyes:

‘Haste and fetch me my little Beatrix.’

As I passed along the second of the three angled corridors, I seemed to hear a rustling train on the floor of the third; but when I reached it, found it lonely. Entering the chamber, I looked for the bird; looked long in the agony of interest. Fearing, doubting, I returned to Areta.

Glancing, she saw me come from the door without the bird; and sprang pallid to her feet. ‘Areta! the bird—’

Again that under-look of mistrust, heartpiercing! ‘Where is she, Numa?’

‘It is very singular — she seems to have left — or been taken from — the chamber—’ She, suddenly tragic, cried: ‘Oh why — why are you here to plague me! If I but walk with you, talk with you — pain — bitter — falls to me—’ drooped then to the seat, face caught in hands, weeping.

Presently she rose, and with grave bent head, walked slowly without speech into the castle. Diligent search was made for Beatrix, the servants all requisitioned. Areta pined in her chamber; ‘heart-broken,’ said her waiting-woman. Beatrix had swerved like a vision into the breaths of the wind, slipped quite back into the jaws of the abysm whence she came. On the fifth evening, however, a letter, as I heard, was handed to Areta from the Elder Theodore. Though it was then near midnight, she at once set out alone; passed over the bay to the chapel; and the next morning sent word by the dwarf that daily food should be taken her from the castle, as in the days of her first seclusion.

That night I, too, took boat to the chapel. Areta, I found, had retired to her side-chamber. In front of the altar, on the spot where the body of Sergius once lay, another coffin, a malachite shell, now shimmered dully under a taper-glow; stretched, open, on the old trestles. In the headpiece was gold-inlaid the Key and angel-song, as before. Supine within lay a figure — a marble statue. I wondered at the minute burin, so intimate with the genius of death, subtle to catch in stone the inmost thought of the Azrael. Here was flesh twice mortal; here was Sergius himself, stiff-fixed in a sleep doubly eternal. As the Greeks in the days of their hairiest niceties over-painted every part of their marbles, wreathing the lips in rosy smiles of supernal loveliness; so here, with opposite hope was the figure painted over-all. Too clearly with opposite hope: for I knew not which to say prevailed in naked ghastliness, the stained face and slumbering lids, yellow as fennel; or the beard and lashes, matted black; or the leaden lips, or greenish ears, or livid finger-tips, or winding-sheet of gold.

As I stood regarding this effigy, lo, black velvet hangings parted before a doorway, and Areta, licked below the haunches by curling purplish tongues, loomed cold in a splendid unbroken gown of soft silk, all whiteness, like taper snowbergs, sun-smeared, clear against the black of Polar precipices.

‘You see, Numa,’ she said, coolly splenetic in voice, ‘I am not all alone. The Elder, knowing my loss—’

‘Stay, Areta!’ I cried, ‘can it be that you still suspect me of that wanton act?’ ‘In the first case, I seemed to wrong you; in the second I knew not how to imagine — the inference looked so clear—’

‘But you cannot believe this! I had no wish to rob you of your Beatrix! Were we not happy together? Can you not see that in all this there is a design deeper than our probing — a force stronger than we? That your suspicion is quite ill-aimed? and your trust?’

‘Forgive me then if that really so.’ Her voice mellowed. ‘The objects of our apprehension come and go, melt and harden before us in endless flux, and we are apt to seek for explanation in the activities of other minds, when perhaps it is we that vary in the temper of our loves and hates, passions and wills. At any rate, with the sight we now see before us I am well content; it has been graciously fashioned for me by the Elder’s own cunning and will more than replace

‘But, Areta! you will not look upon this hideousness from day to day — promise me

‘Numa! it is the very placidity of Sergius in death; full of a mournful greatness. If to your eyes hideous, to mine far from that. But I will sleep now. In the day-time you will come and sit by me.

She turned and went.

As I passed over the water to the castle, a sudden thought took me, as when deserted ships are smitten fervently aback into new lays on a gusty day. It had reference to the Key and Angel- motto ordered by Sergius to be inlaid on his coffin, and it was the fresh sight of these that night which must have pricked me to the thought. A troubled instinct seemed to rise in me that the significance of the device — too well I knew Sergius to doubt that it had significance — might not be deeper than earnest study. I knew that he had sung the words to an air of his finding; that he had measured them out in metrical feet. For many days after this I kept close, profoundly engaged upon the task. Long years before, on reading the Wanderjahre of Goethe, I had wondered at the introduction of this figure into the work; wondered that so meaningful a writer, with no apparent reason, should plump this seemingly absurd drawing, without intimacy with the context into the thick of his seriously-intended book. The ‘key’ had then seemed to me not only very frivolous, but even rather stupid. But later on I came to the certainty that in Goethe's mind at least (with its strong bias towards the mystical) the figure was alive with some secret meaning; and now assurance was doubled in me; for I knew that this must have been the thought of Sergius also, to the flame-jet of whose genius the hardness of the riddle had doubtless soon solved to fluid clearness.

I reproduce the figure; and it may perhaps be well if I barely indicate the very slow and steep road by which I toiled to some sort of apprehension of the significance given by Sergius (and I presume by Goethe) to this singular key. And first I was led by the extreme non-resemblance of the figure itself to my own ordinary notions of the genus key, to ask myself for what reason the author could have chosen to call the drawing a 'key' at all; and hence was confronted, in the first place, with the necessity of defining the word 'key.' What then, I asked myself, is a 'key'? 'That which opens,' I at once answered; and that this is the commonest conception I was convinced by the occurrence in most languages of such metaphors as the 'key of the situation,' etc.: so Bosphorus was called the 'key' of Pontus. But reflection showed me how far is this from a satisfactory definition; for crowbars open, hands, winds, many things; nor do all keys open, as in those cases where the casket or safe, once locked by one key, can only be re-opened by pressure upon a secret spring — a spring which is, in fact, another key. And what I needed was a definition inclusive of all keys, and exclusive of all other than keys.

I was therefore compelled to step deeper, and then arrive at the certainty that a key is that rather which locks — which alone locks; nor are any exceptions to this truth other than apparent, as when automatic locks fasten keylessly, in all which cases the key-principle is, of course, concealed in the mechanism; and this fact is expressed in the German Schlüssell (key), i.e. locker, and so with clef, clavis, kleis (all related to English cleave, close, include, etc.). The key, then, I said, locks, welds together; and I thus got the idea of binding force.

But looking at the figure, I could not but observe how the four small circles at the corners of the handle are bound to the large central circle by the two lines running at right angles within the handle; and how the fifth, further away, at the top of the key, is also (less directly) connected with the same large circle by the shaft, or body, itself. Whereupon there arose within me the conception of a sun binding to itself five surrounding planets; and instantly I remembered Areta's repetition of von Hardenberg's apothegm that 'man is a sun of which his senses are the planets' — four senses (of sight, smell, hearing, and taste) closely connected with the cerebral centre of light and thought; and a fifth (of feeling) more distantly related to it by its diffusion over the body; there thus took shape in me the double notions of flame and human life: notions, indeed, so closely allied as to be almost one — as is proved not only by their interweaving in all the theosophies that have been, but by the common use in language of such expressions as ‘glow,’ ‘fire’ of life; and etymologically by the identity between such words as breath, spirit, etc., and purify, purge, fire, etc., all connected with Greek pur (fire). With the notion, too, of flame is allied (indirectly through the notion of breath) the notion of music; especially of such music as is sung, or won from wind instruments. But, says Goethe, in reference to the key: ‘Does it not remind you of arrows with barbs? God help us!’ Arrows with barbs — the unvarying symbol of flight with wings! and having reached this point, a glimmer of the connection between the key and the coffin-motto, ‘Fear not... he shall be great...’ lit me — the motto sung by the flaming and winged and human-shaped messenger to the maiden of Nazareth; and since this motto had yielded to the scrutiny of Sergius a metre, and been hymned by him to a melody, I no longer doubted that in the key would in very deed be found the key to this melody.

Remembering, then, my twin notions of flame and the human being, I set myself to seek in the key itself more definite expression of them; nor was it long before I observed that the whole figure is little more than a reproduction over and over again of the figure this figure, it will be seen, is formed by the ‘binding’ lines in the handle with each of the small circles at the corners; and formed again by each of them with the large central circle; and formed again by the shaft with the circles at its top and bottom; above all the whole key, if inverted, is, in its ensemble (omitting the barbs or wings), a general reproduction of it. But the figure is the antique and most elementary conceivable representation of the wingless human form, regarded as consisting of head and body; it also represents a burning and haloed candle or torch; a globed lamp; a tailed and flaming comet.

The figure, then, I assumed to be the rationale and motif of the whole key; and having determined this, I could not fail to remember that this very figure is also the obsolete Greek letter koppa. Now, koppa occurring between pi and rho would, had it been retained in the alphabet, have occupied the very place which the central u now occupies in the word pur (fire); it accordingly corresponds with our Latin q, and its line extended upward through its circle in fact makes a kind of double-q: Ae But as the whole Key, inverted, is koppa, so q, inverted, is none other than b; and the elements of this letter b (a semicircle and a straight line) are actually formed no less than eight times in the key by means of the ‘binding’ lines and the central circle. If, then, the Key indeed represented the key of the melody sung by Sergius, I had at last (remembering the flat delineation of the figure) the tangible result of B flat. And in this conclusion I was confirmed, when I considered that by means of the ‘binding’ lines within the handle, in conjunction with part of the central circle, and part of the curves bounding the whole handle, the elements of the ‘flat’ sign in music are produced no less than eight times over: thus b; and now I was able to see for what reason these boundary curves had not been made to bulge outward (a conformation which would have made the key a perfect koppa) instead of inward: for the inward curve was absolutely necessary in order that they might touch the central circle at four points, and so help to produce the eight repetitions of the character b.

It now only remained for me to take the Hebrew version of the words ‘Fear not,’ etc., and write down all the successive letters corresponding to the first seven (a to g) of the Latin alphabet: I thus obtained my notes. Time I determined by dividing two such letters, if they occurred consecutively by the semi-quaver, using quaver, minim, or crochet as one or more of the letters subsequent to g intervened. (In this convention I counted the Hebrew vowel-points as real letters.) Turning now to the organ, and trying my result in the key of B flat on the treble notes, I won — as any one may henceforth win — an air so Orphic-wild, and — to my seeming — so mournful, that it bore me captive as it floated upward; an air, too, at which the ears of memory pricked: I gradually coming to realize that this was no other than the very tune which in early childhood I had heard from Sergius.

All this time I sat often with Areta beside the statue. Autumn and winter supervened. Her quick fictile spirit likened more and more to the marble shape of gloom upon which she looked. ‘Deaths dreeriment’ prevented and pervaded her. She sat and read and wove and gazed. Her mood deepened to resemblance within that of the more hyper-spiritualistic of the Herrnhüters, and the Moravian and Bohemian brethren — the complex religiosity of the Brahmin yati basing itself upon the simple Christian faith. Her only books now were Spinoza’s Ethics, and the three treatises of Jacob Böhme: The high and deep searching of the three-fold Life of Man according to the Three Principles; the Introduction to the real Knowledge of the Great Mystery; and the Supersensual Life. She reverted to her habit of watching through the night, and sleeping by day; she clothed herself in the black habit of a recluse; the wanness of long fastings made her in the grey darkness of the chapel stranger than water-ladies hair-wringing beneath unnatural gloatings of the moon; her diet was cream thickened with raw crushed Persian apples. I wondered that two environments could so of one make two: such varieties were infinite in Areta! Not now was she the same but lately maenad-irrational with the lechery of spring. One link only seemed to bind her any more to me: her eagerness that I should convert to sympathy with her feeling. It was a quiet settled mania with her. She besieged me with meek persistence at every point.

‘Little Numa,’ she said, taking my hand in her two, ‘were you not ever my unrelenting shadow, hot-hunting me whither I fled from you? So now must you follow me where I go — as I him.’

She kissed me, once and again, motherly-familiar, on the forehead, I manoeuvring flagrant lips to the tingling transport of her cheek.

‘And where that is you know. Is it not’ — summoning the Uebersinnliches Leben of Böhme— ‘there where no creature dwelleth? where, having ceased from all thinking and willing, we hear what God unspeakably speaketh? To be real sovereigns of nature and ourselves, must we not be silent and quiet, and then are we as God was before nature and creature. We must learn to distinguish between the thing and that which is only the image of it; that which is properly angelical, and that which is no more than bestial. For’ — what says the writing?— ‘if thou rulest over the creature externally only, and not from the right inward ground of thy renewed nature, then is thy ruling verily in a bestial kind, and a sort of imaginary government; but if thou hast put off the bestial or ferine nature, then thou art come into the Super-imaginariness, which is a state of being above figures and shadows: and so rulest over all, being reunited to thy original in that very source out of which they came; and henceforth nothing on earth can hurt thee, for thou art all things, and nothing is unlike thee.’

She held my hand: she kissed me — lingeringly — again and yet again, on the brow. But I: ‘Yet here you seem wayward, Areta. As for me, I fly from my mast the flag of Sergius. Sergius and Jacob Böhme, it seems clear, looked through eyes of different-coloured irises. For, so far from bidding you cease from all willing, did he not say’ — was it not his last word to you — ‘give to every passion its rein—’

‘Sh-h-h!’ She extinguished my mouth with swift smothering hand, ‘you cannot suppose that the maxim will fit you — rudderless little Argonaut that you are! Nor yet me. Sergius it fitted: for in him every ‘passion’ was spiritual, and winged colt born of that instinctive mother-purity of his, which everywhere saw God: to give to such its rein was to be snatched into heaven. But you — thick, all clay—’

She swooped like a fishing-bird upon a sighted kiss in my hair.

But I again: ‘And is clay then, Areta, less divine than spirit? Not so, I am certain, did Sergius think. ‘Give,’ he said, ‘to every song its dance’ — and to you he said this, specially to you. Ah, Areta! is not body sweet as soul? Does not God beat and burn in both? To feast then must be divine as to fast: to kiss sublime as to pray. For is He not kiss, and kissed, and kisser; prayer and shrine, and pilgrim? So said Sergius.’

A disdainful sidling look, pouting resentment, kept her from answer.

One night — it was then beginning spring — she, looking upon the statue-face, said, frowning:

‘I somehow seem conscious of some sort of change. Look, Numa, see if the same effect is not wrought upon you, too.’

I looked, but shook my head. Yet the change, very gradually growing from day to day, had long been far from unknown to rue.

‘And with this consciousness of change, Areta, does not your fondness for the marble lessen?’ She seemed astonished.

‘How could that come? You appear to cling most persistently to the notion of some inherent reality in the things we see. If I see a thing, which I know can be nothing more than the image of my own mind, must I not also know that any seeming change in it is an exact reflection of some real change in me, by some means produced? so that, supposing I love the thing, my relative position to it must be at all times unaltered; and love, so long as it can realize the identity of the thing, follows it through all its modifications, as Boötes hunts Harmaxa, or as the suns in the tail of the Bear follow it through all its circhings round the Polar star.'

'But suppose,' I said, 'you know the means by which the change is wrought in you — the definite will of another mind working upon yours; suppose, for instance, the Elder, willing that you should be conscious of change in this statue, effected his purpose, in the fashion taught by experience to be possible and easy, by applying to it a burin, while you slept —'

'In that case, indeed, some loves might spread wings from their object; but as for me, even in that case, I feel sure — and your supposition is as wild as little Numa hunting hares of old on the mountains!'

She caught my head between antipodean hands, and dipped at it a steep kiss, motherly-playful. Little by little Spring slackened her girdle, swelling nymphic-gravid. Change in the statue now grew amain.

For this, not Theodore, but I, was responsible. Despair at its ghastliness and the deepening gloom of Areta had spurred me at last to come to the chapel during her sleeping-hours, and with furtive tremulous chisel to soften the face into a semblance somewhat more life-like; the chipped part I would then resmear with a hue less lethal, yet not too discrepant. And the effect upon her was very quickly evident.

One noon a mountebank, from a townlet beyond the mountains, arrived laggard at Phorfor. I hurried to the chapel.

Down a side-aisle I ran to her chamber. She slept. I intruded my head between the velvet hangings of the door-way, and called:

'Areta! Areta!'

She was as when the first presentiment of morning stirs in the plumage of the eider-duck; strained the ivory coronal of a bare arm lazily round her head; jerked suddenly stark, as in the last throes before death; and lay outlined sideways, hills and a central mountain in Lihhiput under the thin green coverlet, eyeing me through imbecile eyes.

‘Areta! a punchinello!’

‘A punchinello! O joy...’

Fleeter than the ether wings of instinct, more oilily than interfluent mercury, she leapt instantly before me, standing hot and rosy, clean-cut through the smoke-puff of a night-veil of gauze. Then quickly scarlet with remembrance —

‘Numa! go....’

I waited in the chapel, dubious, yet buoyed on the memory of all the craze and fervours which the appearance of a mountebank had meant to Areta, a girl.

She came presently, dressed in black. And mournfully negative, said: ‘I cannot go with you.’ ‘How! you will not let the man return—’

‘Let him be fed and paid.’

‘I certainly shall not stir without you, Areta.’ She stood looking at the changing statue. Then rushing furiously downward at its eyebrow a skew and still-born kiss, throttled my wrist. ‘Come then!’ Dragged me toward the door.

We sat beneath the almond tree of the little garden, and the punchinelho set his stage and puppets before us; fussy puppets with breath to grin, and caper, and perorate. Areta looked — mostly pale, averted, — with nostrils panting thorough-bred; now and then flushing into crimson; now and then rippling into sheer oblivion of laughter. The new sunlight seemed to wind her with ecstasy. That night I was able to force her to sleep once more in the castle. The greater part of it I spent in chiselling at the statue.

In the morning I returned within her to the chapel, she guilty and silent. We stood by the altar-rail — for a long time stood dumb, gazing on the emptiness where the statue had lain. The spirit of its pallid granite had passed into Areta; only, she just moved her head measurely from side to side, woe-ridden. Two hours before I had left the coffin safe by the rail.

All at once paroxysmal in queenliness, horizontal from shoulder-blade to rosy-armed forefinger-tip, she cried to me —

‘Oh go! go! — far from Phorfor — whence you came—’

I bowed. The suddenness of high blood had ever been a trait of our race, nor was I all undowered with its quiet-quick arrogance. I bowed — and walked instantly from the chapel, through the sea, to the castle.

So then Areta had dismissed me as a hireling from the ancient home of my family. I passed to my chamber, crammed a few pieces of clothes into a travelling-bag, and descended to the stables at the back. I saddled my horse, and was about to mount, when the dwarf, appearing from behind an angle, shambled briskly toward me, and handed me a parchment.

‘From whom?’

‘The Elder Theodore, master.’

I broke the seal, and read:

‘The Lady Areta has now commanded you from Phorfor. I, her protector, suggest that this injunction meet instant obedience.

‘Theodore.’

On the document I made haste to scribble in pencil the words:

‘I shall not go: and I defy you, Theodore’; handed then the parchment to the dwarf; unsaddled the horse: and returned to my chamber.

The thought which shadowed me all the day was the wonder that Theodore should know of Areta’s ‘go! go!’ He had heard it, then: but how? We two stood alone in the chapel; his boat was by the Tower. Had he asses’ ears? My faith in magic, to Areta possible as nature, was small. I sought deeply for explanation. I remembered how, praying one night by the coffined Sergius, a taper-flash seemed to glance behind me in the chapel: yet Theodore's boat was by the Tower. And I thought of the fall of luminous powder as I harped beneath the turret-window: yet the boat was by the Tower. And from what hand had Beatrix flown to us out of the chapel-recesses? How had she disappeared? The boat was then by the Tower.

At midnight I dressed in white, and crawling flat-faced along the marble terrace, reached the landing-stage; thence dropped to the sands; and so, still crouching, entered the sea, four-square; with hands bloody from the barbed star-fish of the bottom, I came to the inlet, fairly sure that I had thus cheated the eyes of Theodore. Having reached the reredos-end of the chapel, I struck light to a taper, and passed straight onward through a draped doorway. Never beyond this point had I dared before, nor, as I knew, had Areta, nor Sergius. A long and steep corridor, with branches veining out every-way stretched before me. After hours of search, I found that the alcoves, vaults, chambers of every shape, both along the main corridor and its ramifications, were past numbering. Many of these were doorless; many had doors, but open, admitting me to examination; one only, near the end of a long and very precipitate corridor which was the branch of a branch, hid from me behind a locked door. The position of this I marked, and judging that the time had now come when the night shudders into a deeper gloominess at the instinct of the near darts of morning, I returned with like secrecy to the castle.

At the next midnight I crawled back with the same furtiveness to the chapel, and made for the marked door. I carried a bunch of old keys, one of which chance at length fitted to the lock: there was no creaking, and I guessed a well-used mechanism. Within I found a large chamber, black every-way with its own bare rock, and empty. I walked round it, once and again, and met everywhere — nothing. Surprised, I again set out, holding the taper high; but happening now to come nearer one of the corners than before, I stepped upon air; plunged downward into the throat of an abyss; and bumping in my descent upon steep stone gradients, arrived at the bottom all shock and amaze. But I held the taper: in five minutes I was conscious of this. And light was in my pocket. I rekindled the flame, and found myself at the angle of two subterranean galleries. And now truth dawned upon me. For it was clear from their general directions that of these, one led beneath the sea to the Tower, and one beneath the inlet and the land to the vaults of the castle.

Here, too, having passed cautiously along the Tower-gallery, I found a honeycomb — clefts and crannies everyway, veins, chambers. The chief artery itself was full of windings, angles. For about two hours old Erebus blinked in every nook at the innovating flicker (if my taper. I went so far sea-ward as to see the steps leading down from the lower: their length showed me the great depth of the excavation beneath the water. Then back again into the side-catacombs, eyes stepping in my careful feet, a thief in the night, all leers and tremors. Once, far in the labyrinth, I stumbled over some rock-debris. Instantly there was an answering sound: a faint stirring as of shaken plumage, and this barely-whispered, sleepily-voiced interrogatory: ‘Sergius? Sergius?’

It came from behind a bolted door opposite where I stumbled. I drew the staple; entered; roused grey Beatrix in her hung cage of reeds to a sage lateral interest of round eyes in roe; saw the mummy of Sergius in its shell; and near it the statue in its coffin; then, knowing morning near, rebolted the door; returned to the chapel-level; locked the door of the stair-chamber; and with elaborate secrecies made my way to the castle.

Before midnight of the same day I had toilsomely lifted the statue-weight from its coffin, and round its neck fastened a provided rope: with this, having slung the Beatrix-cage upon my back, I dragged draught-cattle-wise, barked at by Cerberus echoes. Progress was slow. The taper, carried in an alternate resting hand, showed me now, what I had previously noticed indeed, but not in such numbers — large cloth bags, stuffed with some soft substance, laid here and there on the ground of many parts of the labyrinth. Resting, I happened to see a little of the powder which as (I concluded) filled the bags, spilt by chance at my feet; it was grey, and I remembered the descending mass beneath the turret-window. I stooping to examine it, a flake of hot grease fell near. The powder instantly volleyed me such a hoot, that space seemed to split fragmentary round me, and I woke to sense prostrate against the wall, deaf but to the booming buzz of my own waltzing brain, and blind but to the two bluish round ghosts that hovered before me in the darkness. When I had relighted the taper, Beatrix was still fluttering and screaming with fright. I had now passed through the length of the vein, and was near the main artery. I dragged the statue after me up a step, and proceeded slowly on this final stage toward the stair. I had not consumed many yards, however, before there sounded upon my palsied consciousness from behind an angle of the corridor the stalk of an approaching step — and, O Heaven, the rustle of silk. I spun motionless, fled riveted, was fixed in sick gyrations, like the statue of a whirlwind, was everything in a moment and nothing, a circle in flesh, symbol of infinity, sign of zero. But only for one eternal instant: in the next I had extinguished my light, had lifted the statue in my arms, and, shuddering under the incubus, had plunged into the dark orifice of a cranny near me; just as Theodore, holding a candlestick, loomed into view. He came close, tremendous, heavy, veiled, himself a phalanx, a marching pyramid — passed close to my breath, unsuspecting — went yet a few strides beyond: when Beatrix, tempted, called, as if uncertain, ‘Sergius? Sergius?’ Theodore stopped statuesque, angled his head sideward; his ears a pair of scales, zealous to weigh the very dust of sound; and so for a full minute stood. Hearing nothing, he again strode two steps forward; and again the new sound stirred the bird to call, briskly now and loud. Theodore turned, hesitating, came towards me, glanced at the black mouth in which I hid, and passed somewhat beyond. Once more the bird uttered a note, and once more he halted short, the stone monument of an ear, grandly patient, his back towards me broadly immobile. Not now did I hesitate a moment: my shoes were already done off. Creeping from my retreat, I drew on tiptoe near him, all bloodless, collected, a concentrated corpse, and stretching a sudden head above his shoulder, puffed utterly out the flame of his candle. An ‘Ah — h — ...’ broke from him like the menace of thunder. I flew back to my cranny, expecting him now to return to the Tower for new light; instead of which he immediately came in my direction, and walked away towards the chapel, blocking my exit! In the chapel, I knew, he would procure a light, and return armed. I, clasping desperation to my bosom, grasped the statue-rope, and tugged towards the Tower; and finding progress all too slow, summoned the cracking thews of Atlas, and lifted the burthen, running, laying it down, running again, until I stood at the foot of the Tower stairway. All this time, Beatrix, wildly swinging in her cage, was two ecstatic winnowing-fans in a granary of chaff. From the step-foot I half hoisted, half dragged, the burthen up the stairway, and had overcome more than threequarters of its steep length, when I beheld Theodore heaving rapidly towards me along the corridor a mountain in travail, steel glinting in his right hand, as when a regiment winks moving on the hillside. Upon the strength of Atlas I piled the fury of Samson — the statue grew light at my maniac tendons. Before the Elder of the Tower had halved the stairs, my head was prising up the trap-door of iron above: it gave sluggishly — I urged and hunted the statue through the aperture — pelted myself madly after it — and slapped down the ponderous metal upon the snapped point of Theodore's blade.

Having spindled the hasp on the top of the trap-door, I found myself in a dark room; but quickly discovering the locked door, the key of which projected inwardly, I opened it, and easily towed the statue over the glazed bricks of the flooring to the boat by the Tower-steps. The wakeful dwarf, dumb at my apparition, gazed upon me with fish-mouth vacant as his eyes. I was soon by the landing-stage, and so with my burthen reached the castle. Looking in the darkest morning from a casement, I dimly discerned Theodore wading to the Tower through the sea — vast as a reef when it awfully forges through the fog athwart the drifting mariner.

I cull some few sentences from a journal which I kept at this time:

Elaphebolion, 3rd (hist.). Areta, then, will not see me. Will let me go without one last look or word. My note of to-day was the third in which I have declared my power to prove the quite natural means by which her mementoes of Sergius have disappeared. She sends no answer. Her old waiting-woman has been with me again by stealth: is all in my favour, and full of sibilant talk, breathless news. Theodore, it seems, plies Areta with missives: warns her presumably against seeing my face. I work all the night, and nearly all the day, upon the statue and the bird. The thought that I have thereby made the spirit of Areta somewhat brighter will be to my exile like fruit in winter: she will see my hand, my care for her, and remember how I loved.

Elaph. 4. This day I have received the first message from Theodore since the incidents in the galleries. My minute outlook seems to have filched him of the hope of assassinating me by cryptic drugs and dirks. And so open murder is to sit arbiter upon us. His parchment was a conjugation of the verb dare: you dare, you have dared! 'We cannot both abide at Phorfor.' Foolish old man! he does not know how soon Phorfor will heave a rid bosom at me. I wrote on the parchment: 'I will not go. Swords punctually at midnight of the 9th in the chief underground gallery of the chapel.' An hour after the answer came: 'It is well.'

Elaph. 5. I am toiling as before at the statue and the bird.

Elaph. 6. By the 9th all will, I conclude, be ready. I shall leave a note for Areta, and set out by dawn of the 10th, provided only that Theodore's sword do not prove longer than my life.

Elaph. 7. Areta's room is constantly warm with her: so the old dame reports. The Mahlström of the spring, it is clear, has not caught her in its now widening whorls. The three last troparions of Sergius she has written out afresh, and studies them long. These, and a few books marked with his name, are all she has of him.

Elaph 8. This day I have been pondering upon my appointed meeting with Theodore. An unwillingness has arisen and grown almost compulsory within me. He is an old man; many reasons come to me. Yet he must not think me dreadful of his power. Time must decide for me.

On the 9th no entry appears. During the evening of that day I sat and wrote my letter of farewell to Areta. The room was the one in which I had chiefly lived of late; vastly domed; tapestried in Utrecht velvet of red, but blood-black under the orbed moon of pink light pendent from the centre. It jutted from the castle on the second stage, somewhat basilica-shaped, the roof being low and flat over the semi-circle at the far end. On one side it looked east towards the mountains, and west over the bay on the other. A palisade of taper stained-windows, Gothic-mullioned, surrounded it. Half the length of the west side was filled by a ponderous organ, the most important of the three in the castle. I sat and wrote my letter, and had not finished, when, hearing an opened door, I looked, and saw, to my confusion, Areta herself stand; simple in silver-white linen chiton, zoned with gold-cloth; an azure and rosy diamond in her forehead flirting lissom at hide-and-seek with the various spirit of light.

A thick sadness veiled her face. ‘I have come, Numa, in friendship, to bid you farewell — having just heard of your resolve to go from us tomorrow.’

‘Ah, that is kind. And you do not fear the Elder’s malison, I hope?’ ‘I fear nothing, Numa. But you speak lightly, sir, of the great Theodore.’ We sat together on a couch within a small recess. The hangings before us half hid us from the room.

‘It is a pity,’ she said, ‘that you have so acted as to rouse his gentle mind to displeasure. You and he cannot, it is certain, now live upon the same atmospheres. One must disappear — you are a boy — he hoar with the snows of reverence — ah me!’

‘Yet not for the displeasure of Theodore do I go: be sure of that, Areta: but because you, with your own lips, have bid me.’

‘That was the mere wind of the blow which struck me; the flash of the sword which pierced me. I was deeply wounded, you must know. Forget that, Numa. But now a far stronger reason urges. Theodore is mortally angry with you, sir.’

‘And because I have committed the sin of loving you.’ ‘Of —— ? No! of not loving me, you mean.’

‘Areta! why, the pebbles on the beech moan with the torment of their thirst when you pass on them — the callous heart of ocean flares into scarlet flames at you! And how have I shown this impossible lack of love? By removing, of course—’

‘Yes, Numa.’

‘But in that case my only motive must have been jealousy, which is but the yellow mustard- flower of love.’

‘And some such half-notion it was which has helped me towards softer thoughts of you. Yet it was a base jealousy — of one far nobler than you — and so venomous bitter in its effects—’

‘And now, if after all it be not true that I did remove your treasures, Areta?’

‘In each case the Elder saw you in the act: in his wisdom, though absent in space, not merely saw, but foreknew: and warned me beforehand that if I laughed with you, went abroad with you, you would be led to do so and so, with such and such motive. All which unheeding, I rushed on, and was punished.’

‘Have you slept to-day, Areta?’ ‘Yes.’

‘Then stay with me to-night — the last — till midnight, at least. It will be a memory to me.’ ‘And why midnight?’

‘I may leave you then for a while. Before, I should without advantage pain you by turning all you hold light into the blackness of darkness; your childhood’s eidolon of truth into the very Isis of lies. But after midnight, if fortune steer my steel, I may to good purpose hold to your eyes lenses rather less distorting.’

She did not understand. We sat together silent. The spaces of the night marched by us. She was the grey symbol of apathy beside me, a grey pen in the gloom of the recess, still wearing on her pensive forehead the jewel without name of her lost celestial home. Did she not care that I should leave her lonely in the morning? Was Sergius still the just dead bridegroom of her widowhood? She took from the sinus of her dress a small roll, the three new-written fantasias of his deathbed. Pored over them in the dim light, bent, forgetting me. Then suddenly vocal:

‘What, think you, did he mean by ‘suns whose rays are living lutes’?’ ‘I cannot tell, Areta. Read the whole.’

The cooing doves of her voice were like a bath of lukewarm luxury to my wallowing. She read the poem.

‘Sergius best knew his own winged meanings, Areta: they may, as you once said, have been prophecy, or rhapsody, or prayer.

‘The second was the prayer of a Moses dying at sunset on Pisgah.’

She read it, bent grey in the gloom.

‘The third seems mere poetry.’

‘Do not think so! — he never conceived mere poetry.’ This too she commenced slowly to read:

‘Shapes in the Fire come and go:
an orb from Scorpio swoons —
(empurpled woe!)
and horns hath she, and eyes,
and lethal trance, and voice, that as she hies,
the swan’s death-nocturne tunes.

I see a headlong Messenger:
her robe a crocus flame —
(confide in her!)
thrills shake her plumes amain:

her passion's load, the burthen of her pain,
is the burthen of A NAME.'

'Areta!' I cried, breaking in, ecstatic. A sudden flash seemed to enkindle a whole landscape of truth to me. 'Areta, love!' I sprang to my feet. 'A crocus flame! — thrills shake her plumes — my God! the burthen of a name! You shall see!' Heedfulness died in me, moderation, remembrance, and hurrying to an opposite recess, I dashed aside the draperies, mounted on moveable steps, and threw wide the doors of a high-hung cage. There was a stirring, a meditation, a poising, and instantly a little saffron bird, yellow-bright as orpiment, took flight, clipping within twinkling tongue and wing a ruled and fluid pathway through the air — alighting upon the high white bosom Areta spread to it.

Her face changed to the beaming sunlight of joy. She knew Beatrix, though changed by my earnest lavings from the grave grey of Sergius to her native gold of Canary.

'And thou hast come back to thy Areta's soul' — whispering low — 'ah wild, wild aeronaut' — hugging it to her throat — 'come back in gaudier robes — and yet I love, I love, I love thee just so, too — no other than just so, little prodigal! But say your master's name — lisp, lisp it to my secret ear — sw-e-et — Sergius!'

'Numa! Numa! Numa!' shrilled Beatrix, recovered in breath, eloquent of the briefer euphony of my own arduously inculcated name.

Areta slid into waltzing with the bird, her head tossed back, laughing.

'O changeling Beatrix! O wanton breeze! O whirling whip! What, another name, then? No longer deserted Sergius? And does the new-launched burthen loll move lightly, then, on the ebb and flow of its little, little, liquid throat? Ah, it is well! it is well!'

We sat again within the recess, the bird swiftly fickle from her to me, an incessant slim bobbin zealous for the net, a frantic ploughshare in the sands, stitching us together with a million airy threads. Numa was her constant burthen.

‘Confide in her, Areta! ha, love! can you not now believe that the mighty soul of your brother lovingly foreknew me?’

She looked upon me and smiled.

A huge clock of greenish-black augite under the rosy central lamp tolled midnight.

‘It is midnight. Whither was it you spoke of going?’

‘Nowhither, Areta. I will not leave you to-night.’

The indecision had frozen together into sudden resolve within me. No blood, I decreed, of me or by me, should spill at that final parting-time. Theodore, if he dared, might think one of my race a coward. In the morning he would know me gone for ever.

But I rose, and bearing the steps to one of the high western windows, mounted upon them, and slightly opening a stained half on one side of the mullion, peeped through. Theodore would probably go to the meeting-place by the underground way, but if he took boat, I was there to wave him signal of my changed purpose. He would not wait to see me leave the terrace in the shallop, knowing that I now knew the subterranean way from the vaults of the castle.

Several minutes passed; then concluding that he had by that time reached the rendezvous I commenced to descend; but was arrested — seeing a shadow, the shadow surely of Theodore, pass by a blind of the Tower. Awe and confusion filled me, dread of his dreadful subtlety. What woof did he weave? He was not in the Tower having returned from the meeting-place: for this the time since midnight was utterly insufficient. He had not therefore gone at all. But for what reason? As I stood debating, a horrible bursting and cracking, uproars of wrack and shock, earth- heavings, throbbed and thundered at my ear, loosened my knees. Enceladus, compact with tremors, crawled beneath us. The castle, flicked but by the tail of the explosion, shivered as with the coldness of horror. Looking in the direction of the chapel, I saw the wide winging of smoke, flying rocks, a dull lurid flare. Then I knew in my hurrying heart how precipitous was the ruin I had shunned; how stern, majestic the wrath of Theodore. There came a moment of lull — a sickening treachery of peace — and in the next instant the Tower in the sea sent up to heaven a wild shrieking bellow, and from the centre of its summit an infinite clean spear of crimson and blue and greenish flame laddered yells of horrid menace to the stars. The earth-shock, immeasurably fiercer in its effects than its author's thought, had communicated the fury of its fires along the underground gallery to the witches' cauldron of volatile chemicals in which Theodore brewed the sorceries of his dark will. The Tower throed, and frittered, and spat red bricks as a grounded pugilist his bloody teeth. For a moment, on the topmost parapet of all, a hunted monumental form appeared — a veilless face — with a similitude of excrescent horns on the forehead — a face which was but a dead and thick and featureless lump of lavender-leprous flesh, lit and lashed by scorpion whips of flame from his silken robes and wide-burning fleece of hair; but the gallery cracked from under him; he lurched ponderously, and lancing a far-circling shrill, empurpled, to my fancy, with a strange chaunted hint and cadence of a death-melody, fell — like holocausts slung flaring from the battlements of heaven — old Lucifer hurtling rotary in somersaults of steep combustion through — the interspaces. And immediately thereupon the whole fabric burst, and rumbled down upon him, building him a funeral mound of hissing bricks broad above the surface of the water.

Of all this Areta had seen nothing. She stood in the middle of the room, three-eared, with lifted auditory hand.

‘O Numa, tell me — what is it?’ she cried, wan in voice and face.

I led her by the hand to the recess.

‘Listen, Areta, and believe serenely that all is of God — the Elder Theodore is dead.’ She doubled, hiding her face in her lap.

‘Dead....’

To her it was the dissilience of whole Scorpio from the zodiac.

I, in solemn peace, spoke low, unveiling all. Her face was buried from me; she made no sign; only, when I told how that Theodore had lied to her, she shook her head, quick-sobbing:

‘Oh no, no, no....’

For a long time then we sat speechless. Her face I could not see, but I knew it veiled with the crape of tragedy. The spaces of the night marched by us. The clock chimed three.

‘What can he have thought, seeing all?’

‘Sergius?’

‘Yes.’

‘Sergius, I incline to think, probably mastered long before death, to a far greater degree than you or I, Areta, the alphabeta of that dark Sanscrit in which Theodore’s soul languaged itself. But he, like Theodore, is dead now; and it can be of little moment to us what he thinks.’

There was silence between us for a while, till she, as if reasoning with her own thoughts, said, ‘But strange! strange!’ and began again to read slowly the vision of Sergius:

‘Shapes in the Fire come and go:
an orb from Scorpio swoons —
(empurpled woe!)
and horns hath she, and eyes,
and lethal trance, and voice, that as she hies,
the swan’s death-nocturne tunes.

I see a headlong Messenger:
her robe a crocus flame —
(confide in her!)
thrills shake her plumes amain:
her passion’s load, the burthen of her pain,
is the burthen of A NAME.’

There smiles a lady, veiled, in death;
bright angels round her chaunt — (mellifluous breath!);
she, from the VIIth sphere,
regards the VIth where gleams her lovely bier,
and sighs her ancient haunt.

List to the Organ’s roaring throat!
Hymen’s loud euois swell —
(triumphal note!):

this day two souls entwine:
their purple orgies drenched in aphrian wine,
and Priap loves, a-dell.

‘But,’ I cried aloud, suffused, and, as it were, electrically shocked, by a revelation, ‘this — this was no voice of man, but of a glowing spirit from heaven!’ and rushing to the organ, I furiously filled its mighty frame with wind; sat before the notes, and in victorious euphony, in pealing acclamation, I sent boasting and gaudent through the timid silence of the morning the angel-song of Sergius. The air was his intact; but instead of the sad minor-key, transposition to a major; instead of the solemn serenity, the light step and golden pomp of wedding marches. The bass was my own. Never so shall I play again. Areta was behind me, her hand on my shoulder, trembling; her face pressed hot to mine. Beatrix, long since flown to her sleepy perch, but pricked to sympathy by the practice of her own native art, warbled a continuous drowsy serenade of my name. All this has self-maturing memory brought me back. But for the time I was lost to sense. Music was a well of living water within me; the broad bosom of the organ shivered at me as when a Pegasus finds its unappeasable rider. I leaned faint upon it when my tyranny was accomplished.

‘O Numa’ — her two hands on my shoulders, her face a rosy lake-ripple looking up at dawn— ‘O Numa, you have—’

She stopped. ‘And whence, of whence, have you drawn this power over me? You seemed to me a little Numa-god as you played!’

‘The piece, you see, is changed in movement and key from the melody as sung by Sergius.’ ‘Changed — and glorified.’

A pain went lightning through me.

‘You like it better so?’

‘Yes — that even must be.’

‘The written music, if I go in the morning, you shall have.’

‘If you go. But not the pippling of every popinjay is a prophecy, nor the whisper of every wind a warning!’ She laughed, mocking my impotence.

‘And do you not see it surely true, Areta, that the great soul of your Sergius lovingly foreknew me?’

Her look rested upon my face: her hand fell to mine.

We sat again within the recess. I opened to her the pit whence I had dug the lost jewel of the melody. Grey spaces of the morning now shivered past like home-turning ghosts. After long intimacy with her, I bent the trickle of our talk to our child’s friendships, delights and abandonments together in the deep places of Phorfor. She turned herself from me.

‘Children,’ she said, ‘are—’ ‘Yes?’

‘Are—’

‘Tell me!’

‘Sensual.’

The word rived her with a shudder; but if of luxury, or if of self-retention, I could not say.

‘And men too, Areta, and women. Is it not the barm of the Holy Spirit lovingly uneasy in our bodies? So said Sergius.’

She made no answer. Stealthy mists of seriousness had again crept gradually large around her. Contact was no longer possible. She became burrs to me and a battery, memorable to pilgrim fingers. The shadow of some thought in her stretched between us.

Morning threw wide casement after casement: the cock was as a herald with clarion vacillant between hand and lip, tiptoe-parturient with the yet unvoiced evangel: Behold the Bride-groom.

An aged man-servant for whom I had drawn back the lever of a bell, appeared, bearing comfitures on a salver, and a mama of wine. I, pouring a glassful, presented it to her. ‘No! the day now begun is marked as a fast-day with me.’

‘See, Areta, how the night hops away with bedraggled wing, like a faint, wounded raven:

‘And now does the cock,
Half anxious its crow
Of tribrach and long,
Shrill: doesn’t it GROW...’

my hour them is near: will you not drink me a parting salve in this glass?’

This I said craftily, with hope in her answer. Her eyes leapt upon me in eager query. ‘Oh... you do not mean—’

‘Have you not bid me go? and you have not yet unbid me.’

Her lashes fell in long curvature upon a perfectly pallid cheek. I could see that she debated keenly within herself. After a time she spoke, arguing to her lap:

‘Well, if you will go, you will go. I here will give myself utterly to those vigils and tears and prayers which made her saintly; prayers, Numa, in which you shall not be forgotten.’

My heart sank horribly.

In saying ‘her,’ she pointed to a picture in oils of a long-dead lady of our race hung on the opposite wall: a middle-aged lady, with meekness in her look, and a radiance of unearthly sunlights in her smile, far known of old beyond the bounds of Phorfor as St. Anna, the blessed.

I, pale as she, held the wind before her.

‘Drink for me, Areta!’ ‘No! why urge me so? I have told you no — no.’

The flash of her anger singed me of enterprise. I sat again mouse-quiet by her side. ‘To what a point,’ she said, looking up at the beatitude of St. Anna, ‘must she not have adventured on the greased mast of spiritual attainment! Her life was a long upward gaze: an eye turned white to heaven. Before death she is said to have been familiar with the facial expressions of many of the winged things of the cycles of the skies. But — how singular — that we should speak of her — to-night!’ and she repeated:

There smiles a lady, veiled, in death;
bright angels round her chaunt — (mellifluous breath!);
she, from the VIIth sphere,
regards the VIth where gleams her lovely bier,
and sighs her ancient haunt.

List to the Organ’s roaring throat!
Hymen’s loud euois swell —
(triumphal note!):
this day two souls entwine:
their purple orgies drenched in aphrian wine,
and Priap loves, a-dell.

‘I doze below four lax-zoned moons:
nude wails of woman rave —

(lugubrious tunes!);
nude, by a beach of bones,
their pallid pomp in torchlit dolor moans,
seeking a new-oped grave.

‘Lo! — one I see — a child of man!
his outlines laved in light — (complete in plan!);
eternal smiles he wears:
no clothing on his chiselled lustre bears, and yet is clothed in White.’

‘Then, Areta — then — —’ I cried, frantically stamping to my feet, ‘then was the Sergius we knew indeed true prophet, and sibyl, and seer!’ — and flying towards the far semi-circular end of the chamber, I sent hissing apart along a brazen bar the two halves of a silken curtain, and revealed between the divided drapery, standing poseful on an estrade in the alcove, a statue of marble. Areta at the sight flew wide-winged towards me, rhythmic-swaying to the throb of timbrel and cymbal, eating up with inconceivable swiftness the vast length of the room. And we looked together, she leaning heavy upon me. Soft glammers of blue and crimson light, levelled by the now high-prospering day-spring through the stained windows, lotioned the head in a dream of colours. Only by the thick-matted black hair could she know it the very block of the Sergius-statue: in all else death had been wonderfully buried into life — the painted cerements all chipped from it, and in their place the white clothing only of its own immaculate marmor.

“But, Numa — it is you! it is you!”

She compressed from my sight a face all inflamed in her two tight hands. Twin-sisters, lake- women, rowed competitive to rhymes in the milky hollows of her breasts!

‘It is you, Numa! It is you!’

It was indeed I; I smiling rosy patronage; I nude; express; accomplished Man. Areta blushed. She was a vomiting Aetna of blushes.

But I violently tore her hands from her face, and I held them in mine, both in both, swinging them. And she, with prudish under-glance, looked up into me, I deep into her.

O broken heart of Love! in her eyes were films, and meanings, and the everlasting and impetuous YEA.

That morning a thievish sprite in my feet led me a-hunt through all the nooks and by-ways of the castle. By a studied plea I had escaped from Areta. Yet Sergius, either with design or without, had left little of himself behind: some sandals I found, a few gowns woven without seam, three books of Bishop Berkeley marked with his name. These I took, and kissing them one by one, worshipping, praising him as a god, I locked them in a cabinet, and flung the key far. An hour thence, I, rejoined to Areta, was with her in the woods, gathering flowers: she dancing raillery at every rein. Her lips and pure white dress were stained with the dribble of the syrupy magenta wine of the grapes of Phorfor, her eyes all glairy with its tipsy yeast. We had, indeed, tippled freely of its whispering nectar; and as the garland of ivy and violets with which I had crowned her had toppled aslant on her head, my riotous love had somewhat the look of an awry Bacchante rather drunken among the forest-glades. For many generations no marriage at Phorfor had been dehymenised by any such thing as benefit of clergy, and the laying on of frog-chill agastric hands: nor, as I knew, would Areta have tolerated any such. But from a slight gash in my fingertip she stained her tongue with my sucked blood; I mine with hers. Then repairing to her chamber with the gathered flowers, we bent to build the Altar of our Covenant: and, truly, it was upper Aiden and the very hair-curling tortion of delight to watch Areta, with what sighing pains, wifely collusions as of Bertha the Good, she took part in the making. It was low and broad by the side of her bed, and directly faced the rising sun. Plushy we made it, and furry, with riches and thicknesses of velvets; over-shading it with canopy of silk; and over and around the velvets we heaped a strew of ivy and violets (the blend worn in chaplets by the phallophoroi in the Great Dionysia); and over this we sprinkled poppy-flowers; and over this parsley mixed with barley- groats; and over this tufts of wool; and over all — on the front, and on the back, and on the sides, and on the top — we traced out in characters of the immortal flowers of amaranth this word:

aphrodite peitho

HUGUENIN, MY FRIEND — the man of Art and thrills and impulses, — the finished boulevardier, the persifleur — must, I concluded with certainty, be frenzied. So, at least, I reasoned when, after long years of silence, I received from him this letter: —

“‘ Sdili,’ my friend; that is the name by which they now call this ancient Delos. Wherefore has it been written, ‘so passeth the glory of the world.’

“Ah! But to me it is — as to her it was — still Delos, the Sacred Island, the birthplace of Apollo, son of Leto! On the summit of Cynthus I look from my dwelling, and within the wide reach of the Cyclades perceive even yet the fruity offerings arriving from Syria, from Sicily, from Egypt; I see the barks that bring the sacred envoys of Pan-Ionium to festival — I note the flutter of their hallowed garments — on the breeze once more floats to me their ‘Songs of Deliverance.’

“The island now belongs almost entirely to me. I am, too, almost its sole inhabitant. It is, you know, only four miles long, and half as broad, and I have purchased every available foot of its surface. On the flat top of the granite Cynthus I live, and here, my friend, shall I die. Chains, more inexorable and horrible than any which the limbs of Prometheus ever knew, bind me to this crag.

“A friend! a friend! That is the thing after which my sick spirit pants. A living man: of the dead I have enough; of living monsters, ah, too much! An aged servant or two, who seem persistently to shun me — this is all I possess of human fellowship. Would that I dared to ask you, an old companion, to come to the solace of a sinking man in this place of desolation!”

The letter continued long in this strain of mingled rhapsody and despair, containing, moreover, a lengthy disquisition on the Pythagorean doctrine of the metempsychosis of the soul. Three times did the words “ living monsters “ occur. Such a communication, coming from him, did not fail to excite my utmost curiosity and pity.

From London to Delos is no inconsiderable journey; yet, conquered during the course of a long vacation by an irresistible impulse, and the fond memories of other days, I actually found myself, on a starry night, disembarking on the sands that bound the once famous harbour of the tiny Greek island. My arrival may be dated by the fact that it fell out just two months before the very extraordinary natural phenomena, of which Delos was the scene during the night of August 13th, 1880. I crossed the ring of flat land which nearly encircles the islet, and began the ascent of the central mountain. The slumberous air languished with the wild breath of rose and jessamine and almond; the pipe of the cicada and the gleam of the firefly were not wanting to add to the narcotic charms of this land of dreams. In less than an hour, I walked into a tangled garden, and placed my hand on the shoulder of a tall, stooping man, dressed in Attic attire, who walked solitary under the trees.

With a fearful start he turned and faced me.

“Oh,” he said, panting, and placing both his hands upon his chest, “ I was greatly surprised! My heart...”

He could utter no more. It was Huguenin, and yet not he. The heavy beard rolling down his white woollen garments was, I could see, still black as ever; but the masses of unkempt hair which floated with every zephyr about his face and neck were bleached to the whiteness of snow. He stared at me through the dull and cavernous eyes of a man long dead.

We walked into the house together. The mere sight of the building was enough to convince me that in some mysterious way, to some morbid degree, the Past had fettered and darkened the intellect of my friend.

The mansion was of the purely Hellenic type, but nothing less than inconceivable in extent — a wilderness rather than a habitation. I found myself in an ancient Greek house — only, a Greek house multiplied many times over into an endless, continuous congeries of Greek houses. It consisted of a single story, though here and there on the vast flat roof there rose a second layer of apartments. These latter were reached by ladders. We walked through a door — opening inwards — into a passage, which in turn led us to an oblong marble court-yard; this was the aule, surrounded by Corinthian pillars, and having in the centre an altar of stone to Zeus Herkeios. Around this court, on every hand, was ranged a series of halls, chambers, th, hung with rich velvets; and the whole mighty house — made up of a hundred and a hundred reproductions of such court-yards with their surrounding chambers — formed a trackless desert of rooms, through whose uniform labyrinths the most cunning would assuredly fail to find his way.

“This building,” said Huguenin to me, some days after my arrival, “this building — every stone, plank, drapery of it — was the creation of my wife’s wild and restless fancy.”

I stared at him.

“You doubt that I have, or had, a wife? Come, then, with me; you shall — you shall — see her face.” He led the way through the dark and windowless house, lighted throughout the day and night by the dim purple radiance shed from many small, open lamps of earthenware filled with the fragrant nardinum, an oil pressed from the flower of the Arabian grass nardus.

I followed the emaciated figure of Huguenin through a great number of the gloomy chambers. As he moved slowly forward, visibly panting, I noticed that he kept his form bent downward, seeming to seek for something; and this something I soon found to be a scarlet thread, laid down to afford guidance for the feet through the mazes of the house, and running along the black floor. Suddenly he stopped before the door of one of the apartments called amphithalamoi, and, himself remaining without, motioned to me to enter.

I am not a man of what might be called “a tremulous diathesis,” yet not without a tremor did I glance round the room. For a time I could discern nothing under the sombre glimmer radiated from a single lampas pendent from wrought brazen chains. But at length a great painting in oils, unframed, occupying nearly one whole side of the chamber, grew upon my sight. It was the picture of a woman. My heart throbbed with a most strange, deep excitement as I gazed upon her lineaments.

She stood erect, robed in a flowing, crimson, embroidered, with head slightly thrown back, and one hand and arm pointing stiffly outward and upward. The countenance was not merely Grecian — ancient Grecian, as distinct from modern — but it was so in a highly exaggerated and unlikelike degree. Was the woman, I asked myself, more lovely than ever mortal was before — or more hideous? She was the one, or the other, or both; but the riddle baffled me. The Lamia of Keats arose before me — that “shape of gorgeous hue, vermilion-spotted, golden, green and blue.”

A hardly-breathing surprise of eyes held me fixed as the image slowly took possession of my vision. Here, then, I muttered, was the Gorgon’s head, whose hair was serpents and her eye a basilisk's; and as I so thought, I reflected, too, on the myth of how from the dripping blood of Medusa's head strange creatures sprang to life; and then, with a shuddering abhorrence, I remembered Huguenin's childish ravings about "monsters." I drew nearer, in order to analyse the impression almost of dread wrought upon me, and I quickly found — or thought I found — the key. It lay, surely, in the woman's eyes. They were the very eyes of the tiger: circular, green, large, with glittering yellow radii. I hurried from the room.

"You have seen her?" asked Huguenin, with a cunning, eager distortion of his ashen face.

"Yes, Huguenin, I have seen her. She is very beautiful."

"She painted it herself," he said in a whisper.

"Really!"

"She considered herself — she was — the greatest painter who has lived since Apelles."

"But now — where is she now?"

He brought his lips quite close to my ear.

"She is dead. You, at any rate, would call her so."

This ambiguity appeared to me only the more singular when I discovered that it was his habit, at stated intervals, to make regular and stealthy visits to distant parts of the dwelling. Our bed-chambers being contiguous, I could not fail, as time passed, to notice that he would rise in the dead of night, when he supposed me asleep, and gathering together the fragments of our last meal, depart rapidly and silently with them through the dim and vast house, led always in one particular direction by the scarlet thread of silk which ran along the floor.

I now set myself strenuously to the study of Huguenin. The nature of his physical malady, at least, was clear. He laboured under the singular affection to which physicians have given the name of Cheyne Stoke's Respiration, the disease manifesting itself at intervals by compelling him to lie back in a perfect agony of inhalation, and groan for air; the bones of his cheeks seemed on the point of appearing through their sere wrapping of mummy-skin; the ala of his nose never rested from an extravagance of expansion and retraction. But even this ruin of a body might, I considered, be made partially whole, were it not that to lull the rage and fever of such a mind the world contained no anodyne. For one thing, a most curious belief in some unnamed fate hanging over the island on which he lived haunted him. Again and again, he recalled to me all that, in the long past, had been written about Delos: the strange notion, contained both in the Homeric and the Alexandrian hymns to the Delian Apollo, that the island was or that it was merely secured by chains; or that it had only been thrown up from the deeps as a temporary resting-place for Ortygia in her travail; or that it might sink before the spurning foot of the new-born god. He was never tired, through long hours, of pursuing, as if in soliloquy, a kind of somnolent, mystical exegesis of such passages as we read together.

"Do you know," he said, " that the ancients really supposed the streams of Delos to rise and fall with the rise and fall of the Nile? Could anything point more clearly to a belief in the extraordinary nature of the island, its far-reaching volcanic affinities, occult geologic eccentricities?" Often would he repeat the punning hexameter line of the very ancient Sibylline prophecy often, too, having repeated it, he would strike from the repining chords of an Aeolian lyre the air of a threnody which, as he told me, his wife had composed to suit the verse; and when to the funeral wail of this dirge — so wild, so mournful, that I could never hear it without a shudder — Huguenin added the melancholy note of his now hollow and plaintive voice, the intensity of effect produced on me reached the intolerable degree, and I was glad of the dubious and pallid and purple gloaming of the mansion, which partially hid my face from him.

"And Samos shall be sand, and Delos (the far-seen) sink from sight."

“Observe, however,” he added one day, “the meaning of the implied epithet ‘far-seen’ as applied to Delos: it means ‘glorious,’ ‘illustrious far-seen to the spiritual rather than to the bodily eye, for the island is not very mountainous. The words ‘sink from sight’ must, therefore, be supposed to have the corresponding significance of an extinction of this glory. And now, judge whether or no this prophecy has not been already fulfilled, when I tell you that this sacrosanct land, which no dog’s foot was once allowed to touch, on which no man was permitted to be born or to die, bears at this moment on its bosom a monster fouler than the brain of demon ever conceived. A fearful literal and physical fulfilment of the prophecy cannot, I consider, be far distant.”

That all this esotericism was not native to Huguenin I was certain. His mind, I was convinced, had been ploughed into by some tremendous energy, before ever this rank growth had choked it. I drew him on, little by little, to speak of his wife.

She was, he told me, of a very antique Athenian family, which by constant effort had conserved its purity of blood. It was while passing southward through Greece in a world-weary mood, some years before my visit, that he came one night to the village of Castri; and there, on the site of the ancient Delphi, in the centre of an angry crowd of Greeks and Turks, who threatened to rend her to pieces, he first saw Andromeda, his wife.

“This incredible courage,” he said, “this vast originality was hers, to take upon herself the part of a modern Hypatia — to venture on the task of the bringing back of the gods, in the midst of a fanatical people, at the latter end of a century like the present. The furious mob from which I rescued her was standing around her in front of the vestibule of a just completed temple to Apollo, whose worship she was then and there attempting to restore.”

The love of the woman fastened on her preserver with passionate intensity. Huguenin felt himself constrained by the impulse of an irresistible Will. They were united, and came at her bidding to live in the grey abode of her creation at Delos. In this solitude, under this shadow, the man and the woman faced each other. As the months passed the husband found that he had married a seer of visions and a dreamer of dreams. And visions of what hue! and dreams of what madness! He confessed to me that he was greatly awed by her, and with this awe was blended a feeling which, if it was not fear, was akin to fear. That he loved her riot at all he now knew, while the excess of her passion for him he grew to regard with the hate which men feel for the distilled elixir of the hemlock. Yet his mind inevitably took on the lurid hue of hers. He drank in unfailingly all her creeds. He followed her in the same way that a satellite follows a world. When for days together she hid herself from him and disappeared, he would wander desolate and full of search over the pathless house. Finding that she habitually yielded her body to the lotus delights of certain opiate seeds produced on the island, he found the courage to frown and warn, and ended by himself becoming a bond-slave to the drowsy gattja of India. So too with the most strange fascination she exercised over the animal world: he disliked it — he dreaded it; regarded it as excessive and unnatural; but he looked on only with the furtive, pale eye of suspicion, and said nothing. When she walked she was accompanied by a long magnetised queue of living things, felines in particular, and birds of large size.

Dogs, on the contrary, shunned her, bristling. She had brought with her from the mainland a collection of these followers, of which Huguenin had never seen the half; they were imprisoned in unknown nooks of the building; ever and anon she would vanish from the house, to reappear with new companions. Her kindness to these dumb creatures should, I presume, have been amply sufficient to account for her power over them; but Huguenin's mind, already grown morbid, probed darkly after some other explanation. The primary motif of this unquietness doubtless lay in his wife's fanaticism on the subject of the Pythagorean theory of the transmigration of souls. On this theme Andromeda, it was clear, was violently deranged. She would stand, he declared, with outstretched arm, with eye wild-staring, with rigid body, and in a rapid, guttural recitative — like a rapt, delirious Pythoness — would prophesy of the eternal mutations prepared for the spirit of man. She would dwell, above all, with a kind of contempt, on the limitations of animal forms in the actual world, and would indignantly insist that the spirit of an extraordinary and original man, disembodied, should and must re-embody itself in a correspondingly extraordinary and original form.

“And,” she would often add, “such forms do really exist on the earth, but the God, willing to save the race from frenzy, hides them from the eyes of common men.”

It was long, however, before I could induce Huguenin to speak of the final catastrophe of his singular wedded life. He related it in these words: —

“You now know that Andromeda was among the great painters of the world — you have seen her picture of herself. One day, after dilating, as was her wont, on the narrow limitation of forms, she said suddenly, ‘But you, too, shall be of the initiated: come, come, you shall see something.’ She went swiftly forward, beckoning, looking back repeatedly to smile on me a loving patronage, with the condescension of a priestess to a neophyte; I followed, till before a lately finished painting she stopped, pointing. I will not attempt — the attempt would be folly — to tell you what thing of horror and madness I saw before me on the canvas; nor can I explain in words the tempest of anger, of loathing and disgust, that stirred within me at the sight. Kindled by the blasphemy of her fancy, I raised my hand to strike her head; and to this hour I know not if I struck her. My hand, it is true, felt the sensation of contact with something soft and yielding; but the blow, if blow there were, was surely too slight to harm the frame of a creature far feebler than the human. Yet she fell; the film of coming death grew over her dull, upbraiding eyes; one last word only she spoke, pointing to the Uncleaness: ‘In the flesh you may yet behold it!’ and so, still pointing, pointing, she passed away.

“I bore her body, embalmed in the Greek manner by an expert of Corinth, to one of the smaller apartments on the roof of the house. I saw, as I turned to leave her in the gloom of the strait and lonely chamber, the mortal smile on her waxen face within the open coffin. Two weeks later I went again to visit her, My friend, she had vanished utterly — save that the bones remained; and from the vacant coffin, above the now fleshless skull, two eyes — living — the very eyes of Andromeda’s soul, but full of a new-born, intenser light — the eyes, too, of the pictured horror whose whole form I now discerned in the darkness — gleamed out upon me. I slammed to the door, and fainted on the floor.”

“The suggestion,” I said, “which you seem to wish to convey is that of a transition of forms from the human to the animal; but, surely, the explanation that the monster, brought secretly by your wife into the house, imprisoned unawares by you with the dead, and maddened by hunger, fed on the uncovered body, is, if not less horrible, at least less improbable.”

He looked doubtingly at me for a moment, and then replied: “ There was no monster imprisoned with the dead. Be not rash with ‘explanations.’ You do not require me to tell you, what you must know, that there are many more things in earth — to say nothing of heaven — than were ever dreamt of in your philosophy.”

But at least, I urged, he would see the necessity of flying from that place. He answered with the extraordinary avowal that it was no longer doubtful to him, from the effect which any neglect to minister to the creature’s wants produced on his own bodily health, that his life was intimately bound up with the life of the being he stayed to maintain; that with the second murder of which he should be guilty — nay, with the very attempt to commit it, as, for example, by flight from the house — his own life would inevitably be forfeited.

I accordingly formed the resolution to work the deliverance of my friend in spite of himself. Two months had now passed; the end of my visit was drawing near; yet his maladies of brain and body were not alleviated. It tortured me to think of leaving him once more alone, a prey to the manias which distracted him.

That very day, while he slept his damp, unquiet, opiate slumbers, I started out on the track indicated by the scarlet thread. So far it led — and the rooms through which it passed were of such uniformity, and the path so serpentine, and the sameness of construction on every hand so unbroken — that I could not doubt but that, the clue once snapped at any point, the journey to the desired end could be accomplished only by the most improbable good fortune. I followed the thread to its termination: it stopped at the foot of a ladder-like stair, which I ascended. At the top of the stair, and close to it, I was faced by a narrow wall, in which was a closed wooden door; in the door a hole large enough to admit the hand. As I placed my foot on the topmost step, a long, low, plaintive whine, with a sickening likeness to a human wail, broke upon my ear.

I hurriedly descended the steps. Some little distance from them I broke the silken thread, and, gathering it up in my hand as I went, again broke it near the region of the house which we occupied.

“Hereby,” I said, as I held the gathered portion to the flame of a lamp, “shall a soul be saved alive.” I watched him later on through half-closed lids, as he departed, haggard and shivering, on his nightly errand. My heart throbbed under an agony of disquiet while I awaited his long-delayed return.

He came swiftly and softly into my room, and shook me by the shoulder. On his face was a look of unusual calmness, of dignity and mystery.

“Wake up,” he said. “I wish you — I am a sorry host, am I not? — I wish you to leave me to-night, at once; to leave the island — now”

“But tell me - “ I gasped.

“Nay, nay; I will take no refusal. Trust me this once, and go. There is a danger here. Destiny is against me — an impudent destiny, careless even to conceal its hand. Go. One or two of the fisher-folk of the harbour will convey you over to Rhenea before the morning light, and you will be saved.”

“But saved from what?”

“From what? I cannot tell you: from the destiny, whatever it be, which awaits me. Do you know — can you dream — that the thread on which my life depends is snapped?”

“But suppose I tell you...”

“You can tell me nothing. Ah... you hear that?” He held up his hand and listened. It was a sudden shriek of the wind around the house.

“It is but the rising wind,” I muttered, starting up.

“Ah, but that — that which followed. Did you not feel it?”

“Huguenin, I felt nothing.”

He had clasped with both arms a marble pillar, against which his forehead rested, while with one foot he gently and mechanically patted the floor. In this posture, now utterly demoralised and craven, he remained for some minutes. The wail of the wind was heard at intervals. Suddenly he turned towards me, with a ghastly face and the scream of a frightened woman.

“Now — now at least — you feel it!”

I could no longer deny. It was as if the whole island had gently rocked to and fro on a pivot.

Thoroughly unnerved myself, trembling more with awe than with terror, I seized Huguenin’s arm, and sought to draw him from the pillar, which, muttering low, he still embraced. He sullenly refused to stir; and I, resolved in any event to stay by him, sat near. The seismic agitation increased. But he seemed to take no further note of anything, — only, with the regularity of a clock’s oscillations, the tripudiary automatic motion of his foot persisted. In this way an hour, two hours, passed. At the end of that time the rocking movement of the earth had become intense, rapid and continuous.

There came a moment when, overwhelmed by a new panic, I sprang to my feet and shook him.

“Headstrong man! “ I cried, “ have you then parted with every sense? Do you not smell — can you not feel — that the house is in flames?”

His eyes, which had grown dark and dull, blazed up instantly with a new madness.

“Then,” he shouted, with the roar of a clarion,— “then she shall — I say she shall be saved! The cheetah — the feathered cheetah!”

Before I could lay hold of the now foaming maniac, he had dashed past me into a corridor. I followed behind in hottest pursuit. The carpets and hangings, as yet but dully glowing, filled the passages with the smoke of Tophet. I hoped that Huguenin, weak of lung, would fall choked and exhausted. Some power seemed to lend him strength — he rushed onward like the wind; some sure, mysterious instinct seemed to guide him — not once did he falter or hesitate.

The long chase through the cracking house, burning now on every side, was over. The just intuitions of insanity had not failed the madman — he reached the goal for which he panted. I saw him hasten up the half-consumed ladder, whose foot was already in a lake of flame. He rushed to the smouldering wooden door of the tomb of Andromeda, and tore it wide open.

And now, from out the vault, there burst — above the roaring of the fire, and the whistle of the tempest, and the thousandfold rattle of the earthquake — a shrill and raucous shriek, which turned my blood to ice; and I saw proceeding from the darkness a creature whose native loathsomeness human language has no vocabulary to describe. For if I say that it was a cheetah — of very large size — its eyes a yellow liquid conflagration — its fat and boneless body swathed in a thick panoply of dark grey feathers, vermillion-tipped — with a similitude of miniature wings on its back — with a wide, vast, downward-sweeping tail like the tail of a bird of paradise, — how by such words can I image forth all the retching nausea, all the bottomless hate and fear, with which I looked?

The fire, it was evident, had already reached the body of the beast; already it flamed. I saw it fly, rather than spring, at Huguenin's head; the burial of its fangs in his flesh, the meeting of its teeth about his windpipe, I saw. He tottered — gurgling — tearing at the feathery horror — backward over the spot where a moment before the stair had stood; together they fell into the sea of flame beneath.

I ran in headlong haste from the house, discovering by good chance an egress. The night was clear, yet all the winds seemed to tumble in disenchained ecstasy about the islet. As I descended I noted the scathed and scorched aspect of the trees and of certain of the rocks; at one spot a multitude of deep, smooth, conical openings, edged with grey, glowing scoria:, riveted my attention. Still lower, I stood on a bluff promontory and looked sheer into the sea. The sight was sublime and appalling. The deep — without billow or foam or ripple — luminous far down with phosphorescences — rushed, like some lambent lamina yoked to the fiery steeds of Diomedes, with a steady, intense, almost dazzling impetuosity towards the island. Delos, indeed, seemed to float — to swim, painfully struggling, like a little doomed bird, against the all-engulfing element.

I passed with the earliest light from this mystic shrine of ancient piety. Among the last sights that greeted my gaze was the still ascending reek of the blighted and accursed dwelling of Huguenin.

THE CASE OF EUPHEMIA RAPHASH (1895)

MAN'S GOINGS ARE of God: how can a man then understand his own way? — Proverbs

“OH, Mr. Parker, he is coming at last, sir!”

“Good heavens! you mean the Doctor?”

“The Doctor, sir — saw him with my own eyes — he is on foot — must have passed through the north park gates, and is at this moment coming up the drive!”

I ran to the lawn; saw him slowly coming in the old frock-coat of thin stuff, his eyes studying the ground.

“Ah, Parker” — he glanced up and held out a limp hand— “that you? Well, I hope?”

“I am well enough, thank you, Doctor.”

“And why the accented I? My sister, Parker?”

I was simply astounded.

“You have not then heard?”

“Heard? I have heard nothing.”

“Merciful heavens! in what land have you then wandered?”

“Parker, in a land far away.”

I said nothing more, nor he. For the first time in his life he felt fear — fear to ask the question which I felt fear to answer.

We passed into the gloomy half-ruined pile, an ancient place, the home of a race most ancient. In the little room we called “study”, he seated himself on the divan, and with perfect composure said:

“Now, Parker — my sister.”

“Miss Euphemia, Doctor, is no more.”

His face was stone; but he swallowed. After a time I distinctly heard him mutter:

“I thought as much — so it happened once before.”

What? I was all wonder; but only added:

“Three weeks ago, Doctor.”

“Of what?”

“She was — —”

“Go on.”

“Doctor, she was — —”

“Say it, man — she was murdered.”

“She was murdered, Doctor.”

I see him now; spare and small, mighty in forehead, which at the top was thinly covered with a cropped iron-grey scrub: thick, tight lips; sallow, shaven face; and those eyes, grey, so unquiet, never for an instant of life ceasing the internal inquisition in which they wandered fro and to, down, and up, and round.

A name high in the view of the world was his — as an apostle of science, as hierophant among the arch-priests of learning. During the fifteen years I had acted as his secretary, we had produced nine books, each monumental in its way. His activities in the domain of thought were, in fact, immeasurable — though I will not say that they were continuous; or, at least, not continuous so far as I was concerned; for the doctor would ever and anon leave me, perhaps in the midst of some work, and without warning snatch himself wholly for long weeks from Raphash Towers; nor could I then determine whether sarcophagi of old Egyptian dynasties had lured him overseas, or excavations at Mycenae, or the enticements of Khorsabad and Balbec. I knew only that he had quietly and mysteriously disappeared; that he as quietly returned in due course to his labours; and that his taciturnity was so inveterate as to seem brutish.

An old housekeeper and myself, beside the Doctor and Miss Euphemia, were the only inmates of the old mansion. We occupied an insignificant portion of the ground floor of one of the immense wings. Never visitor broke our solitude, except a gentleman whose calls always corresponded with the Doctor's absences. The lengthy tête-à-tête of this personage with Miss Euphemia led me to suspect an old flame, to which the Doctor had had known objections.

Miss Euphemia was a lady of forty-five years, taller than her brother, but remarkably like him. She, too, had become learned by dint of reading the Doctor's books. For the life of me I cannot now say how it was, for they hardly ever exchanged a word, but I had gradually arrived at the conviction that each of these two lives was as necessary to the other as the air it breathed.

Yet for three weeks the newspapers had been discussing her singular disappearance, and he, of all others, knew not one word of the matter! He looked at me through half-closed lids, and said, with that utter dryness of tone which was his:

“Tell me the circumstances.”

I answered: “I was away in London on business connected with your Shropshire seat, and can only repeat the depositions of old Mrs. Grant. Miss Raphash had, strange to say, been persuaded to attend the funeral of a lady, known to her in youth, at Ringlethorpe; and, staying afterwards with the mourning friends, did not return till midnight. She wore, it seems, some old family jewels. By one, however, the house was in darkness; and it was an hour later that a scream shrilled through the night. Mrs. Grant was able to light a candle, and had opened her door, when she dimly saw a man rushing towards her with some singular weapon in his hand which flashed vividly in the half-dark — a small, wiry man, she thinks. She had but time to slam her door, when he dashed himself frantically against it, where-upon she fancies she heard the angry remonstrance of another voice. Here, however, her evidence is vague; hours later when she woke to consciousness, she rushed to her mistress' room, and found it empty."

"Of the jewels?"

"Of Miss Raphash herself."

"And the jewels?"

"They lay on the dressing-table where they had been placed, untouched."

"Clearly the murderer was not a burglar."

"Clearly he was. He, or they, took other things, valuables from your room and mine to the amount of four hundred pounds."

"But some of these have been traced?"

"Not one. Some have been found — none 'traced'."

"Where found?"

"In a clump of bushes immediately beneath the balcony of the south wing."

"They were singular burglars. And my sister's body was found — —"

"Nowhere."

"It was buried in the park."

"Quite certainly not. The park has been subjected to too minute a scrutiny for that."

"It was burned."

“Not in the house, and again not in the grounds. It was for some ghastly reason conveyed away.”

“It is not now in the house, for instance?”

“No — if the most recondite search in the darkest recesses of the mansion are of any value.”

“There were blood-stains?”

“A few on the bed.”

“No clue?”

“One. It would seem that the assassin, or one of them, before gaining entrance, drew off his boots, and on running away left them, for some undreamable reason, behind him.”

“It is very simple. He went in a pair of yours or mine.”

“No. Had his foot, as measured by his boot, been one-third as small, it could never have been urged into a boot of yours or mine.”

“And yet Mrs. Grant says he was a small man; it is peculiar he should have so immense a foot.”

“It is clear then that there were more than one.”

“Yet I incline to the one-man theory; for through some failure of courage or memory, one might leave the jewels, but hardly two. Mrs Grant, distracted, may have mistaken his stature; and in the course of my anthropological experience, I have even come across that very discrepancy between man and foot — an occasional survival of simian traits in human beings.”

“There is another point,” I said, “the boots were found to be odd.”

“But that is a clue!” he said. “I have the man in my grasp. Have you now told me everything?”

“Except that a gentleman had called to see Miss Raphash that afternoon.”

“Ah — what sort of man?”

“Tall, black-dressed, middle-aged, with side-whiskers. I have seen him here when you have been away. Mrs. Grant says that Miss Raphash spoke to him with some show of anger, though no words could be made out.”

“Ah!” said the Doctor, and resumed a restless walk.

“It is not impossible,” he continued after a while, “that deeps, black to the eye of a policeman, may lighten to the eye of a thinker. Let us go over the house.”

Science had taught the Doctor to labour without the stimulus of expectancy. On this hopeless search we spent several hours in the mouldy vastnesses of the house; in the solemn silence of old Tudor wings which perhaps no foot had set a-barking with echoes for centuries; deep down in the nitre-crusted vaults. We came at length to an old room on the second floor of the south wing overlooking a patch of garden, rank now with shrubs. The chamber was very damp and gloomy; its tapestries of Arras had mouldered to grey shreds. The Doctor had partly used it as a depository: here were stacked bones of mammoths, embryos in flasks, fossils, spongiadae, implements of stone, iron, and bronze. Along one side was a vast oaken chest, carved, black with centuries of age. It, as well as a secret recess behind a panel in the wall, contained piles of bones methodically labelled.

The lock of the door was of peculiar construction, and the Doctor had the key always about him. I could not therefore but smile, when on entering, I said to him:

“Here, at least, our search is fantastic.”

He glanced at me, and passed in doggedly. Through the grime of the window light hardly entered. Here a piece of old armour, there a cinerary urn of Etruria showed in the gloom its grey freckles of fungus; a dank dust was over all.

“Some one has been here,” said the Doctor.

“Doctor!”

“The catch of the window seems awry: notice the dust on the floor; does it not look — —”

“But if it is impossible, it is impossible, and there an end,” I answered.

He opened the window. Below was the stone balcony of the first floor of the wing; and from it to a point near the window a tin rain-spout ran up. It was among the bushes of the garden beneath the balcony that the stolen valuables had been found.

“He climbed up, you see, by the spout,” said the Doctor. “The feat seems superhuman: but there is the spout, and here is the turned window-catch. We must confront phenomena as we find them.”

“But at least, Doctor, he did not climb up with a dead body in his arms?”

“No; you are right.”

“And he did not enter by the door.”

“No.”

“Then our search here is absurd.”

“Doubtless. You might look behind the panelling.”

I looked and saw only the dust-grown bones of old monsters.

“She is not in here, now?” he said, and tapped the oaken chest with his knuckles.

I smiled.

“No, Doctor, she is not in there. The man does not live who could force the century-old secret of that riveted lid.”

“Come then, Parker. Come — we shall find her.”

We went out, and he locked the old silences and solitudes within the room once more. Men of great minds undertake tasks which, from their very vastness, seem nothing less than silly to men of smaller gauge. The region of the impossible, indeed, is the true sphere-of-action of genius. But, on the other hand, the crowd may be excused if, observing this, they become sometimes incredulous, resentful, and even cachinatory.

And, I confess, it was not without resentment that I listened to Doctor Raphash as he said to me:

“Let us find him, Parker — the murderer of my sister — the secreter of her body. This is a task we must not leave to the crude intellects of the recognized authorities. Let us hunt him down — and, after that, we shall resume our consideration of the science of Comparative Mythology.”

But his method, at least, was singular. To acquire personal intimacy with the whole criminal class of London is an undertaking, if possible, at all events far from light. Yet this was his notion. In a few months we had learned a new language, become acclimatized denizens of a new world — the language and the world of the East of London. Our dress was the dress of the “navvy”; our habits those of the ne’er-do-well.

And now most wondrously were revealed to me ineffable deeps in Doctor Raphash’s character. The intensity of this hatred of an unknown man to me seemed hellish. “Let us hunt him down.” His life became the incarnation of that sentence. It was the man of science turned beast of prey, but retaining the perfect scientific calm; an intensity bordering on lunacy shrouding itself behind the serenity of ocean-depths; the avenging angel without the flashing eye and flaming sword.

Days and nights we spent in public houses, gambling-hells, cells of pawnbrokers, with roughs at slum-corners, stormy crowds at music-hall doors. We were boon companions of men who related to one another without secrecy or shame-blush their achievements in every species of crime. In the morning we parted; to compare late at night notes of the day’s haps. Then far into the morning hours I would hear the slow soft tread of that divine patience to and fro in his room near mine. This, and a heightened glare in his eyes, were all the indication of the mania fretting at his heart.

One day I heard something.

In a gin-palace two women, dissolute of face, stood at the bar.

“And how about your old man, then?” I heard.

“Oh, he must fish for hisself, he must. I took his boots, the last thing I’ve got, to the pawn this morning, and they wouldn’t take them.”

“Ain’t they no good, then?”

“They’re sound enough, but they’re odd.”

“Go on!”

“S’help me. I nearly tore his eyes out over them same boots. I buys my lord a seven-and-eleven pair in the summer and sends him hop-picking in them; two months ago he turns up with his own boot on the right foot and somebody else’s on the other.”

“And what accounts did he give of hisself?”

“There’s where the provoking part of it comes in. Every time I asks him about it, it’s ‘Drop it, mate’, and ‘Drop it, I tell you, mate.’ He was on the job, you may bet, got into some scrape, and now dursn’t say nothink about it.”

I need not mention the steps by which, in half-an-hour, I had become the bosom friend of these two women. The time, place, and circumstances of the boots profoundly impressed me, and when I parted from them I felt assured that the name and address I had obtained were those of the man we sought. When Doctor Raphash returned, haggard and pallid, to our little garret that night, I pressed his hand.

“You have news for me, Parker.”

“I have heard something that may have some bearing on the case.” I told him the incident.

“Undoubtedly — it has some bearing. Let us go.”

“You look tired tonight, tomorrow perhaps — —”

“Not at all! Tonight, man — now — now — is the time to find what we seek” — and he stamped on the floor.

I glanced, startled, at him. The action seemed like a sign of the break-up of that supernal serenity which characterized him.

We passed out, I taking the precaution to bring with me a Colt’s revolver. When, by the way of endless labyrinths, we reached the address the Doctor at last spoke:

“There is no light, you see; he is, probably, still out. Suppose you wait till he comes; then speak, take him under the lamp there, see the boots, and ask him to drink with you. I, waiting at yonder corner, will then join you.”

Flakes of snow drifted downwards. I walked sentinel-wise; the Doctor crouched still at his post. From a Swedish chapel I heard the strokes of twelve, and at the same moment a working-man approached me.

“Cold tonight, mate,” I said, carelessly.

“Ah, that it is,” he answered.

His teeth chattered — his face wore a blue hue. Turned-up coat-collar, and buried hands, and forward pose, spoke of his shivering agonies.

“You look frozen. Come and have a drink along with me.”

“I could do with one, mate. I haven’t tasted grub this day.”

“What — broke?”

“Dead broke!”

“Come along then — the ‘Brown Bear’.”

He followed me. Under the lamp I stopped.

“Do you like the ‘Brown Bear’? If not — —”

The light fell upon him. A sense of contempt and disappointment overcame me at the sight of his weak face, sheepish blue eyes. But there, at any rate, were the counterparts of the odd boots I had handed over to the authorities.

The Doctor had slowly approached us, and was in the middle of the road when Hardy, glancing, saw him.

The change in the man's face was sudden and wonderful.

His eyes glared; he tottered, livid, against a railing; then, suddenly taking to his heels, fled, as for dear life, down a turning.

The Doctor followed, and then I. And now powers of physique, as unexpected as previously depths of soul in my old friend, stood visible to me. He distanced me. His feet grew winged. Hardy, indeed, had an advantage in his knowledge of the intricate grimy courts down which he dodged. Sometimes for a moment he disappeared. But the Doctor slowly gained upon him, "hunting him down". The streets were all but deserted.

Suddenly Hardy dashed into a cul-de-sac. The house at the end was empty, every window broken. If the fugitive, then, could gain an entrance his escape by the back was safe. I judged that this was the house for which he had all along been making. On reaching it, Hardy dashed down the area steps to a basement below the street-level.

"Shoot!" cried the Doctor, looking back. "Shoot with the revolver — shoot!"

This I was far from willing to do, but it was already too late; for Hardy had disappeared. A minute afterwards we, too, had rushed down the steps, and through a gate-like door passed into a low, wide, damp cellar of which the ground was a soft, powdery earth covering our ankles. There was no other visible means of egress, and I was looking about for Hardy, when the gate-door banged suddenly behind us, and a bar clanged down into a staple in the outer wall.

So that we were prisoners. That the man had entered the cellar was certain, and also that he had found some means of leaving it other than the door. But here our knowledge ended. The darkness was Erebus itself; whole clouds rose with every step and choked us; and the intensity of damp cold, after our run, hardly made speech possible. I groped round the walls, fired my revolver; but the flash revealed nothing but a portion of unhewn wall and low ceiling; I shouted at the door; but the neighbouring houses were ruins — an echo answered me.

Towards the early morning I received, I confess, a thrilling shock of horror from Doctor Raphash. That he was not himself, that he suffered far more than I, became apparent. Once or twice only had he spoken through the night, sitting crouched in the dust of a corner, his knees bent up, his head buried in his arms. By palpation I knew him in this position.

Once I said in alarm:

“Doctor, do not sleep! This cold

The doctor laughed aloud.

“No, no,” he said bitterly; “I won’t sleep; small fear of that — tonight.”

I walked for warmth to and fro, treading warily on the dust. A deep groan drew me to him: my cold fingers touched his forehead with the sensation of contact with a heated plate.

“You are suffering greatly,” I said.

“Leave me alone, Parker! Go from me!”

An hour, and I knew that he was stalking swiftly up and down the whole length of the cellar; swiftly! filling it with a continuous convolute reek of the brown incense of the dust. Long I stood, noting his faint sounds as he came near, losing them, following in fancy his cloudy progress, determining that now he was here, now there, now yonder. His disjointed mutterings guided me. He seemed oblivious of my presence.

When the air had finally become unbearably, I moved to go to him. My head came into contact with something, which on seizing I found to be a rope pendant from the ceiling. Unable to guess its purpose, I succeeded after many efforts in climbing it. My head struck the ceiling. Groping round with my hand, I encountered what seemed like the inner panels of a trapdoor. The means of Hardy's escape flashed upon me. I pushed with my knuckles, and a thin stream of light entered. In another minute I was free on the other side — it was already day.

A strange, pallid face looked up at me, rolling wild eyes. I drew him up, and together we passed out to the street.

Here he suddenly seized my hand.

“Parker!” — his breath came in gasps — “be a leech in your tenacity — as you love me, man! Hunt him down! Goodbye.... Madman! do not follow! Good-bye....”

And before I could surge from the depths of maze and stupor into which the hissed words had plunged me, he had rushed furiously down the street, and vanished into a passing cab.

After Dr. Raphash's mysterious desertion of our quest when success seemed near, I simply returned to the Towers, and waited. I now, in fact, considered my duty done when I had described to the police the fellow with the odd boots, who at this time was in hiding.

It was a month later that I observed one evening, as I walked about the grounds, that a man, hearing my approaching footsteps, had ducked his head from my sight in a clump of bushes — the very bushes, by the way, in which the stolen articles had been discovered.

I was accompanied by a large mastiff. Coming closer to the spot, I said aloud:

“Do not run, simply rise, and hold your hands over your head. I happen to be armed — and you see the dog.”

The crack of a pistol would have much less surprised me than the hang-dog air with which he rose before me. I recognized at once the insipid face of Hardy.

“No offence, master,” he said, touching his hat, trembling like an aspen.

“Ah, we have met before, Hardy.”

He scrutinized my face, but shook his head.

“You know me better ‘n I know you, sir.”

“Well, Charles, you must come with me,” I said. I led him by the arm into a room of the house, instructing Mrs. Grant at the entrance to send for a couple of the rather distant local police. I then closed the door, and proceeded to examine my prisoner. The creature wept!

“Now, Hardy,” I said, “dry your tears, and tell me how came you in those bushes tonight.”

“I was looking for the rings and things. It was hunger drove me — they’ve been hunting me like an animal for the last month, and I give myself up.”

“What rings?”

“The rings I dropped in those bushes. I thought that, anyway, one of them might by chance be left there still.”

“You admit the burglary, then?”

“Yes, master, I admit it. It was my first, and it will be my last. I haven’t had a moment’s peace since. I even put up a rope in an old cellar to hang myself, only I’m a coward

“And you admit the murder?”

“Murder, master?” he cried with scared face— “murder! Why, it wasn’t me who did the murder, it was one of the other two, and didn’t I nearly drop dead with fright when I see it done?”

“There were, then, two others?”

“Yes, sir, a working man such as myself, and an old gent.”

“Tell me about it.”

“I and a mate of mine, sir, came down hop-picking. He was a wild chap, and hops was too slow for him; so he says to me as how some of these country houses was mere child’s play, with plenty to be got, and not much danger, besides. He was one of those chaps it’s no use saying ‘no’ to, so one night here we stood behind the old shed on the other side, waiting till the old lady was well asleep, when all of a sudden, as if he’d sprung from the ground, this old gent stood between us. I started running; he looked like a spirit to me; but Jim, who was more bolder like than me, he stands his ground; soon he whistles to me, and when I come up, he ses, “Ere’s a lark, Charlie,” ses he, ‘the old chap’s on the job hissself!’ ‘Partnership’s a leaky ship, Jim,’ ses I; but he only ses, ‘Oh, bother, live and let live.’ Well, pretty soon I and Jim take our boots off, and we all get inside. No sooner inside, than the old man takes the lead, showing the way, telling us what to do, and me and Jim does everything he tells us, quite nat’ral like. He knew every crick of the place; and first he takes us into a room, and ses he, quite wild like, ‘Plunder now! raven and harry! to your souls’ content!’ And then he reaches down a case from a shelf, and takes out a strange, shiny knife, locks the case again — I believe he had keys to every lock in the place — and rushes out of the room into the one opposite. ‘Queer chap, that,’ ses Jim, looking queer hissself, ‘makes me feel shivery all over’, and before I could tell him I felt sure the man was a devil or a ghost, we hear a struggle in the opposite room — a gasping for breath — and then a long shriek which I ain’t ever going to forget while I live. Immediately after, out he flies with blazing eyes, and dashes hissself against the other old woman’s door yonder.

Jim, sweating cold, plucks up courage to reason with him a bit, and at last he runs back to the murdered lady, and dashes out again with her in his arms, light as a feather, a gash showing right across her chest, her grey hair trailing on the ground. And now he comes up to us, and quite lofty like ses he, ‘Marshal yourselves before me — march! march! and I will lead you where trophies and treasures lie thick-heaped for yer ‘arvesting!’ His words is branded into my brain. And then he makes us walk before him right across the building into the other wing and up two flights of stairs, till we come to a dusty room with a lot of bones of dead people — and there, oh great God! hide me! there — there — there he is! He will kill me, as he killed my mate — he will kill you, too — —”

He started wildly about, rushed behind my chair, and crouched down there. The man’s shriek of panic horror thrilled me through, and as the ponderous door swung slowly wide on its hinges, and Dr. Raphash calmly entered the room, I clung paralysed to my seat.

“Well, Parker,” he said in the old callous dry voice, “here I am again, you see. But whom have we . . . the murderer caught at last, surely!” and triumph lighted his eyes as they rested on Hardy, who, pale and panting, now leaned against the tapestries.

“Yes, the murderer!” gasped Hardy, “but that’s not me! Oh, there’s plenty of proofs if it comes to that! That long coat is the very one you wore — have you washed out the blood-splash on the sleeve yet?”

Dr. Raphash sat, barely smiling, examining the face of Hardy. Presently he looked at his arm.

“It is a remarkable thing,” he said, speaking to himself: “I have noticed a stain here on my sleeve; it cannot be blood; Parker, see, it looks not like blood, man — eh?”

But, as for me, a red mist hung thick before my eyes; I could see nothing.

“It is blood,” continued Hardy, gaining courage from the Doctor’s calm — “you know it is, or perhaps you were too mad that night to know anything. Who but a madman would have carried the lady’s body all the distance to that old chest; and there, didn’t you chase Jim round and round the room and stab him like a dog, because you said one body wasn’t enough to fill the chest? And if I hadn’t slipped down to the balcony by a spout, wouldn’t you have killed me, too; and didn’t you look out of the window and tell me to prepare myself because you was coming, and didn’t I have to jump from the balcony to the ground, rolling over, and dropping all the things I had; and didn’t I just have time to draw on two of the boots when you came down and started after me?”

I was looking at Dr. Raphash; during this categorical charge, no sound had issued from his lips; gradually a yellow pallor as of death had overspread his features, and the muscles of his face became tense and fixed; his head drooped forward, and his arms and legs stretched stiffly from his body; the cold stony glare in his eyes lent to his face a look of rhadamanthine sternness awful to see.

I ran and seized the clammy fingers in mine; but he did not recognize me. So he remained for several minutes, no sound breaking the silence of the room.

Then, still rigid in all his limbs, he raised his head, and let it drop heavily over the back of the chair; and, with the action, there burst from his blanched lips — higher and higher, peal on peal, in horrid articulation, in shrillest staccato — a carillon of maniac laughter. When this had passed, his whole face slowly settled into the vacant smile of idiocy.

With creeping flesh, I seized Hardy by the arm, rushed — faint — from the room, and locked the door upon the ruin within.

In this way Dr. Arnot Raphash hunted down the murderer of his sister; and so, with him, fell the Jewish House of Raphash in the county of Kent.

Some days later I received a letter, of which the following are a few extracts:

When I tell you that I am the proprietor of the private asylum from which this letter is dated, and a cousin of Dr. Raphash, you will at once conjecture that his (to you) unaccountable absences from home always corresponded with his voluntary sojourns in my establishment. He well knew the warning symptoms — head pains, a high temperature, etc. — and he usually had two or three days grace before the definite onset of the malady. Sometimes, again, the attack was more sudden, especially when preceded by any excitement; thus, when he reached my establishment a month ago he was already mad, and I at once guessed some previous violent agitation.... His first paroxysm occurred at the age of thirty, when he destroyed a just-married wife by locking her in a room filled by him with a poisonous gas. In the sane state he had no recollection of his insane acts, which were distinguished by their cunning and a strongly marked homicidal mania, directed chiefly against those for whom he most cared. He never knew of his wife's fate, for he was at once placed under my care, and on returning home found her buried.... When he was leaving me, "cured", after the death of his sister, I deemed it prudent to say nothing to him of the tragedy, preferring that the journey to the Towers should intervene before the shock of the news fell on his newly restored powers; hence his ignorance of the matter.... You have probably seen me on my visits to Miss Raphash when the Doctor was away from home; their object was to give that minute report of her brother which alone could satisfy her. On the very day of the tragedy I had a somewhat angry dispute with her respecting the expediency of putting her brother into irons, she deprecating, I insisting. Unfortunately, I allowed her to influence me, and her death was the result.... It is now beyond all doubt that the Doctor escaped from my establishment on that night, though how he contrived to pass out of the house and grounds and into them again without detection is yet unexplained; but to his cunning, as I have hinted, there were positively no bounds.... I need only add that I shall soon have — I may almost say the pleasure — of announcing to you the death of Dr. Raphash. He may still, indeed, linger for a few weeks; but the end, in any case, cannot be distant.

THE END

THE BRIDE (1902)

“He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter” — Job.

THEY met at Krupp and Mason’s, musical-instrument-makers, of Little Britain, E.C., where Walter had been employed two years, and then came Annie to typewrite, and be serviceable.

They began to “go out” together after six o’clock; and when Mrs. Evans, Annie’s mamma, lost her lodger, Annie mentioned it, and Walter went to live with them at No. 13 Culford Road, N.; by which time Annie and Walter might almost be said to have been engaged. His salary, however, was only thirty shillings a week.

He was the thorough Cockney, Walter; a well-set-up person of thirty, strong-shouldered, with a square brow, a moustache, and black acne-specks in his nose and pale face.

It was on the night of his arrival at No. 13, that he for the first time saw Rachel, Annie’s younger sister. Both girls, in fact, were named “Rachel” — after a much-mourned mother of Mrs.

Evans’; but Annie Rachel was called “Annie,” and Mary Rachel was called “Rachel.” Rachel helped Walter at the handle of his box to the top-back room, and here, in the lamplight he was able to see that she was a tallish girl, with hair almost black, and with a sprinkling of freckles on her very white, thin nose, on the tip of which stood collected, usually, some little sweats. She was thin-faced, and her top teeth projected a little so that her lips only closed with effort, she not so pretty as pink-and-white little Annie, though one could guess, at a glance, that she was a person more to be respected.

“What do you think of him?” said Annie, meeting Rachel as she came down.

“He seems a nice fellow,” Rachel said: “rather goodlooking. And strong in the back, you bet.”

Walter spent that evening with them in the area front-room, smoking a foul bulldog pipe, which slushed and gurgled to his suction; and at once Mrs. Evans, a dark old lady without waist, all sighs and lack of breath, decided that he was “a gentlemanly, decent fellow.” When bed-time came he made the proposal to lead them in prayer; and to this they submitted, Annie having forewarned them that he was “a Christian.” As he climbed to his room, the devoted girl found an excuse to slip out after him, and in the passage of the first floor there was a little kiss.

“Only one,” she said, with an uplifted finger.

“And what about his little brother, then?” he chuckled — a chuckle with which all his jokes were accompanied: a kind of guttural chuckle, which seemed to descend or stick straining in the throat, instead of rising to the lips.

“You go on,” she said playfully, tapped his cheek, and ran down. So Walter slept for the first night at Mrs. Evans’.

On the whole, as time passed, he had a good deal of the society of the women: for the theatre was a thing abominable to him, and in the evenings he stayed in the underground parlour, sharing the bread-and-cheese supper, and growing familiar with the sighs of Mrs. Evans over her once estate in the world. Rachel, the silent, sewed; Annie, whose relation with Walter was still unannounced, though perhaps guessed, could play hymn-tunes on the old piano, and she played.

Last of all, Walter laid down the inveterate wet pipe, led them in prayer, and went to bed. Most mornings he and Annie set out together for Little Britain.

There came a day when he confided to her his intention to ask for a rise of “screw,” and when this was actually promised by His Terror, the Boss, there was joy in heaven, and radiance in futurity, and secret talks of rings, a wedding, “a Home.” Annie felt herself not far from the kingdom of Hymen, and rejoiced. But nothing, as yet, was said at No. 13: for to Mrs. Evans’ past grandeurs thirty shillings a week was felt to be inappropriate.

The next Sunday, however, soon after dinner, this strangeness occurred: Rachel, the silent, disappeared. Mrs. Evans called for her, Annie called, but it was found that she was not in the house, though the putting away of the dinner-things, her usual task, was only half accomplished.

Not till tea-time did Rachel return. She was then cold, and somewhat sullen, and somewhat pale, her lips closing firmly over her projecting teeth. When timidly questioned — for her resentment was greatly feared — she replied that she had just been looking in upon Alice Soulsby, a few squares away, for a little chat: and this was the truth.

It was not, however, the whole truth; she had also looked in at the Church Lane Sunday School on her way: and this fact she guiltily concealed. For half an hour she had sat darkly at the end of the building in a corner, listening to the “address.” This address was delivered by Walter. To this school every Sunday, after dinner, he put down the beloved pipe to go. He was in fact, its “superintendent.”

After this, the tone and temper of the little household rapidly changed, and a true element of hell was introduced into its platitude. It became, first of all, a question whether or not Rachel could be “experiencing religion,” a thing which her mother and Annie had never dreamt of expecting of her.

Praying people, and the Salvationist, had always been the contempt of her strong and callous mind. But on Sunday nights she was now observed to go out alone, and “chapel” was the explanation which she coolly gave. Which chapel she did not specify: but in reality it was the Newton Street Hall, at which Walter frequently exhorted and “prayed.” In the Church Lane schoolroom there was prayer-meeting on Thursday evenings; and twice within one month Rachel sallied forth on Thursday evening — soon after Walter. The secret disease which preyed upon the poor girl could hardly now be concealed. At first she suffered bitter, solitary shame; sobbed in a hundred paroxysms; hoped to draw a veil over her infirmity. But her gash was too glaring. In the long Sabbath evenings of summer he preached at street corners, and sometimes secretly, sometimes openly, Rachel would attend these meetings, singing meekly with the rest the undivine hymns of the modern evangelist. In his presence, in the parlour, on other nights, she quietly sewed, hardly speaking. When, at 7 p.m., she heard his key in the front door her heart darted toward its master; when in the morning he flew away to business her universe was cinders.

“It’s a wonder to me what’s coming to our Rachel lately,” said Annie in the train, coming home; “you’re doing her soul good, or something, aren’t you?”

He chuckled, with slushy suction-sounds about the back of the tongue and molars.

“Oh, that be jiggered for a tale!” he said: “she’s all right.”

“I know her better than you, you see. She’s quite changed — since you’ve come. Looks to me as if she’s having a touch of the blues, or something.”

“Poor thing! She wants looking after, don’t she?” Annie laughed, too: but less brutally, more uneasily. Walter said: “But she oughtn’t to have the blues, if she's giving her heart to the Lord!

"People seem to think a Christian must be this and that. A Christian, if it comes to that, ought to be the jolliest fellow going!"

This was on a Thursday, the night of the Church Lane prayer-meeting, and Walter had only time to rush in at No. 13, wash his face, snatch his Bible, and be off. Rachel, for her part, must verily now have been badly bitten with the rabies of love, or she would have felt that to follow to-night, for the third time lately, could not fail to incur remark. But this consideration never even entered a mind now completely blinded and entranced by the personality of Walter.

Through the day her work about the house had been rushed forward with this very object, and at the moment when he banged the door after him she was before her glass, dressing in blanched, intense and trembling flurry, and casting as she bent to give the last touches to her fringe, a look of bitterest hate at the projection of her lip above the teeth.

This night, for the first time, she waited in the chapel till the end of the service, and walked slowly homeward on the way which she knew that Walter would take; and he came striding presently, that morocco Bible in his hand, nearly every passage in which was neatly under-ruled in black and red inks.

"What, is that you?" he said, taking into his a hand cold with sweat.

"It is," she answered, in a hard, formal tone.

"You don't mean to say you've been to the meeting?"

"I do."

"Why, where were my eyes? I didn't see you."

"It isn't likely that you would want to, Mr. Teeger."

"Go on — drop that! What do you take me for? I'm only too glad! And I tell you what it is, Miss Rachel, I say to you as the Lord Jesus said to the young man: ‘Thou art not far from the kingdom of heaven.’”

She was in it! — near him, alone, in a darkling square, yet suffering, too, in the flames of a passion such as perhaps consumes only the strongest natures.

She caught for support at his unoffered arm; and when he bent his steps straight homeward, she said trembling violently: “I don’t wish to go home as yet. I wish to have a little walk. Do you mind, Mr. Teeger?”

“Mind, no. Come along, then,” and they went walking among an intricacy of streets and squares, he talking of “the Work,” and of common subjects. After half an hour, she was saying:

“I often wish I was a man. A man can say and do what he likes; but with a girl it’s different.”

“There’s you, now, Mr. Teeger, always out and about, having people listening to you, and that. I often wish I was only a man.”

“Oh, well, it all depends how you look at it,” he said. “And, look here, you may as well call me Walter and be done.”

“Oh, I shouldn’t think of that,” she replied. “Not till—”

Her hand trembled on his arm.

“Well, out with it, why don’t you?”

“Till — till we know something more definite about you — and Annie.”

He chuckled slushily, she now leading him fleetly round and round a square.

“Ah, you girls again!” he cried, “been blabbing again like all the girls! It takes a bright man to hide much from them, don’t it?”

“But there isn’t much to hide in this case, as far as I can see — is there?”

Always Walter laughed, straining deep in the throat. He said: “Oh, come — that would be telling, wouldn’t it?”

After a minute's stillness, this treacherous phrase came from Rachel:
"Annie doesn't care for anyone, Mr. Teeger."

"Oh, come — that's rather a tall order, any one. She's all right."

"But she doesn't. Of course, most girls are silly, and that, and like to get married—"

"Well, that's only nature, ain't it?"

This was a joke; and downward the laugh strained in his throat, like struggling phlegm.

"Yes, but they don't understand what love is," said Rachel.

"They haven't an idea. They like to be married women, and have a husband, and that. But they don't know what love is — believe me! The men don't either." How she trembled! — her body, her dying voice — she pressing heavily upon him, while the moon triumphed now through cloud glaring a moment white on the lunacy of her ghostly face.

"Well, I don't know — I think I understand, lass, what it is," he said.

"You don't, Mr. Teeger!"

"How's that, then?"

"Because, when it takes you, it makes you—"

"Well, let's have it. You seem to know all about it."

Now Rachel commenced to tell him what "it" was — in frenzied definitions, and a power of expression strange for her. It was a lunacy, its name was Legion, it was possession by the furies; it was a spasm in the throat, and a sickness of the limbs, and a yearning of the eye-whites, and a fire in the marrow; it was catalepsy, trance, apocalypse; it was high as the galaxy, it was addicted to the gutter; it was Vesuvius, borealis, the sunset; it was the rainbow in a cesspool, St. John plus Heliogabalus, Beatrice plus Messalina; it was a transfiguration, and a leprosy, and a metempsychosis, and a neurosis; it was the dance of the mænads, and the bite of the tarantula, and baptism in a sun: out poured the wild definition in simple words, but with the strife of one fighting for life. And she had not half done when he understood her fully; and he had no sooner understood her, than he was subdued, and succumbed.

“You don’t mean to say—” he faltered.

“Ah, Mr. Teeger,” she answered, “there’s none so blind as those who will not see.”

His arm stole round her shuddering body.

Everyone is said to have his failing; and this man, Walter, in no respect a man of strong mind, was certainly on his amatory side, most sudden, promiscuous, and infirm. And this tendency was, if anything, heightened by the quite sincere strain of his mind in the direction of “spiritual things”: for, under sudden temptation, back rushed his being, with the greater rigour, into its natural channel. On the whole, had he not been a Puritan, he would have been a Don Juan.

In an instant Rachel’s weight was hanging upon his neck, he kissing her with passion.

After this she said to him: “But you are only doing this out of pity, Walter. Tell the truth, you are in love with Annie?”

He, like Peter, tumbled at once into a fib. “That’s what you say!”

“You are,” she insisted, filled with the bliss of the fib.

“Bah! I’m not. Never was. You are the girl for me.”

When they went home, they entered the house at different times, she first, he waiting twenty minutes in the street.

The house was small, so the sisters slept together in the second-floor front room; Walter in the second-floor back; Mrs. Evans in the first-floor back, the first-floor front being “the drawing-room.”

The girls, therefore, generally went to bed together: and that night, as they undressed, there was a row.

First, a long silence. Then Rachel, to say something, pointed to some new gloves of Annie's, asking: "How much did you give for those?"

"Money and kind words," replied Annie.

This was the beginning.

"Well, there's no need to be rude about it," said Rachel. She was happy, in paradise, despised Annie that night.

"Still," said Annie, after a silence of ten minutes before the glass, "still, I should never run after a man like that. I'd die first."

"I haven't the least idea what you're talking about," replied Rachel.

"You have. I should be ashamed of myself, if I were you."

"Talk away. You're a little fool."

"It's you. Throwing yourself at the head of a man who doesn't care for you. What can you call yourself?"

Rachel laughed — happily, yet dangerously.

"Don't bother yourself my girl," she said.

"Think of going out every night to meet a man in that way: look here, it's too disgusting of you, girl!"

"Is it?"

"You can't deny that you were with Mr. Teeger to-night?"

"That I wasn't."

"It's false! Anyone can see it by the joy in your face."

"Well, suppose I was, what about it?"

"But a woman should be decent, I think; a woman should be able to command her feelings, and not expose herself like that. Believe me, it gives me the creeps all over to think of."

"Never mind, don't be jealous, my girl."

The gentle Annie flamed!

“Jealous! of you!”

“There isn’t any need, you know — not yet.”

“But I’m not! There never will be need! Do you take Mr. Teeger for a raving lunatic? I should go and have some false teeth put in first if I were you!”

Thus did Annie drop to the rock-bed of vulgarity; but she knew it to be necessary in order to touch Rachel, as with a white-hot wire, on her very nerve of anguish, and, in fact, at these words Rachel’s face resembled white iron, while she cried out, “Never mind my teeth! It isn’t the teeth a man looks at! A man knows a finely built woman when he sees her — not like a little dumpy podge!”

“Thank you. You are very polite,” replied Annie, browbeaten by an intensity fiercer than her own. “But still, it’s nonsense, Rachel, to talk of my being jealous of you. I knew Mr. Teeger six months before you. And you won’t know him much longer either, for I don’t want to have mother disgraced here, and this is no fit place for him to lodge in. I can easily make him leave it soon—”

At this thing Rachel flew, with minatory palm over Annie’s cheek, ready to strike. “You dare do anything to make him go away! I’ll tear your little —”

Annie winked, flinched, uttered a sob, no more fight left in her.

So for two weeks the situation lasted. Only, after that night, so intense grew the bitterness between the sisters, that Annie moved down to the first-floor back, sleeping now with Mrs.

Evans who dimly wondered. As for Walter, meanwhile, his heart was divided within him. He loved Annie; he was fascinated and mesmerised by Rachel. In another age and country he would have married both. Every day he came to a different resolve, not knowing what to do. One thing was evident — a wedding-ring would be necessary, and he purchased one, uncertain for which of the girls.

“Look here, lass,” he said to Annie in the train, coming home, “let us put a stop to this. The boss doesn’t seem to be in a hurry about that rise of screw, so suppose we get spliced, and be done?”

“Privately?”

“Rather. Your ma and sister mustn’t know, — not just yet a while.”

“And you will still keep on living at the house?”

“Well, of course, for the time being.”

She looked up into his face and smiled. It was settled. But two nights afterwards he met Rachel on his way home from prayer-meeting; at first was honest and distant; but then committed the incredible weakness of going with her for a walk among the squares, and ended by winning from her an easily granted promise of marriage, on the same terms as those arranged within Annie.

When, the next day at lunch-time, he put his foot on the threshold of the Registrar’s office to give notice, he was still in a state of agonized indecision as to the name which he should couple with his own.

When the official said, “Now the name of the other party?” Walter hesitated, shuffled with his feet, then answered:

“Rachel Evans.”

Not till he was again in the street did he remember that Rachel was the name of both the girls, and that liberty of choice between them still remained to him.

Now, from the day of “notice” to the day of wedlock, an interval of twenty-one clear days must by law, elapse, and Walter, though weak enough to inform both the sisters of the step he had taken, was careful to give them only a vague idea of the date fixed. His once clear conscience, meanwhile, was grievously troubled, his feet in a net; he feared to speak to God; and went drifting like flotsam on the river of chance.

And chance alone it was which at last cast him upon the land. The fifth day before the marriage was a Bank Holiday, and he had arranged with Rachel to go out with her that day to Hyde Park, she to wait for him at an arranged spot at two o'clock. At two, then, at a street-corner, stood Rachel waiting, twirling her parasol, walking a little, returning. Walter, however, did not appear, and what could have happened was beyond her divination. Had he misunderstood or missed her? Though incredible, it was the only thing to think. To Hyde Park, at any rate, she went alone, feeling desolate and ennuyée, in the vague hope of there meeting him.

What had happened was this: Walter had been half-way toward the rendezvous with Rachel, when he was met in the street by Annie, who had gone to spend the day with a married friend at Stroud Green, but had returned, owing to the husband's illness. Seeing Walter, her face lit up with smiles.

"Harry's down with the influenza," she said, "so I couldn't stay and bore poor Ethel. Where are you going?"

For the first time since his "conversion" twelve years before, Walter, with a high flush, now consciously lied.

"Only to the schoolroom," he said, "to hunt for something."

"Well, I am open to be taken out, if any kind friend will be so kind," she said fondly.

Now he had that morning vowed to himself to wed Rachel; and by this vow he now again vowed to be bound. All the more reason why, for the last time, he should "take out" Annie.

"Come along, then, old girl," he gaily said: "where shall we go?"

“Let us go to Hyde Park,” said Annie. And to Hyde Park they went, Walter, ever and anon, stabbed by the bitter memory of waiting Rachel.

At five o’clock the two were walking along the north bank of the Serpentine westward toward a two-arched bridge, which is also pierced by a third narrow arch over the bank: to this narrow arch, since it was drizzling, they were making for shelter, when Rachel, a person of the keenest vision, sighted them from the south bank. She was frantic at once. Annie, who was supposed to be at Stroud Green! What treachery! This, then, was why . . . She ran panting along the bank, toward the bridge, then over it, northward, and now heard the two under the arch, who stood there talking — of the wedding. Unfortunately, just here is a block of masonry, which prevented Rachel from leaning directly over the arch to listen. Yet the necessity to hear was absolute: so she ran back clear of the masonry, and bent far over the parapet, outwards and sideways toward the arch, straining neck, body, ears, and anyone looking into those staring eyes then would have comprehended the doctrine of the Ferine Soul. But she was at a disadvantage, heard only murmurs, and — was that a kiss? Further and further forth she strained. And now suddenly, within a cry, she is in the water, where it is shallow near the bank. In the fall her head struck upon a stone in the mud.

For three days she screamed continuously the name of Walter, filling the street with it, calling him hers only. On the third night, in the midst of a frightful crisis of cries, she suddenly died.

“Oh, Rachel, don’t say you are dead!” cried Annie over her.

The death occurred two days before the marriage-day, and on the next, Walter, well wounded, said to Annie: “This knocks our little affair on the head, of course.”

Annie was silent. Then, with a pout, she said: "I don't see why. After all, it was her own fault, entirely. Why should we suffer?"

For the feud between the sisters had become cruel as death; and it outlasted death: Annie, on the subject of Rachel and Walter, being no longer a gentle girl, but marble, without respect or pity.

And so, in spite of the trepidations and hesitancy of Walter, the marriage took place, even while Rachel lay stretched on the bed in the second-floor front of No. 13.

The ceremony did not, however transpire without hitch and omen. It was necessary, first of all, for Walter to forewarn Annie that he had given notice of her to the Registrar by her second name of "Rachel" — a mad-looking proceeding that was almost the cause of a rupture which nothing but Walter's most ardent pleadings could steer him clear of. At any rate it was to "Rachel," and not to "Annie" that he was, as a matter of fact, after all married.

After the ceremony, performed in their lunch-time, they returned to business together in Little Britain.

At ten o'clock the same night, as he was going up to bed, she ran after him, and in the passage there was a long, furtive kiss — their last on earth.

"Twelve o'clock?" he whispered intensely.

She held up her forefinger. "One!"

"Oh, say twelve!"

She did not answer, but drew her palm playfully, across his cheek, meaning consent, for Mrs.

Evans was an inveterately heavy sleeper. He went up. And, careful to leave his door a little ajar, he extinguished his candle, and went to bed. In the apartment nearby lay stark in the dark — with learned, eternal eyelids and drowsy brow — the dead.

Walter could not but think of this presence close at hand. “Well, poor girl!” he sighed. “Poor Rachel! Well, well. His way is in the sea, after all, and His path in the Great Deep, and His footsteps are not known.” Then he thought of Annie — the little wife! But instead of Annie, there was Rachel. The two women fought vehemently for his thought — and ever the dead was stronger than the living. . . . Instead of Annie there was Rachel — and again Rachel.

At last he could hear twelve strike from a steeple, and sat up in bed, listening eagerly for the door to open, or a footfall on the floor.

A little American clock ticked in the room; and in the flue of the chimney was a sigh and chaunt just audible.

Suddenly she was intensely with him, filling the chamber — from nowhere. He had heard no footstep, no opening of the door: yet certainly, she was with him now, all suddenly, close to him, over him, talking breathlessly to him.

His first sensation was a shuddering which strongly shook him from head to foot, like the shuddering of Russian cold. She held him down by the shoulders; was stretched at length on the bed, over him; and the room seemed full of a rustling and rushing, very strange, like starched muslins rushing out in stormy agitation. She was speaking, too, to him in breathless haste, whimpering a secret gibberish which whimpered like a pup for passion — about love and its definition, and about the soul, and the worm, and Eternity, and the passion of death, and the nuptials of the tomb, and the lust and hollowness of the void. And he, too, was speaking, whispering through his pattering teeth, saying: “Sh-h-h, Rachel — Annie, I mean — sh-h-h, my girl — your ma will hear! Rachel, don’t — sh-h-h, now!” But even while he kept up this “sh-h-h dear — sh-h-h, now,” he was conscious of the invasion of a strange rage, of such a strength as if energy was being vehemently pumped into him from some behemoth omnipotence. The form above him he could hardly discern, the room was so dark, but he felt that her garment was flowing forth from her neck in a continuous flutter, with the rustling of the starch of a thousand shrouds, like the outflow of a pennant in wind; and the quivering gauze seemed now to swell and fill the chamber, and now to sink again to the size of woman. And ever the rhapsody of love and death went on, mixed with the chattered “Sh-h-h, Rachel — Annie, I mean,” of Walter; till, suddenly, he was involved in an embrace so horrible, felt himself encompassed by a might so intolerable, that his soul fainted within him. He sank back; thought span and failed in darkness beneath the spell of that lullaby; he muttered, “Receive my spirit. . .”

After two days Walter, still unconscious, died. His disfigured body they placed in a grave not far from Rachel’s.

MANY A TEAR (1908)

“GOD COUNTS A woman’s tears.” — The Talmud

I FIRST heard the name of Margaret Higgs one gloomy afternoon, when passing over the Chase by Tydenham, with Severn (they don’t say “the” Severn there) trailing itself away through a vale of haze far down on my right. The aged clergyman I was making the journey with showed me the mass of rags and grey locks, where the woman sat alone on a rock on the Chase, saying to me— “Mark that woman, a remarkable being, I assure you, a woman who during sixteen years has plumbed even the deeps of human woe; for I say that if ever the arm of the Almighty bared itself to be known openly in the affairs of men, it was in that life. There, like a pine blighted by the lightning’s wrath, sits Margaret now, a living pledge of that Power which governs the world.”

He spoke with no little solemnity, though I must say that when he went on to tell me the facts, he left me utterly unconvinced of this “arm of the Almighty”; and I hope that by this time he, too, has nobler thoughts with regard to Margaret Higgs.

“I remember her when she had no resemblance to the object you see there,” he told me, “a shapely wench with a tripping run on her toes, soft-spoken and most soft-eyed, dark blue eyes and black hair, a gay gossip— ‘news-hunter’ they say here — with a prayer-book in her hand in the lanes on Sunday, and a name for ‘knocking around’ with the young men; one of those earth-born souls of this part, unconscious of a world beyond Severn

— save of Gloucester, because the magistrates say to the naughty ones: ‘Go to Gloucester for a month.’

“She came of good farmer-folk in a small way, who died almost together, upon which Margaret chose to marry beneath her, a quarry-man from the Wyebanks near, a thickset, rather taciturn and nervous person, named Higgs, a widower some fifteen years Margaret’s senior. He had a son of twelve or so called Fred Higgs; and I think I have heard it said that as a girl Margaret had had the nursing of this boy, and that it was her fondness for the boy which caused the heiress to make choice of the father.

“Well, Margaret and Higgs got on very well for several years. I have observed them driving toward St. Bride’s of a week-end to market, frequently have called in to visit them, and they appeared happy. However, one summer there came to lodge with them a stranger — a sailor they say he was, though, as the house stands well out of the way in a bower, and as the stranger never at all showed his nose abroad, not much is known of him; one or two, however, of the Woolaston villagers lower down the mountain — a group of people known as the most ‘news-hunting’ in the country — gave it out that the stranger was a good-looking chap, and that Margaret had lost her heart to him; a tale which was confirmed when he was one afternoon loudly ordered out of the house by Higgs, and was observed to pass out of the house and away over the mountains.

“Well, some time after nine that night, when the boy Fred Higgs went to bed, Margaret, from motives of revenge, probably, destroyed her husband; for from that night Higgs has never been seen, and a daft fellow called Felix, who would frequently roam the countryside all night, reported that near three that morning he had seen Mrs. Higgs struggling in a storm across the fields towards Severn beneath the burden of a body.

“This was all the evidence to begin with, except the queer fact that Margaret breathed not a syllable to anyone with regard to her husband’s disappearance; but other signs and evidences soon followed, as I have told you, from — Heaven itself.”

Owing, maybe, to the fact that this witness, Felix, was not a man able to appreciate the nature of an oath, the police took no open action in the matter; and at this apparent sluggishness of the law, you never saw such a gush of fury, every boatman for miles up the two rivers becoming an eye to scan the waters for a body; and both where the banks are all mud, and where there are reaches of beach, parties of diggers, organised by the villagers, were ferreting for a buried body.

“Well, no body was ever discovered; but by society, I can tell you, a way was discovered to avenge itself, and the woman was punished. The baker’s cart ceased to wait at Woodside farm, the butcher declined to deal; even so far off as St. Bride’s and the Forest of Dean, Margaret Higgs could neither sell her starved calf nor get meal for her pig, nor find a forgiving smile.”

“Her’s done away wi’n right enough,” was the word everywhere: “hanging be too good for she, and shame ought to cover the face of the police.” Passing by the farm one morning, I walked up the garden-path, and saw Margaret. The round of industry there was suspended now, her stepson appeared to be aiming shots at imaginary rabbits, and the young woman, swinging her knee between her hands, was seated on the door-sill of her snowy low home. She sprang up to offer me a chair, and I said then sorrowfully to her:

“Well, Mrs. Higgs, things are not so well with you as they have been,” at which she at once became visibly inflamed, and cried out, “the gossiping, news-hunting lot, ignorant as wagon-horses!

“I do have nothing off they, Mr. Somerset! They don’t keep me! Why should I trouble about what they have to say?”

“But how, Mrs. Higgs, do you propose to live, to manage the farm?” I asked.

“I did live and find bread for the boy before, and I’ll do it again, sir,” she answered.

“But for one to defy many is up-hill work, and you without a protector now,” I said...”Tell me the truth, Margaret,” I added, “is Higgs dead?”

She stood against the wall, eyeing the ground, and after a silence said with a shrug of her shoulders: “‘Er be dead, I suppose — God knows; I don’t.”

Well, I was angry at this callous shrugging, and left her at once.

The next Sunday she dared to come to church, and as I surmised that this would be resented, especially as she walked up the aisle with so haughty a toss of the head, I uttered in my sermon a few words as to the beauty of Christian forbearance. But it had no effect, and all up the back lane that leads steeply to Woodside, though it was a stormy afternoon, Margaret was followed by the congregation — most of them her cousins, and cousins of one another. They did not at first molest her, but tittered coughs, whistles, catcalls; all which she endured without looking round, till by beck and signs they managed to induce her boy to leave her side and join the enemy, and thenceforth the walk became a cross-fire of abuse yelled from side to side, the woman hastening on in front afraid, with a grey face, but defiant eyes on fire, the people eagerly speeding upon her heels with no peaceable meaning.

“Go on!” she shouted to them, laughing with a rather ghastly grin of the mouth— “you gossiping, news-hunting lot! Shame ought to cover your face!”

“Where’s Higgs?” they all roared at her.

“Go on, you! ignorant as wagon-horses, with your silly, foolhardy questions!” And so till they came to her house, where the crowd surrounded her; and now, finding herself at bay, her defiance suddenly failing, the woman broke into tears, and falling to her knees, called out upon the Almighty in passionate tones of reproach, saying “What have I done, my good God? If I have done any wrong, send that my house may be burnt to the ground, may every evil befall me, may I be struck paralysed from my crown to my foot—” a vow so apparently hearty, and so awful to the villagers that they went away and left her.

But that night her house was burned to the ground.

When the crowd had left her, she had flung herself upon a couch in the house, where she had remained in the grip of an ague till nine in the night; and getting up then to go to bed her still trembling hand had dropped the lamp....

The news of that thing flew that night like loosened effluvia, and in a few minutes Woolaston was at Woodside. They found the boy, Fred Higgs, confined in the house by the fire, for in the first panic Margaret had run out, calling out to him, but he had been asleep, and now was screaming at his window, which was too little for him to squeeze through to leap to the ground.

Seeing this, some of the crowd darted off to look for the orchard-ladder, when Margaret herself, to the awe of all, dived back into the fire, and presently appeared tearing at the framework of the boy’s window, half of which was a fixture, and half a sideward slide. Well, as she as ever a person of great strength, the woodwork gave way to her tuggings, leaving space for the leap to the ground, and they came down safely.

Fred Higgs was taken home by Price, the grocer; and Margaret, now all bald and baked on one side of the face, found a shelter in her stable with the body of her starved horse, which had died that day.

But the woman's spirit was not yet broken. When, the next morning, Morgan, the policeman, called to invite her, things being as they were, to make a clean breast of what had happened to Higgs, she still sat dumb, rocking her body to and fro. She seems to have entertained still the crazy hope of carrying on the farm on which she was born, but that same day Mr. Millings, Loreburn's land-steward, called to tell her that, of course, she must go now, offering, however, to give her a price for her implements, etc., which no one else would buy of her. These terms she had to accept; but she showed then as ever a fierce determination not to leave the place of her birth, and like a spider whose web has been torn, at once the woman set mutely to work to build up her life anew.

On the third day after the fire she came with her face in bandages to my daughter, Nina, who owned a cottage high up there near the Chase; and though I felt bound to warn my daughter of the danger of letting, she chose to do so. On this the woman went away to Newport, bought there some new things, took her sow and fowls to her new abode, and was about once more to commence housekeeping. But it was not to be: for when all was ready, and she went down to Price, the grocer, who had taken in her boy, the boy roundly refused to go with her, saying to her: 'No, mother, I don't want to see thee face never again.' These words seemed to strike the woman quite silly; and turning toward the crowd for pity, with a wry mouth that tried to smile, she let slip the words: "Why, it was for him chiefly I did it!" "Did it! You hear her? Did what?" cried some, while the rest of the boors booed and hissed her.

“Come with your mother, hearty,” wooed the woman to the boy, “don’t be hard.”

“Thee go away,” said the boy, emboldened by the mob, “thee bisn’t my own mother, nor I never did despise anybody so much as I do despise thee, never in all my life, and shame ought to cover thee face.” Margaret looked awe-struck at this last disaster. She said nothing more, but throwing her arm languidly at him was gone with lagging steps, as if broken down now, given over, cowed, and done for; nor from that day, I think, did she ever show any resistance to whatever was done to her, except once, when she threw a stone at a throng of boys who were pursuing her.

Morgan, the policeman, however, and I also, thought that with regard to the boy, to whom from his youth the woman had ever been a good mother, a hardship had been done her; especially as without his help her new nook of land would be of little use to her. So after three weeks of talk the grocer formally agreed to give up the boy; and the same morning Morgan, happening to be passing up there, called to Margaret across her gate that her boy would be coming back to her at once. Upon this she seems to have run to stand under an ash tree at the end of the lane to see him coming up the hill; several persons, hurrying past in the rain, saw her standing there that day with her dress thrown over her head; and though the boy did not come for some hours, there she stood patiently on the look out, until the afternoon had become late and dark with storm. At last the boy came. But it was to find her lying helpless on her right side, apparently struck by lightning — the ash, at any rate, had been shivered, and she was found paralysed right down one side. Babbling with her blighted tongue, she begged the boy to give her a hand, to try to get her home without uttering a word to anyone, but he, as if out of his wits, flew down the hill, howling out the news to the four winds.

Well, however deep the woman's sin, what followed for her that evening is really shocking to recount, for a legion of fiends seem to have taken possession of the people to make a scene out of pandemonium on the mountain that evening. The words arose, "drum her out" — for, of course, whatever doubt may have lingered in any mind with regard to Margaret's guilt was gone now, since all that her vow had called down upon herself was now fallen upon her; nor did the rain and darkness make any difference; with one accord the crowd started up the mountain. Happily, she guessed their approach, and in her terror, gathering whatever forces remained to her, she fled before them, managing to drag her frame into some bush before they reached the tree; while they, going on to her cottage to find her, and not finding her, threw all her new goods into a hurly-burly, and by accident or design burned to the ground my daughter's house. It was not till the next morning that Margaret was discovered lying in the field called the Morplepiece, and was then carried away by the police, to be put into the St. Bride's infirmary.

There pressure was afresh brought to bear upon the woman to make some sort of confession, but she remained as dumb as ever; and after some months was sent out with that maimed drag in her gait and speech, which even now marks her. She dared again, though now penniless and hopeless of gaining a living here, to face the load of pain that awaited her in her native place; and hereabouts, Heaven knows how, has continued to exist. My daughter Nina, whose heart has always deeply grieved for her, sometimes of an angry night will say to me: "That poor Margaret Higgs, papa; perhaps out on the Chase in it all." Aye, and I have known her go out with a groom and a lantern to look for the woman, and on discovering her under one of those two-arched kilns which are common in this part, has wooed the poor soul to come home with her. Margaret when dragged has come, but always before morning was gone again. In deed, she had soon become much of a wild woman, imbued with the mood of storm-winds and dark nights, as shy and gloomy-eyed as those shaggy nags on the Chase, her only mates, whose manes and great tails the gales up there ever fret; so that belated yokels on their way home have often paused to hearken to some moan or laugh of hers in the dark. Once she was sent to prison, when, ever unlucky, on happening to throw a stone at a throng of boys, the stone cut one of them, and the magistrates gave her their “go to Gloucester for a month.” One of these magistrates, by the way, was none other than her stepson, Fred Higgs, who had been taken up by some mysterious business man — in Glasgow they say it was — had graduated at Oxford, and is now, you may say, one of our magnates. The man has simply ignored his stepmother’s existence.

However, the new proprietor of Glanna has given orders that the woman be housed, and provided with the means of a livelihood — has let it be understood, too, that whoever injures her will incur his displeasure. In fact, during the few weeks that this Mr. Ogden has been in residence, his goodness to the poor has become the talk, though he seems something of a queer sort, and almost a hermit. At any rate, through him, the condition of Margaret may shortly be expected to undergo a change, though it is not easy to rescue her — she resists, appears to be suspicious, can’t now believe perhaps that anyone really wishes her well — and whether she is capable of being reclaimed from her half-savage state it is hard to say: for the years alter us all, sir, the years leave the marks of their passing upon us.

So much Mr. Somerset, the aged clergyman, was able to give me of the story of Margaret Higgs, and that morose star of hers; and two days later I learned in further detail that every effort was being made to tame and help her.

But the bad destiny that seemed to have the woman in hand was not even yet done with her.

Her new abode was actually ready for her, and she had agreed to go into it, glad, I suppose, poor soul, of a bed at last, when some men, digging for a foundation down by Severn, found the remains of a man.

It was near the spot where the daft Felix over fifteen years before had seen Margaret Higgs with a body on her back one dark morning, and the cry arose, “the body of Higgs at last.”

Again, then, was Margaret taken to prison; and I, hearing of all the to-do, took train to St. Bride’s to witness her trial in the petty sessions there.

Of the two justices one was her own stepson, Fred Higgs, a good-looking man of not much more than thirty, and the other, the new lord of the Manor of Glanna.

As to the woman herself, she sat through it all — she was too woefully weak to stand — in a spiritless attitude, as unmoving as a statue. It was understood that, on being pressed in prison, she had admitted that the body discovered was that of her husband, buried by her; to which admission one Inspector Jonas deposed, and spoke as to the enforcing of the Coroner’s warrant, and the whole story of the horror.

But what struck me from the first was the nervousness of one of the justices, the lord of Glanna — a short-built and broad-faced man, with cropped hair, and squat fingers, with which he kept tapping on his chin, tapping on his chair, tapping ever on everything near him.

And presently his keenness to procure the release of the accused became quite clear, till it was painful. One never saw a judge so jumpy in his chair, so agitated, so impatient of opposition.

When his brother justice once leaned toward him, perhaps to whisper some remonstrance, Mr. Ogden cried out loudly: “You be sure to shut your mouth!” and I then noticed that the very slight rocking of Margaret Higgs’s body, which was going on as regularly as a pendulum’s swing, suddenly ceased, and the woman seemed to start and hearken.

Evidence, however, is evidence, and no magistrate could have saved the woman from the County assizes, had it not been that at the last, when the prosecution was summing-up, saying, “there can be no doubt therefore that the remains now found are actually those of Barnaby Higgs—” Mr. Ogden at those words leaped from his chair, calling out: “But how can all that be so certain to you, sir, when here’s Barnaby Higgs himself, a living man, talking to ye?”

The hand which the old man spread before us shivered with strong emotion, while tears blinded his eyes. I heard Mr. Somerset, seated near me on the bench, twice breathe to himself:

“My God!” The mass of rags in the dock sprang straight with a crazy stare. Throughout the crowded room hardly a sound was heard till Mr. Higgs, stepping to the rail, spoke — with a most painful agitation at the beginning, but presently more calmly and then again with wrathful agitation when, turning upon Fred Higgs, he scourged his son with invective. And ever afresh at the object of sorrow and rags arraigned before him he stretched his forefinger, with red-veined eyes, and a moan of love in his choked throat, calling her blessed, calling her saint.

It was the same Barnaby Higgs, he told the court — was rather surprised that some of them hadn’t recognised him — only sixteen years older now, and a big-wig, in a frock-coat, and without a beard, but the same.

One summer there had come to the farm a man named John Cheyne — a sailorman he was — a cousin, who had got into trouble for abducting a girl, and Higgs had hidden him.

But the chap had not been three days on the place when Higgs began to be jealous.

“Though she told me that there was nothing in it, I didn’t believe her, nor I don’t now believe her, for I distinctly saw John Cheyne kissing, or trying to kiss, her behind the sty; and that same day, between three-thirty and four by the clock, I turned the fellow off the place.”

The sailor took his departure, but by ten in the night was back at the farm, craving to be again taken in; this Higgs refused. Cheyne pushed himself in, hot words arose, then fisticuffs, during which Cheyne, who must have had heart-disease, “dropped down dead before a right-handed cross-counter in the left ribs, after a lead-off with the left by himself.” Some moments afterwards, Margaret, who had been out “at fair,” walked in and saw what that was which Higgs was crouched down over on the floor.

Higgs, in the crowd of his terrors, knowing that his row with the sailor was known, could foresee nothing but the gallows; but Margaret, after sitting like a stone a long time, proposed flight, she to bury the body down by Severn, and in three nights’ time to meet Higgs secretly on the Chase, to let him know whether he might safely return home.

This was agreed. Higgs ran, Margaret buried the sailor — no one suspected that he was dead, but as to the rendezvous on the Chase on the third day Higgs, ever nervous, had shirked it.

Terrified by the tidings heard in his hiding that Margaret had been seen carrying a body on her back, he had not dared to return into the region of danger, but, having reached Liverpool, took ship.

“Yes,” he said from the bench, “I abandoned her, little thinking that she’d be seriously charged with killing me, who knew myself to be alive and hearty, and all the time I was in South Africa I was that shy and sick of my cowardice I couldn’t write to her; I preferred she should think me dead and gone. But I didn't know, I made sure she'd be going on all right in the old style....

“Hadn't I left one to protect her, friends? Didn't I get a business friend in Glasgow to adopt him? He did nothing for her. My own son — this man — he did nothing for her. Ah! the squalls that caught her and the frosts that froze her bones were never a bit so hard on her as this bitter heart.

“It was for him she did it, friends, just think! She said to me that night, for she was cross wi' me, ‘it's not to screen thee, I do it,’ she said, ‘so I tell thee straight; but what kind of a life will it be for Fred with everybody having it to say he be a murderer's son?’ And she kept the truth dark from him and from all — how long? For two months? For ten? While he was a dutiful boy to her? No, sixteen solid years down to this hour, though he was a beast to her. Why, sirs, talking of Christianity, there stands a Christian for you, I think? And you — you, couldn't you do some little something for her who did so much for you? Were you really bound to send her to Gloucester? And when you saw that her own husband had coward-like abandoned her, and all the crowd of them was hounding her, and the Almighty God on high Himself that ought to have been her Father was all dead agen her, and she stood dumb and astonished, was that the moment for you, too, Fred, hard heart...? For if only from this confession she has made that she did kill me, I can pretty well judge what she's been through; she has confessed because, when she'd once tasted her prison cell that's proved a palace of rest to her after her kilns, and her brackens, and her barns, and her storms, she was afraid of being set free, maybe, if she didn't confess; or maybe she was too aweary to trouble to say no to aught they asked her. Oh, well, poor wounded woman, you've had it to do, haven't you, poor mute ewe, with all your wounds and bruises on you; but a bosom is here at last to guard you,

Margaret Higgs, like the morning to a murky night, and the turning to a long lane, aye, a bosom is here to guard you...The prisoner is discharged!

“Officer, I give myself in charge for the manslaughter of one John Cheyne.”

It was now that the woman, babbling something, put out both her hands one moment toward her husband, but in the very act failed and fell. She was raised and taken out, and I, rushing out with the rest just behind her husband, witnessed everything that was done in vain to revive her, and the raver’s frenzied vain prayers to his dead.

THE PALE APE (1911)

“A BIG THING of a pig.” — Aristophanes.

YESTERDAY again I stood and looked at Hargen Hall from the lake; and it is this that has brought me to write of my life in it. Wintry winds were whistling through the withered bracken and the branches, whirling withered birch-leaves about the south quadrangle; and no birds sang.

When I first entered it I was a girl, one might say — gay enough; but now I have known what one never forgets; and the days and the hairs grow grey together.

Five titled names among my friends gained me an entrance to Hargen in the fall of the year ‘08. I arrived on the evening of 10th November; and shall never forget the strangeness of the impression made on my mind that night: for even ere I rounded into sight of the house, the sound of the waters far off filled me with a feeling of the eerily dreary — the house being almost surrounded with mountain and cliff, down which a series of cascades shower; and that night I had some difficulty in catching quite everything that was said to me, though in two or three days, maybe, my ear became used to the tumult.

It was four days before I met Sir Philip Lister himself — Davenport, the old butler, told me that his master was “indisposed” — but Sir Philip sent me a polite missive inviting me to take things carelessly a little: so I spent the first days in learning my pupil’s moods, and in roaming over the place, from “Queen Elizabeth’s Room” — behind the bed still hung a velvet shield brodered with the royal arms in white wire — to the apes and the cascades.

A sense of forlornness pervaded it all, for scarcely ten of us were in all the desert of that place, with an occasional glimpse of two or three gardeners, or a groom. The kitchen was now a panelled hall like a chapel, with windows of painted glass containing the six coats-of-arms of the Lister Lynns, a hall in whose vastness the cook and her assistant looked awfully forlorn and small; and hardly even a housemaid ever now entered all that part of the east wing which had been singed by a fire fifty-five years since.

It was on the fourth forenoon, a day of “the Indian summer,” that my pupil took me to see the apes. There were three of them — two chimpanzees, one gibbon — in three rooms of wire-netting close to the east line of cliffs, i.e., about six hundred yards from the house. There, chuckling and chattering in the shadow of chestnuts, they lived their lives, anon speculating like philosophers upon their knots, or hearkening to the waters which chanted near in their ears. And there was a fourth room of netting in the row, but empty; as to which my pupil said to me:

“The one that used to be in this fourth room was huge, Miss Newnes, and had a pale face. He died some time before I came to Hargen: but his ghost walks when the moon is at the full.”

“Now Esmé,” I muttered. (Her name was Esmé Martagon, daughter of the Marquis de Martagon and of Margaret Lister, Sir Philip’s sister; the child being at this time twelve years of age, and an orphan — a rather pretty elf with ebon curls, but as changeable as the shapes of mercury, now bursting with alacrity, and now cursed with black turns of sadness.)

“But if I have seen it?” she gravely replied, gazing up at me with her great eyes.

“The ghost of an ape, Esmé,” I muttered.

For answer, flying off into vivacity, she cried to me:

“Come, you shall hear it!” — and she led the way northward through the park, until we walked down a dark path tremulous with spray, where one of the smaller waterfalls came down. By stepping on the tops of rocks in its froth, one could get, in the rear of the torrent, into a grot, where the greenery grew very vigorous and gay from the perpetual spray; and when I had followed Esmé’s career into this hollow in the rock, she hollaed into my ear in opposition to the tons of thunder sounding down: “Now, listen a little: this one is named ‘The Ape.’”

For some minutes — three to six — I heard nothing but the burden of the cascade’s murmur, and was now about to say something sceptical, when there sounded what I am bound to say affected me in a rather startling way — a sound very sharp and energetic — the chuckle, chuckle of a monkey — most pressing, most imperative, in its summons to the attention. It was over in a moment; but presently came again: and in the course of half an hour’s listening it came altogether five times, not quite at regular intervals, but still with a kind of periodicity: and I concluded that some small cause, perhaps only a condition of the wind, acted ever and anon to modify the cataract’s tract, and produce this curious cackling.

My pupil hollaed to me: “And if you kept on waiting to hear, and listening to it, do you know what would happen to you, Miss Newnes?” — and when I asked what, she called:

“You would go stark mad!”

“Not I,” I said.

One of the shadows darkened the child’s face; and presently she remarked: “I should, I know.”

“Three of the ladies of the Listers, and one of the Lynns, have — among them my mother’s mother.

“It is in the blood, I think.”

I started! — for I now suddenly believed her. Indeed, to my consciousness, there was something ironic in the torrent's chuckle, and at once, taking the child's hand, I said: "Come."

Late in the day when we were together in what is called "the Great Hall," Esmé, ever sage beyond her age, again spoke of the chuckling cascade, begging me not to mention or show it to her Cousin Huggins when he came: for a young man of this name, who had hardly been at Hargen since he was six, was coming from India in some months, and was expected to spend a month with us.

It was that night that, for the first time, I saw Sir Philip Lister: for he dined with Esmé and Mrs.

Wiseman and me in the main building dining-room, the old Davenport waiting upon us in state with his silent footsteps, we five making a pretty insignificant group in that great room, whose array of windows have a south aspect upon the south quadrangle.

It has (or had) tapestry all round, and rows of Jacobean carving-tables, which give the room an air of very gloomy state; and a wood-fire bickered on the iron-work fire-back, under whose oak over-mantel Sir Philip sat with Esmé and me ten minutes, then took himself away into his own sequestered nook of the house.

Two days after this he again had dinner with us, and again the day after that; but that third time the child, in one of her chatterbox fits, chanced to observe that "Uncle Philip is lending his presence since Miss Newnes has come" — and, like a bird that shies, Sir Philip showed himself no more to us for many days.

I regretted this, for his presence interested me, his manners were in such a high degree grave, dignified, and gracious. He was big, and, if not handsome, interesting to the eye — quaint, one might say — his face smooth like an actor's, his hair longer than usual, with great owl-eyes, whose glowering underlook was thronged, to my thinking, with mysteries of sorrow — something shifting, though, uncandidly shy, in them. His age I guessed to be about forty-five.

He was engaged in the writing of what I heard was “a great work,” six volumes long, on “The Old Kingdom” (fourth of sixth dynasty of Egyptian Kings), and lived a life of such privacy, that it was three weeks ere I met him afresh. Meantime, Esmé and I entered upon the course of our adventurous studies— “adventurous,” for never for two hours together was my pupil the same girl. Esmé had fits of headache; and she had fits of reading, when she feasted upon volumes with a hungry vulture's greed; and she had fits of indolence, dormouse torpors, fits of crying, dark-minded lamentations, fits of flightiness, of crazy dissipation, of craving for — wine. As for her knowledge, it was astonishing in such a child, and she anon plied me with queries to which I could find no reply.

On a forenoon in the fourth week, when she was feeling out of sorts, we were sauntering in the park, when, for once, I saw Sir Philip out of doors. We came upon him with his face against the ape-house netting, gazing in at the gibbon — so eagerly, that we were near him ere he seemed to hear us. When he suddenly saw us, he stood struck into a posture as of suspense, but presently was very affable in his reserved manner, and conversed with me some minutes about the apes and their various traits. They had the names of Egyptian kings, the chimpanzees being Pepy II, and Khety, and the gibbon Sety I; and at the gibbon Sir Philip shook his finger, saying with a playful solemnity: “That fellow! That fellow!” — I had no idea what he meant.

Suddenly, in the midst of our talk, he — with a certain awkwardness of his lids — proposed a picnic-luncheon out of doors to which Esmé and I readily assented. But three minutes afterwards he started, furtively murmuring the words: "I must be getting back to work," and was gone — to my astonishment!

After this he again made himself very scarce for three weeks. Esmé and I, meantime, got into the habit of spending our hours of labour in the great hall, sitting on a day-bed that lay in the solar-room gallery there — the gallery from which of old one gazed down upon the retainers at table below; and those days of my life, that I whiled away in that place, are to me at present days touched with much strangeness and a tone of Utopia. But the great place was quite plain and empty — a plain ceiling, plain white walls, oak-panelled half-way up: only, as it was lighted by fourteen great windows with shields of painted glass, when the sun glowed through them, it transfigured that old room into glory-land. . . . But it is gone from me now like a dream, and I shall not see it again.

It was on the Thursday afternoon of my thirteenth week at Hargan that I received from Sir Philip Lister a singular missive: he had injured his thumb, he said, and wished to know if I would "kindly write from his dictation." But what, then, I asked myself, was to become of Esmé meantime? I did not wish to leave the child! However, I could not say no: and so entered that day the sacred den. He, with his fingers in a sling, instantly jumped up with a gush of apologies, showering upon me a thousand thanks that were at once gushing and shy, till the shyness triumphed, and he was suddenly silent and done. Then, I sitting at an old abbey-table, he on an old farmhouse settle, he dictated to me with his eyes closed, in a low tone, all about Khufu, and Khafra, and the things of "the Pyramid Age," until I had the impression that he was himself something Egyptian and most ancient, and I with him, and in which age of the world we were I was not at some moments certain. In the midst of the dictating he all at once pressed his left palm upon his forehead, as if tired or muddled, his eyes tight shut; and, jumping up, he muttered to me, “thank you! thank you!” offering me his hand. Some of his actions had a wonderful swiftness and suddenness; and that hand of his which I touched was as chill as snow: so that I made haste from him.

That night I retired, as usual, soon after eleven to my room, which was in a rather remote and lonely region of the house; and was soon asleep. Two hours later I awoke terrified — I could not quite tell why — but so terrified, that I found myself sitting up in bed — with a singular sound, or the memory or dream of a singular sound, lingering about my ears: and I was trembling, my brow was wet with sweat. Through my two windows, which stood open, shone the full moon’s light, lying over the floor, lighting the stamp-work tapestry on my right; and I could hear the night-breeze breathing drearily through the leaves of the cedar, some of whose branches, held up with chains, brushed my panes. For some minutes I sat so, hearing my heart beating in my ears, the breezes shivering through the tree, the streams showering, the soundlessness of the house and hour, and as conscious of some living spirit hovering round me as though I saw it. If it had lasted long, I must have lost consciousness, or else cast off the oppression of it with a shriek: but presently something reached my ear — a chuckle, a little giggle of glee, just distinct enough to convince me that it was due to no lunacy of my ear: and immediately, with a creeping in my hair, but a species of rage and desperation elevating me, I was out of bed, and at one of the windows: for just after the chuckle a sharp rush through the leafage of the cedar seemed to reach me, and I rushed to see.

What I saw made me faint — whether instantly or after some seconds I cannot say: I know that when I came to my senses I was seated on the floor with my forehead leaning on my old oak chair, and the tower-clock was now sounding the hour of three. But however soon I may have swooned after seeing it, it was not so instantly that I could have the slightest doubt as to the actualness of what my eyes saw. For though the moonlight left the interior regions of the tree's leafage in some obscurity, I was sure that some brute of the ape species with a pale face was hanging there in the cedar — hanging head-downward among the network of chains and branches in such a way as to see into my chamber; and I have an impression of hearing — either before I fell, or through my swoon afterwards — a succession of chucklings; and then a voice somewhere remonstrating, pleading, commanding, in a secret species of shout; and then a strangled outcry of horror, of anguish, somewhere, all mingled with a dream of the chuckle of the chuckling stream.

But the strongest of my impressions was undoubtedly that drowning outcry of horror — an impression so strong, that I could hardly believe it to be a dream, or all a dream. This cry was somehow connected in my mind from the first with old Davenport; and this feeling was confirmed in me when Davenport was nowhere to be seen the next day, nor for four days after.

Mrs. Wiseman, the housekeeper, who for days was pale, and occasionally fell into a vacant staring, told me that Davenport was “suffering.” She asked me no questions as to the night, but I twice caught her eye piercingly bent upon me with a meaning of inquiry, of anxiety, in it; and the same thing was true of Sir Philip when, three days later, he appeared towards evening: for he took my hand with a tender solicitude, and a lingering look of question in his gaze. As for Davenport, when I next saw him it was under a tree in the park, where he sat like a convalescent, in his flesh that pathetic pallor of the flesh of aged people who have passed through an illness; and the wrappings round his neck could not wholly hide from my eyes that his throat had been most brutally bruised.

During those days it was as if a blow had fallen upon Hargen. Esmé no longer laughed, and a lower tone of talk overtook us all. It was obvious that each held the consciousness of a secret which none dared breathe to another; and in vain I consumed days of musing in seeking to see into the meaning of these things. For my part, I was ailing, nor could quite hide it. I had the thought of moving out of my room, which I now shrank from entering even in the day-time, but did not care to show so openly that I was afraid. Through the nights I burned a light, but slept with my nerves awake. Not that I was ever of a very nervous temperament, I think: but terror infected me like a sickness in those days; the stare of eyes of affright in the night was ever present in my imagination; and Hargen soon grew to be to my haunted heart the very home of gloom. Then one day, on a sudden, all this trouble of mind rushed away from me like a shadow; and my being galloped into a mood of gladness in which gloom was abolished, and I forgot to be appalled in the dark.

I will tell of it very briefly. It happened that one afternoon when Esmé and I were sitting listlessly in that solar-room gallery, an open grammar lying idle between us, suddenly behind us, there rose out of the floor, as it seemed, a young man who clapped his fingers over Esmé's eyes, smiling with me the while. "Cousin Huggins!" the child cried out — much surprised, for Huggins Lister was not expected at Hargen for some days yet. He caught her up in his big arms, and bussed her like a gun, for he was a being made all of ardours and horse-play: and then he looked into my eyes, and I looked into his eyes.

It was as if I had always known him — long before I was born; and what hurried me more into the sort of maelstrom in which I was now caught was the circumstance, that on the day after that first day Esmé took a chill, remained in bed, and I was all alone with Huggins Lister in that wilderness of Hargen. The young man was, or pretended to be, interested in old things, and would have me show him all the cassone and old needlework, the Spanish glasses giving their glints of gold, the old girandoles with their amorini. He dined with me, we two alone, and Mrs. Wiseman: for Sir Philip more than ever kept himself to himself.

Only, on the fourth evening when Huggins Lister and I were walking in the park, Sir Philip suddenly appeared before us, walking with precipitate steps the other way; did not pause, nor utter a sound, as he passed by us with a bowed brow, his hat raised; but when he had gone some way beyond us, he stopped, and — shook his finger at us! was going, too, I am sure, to venture to say something, but failed; and suddenly was gone on his way again. I remember being very offended at the moment: but a moment more, God forgive me, had forgotten that Sir Philip Lister lived.

I showed the young man the apes, and the Queen's Room, and the cascades, save one, and the ivory inlay of the two Spanish chests, and the Tudor fireplaces, and what was in "the long gallery"; and still he wished to see things. And just under the window that lights the great staircase, there stands on the landing a sedan-chair painted with glaring variegations, the window-glass casting the gauds of the six coats-of-arms of the Lister-Lynns upon the already gaudy chair: in which chair he got me to sit — it was high noon, on the open stair, but we were as solitary there as if night veiled us in a monastery; and, indeed, all that waste of Hargen seemed but made to beguile and mislead our feet to our fate — he got me to sit in it, I say, and then, having me well in his bondage in the sedan-chair, began to sob to me with passion; and when I hid away my face for pity of him there in his passion on his knees, and dashed one wild tear from my eyes, the young man ravished my lips with his lips, there in the chair on the stair that day. I could not help it, for in respect of me Huggins Lister came, and saw, and conquered! and I was as one drugged with honey-dew, and dancing drugged, in Huggins Lister's hands.

Also, the young man persuaded like a hurricane! and hurried me as madly into marriage as those sand-forms of the sand-storm which madly waltz into oneness. Within six months, he said, he would arrange everything so as to proclaim the marriage; but meantime it must be secret, and must be immediate! Against this tyranny I made a feint of resistance; but half-heartedly; and it availed me nothing: indeed, he was dear to me, and near, and had me all in the hollow of his hand and heart. And so one forenoon I stole out of Hargen gates, and met him at a house in St. Arvens townlet, the place of our marriage; but, as we were passing out, married, from the door of the house, my heart bounded into my mouth to see Sir Philip Lister walking hardly ten yards away. Yes, he who never left home was there before my eyes in the broad light in St. Arvens street with his oak-stick — walking away from us, indeed, seeming unaware of our presence: yet I have an impression, too, of his head half-turned toward us a moment, of a face ashen with agitation: and my heart, for all its warmth, shivered as with a mortal chill in me.

My reeling feet led me back to Hargen in a kind of dream, a wedded wife, as wild with thoughts as with wine that day, for I was my beloved's, and he was mine: and in what way I spent that day I could not say, since I was new in heaven, and can but remember my fruitless efforts to hide from Esmé's eyes the state of my mind: for she had lately risen from her ailment, and I made a pretence of study with her, and I was severe with my dear, denying him my presence until the evening; and even then retired betimes, leaving him sighing.

My chamber-door I barricaded with a chair — a bridal childishness, since, to secure the room, I should have locked it. And I lay awake for a long hour, looking at the luminosity of the full moon, until, wearied out by the reel of my day's dream, I fell into a brief sleep.

From this a roar awoke me: and may a sound like that sound never more come to me to summon me with its trump. I understood that some soul was in extremis, and out of the deeps of grief and horror was horridly appealing to his God; and, finding myself on the ground, I knelt one wild second, crying aloud: "Almighty God, guard my love from harm in this house of horror." A moment more I had thrown a gown round me, and was gone out of the door.

As I ran along the corridor, trying to strike a light to the candle that I carried, there seemed to reach my ear from somewhere a chuckle very hushed and low, like the jackal chattering over its carrion; and my fingers were so shaken by this thing, that they failed to bring the match into relation with the candle's wick. When the heat reached my hand I dashed down the match. Still running, I lit another — or half lit it: for in the instant when the match fused at the scratch, saw — or in some manner knew — that some mad and monstrous animal was with me; at the same moment the match went out, or was puffed out; and a thing most chilly cold touched my skin. I felt pain then, the pain of the awe of the darkness; and I stood palsied. But within some seconds, I think, I was rushing afresh toward the corridor-end, without the candlestick now, which had dropped from me; so that I could not see that the portal at the end, which I expected to be open as usual, was shut; and I rushed with a shock upon it. It was not only shut, but locked! — finding which, I, standing there, piled the passion of my whole soul into cry on cry, crying "Huggins! Sir Philip! Davenport! Huggins!" then I stood, hearing the streams murmuring as through eternity in the silence of the night, and the strong knocking of my heart against my side — but no reply to my calls.

This was not very astonishing, as my room was in such a solitary part of the mansion: and I stood imprisoned, suffering, expecting every second the coming upon me of that which would strike me dead with fright. The stillness lasted half a minute, perhaps, and then I became aware of a sound outside the door, a bumping going down the stairs in a regular way, like something massive being dragged down, with bump, bump, bump: and such was the solemnity and mystery of this thing to me in my solitude there in that gruesome gloom, that to linger any longer there in my pain soon grew to be impossible to me; and before I knew what I was doing I was out of a window, moving along a ledge fifty feet aloft toward the next window. The ledge was scarcely more than a foot wide, I think, and how I dared it, and why I did not fall, I can't now say. With my nose close to the wall — conscious all the time of drizzle tossed by high winds, conscious of the night full of a wild light, though the moon was quite hidden — I stepped flutteringly along over thin snow in dizzy suspense, keeping my sob until I should reach the next window: and there, as I leapt, I gave it vent, and fainted at my safety. I did not cease to hear, though, the bumping sound going down; and when it got to the bottom, something in me gave me the dauntlessness of heart to go after it.

Down I crept, haltingly, crouching, stair by stair. Halfway down I seemed to hear something being dragged over the floor below. I went on down. The sound had now gone out through a doorway, and I knew which doorway; but as I followed that way, my bare toes struck upon something cold, and I dropped upon my hands over it. I moaned then for pity of myself, because it was dark, and because I did so suffer. But I was conscious, as I dropped, of a rattle of matches, for I still had the match-box in my hand, without knowing that I had it: and the desire took me to strike a light. It was some time, though, before I would, or could, and when I eventually ventured, I saw the sight of the body of the old butler in his night-attire lying wildly before me on the floor: and I knew by a look that was in his eyes that they were for ever sightless.

At the same moment I was aware of the slamming of a door some way off; and again I knew which door — the little side-portal by the kitchen-entrance, leading out northward into the park — and again something gave vigour to my knees, and lifted my feet, to go to see. I made my way to the little portal; opened it slowly; my soles were out on the snow. And before me on the short gravel-path going north into the park I distinctly saw the pale ape, bearing a body against his breast. A moment later he laid down his heavy load, and bent over it; and when I saw him horribly muttering over it, something in me stooped, took up a stone, and threw it at the brute.

It went straight to his head.

After some seconds the creature raised himself slowly, and raced with reeling feet into the darkness of the park.

I staggered then to the body, and saw that it was Huggins Lister strangled; and on the body of my beloved my senses left me.

It was ten in the day before I knew anything more; and then I lay on a bed, on one side of it Esmé, on the other side Mrs. Wiseman.

The latter had a fixed stare; and from the manner in which Esmé was smiling, with her face held sideward, while she persistently counted on her fingers, I could make out that the child was now insane.

I lay still, I said nothing; little I cared.

Presently a girl named Bertha entered to murmur the words: “He isn’t found yet”; and from some words murmured in reply by Mrs. Wiseman, I gathered that Sir Philip Lister had disappeared.

Little I cared, I lay still and sullen, with closed lids.

Near noon again came the news that the men seeking for Sir Philip Lister could even yet discover no trace of him; but at about live in the evening he was found dying in the hollow of the rock that lies behind the cascade that they call “The Ape,” and was brought to the Hall.

Very soon afterwards Mrs. Wiseman, who had then left my side, flew in again to me with crying eyes, imploring me to try and go for a moment to the dying man, who was hungering to have one sight of me; and I let her throw some clothes over me, and was led by her to the death-bed.

By this time I knew — for Mrs. Wiseman during the day had revealed it to me in a flood of tears — that Sir Philip Lister’s mother had too much listened to the chuckling cascade, and so had borne him the being he was — a being capable at any agitation of shedding his human nature to resume the nature of the brute, and hurling away human raiment with his human nature in the murderous turbulence of his nocturnal revels — he who in my eyes had been so perfect in gentleness, so shy, so staid! But none the less I shuddered to the soul when he touched my hand to pant at me through the death-ruckle rolling in his throat: “I have loved you well” — a shudder which perhaps saved me from death or from madness, for I had lapsed that day into a mad apathy. It was nearly night then, and the light in there was very dreary; but I could still see that the hair which overgrew the ogre’s frame was considerably more than an inch deep — greenish, and gross as the gorilla’s. It clasped him round the throat and round the wrists in lines perfectly defined, like a perfect coat of fur that he wore; and it did not thin, but continued no less thick where it abruptly ended than everywhere else.

But he had “loved me well,” and I him now — for if he had been perniciously jealous, it was for love of me that he had been jealous; and in dying he looked into my eyes with human eyes, kindly, mildly, looking “I have loved you well”; and when with his last strength he pointed to where the pebble I had flung had sunk into his skull, then I lifted my voice and wept to God because of him, and myself, and Hargen Hall and all, not caring any longer if my face was buried in the horror of his hairy breast. And so he died, and Huggins Lister, and I was left alive.

Shiel, c. 1910

Science, Life and Literature (1950)

First published in London by Williams and Norgate in 1950, Science, Life and Literature appeared posthumously as Shiel died on 17 February 1947 at the age of eighty-one. In 1931, the novelist had met the young writer and poet, John Gawsworth, who would become Shiel's close friend for life and his literary executor after death. Gawsworth wrote the foreword to Science, Life and Literature and was a lifelong admirer and champion of Shiel's work. Most bizarrely, Gawsworth also assumed Shiel's former title of 'King' of the Kingdom of Redonda; an uninhabited micro-nation island in the Caribbean. Shiel stated that he was crowned the 'King' of the island in 1880 on his fifteenth birthday by his father. The extent to which he was serious about this claim is hard to determine, but Gawsworth heavily promoted the story after his friend's death.

Science, Life and Literature is a collection of non-fiction essays on a diverse array of topics. Shiel was deeply interested and engaged with the intellectual and scientific discussions prevalent of the time. In the essays 'On Reading' and 'On Writing', written during the opening decade of the twentieth century, Shiel focuses on writers and writing, as well as exploring the art of literature. The collection also includes the author's musings on topics such as wealth, war, tolerance, vengeance, time-travel and religion. The book provides a revealing insight into Shiel's thoughts, beliefs and intellectual convictions.

Please note: due to copyright restrictions, Gawsworth's Foreword cannot appear in this edition.

I. OF MYSELF

I

I NAME MYSELF a native of the West Indies, whither I was transported to commence to draw breath — to Montserrat, a mountain mass, loveliest of the lovely, but touchy! uncertain! dashing into tantrums — hurricanes, earthquakes, brooks bubbling hot, “sou frières” (sulphur swamps), floods— “fit nurse to a poetic child”, and I have seen “unspeakable things, not possible for a man to utter”.

My father was a “local preacher” (Methodist), little imagining how far his only son, born after eight daughters, and bred a Nazarite, would be from preaching in chapels, though vastly more religious than he, since with increasing speed now we are “better than our fathers”. Not so much a poet as he, however, for, if one had told him “You are a poet”, he would have said “Nonsense”, whereas I have found out that I am a poet, in the hour that I found out becoming less profoundly a poet, in such a case “the unconscious being the alone complete: know not thyself”. But when there was storm abroad, and cosmic voices of wanderers calling all aloft, and all cowered awestruck, and the bounds of Being were swallowed up in bleakness, then was his night of the ball and high Sinai interview, he, blown all aflaunt like Lear, going in a flowing gown up and down the house, hailing those howlers’ haste, egging on the hurricane’s crew to yet graver hurries, and the up roarious to yet more tremendous terrorisms— “blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!” — while we others sat mouse quiet, and had our hand on our mouth. Anyway, owing to that religiosity of his, each morning for years he and I on a little sofa read together a chapter of the Bible, and from thus knowing the book by heart arises perhaps that I write as I do, I myself being a preacher at eleven, preaching in a nightdress over my clothes of Jonah in the whale's belly, shouting, "Lazarus, come forth!", and Lazarus came; but no sooner was fourteen than I began to name the Methodists "the Methodies", making sad a man.

He had also the Irish foible of thinking highly of people descended from kings, and had, in truth, about him some species of kingship, aloofness, was called by all "the Governor", and on my fifteenth birthday, July 21st, 1880, had me crowned King of Redonda — a day of carousal, of a meeting of ships (he was a shipowner), and of people, to see the palm of the Rev. Dr. Semper, of Antigua, daub me with the balm of anointment; and this notion that I am somehow the King, King of kings, and the Kaiser of imperial Caesar, was so inveterately suggested to me, that I became incapable of expelling it. But to believe fantasies is what causes half our sorrows, as not believing realities causes half, and it would have been better for me if my people had been more reasonable here; nor can I forgive myself now for the solemnity and dignity with which I figured in that show. For what is a king without subjects? Certainly, if I am a king, my kingdom is "not of this world": Redonda is a rock-island of scarcely nine square miles, and my subjects were troops innumerable of boobies deciding to swoop with sudden steepness into the sea like streams of meteors streaming, together with eleven poor men who gathered the boobies' excrement to make "guano" (manure). And these were American people! Moreover, not long after my coronation the British Government, apprehensive that America might "annex" the rock, "annexed" it itself, i.e., stuck a little flagstaff on it; and though my parent irked heaven and earth with his claim of "priority", there the flagstaff remains, if it has not gone to heaven on some gale's gallop: there may it ever remain. I have scaled to that rock's very top, and looked abroad at blue-eyed Beauty, being ever nimble on my feet, given to feats of climbing, running, rope walking, dancing, acrobatics, and once at thirteen jumped without hurt from a first-floor window (higher than ours): for I had told a tutor that, if ever he ventured to touch me, I should jump; and he touched me, and I jumped — to his everlasting heart-shock. Conjuring tricks also attracted me, as still I cherish a reverence for the conjuror, the acrobat — intellectual or physical — knowing that “by wit He seated the earth, He fastened the Heavens with trickiness”. Once when a troupe came, I saw a conjuror break eggs into a hat, put on the hat, take it off, and now round his brow was a row of roses. So the next day I, entranced — I was eleven — said to Paddy — lad of twenty, wedded to me— “I can do it!” He denied; I insisted, “Paddy, I can.” Now, he was a mulatto — a sort of people as credulous as priests are, for whom fancies have the same weight as ascertained facts — and, shaken in his faith in Nature by my faith in myself, he said, “Well, we’ll see.” So he gets eggs, breaks them into a hat; and I can see again his keen stoop, his stare of interest, as I raised the hat toward my head, and can hear again his glad outcry of laughter, as the universe rallied to re-establish his old view of her, while I stood foolish, with the fluids raining down my face.... But how ill-educated for eleven! how foreign to the cosmos! I had been reading Caesar, you see, the prick of my intellect “let down” (as we say when we soften steel) for ever. Then, after my window-jump, to Harrison College in Barbados — a good school, as schools go; but I do not seem to have had any more scepticism than my teachers — any more perception that the two hours a week of chemistry and the four of Greek was a crazy state of things. To-day I am in the ironic situation of “knowing” six or seven languages (“Interpreter to the International Congress of Hygiene and Demography”), while being fiercely at war with that sort of “knowledge”, the acquisition of which is a lazy-labour, occupying the brain with the hobby and habit of remembering, until, pampered, it shrinks from the ice and pioneer’s pick of thinking. Then after my coronation I was translated to King’s College, London: now matriculation and “intermediate”; about the time of my degree my father dying; and during all that alumnus period I seem to have quite abandoned writing English, though at twelve I had written a novel, the MS. of which was long preserved in my family (never published); at thirteen I was issuing a penny periodical, seven copies a week for seven “subscribers”, written by hand — a labour of Hercules; and at fifteen I had a serial in a newspaper. But then I was hypnotised into being interested in writing Latin asclepiads, Greek sapphics — grotesque thing! irrelevant thing! — changing into a Chinese mind a European stripling. But when I had taught for a year what was called “mathematics” in a Derbyshire school, I thought of following my namesake James Phipps Shiel, and becoming a doctor (great-grandfather — he who said of some field “Not mine? It is mine from heaven’s height right down to hell!”, the wild mind); this thought kept me at St. Bart’s six months, where upon, coming directly, every day, in contact with science, I was done with writing — or reading! — Greek poetry, except the old Homer, whom one may easily get addicted to. But the very first operation which I saw was for strabismus — on the eyeball — and this so sickened and hypnotised me into a dislike for knifing, that I gave it up; and, lying idle one day, gazing at the sky, was given the idea to write my Prince Zaleski. At seventeen I had come across Poe just when I had begun to smoke, and the two smokes transported me to Nephelococugia, where I sojourned many days, so that this Prince Zaleski (published in Lane’s famous “Keynote Series”) has in it more Poe than Job. Then, on writing more, I decided that writing English — my first love — was what was given me to do. I soon had no lack of interests. Through Sir Ernest Clark, of the Royal Agricultural Society, whom I had known, I was appointed interpreter to the Congress; through Sir William Robinson and my brother-in-law, the Honble. S. L. Horsford, I was brought into contact with Earl Gray and with Sir C. Alexander Harris, of the Colonial Office (later Governor of Newfoundland), through whom again I came into relation with Mrs. Gladstone, a very gracious lady, connected with the West Indies, who at that time took no little interest in my writing, and profoundly influenced my goings and comings; through this again W. T. Stead got to know me, conceived that I “had an imagination”, and would write to me invitingly when one of his rapturous ideas in journalism attacked and urged him — he and I even writing a wild little “book” in collaboration; at the same time I was coaching my nephew, Cyril Horsford, now the butcher of “nose ear and throat” of 24 Harley Street; and simultaneously was in with Louis Tracy, with whom I wrote several “books” under a pen name, he having “the idea”, I concocting “the plot”, writing the first half, he the second — in a wildly different style! I can’t think now with what motive I so wasted myself. Meantime, I was getting to know the literary people, like Dowson, Machen, Louÿs, Ella D’Arcy, George Egerton, Harland, Wilde, Stevenson, while the periodical people were getting to know me. When some trouble broke out in China, Keary, of Pearson’s, for whom Tracy had written a very “successful” serial (The Final War), asked me to do a “war serial”, which became my “successful” Yellow Danger, published by Grant Richards, then beginning, he, too: and he, with Werner Laurie, has been my publisher. Then serial after serial: I am summoned by Alfred Harmsworth, am tempted by that tempter to abandon Pearson, but won’t, till, too much tempted, I write for People, Chronicle, Leader, Red, and the rest — easy labour by which one makes two or three thousand pounds a year; but then, to make real books of the serials, one must needs rewrite, and that is trying. In the thick of which my fate takes me one afternoon into the Palais de Glace in the rue de Madrid, where I see a girl of sixteen skating, a Parisian Spaniard. Of course, I had seen lovely girls — in Cuba — in Andalusia — in Martinique — but never before seen a beauty, and she resembled a girl whom I had loved at seven, another girl whom I had loved at thirteen, and my mother. Now, I had long ceased “to pray” like my parents, considering that improper; but that afternoon I dashed in a cab to my chamber, and, prostrating myself, I prayed, “God! give her to me!” And the good God did. I did not know her name to begin, but out of the grasp and drag of some twenty I grabbed her, got her. It was natural, after this, for me to pray for girls; and I can say that, if ever I have prayed for a girl, I have got her from God. She — Lina — was the “Laura” of my Cold Steel — at least her face and manner; in the streets of London every creature turned the head to look back at her, and observe the handicraft of her Father. But she did not think London “pretty” (“Londres n’est pas jolie”), and it was thus that I got the habit of living long in Paris. However, she was not strong — died after five years, leaving me and a daughter; and it was some fifteen years before I married again, when I met at a lecture Lydia, who resembles Lina and my mother. Then the war — Censor’s Office — toward the end Italy — privilege of kissing the Pope’s great bit, his toe — and, meantime, no writing; but then commenced afresh, having something to say, as America especially seems to see.

Meantime, I have a good time, “counting my days”, having found out how to live in heaven high health — never have a pain, or anything like that. Though no chick still, I run six miles a day — or rather a night, for I like the light of the other suns even better than ours. “My amusements” are mathematics, sometimes mountaineering.... But more than enough of my little self: which “self”, I know, is a fancy, has no reality, being a succession of little selves connected by a thread of memory, and only One is real: to know which thing is weal, I think.

II

It is not very consistent of me to have written books, since I can see that people read too much, through a certain laziness of mentation: as an American lady has lately written to me, “I read three books a week,” and I to her, “I guarantee that that would undermine any mind, however strong: this, then, is why you ‘go to confession’, for the habit of leaning upon props will at last bring one to being a cripple.” She, however, it appears (I never met her), reads all sorts of books — travel, sem-science — but some English ladies whom I know read novels and newspapers — little else. Now, the souls of these are lost: there is no saviour can save them; they are no more themselves, but are puddles of other souls that are themselves puddles. Newspapers! published daily! the hurried words of the tattler, having a circulation wider — far — than the words of the wise; and, as to novels — well, I must confess that I never had time to read many, but in those that I have got through I saw nothing novel, and what struck me was that there didn’t seem to be enough motive for one to sit down and write that mass, so that I have asked myself, “Why ever didn’t he (or she!) amuse himself by doing carpentry, or conic sections, puzzles, tennis — something more educating and entertaining than this purposeless whirl of words?” If there is a desire to “represent life”, and if there is a sense in the writer of some special gift to do this, that might be something; but, in general, life is little represented: people in real life, when they meet, talk on general subjects — the fall of the French Cabinet, the velocity of the nebulae, the decay of the Church, the conditions of flight in the stratosphere — but in the novel the people speak only of one another, of the plot in which they are involved; or, if by chance they discuss things in general, the conclusions to which they come aren't new enough, nor of moment enough, to produce the impression that here was the insight, here the discovery, that moved the writer to write, and it was worth the time he spent: so that when in a few years the writer fills shelves with empty books, the impression left is that his (her!) only motive was to earn a livelihood, and that he is a common work man, who works for himself and for another man, not for Man, not for a planet, not, so to say, for God. And since no one is quite unlike his environment, I, too, no doubt, am of this kind. Not wholly, though, I fancy — perhaps because my father had some money; so that when my old friend, Mr. Louis Tracy, C.B.E., has said to me, "Strange fellow, Shiel: you could make as much money as Bernard Shaw and Edgar Wallace put together, but you persist in casting your pearls before swineherds, who know not pearls," I have answered something like this; "It is you, Tracy, who are strange, if you do not conceive that different people can be pleased by different things, that Mr. Shaw may have had a liking for oranges, and I a liking, not less genuine, for pineapple. And, if I made that money, whatever should I do with it? Should I by chance eat more? Not all the wealth of ten Ormuzes would induce me to put one ounce more food into my sweet little body that I treat with a ritual so deliberate, as an altar. Moreover, as to 'pearls' and 'swineherds', they aren't all swineherds; those that are will be changing their occupation — soon — getting to be fruit-growers. Haven't you noticed this new interest of boys in wireless mechanisms, model engines, and so on? I am expecting to live to see the kicking to the devil of headmasters of the parson-type, and nations of scientists arising. They won't be swineherds then, look. And, if I don't live to see, I shan't be restless in my grave, but shall abide in quietness, having died knowing what I know." Hence I have considered no music too sweet, nor wit too deep, to put into the sort of narrative of events that I have evolved. It seems to be considered in England that the one named The Purple Cloud is my “best”, but in America they think better of my How the Old Woman Got Home, which has run, is still running, into “editions”, while I myself think best of one named Children of the Wind — or think best of the memory of the dream of it, for I shrink from retreading it, lest I should find it less rich in wit and singing than I anticipate, as once happened to me. But the Old Woman one has this distinction, that in it is given, so to say, my political system. I first demonstrate what “good” means — and anyone who makes quite sure of this little thing will be astonished at the flood of light which it will throw into his thoughts on all sorts of subjects. I demonstrate, then, that the noun “Good” means pleasure, that the adjective “good” means pleasant — and nothing else. Then I demonstrate that all pleasure, all good, is the result of truth, of science — the science of the amoeba or of Newton. Then I demonstrate that the growth of truth, of science, of pleasure, of Good, depends (i) upon brains (a little), and (2) upon luck (much). Then I demonstrate that, though the luck of a million is exactly a millionfold more than the luck of one, the million must be in the way of truth, seeking truth, or no luck can accrue — must be scientists, men of leisure; but this they can’t be, if they are slaves, i.e., “landless men”, men without a country: so that any great growth of Good depends upon countries being owned by nations.

Ill And now I have to do with the young poet, John Gawsword, a live wire, he, young! and live! who fumbles like the bee among my written things, and, knowing wondrously all that have been published, if he comes upon aught unpublished, utters sound of discovery, as when H. G. Wells’ men on the moon cried, “Life!”, and those ten thousand cried, “The sea! the sea!” I never dreamt that I had written poems, but he has contrived to discover a surprising number, as to his dear industry is due the collection of these pieces that ensue, some of them cribbed out of other books, but some, he thinks, new.

II. ON READING

A Dedicatory Letter to a Mrs. Meade of Kensington.

FIRST, why should one read? At present everybody does, some “the papers”, some the prayer-book, or a novelette; I once even saw a periodical called Something to Read. But why this? Your reply, I think, will be, that in the throng of modern things there are periods of peace wherein one reads to “while away the time”; but, even so, it is to be observed that this relaxation is most perfectly to be obtained in turning from work for pay to work for play, as City-folk from business to cricket, to being Territorials, and so forth.

For, really, this reading-mania of the nations has an origin deeper in nature than any desire to “while away the time”, has an origin in the fact that progress is the law of Life, in the fact that the longer progress has gone on the greater has grown its rate, so that by the time it got to man its rate began to be great, and at modern man its rate is even eager. Nor is progress any more the law of Life in the gross than of the separate life, man or nag, though, because of its increasing speed, a modern man will do anything, will be gnawing an end of straw, will be perusing football gossip, sooner than sprawl all torpid, while a horse, its girth once gorged with herbage, will long bulge dead-still with a lubberlip in his meadow-plot, bitterly meditating upon nothing. Progress, then — but let us linger one instant, so as to be definite within us as to what progress is. Progress in a mound of stones is a growth in the amount of stone; in a tide, a fire, a growth in the amount of tide, of fire; progress in Life is a growth in the amount of life: and we know when the amount of life is grown, when we are aware of a growth in what is the trait of Life — consciousness, or knowledge, or science: the trait of all Life, of nettles also — as we may well divine: for though it is some months since we were protozoa, and we no more recollect the tone of protozoa souls, we conclude that since we at present possess consciousness, protozoa, and no less protophyta, must possess the elements of some kind of consciousness or knowledge, must have a dream, the fantasy of a dream, and at least know that they have it. And so we find how to define Life-progress: “Progress is a growth in consciousness” — in knowledge of truth; and here is that law of Life which one is jolly, if he is fulfilling, ill if not, and herein the meaning of this reading greed of modern people, who so read, since, progress at eager speed being their law, they feel that they must needs read, or be doing something, to be at every second bettering themselves, in the direction of extending their consciousness of truth.

But, now, how do they prosper in this? Not too splendidly, I think! We know, indeed, as a fact of science that the Law of Time is That Good Be: consequently each thing which is is to the good: serves for the moment some “purpose” in the evolution of the universe; and were it only to load evolution, still, as a load, it is useful in evolution. So when we asseverate of stealing, or reading, or anything that is, that it is “bad”, we mean so far as we can perceive, and it is our duty to seek with all our wrath to root out or prune it with all speed, if we believe it bad, as if it were really bad: for this our belief, too, is involved in The Plot, and if we succeed in killing the thing, our succeeding, too, will be good in its hour, as the thing killed was good in its hour.

*Little drops of water,
Little grains of sand,
Cause the great Atlantic,
Shape the gracious land,
The gracious land.*

*Little dooms atomic,
Molecules of fate,
Framed the constellations,
Make their nations great,

meaning that, since there are atoms of circumstance as atoms of matter, pebbles in that temple of history we see a building, hence the little opinions and acts of you and me, as of the pterodactyl crashing through the rattle of the Jurassic morass, are matters of permanent purport, and work in the world. So as regards this reading greed I call it bad (knowing it good), because, firstly, we read without having first learned how to read; secondly, because, supposing we read only the best that has been written, still we read very much more than we should; and then, because nearly all that we read is nearly as bad as bad can be, unnovel novels of feeble little people, offal beneath pity. And if it was the best, still, I say, it would be much too much of a best thing. For is there to be no time for thinking? as how can there be, if every time we sit down in an idle hour, our fingers of their own motion go out to our Job, our Jehovist, Homer, Spinoza, Herbert Spencer, Goethe, Plato? Or do you feel that “Elia” said well when he said, “I love to lose myself in other men’s minds; when I am not walking I am reading; I cannot sit and think: books think for me”? Well, “Elia” was an easy creature of a remote era who wrote many essays, and was weak in the head: not the highest of types, you say: whereas what we others are now after is to be finding the right path for our sons of the time to come, and be the highest. Or do you say maybe that your Leibnitz, your Mill, “make you think”? you, as Lamb was, are mistaken if you imagine that — not what one can name thinking. Who made them think? No one. “If I had read as much as others,” Hobbes says, “I should be as ignorant as they” (he meant as thoughtless). No, they thought because they were not so weak as to be always reading, and because thought, by use, soon grew to be to them the grandest of hilarities, as the habits of running and slow breathing grow to people who will only grow to them — sweets so deep, that they could no more keep it concealed, but must needs be putting it in a book. As a matter of fact, you cannot smoke and muse in another man’s universe in the old coat he uses; even these simple little ideas that I am at present expressing to you you get only the off-glow of, not that braw brightness and focus I see them in: how, then, from our philosophers, wholly preoccupied with their philosophy, and no poets, nor potentates of expression, shall you happen to catch so much as half of all that their eye just managed to catch in a certain light and the mood of a certain moonshine of the mind? Everyone, then, his own seer, his own thinker: and if one asks, as a young lady once asked me, “What, though, shall one think of?” the answer is the answer which I gave to her; “What can one think of, save of God and His Ways? — since there is nothing else. Smoking a cigarette, you may think of the cigarette and the smoke; sitting before a grate, you may think of the grate and the blaze — a thing which, if you should ponder long upon it, would still after trillions of ponderings defy you to solve a small part of its Divine mysteries.” What is heat...? Well, as to that, certainly, we need not be disturbing our wee circlets of head, since at the burden and hoariness of this question the hosts of the Heavens hold their breaths, saying, "Holy, Holy." Heat is some species of force: and if we owned skulls larger than London, we should still find ourselves infinitely far from knowing what a force is, nay, the bigger our skulls grew, the more truly would we be seeing that we did not one bit know, the more confirmed would become the certainty of our eternal journey that we could not by searching find out the Almighty. But there are a thousand doubts and queries about heat.... Heat hardens an egg, softens an egg-pan, causes brass to expand, rubber to contract — of all the extraordinary facts! Water, in growing cold, contracts, then all at once — expands! Now, is not this enough to fret a seraph's front, if he does not know? It is not, probably, an insoluble problem: possibly we, with our pretty wit, may solve it. Or shall we say that the water in our jars is an article in which certain persons called Thomson, Bohr, are somehow more concerned than we are? No, we will not, I believe, say that: that would be too feeble of us. Let us think, then, of these things; ponder upon the ways of God; upon the grate's steel; that negro rock within it: upon the dream of the meeting in the deep of the eras between that particular piece of anthracite and me, the entrancing mass of romance in that tryst! For the coal-measures of England came into being some ages ago — before Horsa's braves stormed, now, or the arm of Abraham had planted his staff to travel out of Haaran, or a Vihaara been built, or a Sabeian, heart-smit, built him an altar to the Morning Star. As for Kensington, it was not then, nor its mayor there to stare; no man, no mammal, was; nor no beeches nor birches were to be seen in the world; a few firs, maybe; and ferns, ferns, thronging in forests monstrous high; and the heavens, I divine, were of a heavier hue; and the moon in her hey day loomed bigger then, I think, over those woods and lagoons within whose glooms the labyrinthodon brooded. Moreover, we know, those coal-measures were some ages in making their layers — more than a thousand years; more even than four thousand; more than four thousand thousand: millions on millions. And we know that they were made for (or to) the use of men (since men do use them), and one particular lump was made for (or to) my use on a particular winter's night (since on that night I do use it), and a myriad suns uprose, and clomb, and most pensively set, and the lump of coal waited to come to me, then it came to a meeting with me, and I did not see it, I was reading Poincaré on entropy. But one should think a bit, too, shouldn't one? The thing is to educate oneself a little — to awake one's consciousness of the truth of things: this being even what education is — a bringing out, awaking, liberating one's brain to an active, an astonished, a romantic consciousness of facts: for whereas men, now, and cows, see many things, and wonder at nothing, overmen and angels — educated souls — live at most moments in an adoration of amazement. To conjure up, then, one's consciousness: that's the thing: a thing we will never get from books, though good books can instigate, but a thing to be got by sitting and thinking for one's self of the way of God; and if it is an irksome work at first, as running is to plump persons, the end of it is strength, independence, hilarity, and happiness. What we want, and are dying for lack of, in our islands is exactly this habit of philosophy, is it not? — the mental strength, independence, and liberation of philosophers: until we attain to which liberation, as they are attaining abroad, Britons, you may bet, ever must be slaves, and in the end slaves of philosophic foreigners.

To think, then; and so, I think, we have our first lesson in learning to read: DON'T READ.

Well, but I should never be able to persuade anyone to give up reading altogether; nor do I wish to: for those very philosophers whom we have to copy, who were philosophers because they were not always reading, would have been but lean philosophers if they had never read anything. We must thus be reading a bit: and, having mentioned how much, we have to see what, and especially in what way. As to what, Tit-Bits, now, is no Feast (of Reason); and though Answers answers nothing, it has, I think, something to answer for. To me it seems clear that an abuse of the invention of printing, the most ludicrous, the most huge, has been committed in our epoch! and I venture to predict an epoch when in a century not a tenth of the printed stuff at present produced in six months will offer itself to occupy, to confuse, and to use up the Commonwealth. I observe, by the way, that Herbert Spencer and others think well of “an abundant literature”; but they, or else I, must be pretty dull in this. An abundant harvest, indeed; an abundant barter: but I can’t think of a reason for this “abundant literature”. For this interval, look, subsists between an ear of corn and a book: that an ear of corn eaten is eaten; but a book read is not consumed; a million others may read it, either that particular volume, or a copy of it. Nor is this all: for everywhere through the domain of Nature that which is eminent is rare in the way of a ratio, as men breed at a speed less rapturous than rabbits, rabbits than sprats. Well, the production of press-stuff is at present just in this low or rabbit-sprat mood of evolution: and, if our paper, Something to Read, had been shrewd enough to name itself Nothing to Read, that had been just the truth. How it comes that our Government, which gives an eye to our milk, sends our wires, does not embark upon the more important job of supplying to our minds and hearts, as a monopoly of its own, the two new art books a year that we may need to use, I don’t know. If you insist that art-criticism hardly exists in our country, and wish to know who, then, is to choose those two so beautiful books, I answer that criticism — at all events literary criticism — is not at all what many think it: not at all an art, for example, nor a question of the impressions of this or that little man’s palate, opinions: it is a science, in which the judgments of one who has become perfect in it are subject only to so much uncertainty or imperfectness as are the judgments of a surgeon or a plumber; and critics so scientifically strict and right will arise, I think, quickly after a need for them arises. Meantime, the deluge. No dearness of “Nothing to Read” here! For not merely are the people who wield the pen a legion, but each seems to wield it with what speed he can achieve in a species of shriek. They wish to live.... But are they wits? It seems a suspicious thing that a wit should wish to live by his pen, since even the penmen who are luckiest in a money way do not have half so much money as a wit would have in other paths. Are they wits? If they are not wits, what the deuce are they doing with an art tool? If they are wits, why, if they have no money, do they not abandon art a bit, get some money somehow — invent some bawble, dash off a Charley’s Aunt — there’s no difficulty, if he is a wit — then hark back to his art? Indeed, it seems to me that one should do this, should convince oneself of wit in some such actual fashion before tackling the most ticklish of tasks: for we must not think that the human spirit is split up into little compartments, or that Wilkie Collins could do a work of art a quarter so good as wits and worthies and walkers with God like the bringer of wireless or Otto of the four cycle engine. That would be odd, if it could be so. But induce, say, Otto to take it up, and his brain will assuredly produce you a book truer, shrewder, closer to the core of Being, than the whole mass and scrap-heap of fiction books yet scribbled by man. For a wit is a wit, and will do what he wills to do. If you answer that Chatterton was a pauper, that Wagner got to pawning his goloshes, I say again that I cannot understand that — if they were wits: they could have done something cunning. Why, now, can’t our Government go round to everyone, asking “What are you?”, and if he says “An author”, let the Government answer, “Oh, nonsense: you have no idea what an author, or auctor, is: an auctor is an increaser — an increaser of folks' consciousness of the truth of things. You are not an increaser of anything. But come — to bootmaking: and now, for the first time, you will be really an author, really an increaser of the weal and woe's work of the world." For, in truth, the sum of art books so far produced, vast as it is, comes to but little, if you think of it; there have been no great writers, "great" meaning of a radical and grand practicality in grappling with facts — unless you call writers men like Darwin, Newton, Flume, who, indeed, because their mighty minds could not but find themselves at ease in every field, wrote better than half the roll of those who have thought themselves writers, but, nevertheless, were far too full of a world of other concerns to acquire more than half of the art, the science, and the mind of writers. For, if there have been great writers, you can find and give me their names on your fingers. Job, you say, the Jehovist of Genesis. You add Homer perhaps? However, if you go down into yourself, are a little of a critic, you will find, I think, that your delight in Homer is a delight due to your remoteness from him — to a swageing quality of quaintness that you are conscious of: and delight in a writer, mind, is terribly likely, if one is not careful, to beguile one's brain into an impression of greatness where no greatness is, i.e., a grand and radical consciousness of facts. As to the genius, Shakespeare, he was not a writer. Or do I seem to speak now with a certain accent of pertness and world-challenge of Tolstoi, which, however, is but slightly to the liking of my kind? Tolstoi, half of whose treatise What is Art? I have been reading, is an estimable soul, but not himself a writer, man of letters, is too nobly at war, let us say, to know about what is Art, and about writers and writing. Moreover, as I have said, literary criticism is not a question of the caprice of this man's feelings, or that man's palate, is quite an exact science, a question of facts, nor will a critic ever vex you with statements that he is less prepared to convince you of than of some principle in arithmetic. If you say that critics differ, that De Quincey or Emerson would have derided such a statement as mine that “Shakespeare was not a writer”, I reply, as Socrates to the Companion in the Minos, that “those who know (i.e.. are scientists) must of necessity hold the same opinion with one another on things that they know, ever and every where”. Critics, then, can only so much differ as plumbers, if they know their trade. Well, but since, like Milton, I make the statement that Shakespeare was not a writer, the question arises (since Shakespeare assuredly did use a pen) what, then, a writer is? The definition is “a writer is a literary artist who seeks to enlarge the reader’s consciousness of the truth of things”; and, omitting for the moment this of “the truth of things”, let us only say at this time “a writer is a literary artist”; on which someone may wish, I think, to know just what “literary” means, and what “artist” means. It is wonderful, by the by, that I should think that anyone would wish to know! but when one finds Sir Oliver Lodge indicting Haeckel with “considerable literary ability”, I assume that others, too, must wish to know. One wonders with what hectic of the cheek the excellent Haeckel received “the soft impeachment”! he probably did not believe, since it was Lodge who asserted it. But words have certain meanings — each word its genius meaning: and as to the word “literary”, “literary” means “lettery”, concerned with letters (not with words, we observe, but with letters); and as to the word “artist”, Art is the production of one passion [A “passion” is anything that we suffer, undergo, an eagerness, sneeze, sleepiness] or another in the spirit through the action of a particular kind of tickling — titillatio quaedam (Spinoza) — upon one or other of the five senses; and an “artist” is any being that deliberately does that: not a sparrow prattling, but a blackcock uttering the love-call. So, now, what is a literary artist? He is “a person who deliberately works some passion in the spirit by the action of a particular kind of tickling, with written letters, upon one or other of the five senses”. But which one of the five? Not the nostril, now, for that is the province of the producers of perfumes; nor the eye, now, for that is the province of the designer, the dancer, the actor, the architect, the coquette, the painter; nor the taste, for that is the province of those concerned in producing and dressing foods; nor the peripheral nerves, for that is the province of the courtesan, the hammam-man, the masseur: so we see that it is the ear. However, the ear is not now any more, as in the era of, say, Homer, so directly the province of men of letters as it is of the musician; soon, probably, a machine will be produced which will peruse what is printed and repeat it to the ear: after which the art of literature will anew become what it used to be, an art purely aural. But as things at present are, the nerve that the literary artist works upon is that nerve-thread—“commissure” is the correct word — which forms the connexion betwixt the visual centre in the brain and the auditory centre, the thread which, when the visual ganglia see a letter, transmits the telegram of it to the ear ganglia, announcing its sound. This, then, for the time being, is a writer, a literary artist: he is “a person who deliberately works one passion or another in the spirit by the action of a particular kind of tickling, with written letters, upon the thread which forms the connexion betwixt the visual and the auditory centres in the cerebrum”. [In respect of one of my works, I urged the publisher to print the letters in colours — the letter or letters representing any particular sound to be printed in a particular colour of its own throughout, thus to implicate the eye, too, in the delight of the rhyming and music. This, I think, could be highly artistic. But he said that it would be too expensive — couldn’t, in fact, understand what was the matter with me!] Of course, when real writing is at the present time read aloud, either with the mouth or any species of phonograph-machine, it again, as in old ages, makes its appeal directly to the ear — I say real writing, for there exists a mass of difference as radical as you like between writing that is literary and scribbling that is not, seeing that the former fulfils the definition of an Art, and the other, charming as may be the thoughts in that which is scribbled, does not: the difference being as great as that betwixt gravings with a burin and using the organs of talk. For men possess, of course, two methods of expressing themselves — the tongue, the pen: and the two though so profoundly different, will without difficulty interchange their functions: thus, the oratory of Demosthenes was really a writing with the tongue, while your “leading article” this morning was really a speaking with the pen — call it “pen-talking” — call it anything you like, except writing. Or if you desire a definition of a writer slightly less formal, so that Carlyle may be brought in, let us say that “a writer is a wit, who, by the concentration of his whole weight of wit and luck, can only just scrape through, like a lady taken in the fix and scrape of labour: so myriad-minded the trick he tries his skill on”. For consider that his work is not to say what is to be said: but his work is to say it in those words that are then and there the best words. “She came in and sat down”; “She came in and took a chair”; “She entered and sat”; “She walked in and seated herself”; “Having stepped in, she sat down”; in not less than a thousand instances of shape and sound this little thing may be said: what, then, must it be with those sights and sounds of the mind that the writer describes in a town in the clouds, finer than the spider’s trifle? and his work, I say, is not to express them, but his work is to express them in those words, that tone, that heaven knows to be the best. Suppose, now, that the accident of burning had happened to a manuscript of Scott, and also to a manuscript of Flaubert, and that they both, like Carlyle, started out to recompose their burned works. Well, this is what would have occurred: that not ten sentences, probably, in Scott’s second work would have been expressed in the words of the first, whereas every word, probably, in Flaubert's second would have been the same. So, then, Flaubert was a writer, Scott not — not implying that Flaubert's letters and words were those perfect-best ones which Hermes might have chosen, only implying that they were both fine, and Flaubert's best. Besides, a writer is a wit — i.e., a gallant with a bigger brain than the man's-in-the-street, whereas, on the contrary, the brain of Scott when dead was seen to weigh less than the man's-in-the-street. Not so Shakespeare's surely: still — could it be that that heedless Bohemian of Elizabethan England, who, having got hold of some glossary or something, wrote down in a whirl the first word he lit on in it, and then died of the effects of drink, was a writer? Sweet Will! so Milton muses, who knew his Will, totting him up to a T in the twottling violin-harmonic of four W's, "Sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child, marbling his native wood-notes wild" — nor must we think that a mind like Milton's could utter that "wild", that "woodmotes", in atone untouched with condescension. And if this sounds like heresy to one whose head is crowded with shreds of Shakespeare-phrases, "like household words", let him remember that it is in the genius of us British to speak in little catchwords, parrot-terms, as a friend once showed me an essay commencing with, "Hearts weep for mankind" — the inanity wherewith we say "the sere and yellow leaf", "pip-pip!", "To be or not to be", "there's hair!", "the garden beautiful", "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet" — idols of the mind! though no sooner does our brain begin to gain that liberation which embraves us on beginning to think than the result is an utter mistrust of our crusted rucks, mental mirages, charts of conception: for to think is to be educated: to be educated is to be sceptical. So where I suggest that our heedless Bohemian, "having got a glossary or something, wrote down in a whirl the first long or odd word he found", if someone is shocked at this, his shock is due probably to a failure of his imagination any longer to enter into the mood in which boys and girls live and work, and to his failure to remember that our Will, living in the boyhood of our nation, must have been himself by nature very boisterously a boy. Indeed, there are respects in which the greatest of ancient penmen are necessarily a great deal inferior to the sorriest of modern ones. I find that Shakespeare's consciousness, compared with mine, was like the consciousness of Hodge's fox hound compared with the consciousness of Hodge. Milton's thoughts "wandered through eternity": C. W. Saleeby's also; but the eternity through which Milton's thoughts wandered, compared with the whirl of eternities (through which Saleeby's wander, was like a land-locked harbour compared with Arctic and Atlantic: "to God", as my excellent father said, "be the glory" (as though glory, or any thing, could be to anything but God). Let us think, then, in this way of our Will, as a jolly boy and heed less Bohemian of Elizabethan Cheapside, happy in the tones of those reeds of Pan whose melodious breezes he breathed with equal spirit into his pieces of hilarity and sorrow, comedy and "tragedy" — though you will be in the wrong, by the way, if you imagine that he ever managed a tragedy. For, adopting Aristotle's and Goethe's dogmas as to tragedy, we see that Othello, now, is never a bit a tragedy: there must be no "villain" in a tragedy; or, at least, the catastrophe must not be owing to the villain's artifice, but to the hero's "own fault": and Fate must be the villain of the play. No more is Romeo and Juliet a tragedy, only a calamity, because there is no tragic sense of "fault" in the lovers; moreover, it ends happily. [I do not say this in its disfavour, though, since a tragedy, after the tragedy, should find final happiness, to be true: for Life, so far, after its tragedies, has ended happily; and will haply end ever happier.] Nor is Macbeth a bit a tragedy: for the man of a tragedy must not be a criminal lunatic, look, not a murderer, like Richard the Third

— must be “like ourselves”, an imperfect but worthy person, “a good man struggling with adversity”, within him, without him. If you say that in every bosom a criminal lunatic slinks, that may be true; but not so near in us that we can experience for murder that “pity”, or, as I prefer to say, “compassion”, “sym-path-y”, “Mit-leid”, which true tragedy induces. Nor is Lear a tragedy: for whereas in Macbeth we have all “terror” and no tragic “pity”, in Lear we have all “pity”, and no tragic “terror” — unless that is meant for terror where someone thumbs out someone’s eye, saying, “out, out, vile jelly”. Moreover, the hero of a tragedy mustn’t start by being mad, as Lear seems to have started, or we lose all feeling of “own fault”. No, we can see that tragedy was a task over earnestly grand for our hurried, and hungry, and Hebe-worshipping Bohemian, though he certainly knew the glances of the tragic Muse. I should say that Hamlet is a tragedy: but, then, such a muddle-headed tragedy.... Far, indeed, be it from me to preach that an author ought to set explicitly in a shop window all his ineffable philosophy for the benefit of raw eyes: for writers, look, simply will not do this: but when wits brighter than a writer’s can’t after three hundred years even decide if the writer’s hero was, or was not, mad, we may be certain that some smack of burnt sack was in the work. Thus much as to the matter of the tragedies; but with respect to the manner, I remember that even as a boy droiling over Shakespeare, “with notes”, for examinations, I used to be amused at the solemn comments made by grave dignitaries of Oxford upon the vagaries in idiom, irresponsible as a Babu’s dribble, of our heedless Bohemian. I have now at my hand a Shakespeare, I will open it, and the passage on which my eye chances to light I will quote:

*“The tyrant custom, most grave senators,
Hath made the flinty and steel couch of war
My thrice-driven bed of down: I do agnize*

*A natural and prompt alacrity
I find in hardness.
Adost humbly, therefore, bending to your state,
I crave fit disposition for my wife;
Due reference of place and exhibition;
With such accommodation and besort
As levels with her breeding.”*

Or this on the same page:

*“... No, when lightwingéd toys
Of feather’ d Cupid seel with wanton dulness
My speculative and offic’ d instruments,
That my disports corrupt and taint my business,
Let housewives make a skillet of my helm,
And all indign and base adversities
Make head against my estimation.*

Now, when we know absurd words by heart, as we all know these, it is hard to see their absurdity. What, though, is this? If you say, “not Chinese, nor English, but a kind of Middle-English”, I reply, “no kind of English, unless Mrs. Malaprop in Sheridan’s comedy talked a kind of Middle-English” — for irresistibly Shakespeare brings to my mind Mrs. Malaprop; and I know that it is not a kind of Middle-English, not only because More, Milton, did not write it, but also because I can remember the mood of my youth, when I was ten, and given to scribbling this very lingo, a lexicon at my side. Since you will say, then, that Shakespeare was not a great writer, who, shall we say, was a great writer?

That ever interesting critic Edward Thomas, having once demanded of me, “But don’t you, in reading Milton, feel yourself in the presence of a great mind?”, it was some moments before I gave answer, “But no,” I was so taken aback by the (to my habit of mind) novelty of such a notion, having long ago forgotten that it is in the tradition to make Milton a great mind. But a critic has, to begin with, to clear his intellect clean of tradition, like a captain clearing his ship for action — to begin with. And if our critic, in reading L’Allegro, finds himself in the presence of a great mind, how, one gets to wondering, does he read Schopenhauer, Herbert Spencer, even, say, Adam Smith? — he must be so lost in awe, that it must be impossible for him to proceed! I, now, in reading Milton, find myself in the presence of a child’s mind — an ancient child’s: a mind aspiring, certainly, earnest, pure, bemused, deft, learned (though quite uneducated); but a mind unexploring, local; more mouth than bowels, sound than power; more feeling than perceiving, obedient than leading; giving little signal of that radical and grand practicality in grappling with facts, whereby greatness (or vigour) of intellect is exhibited. Or will you say that your Ibsen was a great writer? But one of the strands of greatness is grandeur, that bigness of gesture of Milton, Goethe, Shakespeare; a certain allgemeinheit, (universality), moreover, of the sun and sunset glory: wherein the Norwegian, who to a Japanese would appear all jejune, strange and unrelated, fails of greatness. Or, as to the novelists, will you not say Thackeray? Dickens, now, was a clown. And if “clown” looks too loud a term to tack to “an honoured name”, the answer is that Dickens is not an honoured name — if it is the quality, not the quantity, of honour that makes the honour of a name. Grace Darling’s, now, I agree to call an honoured name, for the reason that the people who honour her are capital critics of the act they honour her for; whereas the Mahdi's, though of all names the most honoured, if the quantity of honour were the thing, I can't call an honoured name, since I can't consider the flocks of lack-alls who honoured him capital critics of a prophet; and so as to Dickens, though many tight little Viking islands devise many monuments to his honour, still if the critic does not honour him, he is not honoured. Indeed, if you know that writing is a craft whose technique is harder to acquire than virtuosity on the violin, you must know also that one can't hasten from "taking notes" in the House of Commons, without any preparation, into literature, and accomplish it well. And if you know with what horror every Harrow boy observes the poison-basilisk of an iambic verse stolen into the tissue of his prose, and know that Dickens, thinking the jig grand, hopped jog-trotting through paragraphs in bad iambs, you now think Dickens a clown. But his clownishness goes more profoundly down in him than can be judged from this, showing itself in everything, down to the outré mood of the names that he chooses for his characters — characters that have no souls, that have only noses, poses, clothes, for the page of illustrations. Mr. Micawber is a bald head, a stock phrase, an outré name, and — no more: Mrs. Someone who says "everything goes contrary wi' me" is that phrase, an outré name, a robe and a nose probably, and — no more. That is, they are not characters, they are drawings; drawings infected with caricature; nay, many of them, I think, photos of actual folks known to Dickens. But let us say that they are not photos, nor caricatures, but drawings, excellent drawings: then, because they are drawings, excellent drawings, they are wrong; nothing so wrong. And if you demand why so monstrously wrong, the answer is that to draw with the pen is to use a wrong tool, is to pestle with a saw, plough with a pounder. What, now, was the shape of Helen's, of Joseph's, nose? Homer, the Jehovist, are careful not to mention that, for that is the painter's care: yet Homer contrives, nevertheless, to embue us with the brightest remembrance of Helen's beauty. For the rôle of the pen is to relate — to relate that which is in motion, a race, a rebellion, a rebellion in the breast, since it speaks to that which is in motion in Time, to the Mind, which easily perceives, but not easily sees; whereas the rôle of the pencil is to show that which is motionless, the racer in some moment before the race begins, La Rixe before the struggle: for it speaks to that which is quiet in Space, to the Eye, which easily sees, but pesters perceiving. [As we close our eyes to think.] Not that the penman may not let himself write a line as to that which is quiet, as Shakespeare acquaints us with the fact that Hamlet was fat: yet let the user of the pen know that even a phrase or two of "drawing" is proof of a failure of genius, is the use of a wrong tool, and borrowing of the brush. What, then, can be said of Dickens, whose whole book, if you look into it, you will see to be of this kind — like (though so unlike) that article of Poe named The Domain of Arnheim, a description of a park, in which he wishes to produce in the reader a deep feeling of beauty; and he does, I think, produce a feeling of beauty; but, oh, the mountain of effort on both reader's and author's part, and the mouse of effect! whereas, with the right tool, a pencil, forty times the effect of beauty would have been wrought in the mind with a fortieth part of the effort. So, without further discussion, we will now call our Dickens a clown; [I think, though, that Pickwick will live, since it is already read. I never met a Frenchman who had read it, but a friend (Arthur Machen) tells me that a French critic told him that, having read it uninterestedly to the middle, he then suddenly uttered "a mad laugh" (poussait un fou rire). On the other hand, I remember when a lad seeing a sister, a Methodist saint, sit and peruse it from beginning to end with the gravest face — to my great amusement.] and if you say, "and yet the people liked, and like him”, the reply is, “No, the people never liked him.” The people, certainly, have heard somebody say that they like him, and think that they like him, as they think that they like beer, and whisky, and Tit-Bits. but, having tasted both beer and whisky, to see, I will take my dying oath that no human brother of mine ever really liked beer and whisky; and as to Art, what the people really like is what is right and refined and conformed to the laws of their mind and of Art; only, they know not a little what they like, until they are taught what they like, as an infant is taught, in spite of tears, that the nipple is hardly the highest type of feeding, and that it likes the highest.

Thus much, then, as to what not to read; as to the leakage in the British ship implicit in this abuse of the printing machine which we view; as to the constant loss to the Commonwealth involved in the writing, printing, binding, and reading of such cargoes of garbage; as to the long-suffering of God, who has daily to read The Daily Telegraph through, the lean unleading articles, the criticism, the cricket, causing the Infinite to yawn. And would you be reading it all? Oh, beware: “life is brief”; and how solemn, now, is the striking of the clock, its gong sounding the death-knell of the hour that’s gone, the very voice of God noising through the void and night-watches of Time, which you may buy for five bob. Beware, then, of “the papers”, since in Britain, by a ripping bit of luck, one may easily enough glean what is going on from the notice boards, and get the rest from friends; knock off every kind of periodical (except technical); and, as to books, remember that, since time is not good, but very good, your book, then, must be not good, but very good, must positively improve your consciousness of the truth of things, and produce progress in you, if it is to give you so much as you give to it. So much, then, as to what not to read; but as to what to read, I divide it into two things: (1) science; (2) music — to use an expression of Plato’s, meaning whatever is truly poetical: with the proviso, that, though I divide them, yet science is truly musical, and music nigh to science. And as to science: since to you has been vouchsafed the high favour not to have been born in a former age; since, modern, your main duty is to be modern; since this you can scarcely be, and not be of a scientific mood: therefore, your duty is to be studious in science, in which I loosely include modern philosophy; and your rule will be to read but few books, which you will curiously choose, though these you will read frequently — at least thrice each mighty writer, the first time to follow and learn of him, the second time to wend alongside and converse with him, the third time to trot first and controvert him. It is well, I think, to know well some one toe in that moving foot of science, as I, since my nipperhood, have kept myself pretty well au fait in what men know of chemistry: but that would be rather a tallish order for, say, a married lady rolled in the social maelstrom; nor is it essential. What you want is to pick up with some sort of minuteness a knowledge of those simple, large-minded truths of science, just the subconsciousness of which makes us moderns a different kind of being from the ancients. You cast up your eye to the sky at night, you mark its largeness, you form a conception of its size in your thought: well, the earth is larger far than your notion of the whole army and march of all the worlds; yet if the earth was a mote in the eye of one all-knowing, He would not know that a mote was in His eye. Things of that sort, simple, vast-minded: the hoariness of Time, the remoteness of the suns, the hurry of Light, the story of Life. And then, having gathered such facts from books, having got them well into your subconsciousness, remember that you have still to educate yourself with them, by drawing them up into your consciousness through pondering and strong imagining of them; have still to become an overman, and live happily in fairyland, for the universe is fairy; land to overmen. I, for my part, do not regard as educated minds like the old Mr. Gladstone's, ever ready for heaven, but unconscious of The Heavens, and I know that there is more psychic value in Prof. Haldane's right auricle than in all the vitals of a mind like Matthew Arnold's. Thus much, then, as to science; but as to music —

But this of music leads me to my third thesis: for first I tried to determine how much we shall read, and found that the reply is “not much”; and secondly I inquired what not, and what we shall read, to find that, as to what, the reply is science and music; and now, lastly, we have to find how we shall read, science with a devout eye, and music — how?

For to seek to read music without learning how is as useless as to wish to turn tea-taster or champagne; taster in the City without so much as knowing what are the dispositions which an expert detects in excellent tea or excellent champagne. You cannot do it. Though when you are once taught what those niceties are, when you have acquired the science of wine-tasting, then practice will add to you the craft of wine-tasting, till on a day you find yourself a wine; taster. My business, then, is to bring you to see quite what are the beauties of excellent writing, or music: for I find that to teach you how to read, I am obliged to teach you how to write — an Art, the science of which you may acquire in quite a short time, just as you may acquire the science of shorthand in as few days as that of the violin will take you weeks, yet must spend as many months in the exercise of shorthand as that of the violin will keep you years.

III. OF WRITING

How, THEN, TO write? that is our thesis.

Well, let us say that a messenger-boy is appointed to bear you a message: then, all those points of excellence which you may expect from him as a messenger-boy you will unite in your art writing: all those, and no more.

What, now, are those points?

Well, you would not want your boy to be all spoiled with smallpox, or uncomely clothed: so you will grant to your thoughts a decent form as to grammar, prosody, etc.

But now the more important points about our boy...

Evidently, the main thing is his message — the matter of his message; and, after that, his manner or form of telling it: (1) the gem; (2) its shape.

And as to his matter, we can at once say what it must be: it must be a true message; and then it must be a new message — fresh news; and then it must somehow be a message about yourself, of some interest to you; or, bracketing all this into an abstract form — he must enlarge your consciousness of the truth of things, and that intimately.

This, then, as to matter, is your task.

And if you ask, “But is the object of Art precisely the object of science and of philosophy — to enlarge the consciousness?” the reply is, “Yes — what else than to enlarge the consciousness,” i.e., to augment the quantity of Life, i.e., to cause Progress in Life— “that we may have Life, and have it more abundantly?” Nevertheless, the method of Art, though more after the method of philosophy, is as divided from it as the method of philosophy from that of science. Art, for instance, is more intimate and about ourselves somehow, enlarging our consciousness of the truth of our own hearts, and bosoms' biology principally, and affecting us in an intimate way by a particular kind of tickling of one or other of the five senses. Besides, though the object of Art, like that of philosophy, is the demonstration of some abstract fact, Art does not, as philosophy does, formally state this, but conveys it intimately, as by innuendo and parable, in a glance, a sob, ineffably, in the tone of gossips pottering over a dead body; and it is divided from science, and from philosophy also, in this, that even the facts that it formally states are not concrete, but are themselves, like its abstract facts, abstractions: for, if it tells of a man, an axe, it is not any actual man or axe that exists exactly as it tells of it, as in Dickens, but it is an abstraction from a mass of actual men or axes of that class, like Hamlet, or Hector's axe, or Gainsborough's Grace. And so we get clearly the difference between science, philosophy, and art:

Science is occupied with facts for their own sake, and formally states them.

Philosophy is occupied with facts, not for their own sake, but for the sake of some abstraction, i.e., some large fact, which it draws from facts, and formally states it.

Art is occupied with abstractions of facts, not for their own sake, but for the sake of some larger abstraction which it draws from facts, nor does it formally state it, but intimately, exciting the mind to its perception by a particular kind of tickling of one or other of the five senses.

In which definition, if you think, you will see included not only such arts as music (so called), drawing, writing, and so on, but also the arts of the actor, the cook, the coquette. And as to the writer, you see, do you, what the definition implies? you must find in his writing (1) plot; (2) realism; (3) romance. And as to plot — or don't you care for plots, and revel in your Henry James, who doesn't care for plots? or do you care for plots, and think that there is a plot in your Wilkie Collins, your Emile Gaboriau? They could as easily, stealing with the feet of the midnight thief when the Cosmos sleeps, sneak Venus from God, and fix her glittering in a finger-ring for their Felicity's finger. For plots have been more uncommon than conquests, most of them evolved not by any one head, it appears, but, so to say, by peoples. What, then, is this thing, a plot? Well, recollecting what Art is, as distinct from Science and Philosophy, you can see what a plot cannot but be, merely, "a plat or fabric of facts, in their nature abstract, the statement of which involves a philosophic abstraction"; and to make this plain, I offer you two plots, both in Shakespeare (but, of course, not Shakespeare's own).

PLOT: TWO Italian families are at feud (a truth); a man of one and a woman of the other love furiously (a truth); [A truth, I mean, since, love between them being forbidden fruit, they would be the more prone to love. Romeo would love Juliet in gratitude and vanity, owing to the greatness of the gulf she leapt to get to him; Juliet, loving Romeo's love, would love it the more fiercely, since it was unique, a Koh-i-noor among loves; and both would contend in glorifying the greater greatness of the god of love above every god.] to this their death is due (a truth); and over their tomb their relatives are reconciled (a truth).

ABSTRACTION: NOW, how grave a gash in the state, that wrangling! Is there no chemistry can heal its haemorrhage and hectic? Hate and hacking cannot. But Love does. And the philosophic abstraction inherent in the mere positing of the facts is that Love is a healer.

PLOT: Contumely educes the crudest instincts, as in the case of the Jews of the Middle Ages (a truth). One such Jew induces a merchant to undertake to lose a certain weight of flesh in case of a failure to pay: for the merchant, never having been himself oppressed, and incapable of conceiving the realness of the effects of oppression, is unconscious that a bond so bizarre can be meant as aught else than a formality (a truth); and the unexpected happens (a truth), for his vessels miscarry, he fails to pay, the Jew claims the flesh (a truth). But the Jew, in his habit of brooding on national wrongs, has, in drawing up the bond, forgotten a detail on the plane of the pigmy and the commonplace (a truth) — that flesh cannot be cut, and no blood shed (a truth): so he is dished.

ABSTRACTION: There is that in the scheme of things which is ingenious in dishing evil, and finally rides smiling in, triumphing.

You notice that they two are true woofs, every item intertwining nicely with every other and with the entirety, as in a Chinese puzzle, or piece of Japanese marquetry — mortise and tenon — and so fulfilling the sense of Art, i.e., “a fitting”, “art-iculating” (ἀγπαρισκω), as in the story of Joseph, not as in The Odyssey, Don Quixote, though these, each in its way, are worthy works, for other reasons, on a lower level. And if you would know why the plot, or plat, stands on so lofty a level, the answer is that, as it only is true to things and to Life, it alone is divine, since the cosmos is a plot, a molecule a plot, the solar rhyming a plot, the story of Life a plot; and since Plot in matter is the cousin or correspondent of Harmony of Order in manner. Herbert Spencer, I observe, imagined that the absence of plot is an evolution: but, then, he knew not at all what a plot is, thought that there were plots in Wilkie Collins, and would without doubt have gone to the opposite opinion as to plots, if he had ever given any long thought to Art. Thus much, then, as to plots; but about romance and realism — which, now, do you champion? for it appears that people stand in two camps as to the matter, one lot choosing to give their votes to Scott, Schlegel, one lot wishing to vote for Zola. But since the object of Art is to enlarge (or at least to sharpen, or at the very least to refresh) your consciousness of the truth of things, the question naturally is, which of the two is the truer, realism or romance? Well, there can be no question that realism is true, if it be truly realistic; but the' truth is that it is not truly realistic, if it be not romantic, since truth is romantic. With a mood of wistfulness in your eyes you look at the moon one night, where, as musing, she walks amid the stars, and you wish that you were there where she muses: wait: before you go to bed you will be there where she muses, if our globe be moving that way, and soon you may be soaring not far from where Venus at this hour leads the crowd of the starry orchestra with her crown and psaltery. Is this romance? trance and tarantula-land? I hear you say "yes"; you whisper "yes". Well, it is true: so realism, if it What, now, do you say of these? What of that of Meredith's... Is it true? Is it new? Is it precious? If it is precious, why is it precious? Is it not precious owing to this, that it tends to put us in old slippers in the universe; owing to this, that it is a scientific discovery, specially precious because hardly any formal scientist could have lighted on it, and because we have it spoken in a humour and mood peculiar to one man, who alone could have communicated it to us in that humour: in which humour we for the future may use it? And if you desired to know the title of the book that it is in, or anything else that is in that book, I could not tell you, for I have read three of Meredith, and the fact is that his lack of philosophic volume, and his submission to the influence of the brain of Shakespeare and the Arabians, spoiled him of being strictly a voice, or verily impressive to a critic. Besides, his paragraphs are anon masses of probable misprints, mixed with a sister of Mrs. Malaprop — not how "the simple great ones" write: this obscurity being due to a cowardice, unlike

Browning's obscurity, which is due to a kind of mental stutter: due (in Meredith)

(1) to a horror of the commonplace, the shallow; (2) to a subconsciousness of being commonplace, shallow; (3) to a consequent neuropathy as to plain statements, for fear of appearing (to himself) what he is: hence his thoughts are veiled prophets of Khorassan, all veil, and no prophecy. Precious, however, is his power of expression (of ideas as distinct from thoughts); and you observe how, for the reason that I had learned to read, I immediately seized upon the one supreme beauty in whatever the book was, and by improving with it my consciousness of the truth of things, enriched myself with it for ever. And as to that marvel of Carlyle: "the body lies on the steps; the head is off through the streets" — can you read this? In no lingo of man but English, I think, could that mad glance have been hinted; by no mortal in English but Carlyle. But what vivacity! Bacchic alacrity! The head is off through the streets...! Do you catch? see the spontaneity of the head? the rapture of hilarity with which it snatches itself away? It is strictly inexpressible; yet he expresses it, by miracle. Pity only that he did not say "the head's off" instead of "head is".

But how about your boy's voice? If his message is of any length, his sounds will much affect your sense of it, their (1) harmony (kinship with one another), and their (2) melody or tone (kinship with their subject and the mood of the hearing ear). So you will be harmonious, or literary. And if you demand: "Is literature nothing more than harmoniousness?" the answer is: "Nothing more"; and, as I presented you examples of perfect matter and of perfect expression, I next present an example of perfect literature:

"a, a, a; ba, ba, ba; ca, ca, ca"; and if you demand: "Is it not, then, necessary that the letters make words?" the answer is: "No, not necessary for literature"; though it is an evolution, look, that the letters should make words; and it is an evolution that the words should make sense; and it is an evolution that that sense should be beautiful; but all this has nothing to do with literature, which is concerned, not with words, or with sense, but with letters, and men of literature are men of letters, not wordy men, inventors of ever new and beautiful mosaics of letters. For you know what was the origin of literature? Religious, was it not? And religious it must mind to continue to be, for if a book is not a Bible, it is not a book. Its origin was religious in this wise: that the old hierophant, obiah priest, beating upon his torn torn within the forest groves in celebrating the Mysteries, to goad his rabble to dance with abandonment, gabbled sounds of instigation, again and again the same sound:

“Dar, dar, dar, dar,

Dar, dar, dar;

Ah gar, gar, gar, gar,

Gar, gar, gar.”

Go again, however, down into the a thousand years later, and now you’ll hear still with a dwelling on the same sounds):

“Dart, darlings, dar, dar

Dar, dar, dar; Ah, garters all, gar, gar,

Gar, gar, gar.”

And steal near yet a thousand years later, and now you’ll hear (yet the same sounds):

*“Daart yourselves staark., maidies,
Naked as a staar!
Aah, get your gaarters laaughing, ladies,
Daart your legs faar!”*

And so the thing would continue, until that humming thunder of Homer will be heard rolling, and Poe’s pibroch skirling. You may know that of Madame de Stael’s, “un son nous fait désirer celui qui doit lui répondre, et quand le second rétentit, il nous rappelle celui qui vient de nous échapper”; and Plato’s $\acute{o}\iota\acute{\alpha}\nu\acute{o}\chi\acute{o}\nu\alpha\iota\ \upsilon\epsilon\ \acute{\iota}\alpha\alpha\ \chi\acute{\epsilon}\upsilon\epsilon\iota\nu\ \omicron\nu\rho\omega\lambda\nu\ \omicron\iota\ \alpha\omicron\ \rho\omicron\lambda$, “I learn from the wise to use rhymes”; or, if you noticed on the “notice-boards”, some months since, “Reign of Terror in Teheran”, this is literature, at any rate literary — would be literature, if it had been “Reign of Terror in Tayeran” (emphasis on the Tay): for how much more terrible a business is a reign of terror in Tayeran than a reign of terror in mere Ispahan; whereas pippins and hips in Ispahan (emphasis on the Is), are, by some profound principle of repetition in music and musical utterance, more suited to our soul’s disposition than pippins and hips in Teheran. Harmoniousness, then: nor is our load only to be harmonious in the sounds we use, but to choose those sounds which are most suited to our sense: thus, “ah”, “aw”, are tall and haughty, “p” is a very spirited little letter, “oo” is useful for pity (as where Will, quite instinctively, I think, whines “poor woounded name, my boosom as a bed shall lodge thee”), and so on in a thousand subtleties known to the old hound’s nose. And all this harmony and choice of letters to be joined with a choice of words, you observe — those very words which are best for expression: a contradictory business, “more endangered than when Argo passed through Bosphorus betwixt the jostling rocks”; as to which we see, I think, that here is a task which only a carl born lucky to the heart, born with a caul, nay, with a call, need attempt to meddle in. Thus far, then, as to literature, or harmony, or the art of writing as distinct from pen talking.

But how about the boy's tone? That is important! for if somebody has been run over by a motor bus, and he gives you the story of it with a grin, or if he gives you the poet's dream eating nuts, this will be by no means pretty. Tone, then. Now, tone, of course, is thousand fold: and since the tone of a whole tome or piece must be so-and-so to suit its mood, and the tone of each part or page must needs be subtly so and-so to suit its mood, and yet the tone of each part or page be in harmony with the tone of the whole, here once more, we see, is a task that only a carl born lucky to the heart, born with a caul, need attempt to meddle with. Moreover, in tone there is invariably in the greatest writers a something, a grain, a tone within their tones, which I in my own mind always call naïveté — an element not richly represented in English literature (in Bunyan principally), but very richly in French, in Greek, in Hebrew, in Heine and Wieland. How a little savour of it would have saved Poe, Meredith, Milton! But I am not certain that I am able to make myself clear as to what I mean by this word naïveté — something like what Goethe meant by his heiterkeit? Simplicity, yes, to the edge of child-likeness, of childishness; but something much more, a pregnant simplicity, struggling against poetry, against grandeur, against agonies of emotion, and remaining triumphant, a burning nerve yearning to blurt its burden, but restrained by the very rein of, reticence, and not the shadow of an adjective or adverb within a thousand furlongs to whittle down the nouns and verbs. “Consider the lilies how they grow; they toil not, they spin not; and yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these”: this is “naïf”: for you see what a world of ermine and purflings of purple the Speaker leaves unmentioned here, yet mentions. And I add yet one example — one not only of naïveté, but of every preciousness of tone, of expression, of matter and of manner, the phrase that in my view takes the cake as the truest, most musical, most beautiful, most romantic, till now ranted by a man's mouth:

“Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained to the days of the years of the lives of my fathers in the days of their marches...”

If you can read this, you have learned to read music and the yearnings in the tumults of October breezes. The stories of those “fathers’ marches” have been told deliberately: you have lived with them — long marches; and, generation after generation, they have strangely gone, engulfed in the gorge of God, the suns no longer know them; and now the aged Jacob, he, too, is about to foot it down that steep, and he says, “Few and evil... “Oh my, if the Sphinx should speak, just so, I think, she’d speak, so mindfully, so miserly, so almightily. And on the whole, this whole tome of the Jehovist, in its emotion at, and intoning of, that unknown word of the world and the worlds, is to Homer at his uppermost note what Homer is to a penny novelette; nor can I, either, read it well in a town, but at dead of night, in a waste place, in a tent, where sounds of wintry winds and a reign of breakers drown the brain in a revel of drowns and reveries.

So, now, we have finished with our messenger. His excellencies, we can see, will consist in (1) Matter (2) Expression (3) Harmony (4) Tone.

Those four: and if he combine two or more of them, we will find the following code of law to hold:

Expression+Harmony=“ Magic” (Art)

Matter+Expression=“Interest” (not Art)

Tone+Harmony=“Charm” (Art)

Matter +Expression+Tone=“Fascination” — (not Art)

Matter + Expression + Harmony + Tone = “Beauty” (Art).

We will also find the law that Harmony or Order in manner is the cousin or correspondent of Plot in matter; Expression in manner the correspondent of Realism in matter; Tone in manner the correspondent of Romance in matter.

And as regards Matter, you will find that the masters so far (or the great masters, if you like adjectives) are in the following order:

(1) The Jehovist; (2) Goethe; (3) Job; (4) Lucretius; (p Plato; (6) Homer; (7) Molière; (8) Cervantes; (9) Hugo — not all of these, you perceive, being writers, i.e., artists, but all a kind of artist, not formal philosophers, whom I leave out.

And in the matter of Expression, you will find that the masters, or the great masters, are in the following order:

(1) Job; (2) Carlyle; (3) I; (4) Lucretius; (p The Jehovist; (6) Keats; (7) Milton; (8) Meredith; (9) Flaubert; (10) Browning; (11) Homer; (12) Coleridge; (13) Goethe.

And in the matter of Harmony you will find that the masters are in the following order:

(1) Poe; (2) Homer; (3) Milton; (4) Swinburne; (5) Virgil; (6) Dante; (7) Sophocles; (8) Racine; (9) Coleridge; (10) Cicero; (11) The Mights; (12) Flaubert; (13) Loti; (14) Sir Thomas Browne; (15) Demosthenes; (16) Lord Chesterfield; the verse men stepping first, not because more harmonious, but because harmony is harder in what is metrical as well.

And in the matter of Tone you will find that the masters are:

(1) Shakespeare; (2) The Jehovist; (3) Dante; (4) De Guérin; (p De St. Pierre; (6) Heine; (7) Aeschylus; (8) Poe; (9) De Quincey; (10) Ecclesiastes; (11) Homer; (12) Omar-i-Kayyam; (13) Wieland; (14) Coleridge; (15)

Keats; (16) Bunyan; (17) Milton; (18) Gray; (19) Horace; (20) Loti; (21) Words worth; (22) Petrarch; (23) Job; (24) Virgil; (2p Fénelon; (26) Dowson; (27) Burns; (28) Goethe;(29) Carroll; (30) Arnold; (31) Boccaccio; (32) Tennyson; (33) Corneille.

Now, our lists, though gravely meditated, are not to be taken without one grain of salt — not for any lack of exactness in criticism, since there is hardly any difficulty as to that, but for lack of a vast familiarity with what has been written; a scholar, not without grounds, would doubtless think me ignorant; and though I have besought you not to be a scholar, but a philosopher, because a scholar, like a tailor, is scarce the ninth part of a mind, still, it is jolly sometimes to know scholar stuff. For example, I haven't included Job and the Jehovist in the harmony list, ignorant as to whether they were great harmonists like the Arab scribes. For the same reason the lists rather get degraded into guessing toward their ends in regard to order; the names themselves, though, are well; and toward the beginnings I am always big with significance as to order also — sure, for example, that, Job alone excepted, no son of Adam ever possessed a power of expression comparable with Carlyle's; and that the greatest in matter was the Jehovist, in expression

Job, in harmoniousness Poe, in tone Shakespeare, the greatest on the whole the Jehovist, if he was a harmonist, “great” being the wrong word, great writing being an Everest yet virgin, reserved for the journeyers of the centuries to be.

Thus far, then, as to the technique of writing. As to what one calls “style”, that need not keep us, style being but the peeping through of the personality of each writer in his writing, not a part of technique, which is exhausted when matter, expression, harmony and tone have been spoken of. But now that I have taught how to write, which is not where I sought to arrive, the question which I ask myself is, have I also taught how to read, which is what I seek to reach? Well, I quite hope so; for since we at present know the niceties of the science of writing, I calculate that some practice should make us as exact critics as the salaried tea taster is. I will but add some little observations that suggest themselves to me: i. “Progress”, a growth in consciousness of truth, being the object of Art, and truth being anon rude, we should not expect, or wish, our art work to be all honey and water, as servant girls think that they wish their heroes to be perfect, untrue, or as a lady relating to me the tale of a book named The Beloved Vagabond, criticised it in this manner: “It offends, the man has dirty fingernails” — a thing which a French lady would never have uttered; but somehow, in the matter of written things we English seem to be all at sea, to have some radical incapacity of grasp due apparently to a certain crassness rooted in the Saxon — not necessarily permanent, seeing that it has already yielded to the influences of years. So in time we will cease to mind that our hero has grimy fingernails, if that is the case with him, seeing that our great writer is in the place of a god, conscious of his characters’ natures with an accuracy, a sympathy, a judgment, which nothing but study will bring us to realise; nor is his business to give us pleasure directly, but to give us progress, to improve our consciousness of the truth of ourselves and of the cosmos.

2. Let us cease to regard our “great” author as indecent, for, surely, the truth that we always do should lead us to the conclusion that there must be something outré in our view of indecency. It is among the grand facts of biology in this cycle of the history of Life that we English are a little ridiculous — or do you not see the actualness of this fact, so frequently repeated? Neither do I at this instant perceive it quite in white light perhaps — to perceive it, one needs to stay a year or two, say in Paris, in the society of persons of an alert and worldly turn of mind, then find oneself suddenly come to Kensington: whereupon for three, as much as four, days one's cheeks keep puffing out with fun at each essentially Kensington thing that one sees. The English are a little ridiculous — an actual fact, and a grand fact: ridiculous in our Saxon crassness, in our ignorance of English or of any language of man, in our religiosity, our irreligiousness, in the platitude of our ladies' aspect, their long teeth, in the Negro manners of our labouring class, in our concern about opinions and persons, our callousness as to truths and ideas, in our Hottentot horror of certain worthy little words, "bluddy", "bureaucracy", OF WRITING

"blasted", "hell" — and so on. And if this was the one fact about us that we are a little ridiculous, little that would matter; but there is this other, that we've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too, are the obvious bosses of this orb: and you see the peril resident in a ridiculous boss. So, at all events, it is in this of indecency in Art, we need to be awfully guarded lest we regard the sacred as indecent, or we make ourselves a laughing stock. As I was once greatly offended on being given by a friend to read a review named Jude The Obscene in regard to a novel of Thomas Hardy's, in whom, from a book of his that I had looked through, I could not believe obscenity to be possible. So I questioned my friend, and when he informed me that someone in the novel had tossed the male organ of a hog at somebody's face, the question came up between us: "Is this indecent?" He seemed doubtful; so I said, "Let us come now to a conclusion as to this." I now made him read a phrase of a book, asking if he thought that indecent, and he thought it so; so now I gave him to see the name of the book, and he now no longer thought it so, because it was a doctor's book. "So, then," I said, "it is merely the tone wherein a thing is written that makes it in decent?"

"Yes," he agreed, "that is true — as to a doctor."

“But how about a philosopher?” I said, “or a poet? whose tones are as foreign to, and more cocked aloft of, the tone of indecency than is a doctor’s?”; and in the end we saw that this in the novel was not indecent, if the tone was that of a philosopher or a poet, since these, in so far as they are actually so, cannot be indecent: but a tone alone can be indecent. We must remember to distinguish in this between (i) grossness, and (2) indecency: for the easiness of indecency as an art-effect offends, whereas grossness, if not too gross for the Age (as Dante’s grossness for our Age) is one of the arms in the artist’s armoury. Venus and Adonis, for instance, is indecent without being a bit gross; whereas The Merry Wives of Windsor, The Bible, crowded with grossnesses, are so without being in the least indecent: for Merry Wives laughs, and Venus, always dead serious, never laughs; and we know with how naïf a grace some of the Biblical and Arabian authors knew how to use the art of grossness. For my share, I question whether anything is gross; if so, how can it possibly have got to be so, since to God nothing is gross nor thin, but “thinking makes it so”; and whether people in the future will consider anything indecent. Is shame an evolution? If shame is at bottom nonrational, and if Evolution is a movement toward the absolute of rationality, I cannot understand that shame is an evolution; certainly, the French have less shame than we. Once, if you had told me that in your view human shame is not an evolution, I should have disdained your mentation; but now, become more utterly mistrustful of my conclusions, I am become quite unsure as to whether it is an evolution or a survival from brutal moods of Life. Decidedly, dogs have lots of shame, “elephants more shame than men” (Tolstoy): which would scarcely seem to lead to the conclusion that shame is an evolution. Heaven knows! and the well wherein truth dwells. However, I do seem to perceive that our whole feeling in respect to sex in Europe, due no doubt to the necessity of the use of clothes in our cold countries, is more or less outré. Sophocles, questioned toward the end of life as to how he was now affected toward the delights of love, gave answer, “Softly, friend, most gladly have I escaped from those delights, as from some angry tyrant”. But peace is not life! life is nicer than death: “life is sweet”, sweeter than sleepiness and peace: so of the absurd things ever said this may be the worst — that bad eyes are better than sight, the absence of a sense than the blessing of it: for a sense is an insight, a pinning wight wiser than a full wight, since he spies in food a beauty to which the full is blind, a sweet heart wiser than Lucretius, since he can descry in his dear a bliss which a billion eyes are deprived of the wit to spy. Old folks, in fact, are no good, and tax no land: hence of France there is greater hope than of England, where the givers of laws are grey, about to go up to the Lords at the order, “go up, thou baldhead”. But a land to be gallantly grappled and peopled has to be grappled and peopled by carls raging between the ages of sixteen (like Hastings’s father) and thirty-six, or by the few wing footed Hermes, who, having learned the little hither to acquired of the Science of Bliss, enjoy at forty all the buoyancy and jauntiness of boys. But on this subject nothing but a faint modification of consciousness is at present possible to us; and this we will acquire in remembering that only a tone can be indecent, and that, even if it were otherwise, writers are not to be guided in regard to this or any matter by the smiles and wraths of Kensington: they are so proud. Now, a marquis is proud; prouder still a king; prouder still an arch priest: but lordlier far than tsar, or shah, or arch priest, is the sort of carl I am talking of: for his pride is not a pseudo-pride like a duke’s, insecurely massed upon fantasy and sham, a bladder that any chance or brashness of the rabble may shatter; but his is a pride established upon the rock of facts, upon a modest and scientific knowledge of his brain and culture as compared with the brains and culture of different kinds of being, of the king, the Hottentot, the gorilla, the dog: a real pride, a real humility. If, then, our reverend gentleman novelists ever venture to be shocking (they know their trade-dodges too thoroughly for that, I take it), let Kensington play the censor on them, and it will do well, I think; but artists do not know their trade too thoroughly for that; they, naturally enough, venture; with an effort of venturing so paltry, that how any mortal with a heart in him can call it “venturing” I can’t say; and, indeed, I know not how it is, but recently it has begun to seem to me that everybody I meet is getting quite fearful and retreating, as though the race of brave men and heroes had ceased to be. Or is this only my fancy? Anyway, if we don’t crave to have the angels and the very jackanapes cackling cachinnations at Kensington, let us not be sweeping away the indecencies of the poor Job, and of all the psalmists and the bards, in whose tone the artist harps to us. So much, then, as to this.

3. Writers, and, I fancy, minds of any strength in general, cherish a natural dislike for adjectives: so that when we see “he was a tall, dark, handsome man”, we may reflect, “Here is a fellow not Homeric”. You may know Voltaire’s mot— “the adjective is the enemy of the noun, even though it agrees with it in gender and number”? Well, this is true: for, if you say “the blue sea”, you tell not more, but less, than if you say “the sea”, since, if you say “the sea”, I think of something blue and vast and awful, but, if you say “the blue sea”, I think only of something blue, and that confusedly. Poetry apparently bears adjectives, or is supposed to, more patiently than prose — why I don’t know; certainly, if I was composing verse, not one more adjective should prattle in it than when I am composing prose: and, as a matter of fact, the greater poets — most of the Greeks — Homer — flee an adjective like plague: for though the adjectives in Homer, if counted, might amount to thousands, they are such old-coat adjectives — like “many counselled-Odysseus” — that they sound as one with the noun: as in “dear-little-thing”, where “dear little” has hardly a dash of an adjective in its disposition, and can’t be called two. As for two adjectives before one noun, I doubt if that could be found in Homer — many twos in Milton, who, however, puts one before and hides one behind the noun; and I know of one three in Homer, but so wittily arranged as not to be enraging like “tall, dark, handsome”. As for the Jehovist, Job, it may be said that they won’t have an adjective for any money, though in the Jehovist passage which I quoted there appear two, “few and evil”, but those are not the cumbrous kind that huddle the noun behind, combust and drowned. Naturally, it is never a facile thing to express images without adjectives, to tell that one is tall without saying “tall”, but the whole business of Art is a cark and difficulty, and it has to be done in some manner, if that result of naïveté of tone, that plain grace of face of the monuments of Greece is to be got; but at present England sits afflicted beneath a very cataclysm and plague of adjectives, like fleas in Egypt! “Thou fool”, said Jesus, and that’s strong; but a modern Englishman can no longer say that, he must say “thou damned fool”, which is by so much weaker as it is fiercer. In that passage from the physician which I quoted you — “cats of character and imbecile cats, but all bore a strong, though faint, resemblance to a typical cat” — why could he not have said “all bore a resemblance”? but, no: he must have an adjective, any adjective, nay two, and between the two what a cropper the excellent doctor cropped. Even intellects of no little vigour have got this odd disease, as in that marvel of Carlyle’s, “The body lies on the steps; the head is off through the streets; aloft on a pike” — the correct quotation is, “The bleeding body lies on the steps; the head is off through the streets; ghastly, aloft on a pike”. But why “bleeding”? “ghastly”? Can the raggedest reader keep from conceiving that cat’s-meat bleeds and is ghastly? So in this little bit you find two superfluous words, adjectives, from a mind that had a natural dislike of adjectives. So much, then, as to this.

4. It seems rather a mad thing that one should need to get a little Latin in order to read English well; but that is rather so: for English writers, Milton, have a way of hurling out words with an eye to their Latin sense; nay, English writers never write a word of this kind unconscious of its essential sense: for if one writes “ponder”, “attention”, in his mind is “weighing”, “stretching-to”, so that his writing is one mesh of hidden metaphor, which we miss, if we do not know. So much, then, as to this.

5. Let us not be annoyed if at a few points we are foiled of following our writer, his ineffable philosophy, flight, and highest trebles, nor use of him such terms as “incoherent”, “turbid”, the words which a Basuto would use in listening to the tutti tumult of a symphony of Beethoven, or to the tongue of Gabriel in mid-air scattering a madrigal to the galaxy, all glossolalia and Chaldean: it is for us, if we desire to love his loveliness, to acquire the way of rising to what is lovely in him, yielding ourselves to the wooing and bent of his leading; then it will be well. For, after all, we may as well learn to respect our writer, who, if he is worth our attention, must be of a kind of better birth than Mike and Bertie. Let us refrain from despatching him little letters of praise and patronage with that familiarity of village rectors: the Divinity gives him ditties; October blows console him; Bootes soothes him. Nor let us send him little vicar letters of censure and suggestion: he knows, he knows. I know, indeed, that in this country it is not easy to respect the penman: for though we may not consider that notorious Victorian, Marie Corelli, exactly a littérateur, there is still the impression that such ladies have some sort of connection, or relation, with the art of literature. But, then, that is not so: for, in fact, so far as Alpha Centauri is solitary and tossed from Sol, millions of millions of miles, so far are individuals of this kind from having any part in the art and craft of letters. Let us raise, therefore, our respect for the writer to at any rate the level of our respect for the violinist, the painter, whose brush, I think, you would be charmed to rush to pick up, as Charles V picked up Titian's. And our writer more merits our bribes and smites than these, if only because his technique is more a torment to master. See me here at this moment composing with a complete, though low harmoniousness, and with a nearly complete ease — conscious of each consonant and of every (accented) vowel sound of my outlay, without fail remembering them everyone, as the swain bears safe in his brain the faces and tale of his ewes, using an alacrity of consciousness comparable to that of an acrobat or conjuror astonishing some mass of men, of a mathematic (successfully) tackling the job of some very complex problem, writing and riding this English language with the gallantry and wrist of the charioteer of the Roman amphitheatre as he drove his street breadth of rebel steeds; and though I speak of “a nearly complete ease”, that is the result of some forty years of practice that, applied to the piano or the violin, would certainly have turned me into the most perfect virtuoso that the world has heard; then, too, I have but a week or two ago completed a harmonious book, but after some months, may be, if I begin another, harmony will again be to me quite awkward and hard. Respect me, then. And I have not said all, I have not said half of half. For the violinist's technique, though easier than mine, is quite half of his art, while my harder technique is not nearly half of my art, which far more positively, more insistently, more fruitfully, than his, consists in enlarging your consciousness of the truth of things. Let us respect, then, them of this kidney, our priests and kings after the order of Melchisedec, our real priests, great kings, gallant and gladsome and glorious, long to reign over us — whether we want it or not, whether we know it or no. Yet we are right, I think, to respect our pianist, and in time will arrive at doing this to our writer, too, since our will is ever right, and our ignorance guiltless. So much, then, as to this.

IV. ON SCHOLAR-ARTISTRY

(The Writings of Arthur Machen)

OF LIVING people known to me none I think more, so, essentially the artist as Machen — meaning by this a singer somehow of the truth that the universe is bacchic and deserves an emotion, a truth which the universe itself is in a conspiracy to conceal from us, and keep us dull. For we see nothing as it is. That “inverted Bowl” that “coops” us in — no bowl there; the stars are not little, nor the moon a foolish cheese, now whole, now cut, that floats dull — in truth, her speed is as lunatic as herself; a tree inside is a Wall Street all teeming with feet that speed, and to see the scapings of a petal through a microscope is to descry trains of trucks pressing with preoccupation on their way, the whole thing trilling like fiddle-strings, singing like fiddles, every millimetre of ether trilling between here and the Pleiades, light flying, suns thundering, some colliding with fuss and fume, moons undergoing “disruptive approach”, pitching into puddles of pit-fire; as I write, wireless waves are rushing in every direction through my hand and heart, but I do not see them, feel them, and oh, wretched man that I am, who shall rescue me from the blasphemy of being bored? Everything in the conspiracy of secrecy! — except perhaps meteors, streaming flags of fire that the gallant planet flies in her flight, which do reveal a little how things are, with what a laugh she flies with me. But even these I do not half see as they are, and dull I should be, if the scientist did not arise to tell me “the universe is bacchic! bacchic!” But the notes-of-exclamation here are mine:

he has no time, is too preoccupied with seeing to feel, and here is where the artist comes neatly in to rescue me, he having heard what the scientist says, having time, too, to admire, and to tell of it in innuendoes, with winks, saying: “It is not dull! I know a thing or two, I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows!” And if one asks him: “But is that all?” he winks at one, saying: “Enough said; I give you a hint: eye has not seen, never heart fancied; tolling melodious notes, wrung with emotion, it rolls; fairy! drunken! enough said.” But is it true? Fairy? If it is a fancy, then it is not of the least interest or importance; but the scientist says “yes, a fact”, and the artist with streaming tears calls God to witness it. The scientist’s part in art, however, is not seen by Machen, who conceives that art preceded science, that “poetry has nothing to do with scientific truths”, does not, in fact, quite know what science is, thinks that the fact “A loves B” is “a scientific truth”, so does not know that science is the mother of art — or, say, does know, but does not know that he knows: for art, he says, is adoring; but, then, before adoring one, obviously, must be conscious, must know something, something of an order of things; and to know anything of Order is science; to know more is to adore more. But Machen is of the scholar-artist type, the Milton type, with a remembering habit of mind, not of the scientist-artist type, trained in perceiving, of this type the sole representative so far being Goethe, whose like, when next he comes, will renew all things — such as Wells, Verne, being just shadows cast before his coming. But for the scholar-artist type see Machen who quotes with approval Rossetti’s remark, “I neither know nor care whether the earth goes round the sun” — which is the first remark that a cow would make between two chews the moment it got the gift of speech. Characteristic of Machen is his Hieroglyphics, “the gold of that land is good”; but not its “licence of affirmation”, its lack of that wariness, circumspection, or scepticism (spec=scep — look — before you leap) to which only scientific training educates the intellect. His theme is the artist's theme that "the universe is bacchic, and deserves an emotion", but he makes certain unexpected exceptions in emotion! — high art, he thinks, does not weep at the universe, nor laugh at it, only sighs at it. He distinguishes between "feelings" and "emotion", though, of course, there is no such distinction in psychology: "feelings" are emotion. If one sends to a woman a telegram "your husband is dead", and she weeps, is that, he asks, fine literature? But, evidently, this bacchic mood, this weeping at the universe, is due to the woman's belief that her own husband is dead! If I can make her weep at the universe by a tale of, say, Hector, of someone else's husband, in whose existence she does not believe, how high my feat, and fine my "literature"! But he is full of "opinions", biases, idiosyncrasies, resembling that fat Dr. Johnson who struck with his stick for luck every rail of every railing on his way. Half of the universe he loathes; the other half he clasps with passion to his heart: and his favour is often favouritism, his hate is often prejudice: it is not easy to predict what he will kiss, what hiss at. Nor does he ever undergo change: the mountains shall dissolve, but he will be found the same. There are those, who, if ever they caught themselves thinking as they thought six years before, would be killing themselves; but Machen is too delicious to be different. And he argues; anon he is even Socratic: and his pretty bubble of argument can as easily be pricked by an intellect really modern as any of the good Socrates': indeed, in tone of soul and mental outfit he is very like Plato. He lays it down that "literature is the expression of the dogmas of the Catholic Church" — and one may think for a moment that he means it; but not he: he means something, something true, but not what he says. He says: "Rationalism may say to you: Either give a reason for going to Mass, or leave off going; you have only to answer:

But I can give no reason for liking The Odyssey, and yet you admit I am right in liking it: then I have proved the contradictory of your premises' And now he is quite satisfied; the enemy is crushed. But, then, there is no parallelism between "going" and "liking": the parallelism would be between liking to go and liking to read. One may "go", not for pleasure, but to "get good", or something: and the Rationalist says "know why". And so on. But it is not for arguments that one reads Plato: he cannot argue, since the ancient brain was not wary enough, trained in scepticism, strong kneed, enough, except when, like Euclid, it argued on schoolboy themes. Yet one reads him spellbound, as one reads Machen, and the heart dances. There are creatures that cannot run, but can fly. When Matthew Arnold spoke of "that victorious brow" (of Shakespeare), that, of course, was Victorian, since Shakespeare had no brow — except in his portraits, in which he vainly emulates Hall Caine. Newton had a brow, Edison: which said, it is evident that Shakespeare had none, for, if so, it would have thought something; and what did it think? we can say at once what Edison has thought, but what Shakespeare had was a warmth, a wing — was no Goethe, who had brow and wing; but either by itself is worshipful, and wing without brow will frequently by some luck come cutting into the very thickest of truth. Thus it can easily be shown that the soul of Hieroglyphics is true, with a truth on which Machen's books in general are founded. I think the purest Machenesque is The Chronicle of Clemendy, such as The Great God Pan and The Three Impostors perhaps showing some trace of Poe, of Stevenson. In none is aught of "common or unclean" — though it is amusing that when he is most elevated, just then "the general reader" conceives that he is rioting in "improprieties". But, in truth, his theme is ever the Rose, the Rose: even in his letters, for as I write, I reread an old letter that teems with "the Rose"; and though I do not know exactly what Rose he is talking about, I know that there is a Rose — of Sharon — and that he knows about it, for his garments smell of it, and his pages. This is how he talks: “The longing peculiar” (unwary!) “to man, which makes him lift up his eyes, looking across the ocean for certain fabled happy islands, for Avalon that is beyond the setting of the sun”: so that the fellow dances mad, he is stung by the tarantula, he loves God, is afflicted with glossolalia and the gift of tongues, weave a circle round him thrice and close your eyes with holy dread, for he on honeydew has fed, and drunk the milk of paradise.

V. OF WRITING AND SCIENCE

AN OBVIOUS DIFFERENCE between modern literature and that of the past is that the modern is more or less modern — i.e., scientific — in penchant: — such words as “Oh, earth, what changes”, etc., “Man now is first”, etc., would hardly have been written much before they were; nor is it that fiction which is ostensibly scientific — The Coming Race, A Voyage to the Moon — which is most imbued with the modern mood, but rather such as La Terre, Ghosts, etc.; and some trace of the same spirit would no doubt be found in any novelette.

But this preoccupation with the science of the moon, the sea, heredity, evolution, Mars, stars, is not owing to the writers being themselves scientists: but they have heard a rumour of Science, and been fascinated. The writer’s trifle of science is still acquired at his fireside, or from an omnipresence of science in the air: which, of course, is not to be a scientist, science being an acquaintance with the ways in which forces act, nor can acquaintances be other than personal, since one cannot feel with another’s fingers. But so much is it ignored that it is personal experience of the cosmos which makes a scientist, that the scientist par excellence, the craftsman — the smith, pattern maker, instrument-maker — is not even called a scientist in ordinary talk: for this word “scientist” has, as Huxley pointed out, got a quite grotesque glamour in many minds, as though “the scientist” was concerned with a different cosmos from the blacksmith’s cosmos — a glamour which would have been pretty foreign to the comprehension of craftsmen like Galileo, Newton, Papin, Huyghens.

Nor was it only such as Newton, with his “aforesaid Glassworks”, who were firstly workmen; but, as Ruskin knew, the artist, too, was firstly a workman, a scientist, so that between “art” and “craft” was hardly any difference, and men spoke of the “mysteries” (i.e., the science) of a craft as many now think of the mysteries of the “scientist’s” activities. Handicraftsmen like Amati, Stradivarius, were typical musicians; while every Dürer or Botticelli had his own “wrinkles” as to tempera and impasto, was an adept cap-a-pie in the science of the craft of colours, and regarded the drawing of curves and the laying of colours as a craft quite like the fiddle-maker’s curvings, the sign painter’s colourings: hence Giotto’s circle as proof of his artistry. Nor was literature less a craft than lute-making—“men of letters” being craftsmen, not in words, but in letters, in the rhyming (i.e., repetition) of letters, like “studies-in-chords” on the violin, or the stringing of Venetian beads in pretty patterns.

But though every artist is a craftsman, a scientist, the craftsman as craftsman is more exactly a scientist than the craftsman as artist, being subject to tests more crucial and rhadamanthine, and so is more trained in the essentially scientific trait — that level headedness or hard headedness, which in Saxon we call “awakedness”, “awareness”, or “wariness”, in Latin “circumspection”, in Greek “scepticism” (scep = spec=look — before you leap). The violinist and violin maker are both handworkers; yes, but the violinist may anon commit a faulty double harmonic, and live; the violin maker may not make a faulty cut, nor stray from Nature’s rigour as regards his glue or varnish, his arch of bridge or belly, the dash and charm of his scroll, the perfect curving of his purfling: for here no self conceit, no fame, nor fancy, avails him: for sin he is mulcted. Such men know wariness: no anxious general on the brink of battle, no Perrin measuring Brownian movements, nor Ramsay weighing the tenth of a cubic millimetre of emanation, is of a warier strain. Hence we have those little wrist watches.... They contain a hair-spring — evanescent as a poet's fancy! and very truly poetic, since “poetic” means “making”; there is a balance wheel on the escapement, made by welding two minute semicircles of brass to semicircles of steel (to evade temperature changes), a thing, really, that an angel might deign to mention in Heaven as a chose vue, returned from journeying among the suns.

But this wariness, and this inventiveness, are the very traits which the writer, above all artists probably, requires. His trade is to invent. But to invent what? — fictions that look true, that are, in some sense, true, so that the word “create” may not ineptly be applied to his highest efforts. But unless he be trained in wariness, is a veteran in the truth that Truth is in a well, has again and again failed, visibly, six times in ten, in attaining Her, his inventions will not be truthful, but will be tumbling into every sort of obvious blunder — if not obvious to everyone like himself, at any rate to every cabinet-maker, to everyone having a wary habit — and he will be tumbling into a thousand other blunders, not obvious to anybody, smaller failures in truth, the avoidance of which would have hoisted his effort to perfection of excellence — if there is truth in the statement that “beauty is truth”. Take our Shakespeare, our Milton: in that “di parlar si largo flume” (of Milton), how many unwarinesses on a page which no carpenter could away with! In the case of the Trojan War, we have (in general) what can be imagined by man, man being what he is: it is therefore a fiction founded upon fact; but from the first the War in Heaven fails to work — cannot be imagined, since it was “the Omnipotent” whom Satan “durst defy to arms”, Satan being an intelligence who could “wield these worlds and all their elements”, whereas a horse's intelligence is too high to try to stop a train, to say nothing of an infinite train. Or did. Satan not know that the Omnipotent was omnipotent? In that case, Milton knew something which hosts of super human intelligences did not know — which is foolish. Therefore Satan knew, and did not fight. “Nor did the Omnipotent fight,” our carpenter would say, “he need merely have sneezed, and everything would have been nowhere: therefore there was no war.” And, if there was a war, Satan should never have invented guns and gunpowder: the mind of a trained boy instantly spies that anything invented by the Chinese would never be a trillionth part tricky enough for intelligences so hugely superhuman. Guns that shot off hot balls, not even T.N.T. shells. And none of the Omnipotent’s side was hurt! So did the balls hit no one? Or, hitting, not injure? In either case the intelligence of the shooters, who did not foreknow such a result, was little angelic. And so on: not much of it could have been written by an intelligence a little trained in wariness.

As to Shakespeare, he must have been something of a craftsman as a practical playwright, as an actor, nor do we find him tumbling into obvious blunders on every page — though blunders, we may be sure, are there, obvious or not; and many are the obvious blunders, the footprints of the child, the ancient, to the modern eye, frank as the track of the pterodactyl in Triassic sands. Take as an example at random the passage of him that is perhaps the most celebrated, Hamlet’s “to be, or not to be”. Of this passage Macaulay of the Philistines says, “ ‘To be, or not to be’ has merit undoubtedly as a composition. But its merit as a composition vanishes as compared with its merit as belonging to Hamlet. This is perhaps the highest praise that can be given to a dramatist.” As to its “merit as a composition”, this is low: and nothing can better illustrate how hypnotic is the common view, how deep the disease of an eye infected by an epidemic of opinion, than that Macaulay thought well of its “merit as a composition”: for ill would it have gone with that Mr. James Montgomery, the poetaster, at the hand of Macaulay, if Montgomery had ever written any such thing as “taking arms against a sea” — and so on: it was dashed off anyhow in haste, with some outré words, “fardel”, “quietus”, put in to make it sound nice! as all boys do. (This criticism, however, is by the way: for here some reader may differ from me; and I am not in this place making connoisseur criticisms from which someone may differ, but I am making such criticisms as a pattern-maker would make, criticisms of blunders, as in the case of Milton, from which it is impossible for anyone to differ, unless someone is unreasonable. Yes, but, says Macaulay, though its merit as a composition is not high (since it “vanishes” when compared with something else), it has this highest merit, that it is so special to Hamlet. But it is not special to Hamlet. Plato said it. I have heard a slattern in a slum call to another that she would “do for herself, too”, only she was afraid of “what may come after” — a thought common to Humanity, that life may fly its carks in the nepenthe of death: “to die, to sleep”: but, then, “perchance to dream”? still perchance to experience phenomena? out of the frying-pan, perchance, into the fire? It is the universality of the sentiment, maybe, that has made the passage so famous, not that it is special to Hamlet. And not only is it not special to Hamlet, but (now I no more speak by the way) the fact is that any man who ever lived might have said it — except one man: Hamlet. To him it was impossible, since he, alone of men, knew that there is dreaming after death, could never have said “perchance to dream” after his long gossip with a ghost, who had quite gone into details about the dreaming (“purgatorial fires”, etc.). In fact, “perchance to dream”, etc., are mots d’auteur: it was Shakespeare, not Hamlet, who wished to say it; and, in his eagerness to say it, Shakespeare put the speech into Hamlet’s mouth, forgetting that Hamlet knew that a man may hold converse with a ghost — a thing in Nature so much more odd and momentous than X-rays, that to Hamlet's last day it must have remained the central fact of his consciousness, nor ever thenceforth could his utterances have failed to reflect his consciousness, his perfect certainty, of it, much less show doubt of it, much less contradict it ("from whose bourne no traveller returns").

But if Homer nods, and Shakespeare snores, if Dante talks in his sleep, and Milton walks, this is only what we may expect: the brain till lately was not very awake or wary — a fact which we could readily deduce, supposing we had no direct proof of it: for since wariness and inventiveness are but the two faces of the same medal — wariness a sensitiveness as to untruth, inventiveness a sensitiveness as to truth — the wariness of a mind must be a measure of its inventiveness, its inventiveness of its wariness; and since the ancients invented little, i.e., were little inventive, we could be sure without proof that they were little awake or wary. To blunder, then, was their nature: what is more astonishing is that modern writers should tumble into blunders similarly obvious, through not being trained in the wariness of craftsmen and "scientists". Thus H. G. Wells, our scientist-writer en titre, went obviously tumbling, as in the statement that "there are no bacteria on Mars" — and yet Martians. It is not easy to conceive how vegetation could arise without the mic-robes of nitrification; but let it arise; it must presently die out when once Mars became covered with dead tree-trunks, which, in the absence of the bacteria of putrefaction, could never decay — and, since no plants, no animals. If animal life could arise, the corpses of a million years would have the seas solid, the land carpeted; and since a whole story is made to rest on this statement, the story crumbles. So, too, The Time-Machine?; for let one contrive to get over such a fancy as the motion of steel in Time, still, in no carpenter could the thought fail to arise that, as the time-traveller started forward, he must come to the date of his death: so that all his alleged adventures after are falsehoods. Another romantic tale, on a lower level of fancy, though a higher of imagination, lately read by me, is R. L. Stevenson's Treasure Island, in which an eye in the least modern easily sees that some of the events could never have taken place as related; and if, before writing, the writer had waited to become, like his father, an engineer, the tale would no doubt have been still more romantic, since more true. Perhaps, though, I should not make mention of blunders in this book, since I now shun the bore of shewing what they are, the details being lengthy. Let me take some shorter, more important, equally modern piece — say some play. Novels are not often written with a concentration of all the author's available wariness and invention, but dramas are: so, taking a drama, let me take one by a foremost dramatist, preferably one strong in the modern penchant for scientific subjects — say Ibsen; let me take his play that is at once most pregnant with his scientific penchant and most celebrated — say Ghosts: and, if I can then shew that Ibsen, having a pattern-maker's (or a carpenter's) training in wariness, could never have tumbled into the blunders which gash, and, in fact, slay, and lay, Ghosts, I shall have established my argument, and shall end.

The story is known; but I may just mention how to Captain Alving's widow comes on a visit her son Oswald, a painter. The fellow is very unwell, depressed, and pretty quickly he is seeking comfort in the charms of Regina; a Pastor Manders is discussing with Mrs. Alving the life of riot of Oswald's father, when Oswald in the next room is heard doing something tender to Regina; whereupon Manders (excited): What in the world is the matter?

MRS. ALVING (hoarsely): Ghosts! (for Oswald's father had done the same to a servant, Regina's mother).

This ends the First Act.

In the Second, Oswald tells his mother of his state:

OSWALD: NOW, I am going to tell you something, Mother.

MRS. ALVING: YOU are not ill, Oswald?

OSWALD: DO sit still, Mother. I am not downright ill either. Mother, my mind is broken down — ruined —

MRS. ALVING: My poor boy! How has this horrible thing come over you?

OSWALD: That's just what I can't understand. I have never led an unsteady life — never, in any respect.

MRS. ALVING: Tell me the whole story.

OSWALD: Well, I will. I began to feel the most violent pains in my head. At first I thought it was the ordinary headache I had been so plagued with. But it was not that. It was as though my powers failed me. At last I sent for a doctor. He set to asking me a heap of questions. At last he said, "You have been worm-eaten from your birth."

MRS. ALVING: What did he mean by that?

OSWALD: He said, "The fathers' sins are visited upon the children."

This, then, is the theme and teaching of the play: the importance of Heredity.

Oswald, however, knows nothing of his father's life of riot; and in the Third Act his mother tells him.

MRS. ALVING: I saw only this one thing, that your father was a broken-down man before you were born.

OSWALD: Ah!

His mother then undertakes to poison him, if he becomes an idiot: and in the end he does.

One of the obvious blunders (by the way) is Mrs. Alving's alleged motive for informing the son of the father's debauchery. It is necessary that she should have a motive, but the motive alleged is baseless. She does it, she says, to save him from remorse; would have him know that the fault is in his father, not in his own way of life: for Oswald had said to her (in the Second Act), "Incurably ruined — by my own heedlessness. Oh, if I could but live over again, and undo all I have done! If it had only been something inherited, something one wasn't responsible for! But to have thrown away so shamefully, thoughtlessly, recklessly, one's own health, happiness, everything..." She wishes, then, to free him from these "gnawing and depressing thoughts". But why did Oswald think that the fault was in his own way of life? It was because, when he had told the doctor that his father was an exemplary man (as he then thought), the doctor had been bound to admit himself on the wrong track (as to "the father's sins"), and so "I (Oswald) got to know the truth — the incomprehensible truth! I ought to have held aloof from my bright and happy student life among my fellows. It had been too much for my strength. So I had brought it upon myself". Hence Oswald's remorse.

But, of course, no doctor can be imagined to have said so. A "bright and happy life" is never too much for one's strength, being the fruit of strength, and the source of strength, especially when one is quite "steady": and Ibsen, wanting to cast the whole blame upon the father, had previously insisted upon the “steadiness” of the son. Oswald had said, “That’s just what I can’t understand! I have never led an unsteady life — never in any respect.” So when the author is wanting all the fault to be the father’s, he insists upon the son’s steadiness “in every respect”, but when he is wanting the son to be tortured with remorse, in order that the mother may have a motive to inform the son of the father’s debauchery, he is unwary enough to forget, or to ignore like the ostrich, the son’s “steadiness in every respect”, the son’s statement that he “just can’t understand” how the fault can be in himself; and, in order to make Oswald remorseful, is un inventive enough to make a doctor utter a fantasticality which no doctor, nor anyone, ever uttered, a fantasticality which Oswald would have laughed at, and Oswald’s mother would have laughed at Oswald for being troubled about, and at the doctor for uttering.

And Oswald’s “steadiness”! What a contrast in character to his father! — in a play whose theme is heredity. He has two fathers: his physique he inherits from Alving, his psyche from another father who was the opposite of Alving!

And even here there is blunder: that other father of his could not have been so “steady in every respect” as Oswald pretends: for Oswald was “steady” in gay Paris only, but at home was “unsteady” with Regina, making Mrs. Alving exclaim: “Ghosts!”

These blunders, however, are not fundamental in the play, do not rack it to fragments.

Nor do some other obvious blunders in the presentation of the personalities, as, for example, this:

MRS. ALVING: A vale of tears; yes, and we act up to our profession and make it one.

OSWALD: But in the great world people won't hear of such things. There you feel it bliss and ecstasy merely to draw the breath of life. Mother, have you noticed that everything I have painted has turned upon the joy of life? always, always, upon the joy of life? — light, and glorious air, and faces radiant with happiness?

Here the cause of the blunder is probably not so much that the author forgot that Oswald, of all men, never could have said all that, as that he, Ibsen, wished strongly to say all that, and lacked the self restraint, the wariness and inventiveness, to put the phrases into the mouth of someone in whose mouth they are appropriate phrases. As to Oswald uttering such things— “dir kannst du nicht entfliehen”! Never for him was a “feeling of bliss and ecstasy”, nor the painting of it, nor even the possibility of conceiving the queerness of state of anyone so alien to him as to feel bliss and ecstasy. He was born with “headaches”, born “worm eaten”, saw a headachey cosmos through worm eaten nerves, nor could any herb on earth ever medicine the malady of that damned diathesis. And there are some other such tumbles into blunders not fundamental in the play.

What is fundamental and racks the drama to fragments is Regina, the “splendid”: for, with singular ill-luck, Ibsen everywhere insists upon her “splendidness”: “Such a fine girl as you’ve grown to in the last year or two”; “Isn’t she splendid, Mother!”; “How beautifully she is built, and so healthy to the core!”; “Mother, when I saw that fresh, lovely, splendid girl standing there before me”; “I saw that she was full of the joy of life”; “Have you noticed how she walks — so firmly and lightly!"; "Regina is so splendidly light hearted", etc.

The author's motive for all this splendidness seems to be the ordinary motive of the fictionist to make his young women attractive; perhaps, too, he wished to have someone specially attractive as a contrast, and a snare, to a wreck like Oswald; and he takes occasion to make her a bastard of Alving, a visible evidence of Alving's libertinism. But, by a grotesque instance of unwariness, he forgets that she can't be both "splendid" and Oswald's half-sister, begot — after Oswald — by the same father who was "a broken-down man before Oswald was born", the cause of all Oswald's sorrows. So the play vanishes: for since a fact paraded in the play denies and derides, sneers and jeers at, the teaching of the play — since he sets out to demonstrate, and demonstrates, that Heredity is everything, and demonstrates in addition that Heredity does not exist — the whole thing cancels out, its sum is zero.

Now, to men of the wary and inventive habit of craftsmen and "scientists" blunders so flagrant are alien. Let us try to fancy the doom of a mechanic doing his task with this one-eyed half headedness: he'd pretty soon be blown up, electrocuted, get his fingers off; nor could any experiment conducted with this unawakedness result in anything but messy fingers, a singed beard, an electrostatic shock, a wish to vomit, a feeling of defeat.

VI. ON HAPPY ENDINGS

WHEN WE TRACK any pleasure radically back to its origin, we discover that that origin was the knowledge of some truth; now, pleasure is Good, for when we investigate anything that we name “good”, we see that by good egg, good man, good God, we mean au fond pleasure giving; if an egg tastes bad, we say “it is bad”, “not good” — to eat; but, if we put it into soil, and it causes to come a plum that gives pleasure, we say “it was good” — for that. So, since pleasure is the offspring of knowledge of truth, and pleasure is Good, we can say, then, that “Good is knowledge of truth”, or, more shortly, “Good is truth”; as to tales, we can say that “good tale is true tale”, and hence we can say “a good tale has a happy ending”: for, being good, it is true (to Life); and since the truth about Life is that its endings are happy, that there is a happy issue out of all Life’s afflictions, here is the theme and emotion of each good tale. Nothing else, indeed, is of real interest to living things, nothing else worth the telling.

That the endings of Life are happy we no longer hope, as the ancients hoped, but know, for which reason it is that religion is a modern thing: for, if I hope that you are good (will give pleasure), and fancy that I love you, my love is fictitious, but, if I know that you are good (do give pleasure), I love you really; and the ancients had hardly any knowledge of the goodness of God, but were all more or less compelled to think, what Buddha saw, that “Life is sorrow”, what Job saw, that “Man is born to sorrow”, and, having nothing but hope in some “pleasure-garden”, some “nirvana”, to console them, represented Being as a Sphinx, her icy lips smiling at Life’s agonies over her grim grill of fangs. And still some of the world's aspects are merciless — earthquakes in Japan, Chilian villages which vanish, "Titanics" perishing, aircraft crashing. But our consolation is no more fictitious, but real, now are we the sons of God, of Reality, and, knowing, are done with faith and hope. The generations of the geologic ages raged in sorrow, and still the millions teem, streaming to crash down over the ocean-cataract and perish, generation chasing generation down, after finding themselves somehow alive, like silly chickens hatched in incubators, knowing little under the dumb constellations, knowing pain, the young lions crying for food, the old lions growling for toothache, every life under sentence of death, destined to stink, to grin, to get to be grotesque, ridiculous — pitiless thing, pitiable — Time like a cannibal cat, edax rerum, Eater of them it breeds. Still, it is high drama, star-high, for star light is the theatre lights turned low, the scene is deep in Eternity's deeps — it is high doings — wait — it is not for nothing — out of the Eater shall come forth meat. The dinosaur sighed and died out, yes, but if, in dying, it had said, "Though He slays me, yet do I trust in Him", that, we now know, would have been well said, for men and birds have turned up; and a day will be in which the Eternal Worker shall have wiped from the eyes of Life all tears but tears of love wrung from Life's broken heart, a day in which Life will say, "It is well that once the muds mothered me, and I fluttered, for wild is this delight of mine in that Might, under the shadow of Whose wing is Life's refuge for ever." And since this is science — for, if it is not science, there is no science, no relying upon experience, and weather forecasts are nonsense — since it is science, we can say that, of two tales, that one which has the happier ending is the best (truest), and if this excludes from the category of good tales some famous "tragedies" — Othello, Ghosts — that is nothing, if our argument is sound. Some "tragedies", though, are good. For, of course, there are two kinds of happy ending: (i) endings happy for the “characters” of the tale; and then (2) — a still better kind — endings happy for the reader, for Society, for Life. Of this second kind an excellent example is The Bacchae (of Euripides), or say Romeo and Juliet, in which we have tragedy, pretty pitiful, but then comes a happy ending for us; we get the benefit, since that Montagu Capulet feud that had so wounded the Community is soothed to quiescence over the lovers’ tomb; and in the end we see that the pitilessness of God is good, for there was a happy issue out of all that affliction, as out of the megatherium’s shriek of grief, the pterodactyl’s tragedy, and the affliction was worth while, since the blessing to many immensely outweighed the bale to a pair of wee people; whereas in Othello, which, ending in sorrow, tells no gospel truth, we get a private trouble not my business, a storm-in a-teacup, its kite hitched to no star, a novelette — higher than ordinary novelettes, because of the warmth of the author’s genius, which breeds in him an impulse to be extraordinary, but lower than ordinary novelettes, because his impulse to be aberrant from novelette type is warmer than wise, ordinary writers being submissive to novelette type, of which happy endings is a right characteristic. How right a characteristic we see in that “old, old story” of Jesus Christ, the best no doubt that was ever told — best since truest, truest since having both kinds of happy ending, both in excelsis. No lack of tragedy here: gashly the hero dies; but little that matters — the nimble being rises again: sorrow may endure for a night, for two nights, but joy comes in the morning. And he ascends into heaven — a thing most true — not “the descent of Man”, but the ascent of the son of Man; in which heaven he lives happily ever after — though he will come once more triumphant, riding the skies, attended by ten times ten thousand knights, with squalls of psaltery-strings trilling, or with crashing rote of chariot-wheels, and thundering throat. If the tale had been by a modern author, the end must have been spoiled: he, with his modern circumspection, could not have helped demanding of himself “ascend — where to?” If to the nearest star, travelling with the speed of light — the maximum speed of Being — his traveller would be five years flying, supposing that he did not catch his death of cold, to be then frozen to a bone in the zero of cold, before going bony for hunger; if to some far sun of our system, the trip would last fifteen thousand years, would be still beginning; if to the nearest system of suns, a million years. Such considerations would prevent that end from being written at present, but in an age when it could be written, and the details of this deeply true tale credited, it is not strange if it inspired an even wild affection: men died for it. As to the second kind of happy ending, a world is rescued — not a town, as in Romeo and Juliet — this world, in which the reader is. At all points, in fact, the tale is transcendent, in excelsis: Buddha abandoned his father’s throne, but not his Father’s throne in Heaven; went forth to poverty, but not to death — and so on. But it is the tale’s end that matters, the lizard linnet victory of issue out of affliction, and lark’s hymn of happiness at the last.

VII. OF HOW TO BE HAPPY

I

“GOOD”, WHEN WE reflect, we see to mean pleasant, happy, “best” means pleasantest, happiest — as even the ancients (Aristippus) could clearly see.

But people who are not miserable tend to be content with themselves as they are, not imagining any Good greater than their negative Good, nor desiring to “have life and have it more abundantly”, as cats do not desire to be bipeds, nor to listen in. But there is positive happiness — height after height — if we know how.

For Good, Best, consists in knowing, and an omniscient being is in bliss, knowing how to procure every pleasure and evade every pain (the sci in “omniscient”, “science”, “consciousness” meaning knowledge).

And any knowledge of order, of what always follows upon what, is called Science — not the knowledge that one has a headache, but the knowledge that headache follows upon stomach-trouble; and it is easy enough to see that it is this sort of knowledge, knowledge of order — science — which mainly makes an animal happy, which alone makes animals in the mass happy: for though I get some happiness from knowing where to find my pipe, Life-on-the-whole gets happiness only from knowing eternal truth, universal order, such as that insulin in a sick kidney is followed by a cure, that a four-cycle explosion in a car is followed by motion of the car.

From which we see that the so-called “mystery of evil” is no mystery at all: evil is pain; pain is ignorance, lack of science; and since science is of necessity a growth — for there can’t be an omniscient monkey or amoeba — this explains the “mystery of evil”.

If we now go dancing, then, that is only natural: for evil is ceasing, will more and more completely cease.

The cavemen — Caesar — all the ancients — were in pretty evil case: no matches, now, no anaesthetics, dentists, paper, w c’s, motors — nothing much; dulness, carks, apprehensions; everyone “had a devil”, seven devils, was a leper, maimed, halt, or blind: their science was so slight.

However, not all science is of equal promptness in making happy. Darwin spent thirty years in studying worms, caring nothing about worms, really, caring only about happiness, certain that some day, somehow, a knowledge of worms will work to make men happy; but, meantime, he suffered deep pains which he did not know how to cure. Spencer, too, had no little science: but, if he had known less of other things, and how to cure dyspepsia, he would have been happier.

For we are not infra-angels, as low types like the ancients and savages find comfort in imagining, but are super monkeys, and in simple things is our good and evil. Our hearts will not dance and adore, if we have toothache, or lack food.

That is one thing to know, in order to be happy.

For instance, we are often eating and always breathing, and, if we do these wrongly, we cannot have happiness of heart.

If someone says (like Bernard Shaw) that we do these things by instinct, and therefore rightly, I reply “you don’t know what instinct is”. Instinct was once reason in some ancestor, who came to the decision to behave in some particular way; which way became second nature in descendants: and his decision was more likely to be unwise than wise, just because he was an ancestor, low in type. Dogs, for example, are radically wrong, breathing in pants, eating in gulps, so that their jubilant youth degenerates into a shameful old age at fourteen.

And so with many men; they never get a breath of fresh air: for air taken into the lung becomes foul air, and this should be deeply squeezed out by the strength of the trained breast-muscles before the next take-in, especially in sleep; but their pant expels but a pinch of it; then the next pant takes in a pinch of fresh air to mix with the foul, so that there is never a breath of pure air in the lung. Such folk soon lose the jubilation of youth: for the air of heaven is a heavenly spirit, all frivolity and holiday, and the organ that inhales the laughter of its life-sparks' flight is the organ of gaiety.

Anyway, there is little difficulty as to breathing strongly: four months, say, of self training, then never any more: for one is always practising after.

Possibly, my own continued efficiency in breathing owes something to a habit of running, which (like swimming) much strengthens the lungs; and since we cannot run far and fast, the thing is to run far and slow. When one does it thinly clad in March winds, say — flushed, breathing easily, panting only for happiness — it is well then with one.

“I know a man,” says the apostle, “who was caught up to the third heaven, and there saw unspeakable things”; well, I, for my part, know a man who has been caught up to the seventh heaven, there to see things more unspeakable still, as 7 is to 3 — or as 7 is to 0: for there is no third heaven (as people then believed), so never the apostle was there; but there is a seventh heaven.

II

Again it is easy to eat wrongly.

For only lukewarm liquids should be swallowed... Now, cold things, like water, hot things, like tea, solid things, like plums, do not hurt the mouth, so may well be put into it; but, as they hurt the stomach, and, as the mouth is a marvel of mechanism for warming cold things, for cooling hot things, for liquefying solid things, provided it be given time, therefore it should be given time.

And from its first months a baby should be trained so to eat. In its breast-sucking, Nature supplies it with petty oozes only, but a foolish mother, spoon feeding it, stuffs it with spoonfuls, implanting into it for ever a habit of haste in eating. Yet, on growing up, if it discovered Golconda, or got to be a Pope, these would be but trumpery lucks compared with having had a mother of some understanding and loving patience.

To some, indeed, it may seem that that must be a bore to eat slowly; but, then, righteousness of life is no bore, but luxury and fun — real righteousness. During a week or two it is a bore to go over from any bad habit to any good: but “good” means pleasant — has no other ultimate meaning; and eating first becomes a great good when perfectly done. Now, too, you may say goodbye to “sick-headaches” and suchlike shames: for we are well made, and merely grieve through ignorance.

Nor does eating well occupy much more time, since we are then inclined to eat less; moreover, one gets to know the luxury of eating will never be so green as to eat unless greedily hungry, and this may mean less time spent on the whole — two meals being enough (I think). We are meant to eat a certain number of tons in a lifetime, and most people eat the whole in sixty years, then die, while the wise take a hundred years to eat it, then die.

Slow, then, and seldom — and silence! For the job of eating with joy and consciousness is enough to occupy all one’s attention; but people chatter meanwhile! If I was an entertainer of many, I should make a law, “No conversation at table”. Then meals will become an epicure’s sacrament.

And I imagine that what one eats is also of importance; but here, though one’s ears are wide to hear of “Vitamin D”, “unfired food”, etc., one is still bewildered. I have an idea that, if we ate only fruit, fresh picked, and ate it well, we might live to be one hundred and twenty; but, of course, this is not knowledge. And whence is the average man in England to get fresh fruit? He actually drinks beer, not made of fruit, and his inspired law-makers, instead of bribing vine growers to send him wine, tax them, to make him drink beer.

And there is another science that specially makes men happy — the science that makes them religious: for, though all science does this, that science specially does it which consists in the knowledge of what follows upon some simple, large facts, such as the facts of what we are, when we are, where we are.

To know which facts is the high privilege of modern men, ignorance of them being the reason why the ancients never dreamt what religion is, what happiness is — true religion, high happiness.

For they lacked our lowliness of heart, fancying that the universe is little, themselves big, fancying that there is joy among the lords of Taurus in respect of one Tom that repents.

And they were haunted with apprehensions — of death, of hell, of stars “falling”, the earth bursting up, graves giving up their dead.

We are too little for hell: the Charioteer of Arcturus says “pooh” at our dwarf G sun — one of billions no doubt in billions of island universes, of which a few are visible to our eyepieces.

Nor had the ancient brain the strength to realise the Past, the Future, Eternity; a few years back was “the beginning”, while “the end”, “the consumemation” (τό τέλος) was expected daily by some. For us the earth’s seven thousand million years is a mere click of the cosmic clock, our eternity being ungirt by any beginning; and since “Force is persistent”, and there is One whose Name is Force, we know that, though the pulses of these suns will slow, His sea will for ever and for ever flow, His billows will know no end.

In that Deep of Time, if He seek me, He will not find me, He will be deprived of you; but will not repine.

Meantime, by pricking and pressing our spirit to be omnipresent in space and time, we are with Him in that Everywhere where He resides; and there with Him is fairyland, romance and happiness.

Ill So, then, in a new universe we are new creatures, having learned Bigness, Littleness, Awe.

And we have learned Love, on learning that men are sprung from Apes, that there is a principle of Progress in Being, by which Life through science climbs to might, and will in time be wildly delighted — this not being a hope and a faith, but knowledge obtained by experience in the same way in which we know of the future that next June will be sunnier than next October.

So here is Gospel in reality, glad tidings of great joy in truth! His name was Charles, and his name was Comforter, Prince of Consolation, for we still know pain, but a voice has called to us Love! all is well, be comforted: For, as none before Galileo could suspect that God is great, so before Darwin none could suspect that God is greatly good.

And now we have thrown overboard our “personality” as a phantom having no reality, only One being real, “I” being a thing of atoms that reel in dance, so that during sleep my opinions veer, my nails lengthen, “I” to-day being far from being the same body or mind as when I was embryo, or behaved yesterday: I have changed, am different, and a different thing is another thing. And since millions of changes take place in each thing in each second, “the individual perishes, the world is more and more”, the drop is lost in the Ocean.

But the sense of self in the ancients and savages! — amusing souls. “Who follows Anjou?” cries Richard Lion-heart, leaping from a ship into the sea to fight a battle, clad like a Basuto “boy” in gawds and gewgaws. What cocks! I came, I saw, I conquered, I am — the cock. “Anjou’s” father, was “England” — God is my right, by jingo! One of them had for motto “Cave, adsum” — look out for yourself, I am about, swaggering as the African gallant, “Lion of the Tribe”, struts and carries on.

We are different — puffs of nothing whirled in the whirlwind of eternal things, universal things. And all this lowliness of ours, this nirvana, this awe, this love that “casts out fear”, this true religion, real poetry, this inhabiting of eternity and having our lot in a nook of infinity — all this romance is happiness, on condition that, really modern, we realise the facts.

To realise them, one not being formally “a scientist”, one should read about them, and by strong imagining digest them into the mesh of one’s everyday intelligence.

The facts are (i) that suns are big; (2) that the earth is old; (3) that men’s unlikeness to snakes is slight compared with their likeness; (4) that atoms are smaller than archangels can imagine.

But one who learns that there are other worlds thick as peas does not believe, know it, until by familiarity with details he gets the facts into his heartbeats: he should study some astronomy, some biology, some sub atomic stuff, some mathematics — there’s no difficulty.

Then, waking up, he finds what he is — Nothing; when he is — Nowhen; where he is — in the seventh fairyland of the seventh heaven, sailing away for Utopia on one of these islands of idyll that float areel through the Ethereal Sea; and now he realises that that is not clever to consider Being common place, just because other Joneses are sufficiently unreasonable so to consider it.

A young man, lost somehow when an infant in a tropical forest, where like Tarzan he had lived solitary, was captured and brought to Paris (in the 1880's), to be studied by the anthropologists, and it was found that his adoration was boundless; when there was a gale his raptures became frantic: he ran, he pranced, he laughed, his tears streamed — as is natural in anyone whose intelligence is fresh and much above a cow's. Perhaps cows, too, are like that, as young dogs, larks, seem to be; and Jones is dull, not because he is weak in the head, but because of the inveterate influence upon him of millions of Joneses, all preoccupied with the strains and stresses of a crazy society, named “modern”, but designed by ancient minds of a childish type, so that the Messrs Jones have no leisure to be conscious of other facts; and from them the leprosy of dulness spreads.

For for goodness, happiness, one must, moreover, have some “goods”— “wealth.”, in addition to high health and high consciousness: “healthy, wealthy and wise”; and, as to getting wealth, or wellth, I don't know what to say — except this, that, to be well off, Israel must not live in Egypt, nor Saxons in a Norman England: a nation must have a country as we no doubt would soon have, if we had the gumption to appoint to govern us young scientists, not old lawyer minds.

However, the big difference between two men is not that one is a beggar and the other a duke, but that one is dead and the other alive to eye this sight of a world and worlds. On waking from a sleep, I say, “Alive! another day, another palace, built without hands of bubble-colours upon a void of Being; and in all the myriad hits of this mystery and miracle of me not an ache, not one. As to to-morrow, what do I care? If 'I' do not wake again, 'I' will not know; if I do wake, 'I will be someone else — someone older, too, his blood less flushed with the hormone of piety to exult, and love, and thank, and thank; and Peppy's dead, Ketty's dead, Setty's dead, the lake-dwellers dead, and that old Uruk who built Ur of the Chaldees; but I this day am a thing awake and well: this is my day, my palace." Then I am up, to be an hour naked, exercising every muscle, especially the face-muscles, so as never to look older to myself (for that's bad), letting no muscle stir but the one I will to stir; then to bathe in cold and be anointed with oil; then out to run six miles in cotton shirt, trousers, shoes — nothing else ever; and if there are heaven high winds waydaring, wetted with drizzle — everything in Eden wet, fresh-made, smelling of eternity, singing the hymn of the earth's journey toward Hercules — then I can't help letting my mouth shout what my soul moans, "Beloved", thanking God that to men at least is given to perceive His meanings, and to be with Him in days and places of Heaven that no tongue may tell of.

VIII. ON WEALTH

THE MEANING OF “wealth” frequently seems to be not clearly apprehended.

For example, Frank Varley, Member of Parliament for Mansfield, says (as to a Mines Nationalisation Bill), “The miners are justified in asking that the national wealth (meaning mines) should be nationalised.”

But clear concepts, and the use of words with precision, are great gains. A mine, now, is not wealth. Well is good, or pleasant; wellth (or wealth) is goods, or pleasures; but, evidently, a diamond on-the-ground is no good or pleasure, is not wealth: though, if I take it, “do work” on it (as physicists say, i.e., move it), pick it up, a diamond in my hand, in my tie, is wealth.

Coal in a pit is no good or pleasure to anyone, is not goods, wellth; though coal in a fire-box, in a grate, is. The sea, the land, the air round me, is not wealth; though the air that I have taken — i.e., moved — into my lungs is.

Nature is not wealth: wealth is something desirable in Nature taken, moved: it is the taking, moving, that changes Nature into wealth; and the whole of the wealth in a piece of coal, or any object, consists in motions given to that particular kind of thing: for whereas it was originally no good, it got to be some good by being moved, and where it was moved to it was less good than where it now is, its wellth growing and growing by successive movements.

And the movers of it, the makers of the wealth in it, are the sole owners of it: for only wealth can be owned; “to own” means to own wealth, to own something that has been moved, and has acquired wellth, by one's own force; or someone else may have moved it, and I, through having moved other things by my own force, am able to buy it from him, and own it. But in every case to own is to own wealth. If in the dark I steal something that turns out to be no good to anyone, that is no theft, as, not being goods, it can have no owner.

Nature, then, cannot be owned, only goods can, only wealth — something that has been moved.

We see, then, the absurdity of men being wealthy “by law” through asserting that they own something that, not being wealth, cannot be owned: is it strange if absurdities emerge out of the bowels of communities founded on an absurdity so buffoon?

What is curious is that such “owners” base their absurdity on a truth, referring to the “good old simple plan that they should take who have the power”, this, they say, being the Divine law; and, of course, this is so true, that no other law is even conceivable; moreover, what one takes, they say, is his, his own, he owns it; and this, too, is evidently so. But they seem to have no notion of the meaning of the word “take”, do not realise that, to own, one must really take, not merely say that one has taken.

If one breaks some skulls with battleaxes, and makes a “law”, and sets up a fence, sets up a board marked “trespassers will be prosecuted”, that is saying that one has taken; but “to take” means to move. If I say to my guest “take some mustard”, he may trumpet “Yes!”

“Yes!” till his throat's sore; but saying is not taking: to take he must “do work” on it, move it, do something to it.

In the case of a plot of land, it has soil, it has site, it has undemoil — those three: and its soil can be owned by an individual who takes it, i.e., moves it, ploughs it, compresses its particles by building on it (as when we “take” a chair), does something to it, somehow changes it from Nature into wealth — for a while; its site cannot be owned by an individual, since he cannot take it, move it, do anything to it; but it can be owned by a community who takes it, i.e., moves it, moves it from being outside a community to being inside a community, does something to it, raises its rental — motion being Einsteinian, relative, and one may take some mustard either by moving it to one’s mouth, or by moving one’s mouth to it; as to the undersoil — the earth’s lithosphere — the most important of the three — that cannot be taken, moved, owned, by one or by many.

Such, then, is the bébêtise of men saying that they own lands of which they cannot take the site or the undersoil, and have not taken the soil, nor have bought the soil, nor have inherited the soil from anyone who ever took the soil!

IX. OF THE NECESSITY OF WAR

WHAT FIRST EMERGES as a truth relevant to our enquiry is that wars among us civilised are less frequent and prompt than among the ancients and savages: and, if we can see the reason of this, this may furnish a clue to the question whether the process is certain to continue.

Is it that we moderns have become more mild in mood, the warfare of the ancients and savages being an offspring of their ferocity? Or is the ferocity of savages a fancy? The Caribs, for instance, the Incas, were gentle people, upon whom the Spaniards came “like wolves upon sheep” — as Macaulay said of the English coming upon the Hindus; and in honour, too, in heroism, and other moral moods the American Indians seem to have surpassed the Spaniards.

Some savages, then, are not ferocious, and, if all A's have not x, x cannot be a characteristic of A; also some savages are more moral than some civilised, some being Christian, Mahometan, saints; and since there are but the bodily knacks, and “heart”, and head, and the difference between savage and civilised is not in the knacks, save in knack of hand (hawks excelling both in sight, dogs in scent, cats in hearing), and the difference is not in “heart”, it must be in head, or hand, or both — in intelligence, and so in knowledge of the cosmos, or in handicraft, or both. Who, for example, are the bravest soldiers? I have heard it asserted that the Turks are, that the Irish are, the Germans, the Japanese, the French, the Cossacks, the English, the Chinese; and some savages have shewn themselves at least as brave as any of these. For “deathless heroism”, endurance the most stoical of excruciation, I select the fatalist Hindu — Nuncomar on the scaffold — though some Red Indians, some French aristocrats in '93, some Chinese, some Africans, are hard to surpass in this respect. Hence the harm which those do who boom and hoot examples of moral mood, such as the Balaclava Charge, or that “Birkenhead Drill” which the King of Prussia presented as an example to his men: for, in so doing, they focus admiration upon those things in which savages are not below the civilised, and they omit to boom those things which have lifted the civilised far above savages, viz., knowledge of the cosmos and handicraft: so that Grace Darling becomes more celebrated than Rutherford. But the aim of Nature may be demonstrated to be the development of the brain — even the hand, Her next favourite, being perhaps destined, as some imagine, to be replaced by a mechanical hand; and She gives the impression of having spent 900,000 years in training men to a moral heredity, merely in order that the thinker's brain may not be much distracted by the irruption of his own and others' passions. Hence with the civilised — at least the highly civilised — the centre-of-gravity of the man has shifted, and he is as if converted and born again, not of water, but of the intellect, the words “good man”, “best man”, no longer meaning, for him, a saint or moral enthusiast like Socrates, Buddha, Marcus Aurelius, Carlyle, Arnold, but a seer, like Faraday, Helmholtz; at the notion of the ancients and savages, that all things work together for good to them that have certain emotions, and walk by charms, he smiles, as at his child's fancies and drawings, at the handicraft of savages, at Napoleon's notion that “God is on the side of the big battalions”, knowing well that God is on the side of the big intelligences, and that one inventor may yet be stronger than a thousand million men; “conduct”, then, for him, is no longer “three-fourths of life”, but a tenth, a more or less subconscious, negligible tenth, since he is carelessly convinced that he, the King, can do no wrong; nor is his cosmos any longer a moral parish, but is large, and electro chemical: so not grit, but wit, any longer preoccupies him, appearing to him most noble and exemplary, not moods, but perceptions, the spin thariscopes, the 4-cycle Otto, the electrolytic detector, the seer's wit of the phonograph, of the submarine; and his question is not "How shall I feel, what shall I do, to be saved?" but "What shall I think, to further a world, and what shall I make?" Moreover, those who boom such examples of moral mood overshoot their aim: for their excellent aim is to encourage such moods; but such moods are not foreign to Man, nor far from the thought of his heart; and those who over laud them only cause them to be infected with a certain self-consciousness, bravado, below the plane of the simple stoicism of a Nuncomar or Redskin brave: for in conduct, as Novalis says, "the unconscious is the alone complete".

At any rate, since ferocity is not a characteristic of savages, it cannot be that their wars are caused by their ferocity: for, as Prescott shews, even the gentle Incas were generally at war — who permitted their empire to be conquered by two hundred Spaniards: these people's wars assuredly were not because of their ferocity. Only, they knew how to look ferocious when they put on plumes and paints, to prod themselves toward ferocity, like boys who boisterously march and look large, but are not too ferocious au fond, Man apparently being not a ferocious animal, but a domestic and slippered soul, until some power rouses and hounds him to prowess upon the warpath.

And, if ferocity is not the cause of savage wars, shall we think that ferocity is the cause of the wars of modern Europeans? That can hardly be: for, on the contrary, the laws, at all events, and manners of the civilised — their garb and garniture — have inclined toward mildness, fineness, politeness, the very war paint and horrid busby of the swash buckler having tended to vanish. This, Buckle fancies, has been owing to the discovery of gun powder, which created a special class of fighter, and to the discovery of steam, which promoted intercourse — anyway, was not owing to preachers of peace, but to causes universal in civilisation: so the change is universal. Some modern Continentals, indeed, especially the Germans, have deliberately fostered among themselves a certain turbulence and “frightfulness” in the curl of their moustache, like Daimio Japanese; but this seems a mere freak and anachronism of fashion, like Greek gowns under the Empire. Two thousand years ago, in Germany, the shipwrecked sailor was “vogebsfrei” — could be seized as a slave, or killed; a thousand years ago his little property, at any rate, could be taken; to-day under the reign of science men stake life and property to rescue and pet him, Huns becoming merely Hunnish, and finally honied, until roused by some power and hounded upon the war-path. Anyway, the truth seems to be that men are not ferocious, that, as the song sings, “We do not want to fight” — until, by Jingo, we do.

For we do. “We are at war with Germany”, as someone, twenty years ago, waking up, insisted — driven to it, “for the good of Belgium”, some said, “for freedom and civilisation”, others said, “for the sacredness of paper”, Lloyd George said, “for our existence” Winston Churchill said — mixed motives. And why did France fight? “For our existence,” she said, “for the revanche”, she said, “for justice, freedom and civilisation.” And why did Russia fight? “For our existence,” she said, “for Constantinople”, “because we were attacked”. And why did Germany fight? “Because we were attacked,” she said, “for our existence”, she said, “for our development”, “to spread culture”, “to strafe every one” — mixed motives. Everywhere, however, was found one profession — that they fought “for existence”, which has a truer ring than that it was for “justice”, or “paper”. At any rate, we may say that it is not for nothing that they suffered, but for something; and, if no group of ten Germans can agree in their analysis of what the something was, nor no ten French, English, then, since they are not ferocious, they, in common with savages, must be pushed toward war by some cause — one bidding as the love of “existence” — a cause dark and wide, which, like all causes, we must call “Divine”.

This is the more obvious, because here was no holiday cock-fight, but business — gargantuan — nor ever was the gorge of death so chock with flesh. Are men, then, as sands, and offal of Autumn? Or will anyone henceforth utter the phrase, “life is precious”? Indeed, this was ever an empty phrase, bereft of sense, if “precious” meant anything like rare, as radium is a precious metal: for living beings teem in nearly every cubic millimetre of the sea, soil, lower air, so that coal or copper is most precious in comparison, and, if one kill a million times a billion lives, that makes no difference, a million billions spring in their place. In fact, we know that the will to live and occupy every nook is a rage so furious, that the varieties of life everywhere press upon the limits of their means of well being, and are at war “for existence”, so that each would speedily overspread the earth, if its spread were not repressed by some necessity of its environment— “environment” meaning the nature of things as it concerns any variety, not as, say, Sir Norman Angell, in his Great Illusion, thinks as regards human varieties, that their environment is “Nature” outside Man, which Man’s business is to “conquer” — a view of the human race as a non natural whole in the midst of “external Nature” which is little modern, and is no more to be maintained as to Man than as to birds, whose “sparrow is speared by the shrike”, each variety having other varieties of its species that environ it as part of Nature.

Of human varieties, then, as of every variety, that must be a truth what Spencer says: “Every variety is perpetually undergoing a variation in number, now rising above the average through abundance of food or absence of enemies, and then, by a scarcity of food or abundance of enemies, being depressed below its average; and amid these oscillations lies that average number at which the expansive tendency is in equilibrium with repressive tendencies” — a truth that has-been called “The Law of Life”.

But in this statement of the Law two words call for elucidation—“enemies”, and “average” (number). The “enemies” of sparrows may evidently be divided into three kinds: (i) the nature of inanimate things, weather, dearth, size of the earth, etc.; (2) such animate enemies as farmers, cats, etc.; and (3) such animate enemies as shrikes, birds like sparrows. Such are the “enemies” which repress the spread of varieties in general; but the varieties of one genus — the dominant genus — must offer an exception: for, since the number of these can hardly be repressed by the dominated genera, their enemies can be of two classes only, viz., inanimate things, and the other varieties of the dominant genus; and, if the Law of Life is to operate in this genus also, then the varieties of this genus must either evade the repression of inanimate things by an adequate increase of knowledge or quality, or they will have their rage to overstep their “average number” repressed by their only remaining enemies, the other varieties of the dominant genus — unless they themselves repress their rage to overstep their “average number”.

Now, as regards Man, the naturalist may not be quite prepared to state that he is the dominant race: for that race is the dominant which can come upon all others, saying, “I am about to kill, devour, decompose you” — as Man does to lambs and lions, and as is done to Man and to all by microbes: and, in fact, this race of microbes has everywhere in the past been the enemy which, more than anything, has repressed every tendency of Man to overstep his “average number” — in “Great Plagues”, “Black Deaths”, when many deathcarts wended, and from dwelling to dwelling went the wailing “out with your dead”. αἰεὶ δε πύραι καίοντο Θάμναι. Such horrors, however, no longer happen in our most crowded slums; the dominance of microbes has so toppled, that civilised Man may now roughly be called “dominant”: in which case, any overstepping of its “average number” by any variety of civilised men in any stage of knowledge must, if it evade the repression of inanimate things, either be deliberately repressed by the variety itself, or it will be repressed by other varieties of civilised men — a statement necessarily true, if the statement by biologists of the Law of Life is true. Some biologist, indeed, like Mitchell, may see fit to make the suggestion that all other biologists, knowing little of biology, misstate the Biological Law; but this can hardly be regarded as gravely meant; and, biologists apart, it is only necessary for anyone to look within himself to discover that he is conscious of the truth of the law, and this without other knowledge of biology than belongs to housemaids, who quite know that there would be more mice, if there were no cats, and more cats, if kittens were not killed by men, and more men, if their “average number” was not adjusted by want and war.

But “average number” — what is this? What is the “average number” of the English variety? In 1700 their number was 6,000,000; in 1800 it was 12,000,000; in 1900 it was 45,000,000; in 2000 it will be some 360,000,000 (at this rate). Which of these is its “average”, or natural, number? — for here “average” means “natural” or “proper”. It is evident that the “average” number was, in each case, some thing not far from the actual number at that date: for we can be sure that 39,000,000 of the 45,000,000 now in England would have perished in 1700, since the 6,000,000 then had no superfluity of things; nor could those surplus 39,000,000 by their labour have coaxed Nature to produce things to maintain them, for, of their two enemies, we know that one at least — the nature of inanimate things — would have killed them off, in their lack of knowledge of soils and oils, light and lightning, steam and steels; if some did contrive to survive in wretchedness this enemy, they must have survived, since not by their own quality or knowledge, then somehow by the labours and trading of other nations, to whom they would be powerless to pay any recompense; and these survivors must presently have perished, if not by microbes, then, by their only remaining enemy, the other varieties of their species: for, by the Law of Life, there would have been War.

But while Man's behaviour is not less ordered by natural laws than is the behaviour of rooks and sparrows, the laws operate through men's will and reason: so that when Austria wars with Italy, it is not in order to illustrate some Law, but for some concrete cause of quarrel. Between the Wa-Ingwania and the M'Niami, frequently at war, unconscious of any biologic law, there must be some grievance which can be definitely alleged. What is it? It is to be remarked that they are very separate in their proximity, like a drop of oil hard by a drop of water, like Montagu and Capulet, Jew and Samaritan. A German can come to London, marry a Cockney, open shop in Bermondsey; but, if a M'Niami hunt a haartebeest across the frontier into Mo-Ingwania, it is at the risk of being seen and speared. Yet the Wa-Ingwania owe something to the M'Niami: that new-fangled style of grinding groats now the mode throughout Mo-Ingwania is a M'Niami notion; but for M'Niami mountains the flats of Mo-Ingwania would be a misery in the rainy season: it was not the Wa-Ingwania who kneaded M'Niamiland with their hands, and seated her where she is, and seated Mo-Ingwania where she is, serenely screened within those everlasting arms of M'Niamiland: the Wa-Ingwania forget that. And, if part of Mo-Ingwania wellbeing, Mo-Ingwania wealth, is owing to the M'Niami, that part is owned by the M’Niami; and, if part of Mo-Ingwania wealth is, then part of Mo-Ingwania land is, for wealth is from land, as finger from hand. But, then, the M’Niami, for their part, forget that it was the Wa-Ingwania who attracted the Portuguese trucksters to these latitudes with their fabulous buttons and calicos: they forget that, as they forget ten other benefits that they get from Modngwania. And how they both are multiplying! Perilous thing! Wherever one wanders solitary in forest, one spies a Wadngwania’s eye shining like God’s behind a bush, watching one’s doings. And growing poorer nowa days: the more they grow in number, the thicker the crowd of their riff-raff poor, and the bigger the peril, for those poor are after land, aye, after M’Niami land. A wise king of M’Niami would strike quick — now while he may — before the Wadngwania and their poverty multiply beyond measure, until the whips of want wallop them to come dancing their war dance at the M’Niami, who, also, multiplying, tasting scarcity, are after land, aye, after Mo Ingwania land, that is partly theirs....

And as with savages, so with civilised, whose cause of quarrel, however, operates less goadingly, since our growth of numbers, of poverty, is counter balanced by growth of knowledge; but a similar separateness here; a similar claim to the exclusive possession of land — frontiers, tariffs, passports, registration of aliens, quotas, deportations, Home Office permits — though it is easy to see that Germany is partly Englishmen’s, England partly Germans’. But no acknowledgment of the obvious; no millions of pounds paid by England to Germany for Röntgen rays, which heal Englishmen’s diseases; no millions paid by Germany to England for the steam-engine, to Denmark for unearthing the birthplace of Light, which makes Germans a higher type of Hun; instead of acknowledgment of debt, only growth in numbers by each other’s achievements, and threat of invasion. There is cause for quarrel here.

Anyway, we see that “average number” is not some fixed number, but may properly spread beyond measure, on condition that a variety’s quality or knowledge keeps pace with that spread; but, by the Law of Life, its number tends ever to grow faster than its quality or knowledge; and, if it does this much, and the variety still contrives to maintain in wretchedness this excess of number over quality, or knowledge, or power over Nature, then, without fail, in the case of a variety of the dominant genus, that excess will be repressed by its only remaining enemy, other varieties of the genus.

And it is to be noted that when quality or knowledge is spoken of, any knowledge resident by chance in some heads is not what is meant:

J. J. Thomson and Lloyd George may know that the “ownership” by individuals of a country is the root-cause of its sorrows; or they may know Avogadro’s Law that in a cubic cm. there are 3×10^{23} molecules of all gases alike; or they may know that wine, cider, are better for the genius of a people than beer, not made of fruit, but of duller products; but unless this knowledge is diffused, or somehow used by the community, it boots not, it is not the knowledge of the variety, nor modifies its quality.

At any rate, what now appears to have been demonstrated is this: that War is the offspring of ignorance, the ignorance of a great number somewhere, and depends upon a wretched ratio somewhere between numbers and knowledge. And, as, like all sorrows, it is the offspring of ignorance, so it is the medicine of ignorance, decreases ignorance, not merely relatively, by decreasing the number of the ignorant, but, with its two-edged sword, absolutely, by heightening the quality or knowledge of men — as can readily be demonstrated... Many, indeed, are the lesser medicines of War — not the smallest among them being this, that it creates citizenship. To the soldier in whose head, till then, the idea of the State has scarce arisen, there arrives a moment when he stands wide-awake before death — for the State, which thereupon becomes not less real to him than groans and griefs. Hence history is thick with tales of the reorganisation of States by the home-coming soldier: for he has acquired Co-operation under threat of death; the General is a general servant, the captains are captains of industry in sacrifice, the army is not three millions but one being fighting for its life, and War, the divider, is above all the uniter — of individuals into heptarchies, of heptarchies into nations, of nations with their allies, and at last of allies with the enemy. Nor is it the soldier alone who is thus keenly piqued to the idea of the State and Co-operation, but the nation: for the most dissolute crowd of individuals, slouching through existence together in a happy-go-lucky slatternliness, must necessarily, if they are at war, socialise, nationalise, smarten themselves a little, in order to be able to expect the smallest success in the combat. Nor is this a solitary effect. “By means of war,” as Winwood Reade says — seeming to forget that he is praising, not a good in itself, but the medicine of an evil— “by means of war intelligence was brightened, tribes compressed into nations. It was War which founded the Chinese Empire, linked Babylonia, Egypt, India, planted the Greek language in Asia, united the barons in the Crusades, destroyed the feudal system. United Italy was formed by the wars of ’59, ’66 and ’70” — and so on. Deep have been these, and suchlike, uses of war in the volume of human evolution; but they are as nothing in comparison with the essential working of that drastic purge and scourge, its double-working of lowering the numbers, and enhancing the quality, or knowledge, or power of Man— “quality” and “knowledge” being employed to mean the same thing, since it is obvious that the quality of an animal is exhibited in its power over Nature, as its power depends upon its knowledge, since, if the animal knows enough, it can make to itself chariots of flame, watch an atom waltzing, wash in other suns, or accomplish anything whatever, those that eat of that tree being “as gods”. But “quality” may be employed in a somewhat different sense to mean, not “knowledge”, but “capability of acquiring knowledge”: for, if an animal A has more power over Nature than B, A, at that instant, is actually of the higher quality; but if B is capable of acquiring more knowledge than A has or can acquire, B is potentially of the higher quality: in the first aspect a cat being of higher quality than a baby, but in the second a baby being of higher quality; and it is in this second sense especially that War heightens the quality of varieties, by heightening the quality of births — a statement whose truth may not be obvious at once to all: for “Howl”, someone may say, “here are our boys, our bravest and brightest, the parents of the future, being devoured by War — can this heighten the quality of births in our variety?” The answer is that the Great Physician is a Surgeon, too; that, if He “works in a mysterious way”, it is ever without fail; and, as for me, though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him. It cannot, indeed, be denied that when the braw and bright fall, there is a loss of good blood; the guess has even been made that here was the cause of the fall of Rome, whose soldiers are supposed to have been all braw and bright; but, then, this picking of men has not been general — certainly is not the case in the modern conscript army, which, for one braw and bright, contains fifty riffraff a little better than C 3; and since, before a war, there was more than the “average number” somewhere, every death not only tends to rectify the wrenched ratio between numbers and knowledge, but, by that very lowering of the claims upon the wealth which the then stock of knowledge can wrest from Nature, every death tends to heighten quality by granting more wealth to survivors, more leisure to acquire a liking for knowledge, and augment its stock: for it is as if blood was “let” from the plethoric, and the brain cleared for activity. But this is far from all: for for every man — braw-and-bright or riff raff — who is killed in war, a woman, too, is killed by the same two-edged sword — a woman as a woman, as a mother, since, with a lesser number of husbands there must needs (where there is monogamy) be a lesser number of wives; and these will be picked wives, the riffraff girls being left unselected — a Divine thing: for, as Tennyson well says, “our mothers make us most”, giving us “our intelligence” (Schopenhauer), and our height — animals (as stock-breeders know) getting shape from the sire, size from the dam, as men get that in which the civilised do not surpass savages, their character, or moral shape, from fathers, but their intelligence, or mental size and span of forehead, in which the civilised far surpass savages, from mothers. This can be readily demonstrated, if it be granted that the aim of Nature among the lower animals is the development of strength or agility, but among the highest of intelligence. Let this be granted: then, it follows that among the lower the sex which transmits strength will be the selected sex, and the other sex the selector of mates. Now, there can in general be no doubt which sex is the selected, since this sex is adorned (with plumage, song, mane, paint, jewels, etc.), to catch the fancy of the selector sex, the male being so adorned and selected among the lower, to transmit strength, the female among the highest, to transmit intelligence. It is true that what men in general consciously select in women is beauty rather than intelligence; but then, human beauty when analysed is found to be nothing but an expression of intelligence, of mental health and strength.

We can now, at any rate, appreciate the reason for the constancy of savage warfare, and the rarity of civilised — War depending, not upon ferocity, but upon a wretched ratio between numbers and knowledge, upon the ignorance of a great number some where, upon the existence of much riff-raff — this being a corollary from the Law of Life, from the consideration that, if only one man was in France, Germany, there would be no war, though there might be, if only one lion was in each, with little life for its food; or, if the numbers of Frenchmen, Germans, etc., were as now, but they possessed a much larger stock of knowledge, i.e., of wealth and leisure knowingly distributed, still there could be no war, since no surplus numbers, or riff-raff, vile life-stuff, ready for any sensation and change from their tame wretchedness, offering to kings and politicians cheap fodder for cannon. It is, then, a question of ignorance and number. But among the civilised ignorance decreases — knowledge being as the rolling snow-ball, the speed of whose growth increases with its bigness; in modern Europe it already begins to grow with such speed as more or less to keep pace with numbers, which, moreover, are being voluntarily repressed. But, as to savages, who are all riffraff, their snowball of knowledge is next to nothing, and, having no momentum, neither rolls nor grows, while their number mounts up unrepressed by themselves, till want, or war, or bacteria, afresh repress it to a proper ratio with their knowledge. Indeed, in their case, number cannot but mount up unrepressed by themselves, since they lack the knowledge of physiology, and, if they had this, lack the power over Nature necessary to make the proper things to repress it; nor, after a war, does their little stock of knowledge grow through any heightening of the quality of births, for they are polygamous, and their riffraff girls, instead of being killed as mothers by the war, simply furnish more wives for each man, more children, the Hottentot dancing for joy that a man child is born into the world — the unconscious man, who likes to have his quiver full of them.

We come, then, to a point in our enquiry at which the statement of, say, Haeckel, General Butler, that war is a biological necessity cannot but be consented to: indeed, the proof above proofs that it is necessary is the fact that it happens — unless someone can imagine that there are effects without causes, or that some one animal and his matters are things outside the course and belly of evolving nebulae, so that something may possibly happen which is not necessary. It is, and has been, necessary, then — though to go on thence, like General Bernhardi, to the statement that it will continue to be necessary seems a mere licence of affirmation. On the contrary, it seems permissible to predict that when knowledge has so spread that the claims of nations to lands cease to be exclusive, and that the claims of individuals to land cease to render the structure of a society too complex for numbers to be repressed by the society itself, then War will cease to be necessary. The science of Economy, only some hundred and fifty years old, is still but little known or applied, countries being still “owned”, not by varieties, but individually, as by palæolithic man, the “owners” being essentially Normans, conquerors, with the conquerors’ mood for fresh conquests abroad under pressure of numbers at home, the non-owners being essentially Saxons, conquered, Israel in Egypt, economic riff raff, serf like, furnishing military service to the conqueror “owners” — a social phasis, offspring of war, and prompt to war, whose collapse in an age of aeroplanes and cathode rays one need possess no spirit of prophesy to foresee. Nevertheless, we know from the Law of Life that, however knowledge be advancing, number has always an innate rage to outrun it — a rage against which private enterprise in repressing number is but a slight and haphazard barrier. It is the variety, acting as an organism, that can alone decide upon its proper number — the State must do the arithmetic, and take the measures. But how is the State at present to do this? It cannot — lacks data to decide upon its “proper number”, society is too complicated and chaotic. The self suppression as to number of the French, for instance, is nothing but a groping in the dark: for it may be that the best number of the French, instead of $5n$, as now, is n , all that France now produces in wealth, safety from “enemies”, etc., by yn births of q quality being producible by n births of 5q quality, in which case the wealth of a Frenchman would be 5w instead of w, as now, and his happiness perhaps 5x5h, instead of h — happiness being that which is “precious”, not “life”. But nothing of all this can be ascertained in the economic complexity and chaos of our society — a complexity arising of necessity from the fact that countries are not owned by societies, so that, though a country’s wealth in any stage of knowledge is readily ascertainable, no ratio can be calculated between wealth (or knowledge) and number, no estimate made as to how many there ought to be, in order that each may be the virtual owner of so much of the country as a person can win sufficient wealth from to acquire a liking for knowledge and augment its stock — a deplorable truth, considering the wastefulness of War, and of that chaos of unconsciousness which breeds and feeds and raises to be razed by War those crops of riff raff which need never have been born. This, however, may anon be well. There lives and grows that Tree of Knowledge — fruit good for food, fruit to be desired to make one wise — and with it grows that Spirit of the Hive which, as Maeterlinck says, “disposes pitilessly of the wealth, the liberty, the lives of all this winged people, which regulates day by day the number of births, and contrives that this shall bear a definite ratio with the flowers that brighten the countryside....”

X. ON THE CAUSE OF WAR

A COMPOSITE PHOTOGRAPH of all Englishmen would be a face of a different expression from a composite photograph of all Frenchmen; and such a photograph of Englishmen it is which can be considered to be the face of Britannia — as to whom it is frequently said that, since she is merely a convenient symbol, not a real being, we behave wrongly if we behave as if she were real.

It appears, however, that to behave as if symbols were real beings can be highly right, a whole branch of mathematics being based upon the assumption that the symbol of an impossible quantity (the square root of minus-one) is a real being; and it is by regarding Humanity as One that many a scientist decides to lay down his life for Him, dying as X-ray Christs, dying of tubercle bacillus, self infected, and so on; and, if regarding Britannia as a real being, and standing up at “God save the King” has “cost millions of lives”, are there not things of more importance than millions of lives?

Is War, then, actually of some importance as is now (naturally) thought by those who passed through torments in 1914-1918? How many were killed? Ten millions? In three years? Is that of some importance? As many die every three months; and twenty million (better ones) press in their stead. And the other harms of War, are they not as transitory as this, and much of the good of War transitory too? But while that good lasts, and largeness of heart is the vogue, and a laugh at a breath of fresh air is in the land, bravo for War, which abolishes civil war — is it not civil war, the dull war-of-the-slugs now going on, that is important and is odious? Let the trumpets sound, though, and now that duke of Grosvenor Square, that grocer of Grays Inn Road, whose hand has been against every man, getting all he can out of his country, giving nothing, now his ears hear a voice of sirens crying, rumours of an old music are abroad, and such bugles going as gods use, calling “Come! suffer! die! — for Me!”: and he, enticed, is up, he is off — goodbye, all — to die — for Other-than-himself — he, the lubber, springing up a hero, the sneak-thief, see, is become a redeemer, the saunterer in clubs transformed into a martyr: and is not this the greatest that can happen to men, the saving of their souls? If they die of it, or go mad, what matters?

Of course the thing is Negro, and the Europeans who still do it must expect to be giggled at by their sons’ sons; but it is perhaps the least important of the Negro things among us, since its (inherent) results are soon over. As for the next one “wrecking civilisation”, as the phrase is, that does not seem reflective. A world-war could wreck civilisation as much and as little as turning a meadow’s sod with a stick wrecks the earth’s lithosphere: all the scientists, the text books, apparatus, would have to be destroyed, occupying a thousand armies a thousand years. That was laughable, those bombings of London of the Kaiser! — like the fantastic bright ideas of faddist inventors, and boys playing at war; if the bombs had been millionfold more in number and in power, the thing would still have been comic: for London needed some years to build, and is still mainly there, not troubling to smile at that bumming of flies.

It was the good that was done that was big, if fleeting, a good to be achieved in a lasting fashion by education, when the nations start teaching the child nothing but science, nothing but the habit of scepticism-and-inventing, of seeing untruth-and-truth, which is the trait of an intelligence educated to strength. Until then, War will do the good of calling to the common man, what Science calls to all, “Your life is nothing, come, live and die for Something”; and, of course, there will be more of the savage stuff, and still more, for all the Pacts, Locarnos, Conferences, until men, so educated, see and abolish the cause of it.

That cause, it appears, is simpler, deeper, more recondite, more inexorable, than Premiers see when they take pleasure-trips, and meet to speak of peace, saying, “Peace, Peace”, where there is no head-piece: for is not that cause of War the earth itself? — a question of land, of site-values? The nations claim portions of the earth’s surface as wholly their own; and if this claim is fictitious? Certainly a portion of the earth is partly a nation’s own, in so far as the nation has taken, i.e., worked, it; but hasn’t it an extra-value that other nations create, and therefore own? An acre of land at Charing Cross is of more value than an acre in Mashonaland, owing to its site, London being round about it; and those who use it should pay the rent of its site to London, which, creating that extra-value, owns it: until they do, there will be a sort of civil war always fretting, every Englishman at war with England, as a consequence of strained relations with the nation. So likewise England, as an entity of acres, has a site-value: Englishmen are better off for being in a planet in the midst of nations labouring at things and ideas than if England were a planetesimal wayfaring by itself in space: so Englishmen should pay a site-rent to the nations which, creating that extra-value, own it: until they do, there will be War-not-civil, as a consequence of strained relations between nations. National war, until countries are owned, not by village Jims, but by nations; international war, until the planet is owned, not by little Englands, but by Man, this taking place whenever a growth of population, anywhere outvieing the growth of science, makes poverty gross, bringing about a consciousness of wrong somewhere and a mood of quarrel with the four winds; international war unimportant in comparison with national war (for it must be forty-millionfold less wrong for forty millions to pocket a world-value than for one Lord Jim of the village to pocket it). But, unimportant in itself, War-not-civil is still important for the incubus of preparedness which its probability makes necessary: England, for example: England is rich in minerals; but how poverty-stricken the nation! it can't afford to create laboratories to make its boys philosophers — spends a thousand millions in preparing to fight; which thousand millions will in time be presented to a World-Treasury as site-rent, the World-Treasury to spend such sums upon world-works — there upon a Channel tunnel — there upon the Mesopotamian desert — anon awarding as prize a diadem of diamonds to some scientist's forehead — and anon squandering that cash like water upon some majesty of orgy, some appalling pomp of the family of Man.

XI. OF RELIGION AND IRRELIGION

“WE SEE STRETCHES of our cities going pagan under our eyes — more destitute of religion than some tracts of India”: so Dr. W. R. Maltby at a Wesleyan Conference at Manchester.

Those “tracts of India destitute of religion” would be difficult to discover, I think — using “religion” in Dr. Maltby’s sense of a willingness to give money to priests. But is “going pagan” — i.e., rejecting priests, becoming non Christian, non Mahometan, non Buddhist, non ancient — is this to become “destitute of religion”? or is it not to give up being irreligious, and to become religious? Let us see.

There is a Power that moves the universe— ‘buses, wings, solar systems; this is a fact, the only fact which we are powerless to doubt — though to say “a Power that” is a little odd, as though there were other powers that move what is outside the universe; there is nothing outside: so let us say simply “there is Power” — Energy, Stress, Might, Force. For Power is Force: Power is power to do something, to make an event happen; now, only five events can possibly happen: (i) something may move; (2) something may stop moving; (3) some thing may move faster; (4) something may move slower; (p something may move on a new course; if we attempt to conceive some event which is not one of these, we fail; and these, we know, are due to Force: so Power is Force.

Now, Force is a Mystery, infinitely unknowable: for we can only know something that has qualities, has a nature — a clock, a cock; and Force has no nature, for, if It had, It would be forced — like clocks, cocks — to behave according to its nature: but only Force can force; anything else is forceless: so Force would force Force — which is nonsense. So Force has no nature, is above nature, super-natural; It effects, affects, is not affected; is Absolute Lord and God, Almighty, Unknowable: for that which is above nature is X, inconceivable, to us who are in nature, who are not “made in His image”, He having no image, an image being bounded, He unbounded: and thou shalt not make to thyself any mental image, false god, or idol, nor bow down to Mumbo Jumbo, for I, the Lord thy God, am an imageless sort of god, not unworthy the worship of your heart’s heart, as your half a farthing fancies are.

There are, indeed, people — highly intelligent, many of them — who are pleased to name themselves “atheists”, and say that there is “no” God; but, then, these are merely people who are under a misconception as to the meaning of a word, and when they assert “there is no God”, they do not at all mean that there is no God, no Power to move suns, feet, they mean that God cannot be imagined, is not such as priests and the Negro peoples imagine It, Him, Her, to be; but they do not say what they mean, and, in saying in their haste what they do not mean, they utter a nonsense, forgetting that “God” is just another English name for Power, the Almighty, Whose being is as perfectly certain to them, to larks, to Martians, as it is completely mysterious.

But though we can never know anything of Force, we can know facts about Force — can know, for example, that there is much Force, that God is great; or we can know that, on the whole, God is good, i.e., that the sum of motions makes eventually for the happiness of the army of living things; this we know — scientifically now — in the same way that we know that water will warm sulphuric acid tomorrow, because it has warmed it in the past.

Now, religion is an attitude of adoration and of donation to God — the donation depending upon the adoration.

And, evidently, adoration depends upon knowledge about the object adored: we cannot adore a vacuum, nor adore when under chloroform: must be conscious, conscious of something, know something about some order of things, i.e., must be more or less scientists, a scientist being a person who knows something about order. And since adoration is a compound of (1) awe, and (2) love, before adoring we must know two facts, that God is (1) great, and (2) good.

Now, these are cosmic (or orderly) facts: so no ancient could suspect them, since the ancients had hardly any science (consciousness of cosmic facts): so religion is a modern thing like aeroplanes. They, new to the universe, and anxious, as savages still are, asked, “What shall I do to be saved?”, and, villagers in mood, they discovered the answer, “Love the neighbours, be good to Jim, turn the other cheek to Gertie.” This was done — became the individual’s village-morality. We are saved, are not anxious, know that the universe moves to good, to better, and, worldly in mood, religious, we ask, not “What shall I do to be saved?”, but “What shall I think to further a world, and what shall I make — how conquer disease, see into economics, speak across the seas, reach the Poles, the Moon?” Their “religions”, then, village religions, said, “Love God-and-the-neighbours” — as though there was some connection between the two loves; but, as to loving God — much — that was impossible for them, for we can only love what gives us pleasure; a rose, a baby, a lover; cannot love what gives us bad smells, leprosy, “palsy”, poverty: so that, to contrive to love Him a little, they, pretty miserable, had to invent “another world” free of leprosy, having no suspicion that in this world the greatness of God’s goodness causes Life to evolve, and that science would arise to abolish poverty and “palsy”: hence, so far from loving God, they were God fearing, their fear “casting out love”, as our love casts out fear.

Jesus, then, was not religious. Plato, Buddha, Philo, Mahomet — were not religious compared with us, since they had not our data, our means to be religious, we having got to know three things about God: (i) that the stars are suns, (2) that men are related to apes, (3) that the earth, seven thousand million years old, is likely to last ten times longer: the knowledge of which facts puts us in a new universe, makes us new creatures, of a mood and outlook different by billions of times from that of ancient men: for it is the place of residence that makes the animal. Jesus believed that some day the stars will “fall from heaven”, “like fig leaves”, upon Jerusalem, say; our stars can’t do that: a million earths can fall into the sun, a million suns into Betelgeuse, there being doubtless billions of Betelgeuses, the universe consisting of “island universes”, across an island light taking thirty thousand years to travel, taking a million to travel from island to island; and there may be millions of islands. God’s great: we have awe. And we have love: for we know the Gospel, the tidings of Great Joy, that we are related to snakes, that there is a principle of Progress in Being, leading on to lives that will one day be wiser, finer, more wildly delighted than ever entered into our little hearts to fancy: how greatly good! it might not have been so; we can’t help loving what made it so, though we still know pain. No archangel appeared to the mother of him who proclaimed this Revelation to say, “You shall bear a son, and shall call his name ‘Charles’”, yet he was Messiah, the teacher of dancing to the heart, harbinger of jubilee: beautiful were his feet on the mountains. What is amusing is that priests, professional experts in gospels, did to him what they did to those who announced that the stars are suns — reviled, denied him — did not even see that his gospel was gospel, but blasphemed because his cosmic gospel of knowledge abolished their village gospel of opium smoke, littly good, which saves the soul of Sambo and village Jim, males whom God, a male, somehow "loves".

So, having awe and love, we have adoration. And from adoration springs donation. A public spirit is abroad in "those stretches of our cities that are going pagan", a religious spirit, that is not villager, not troubled about "loving neighbours", but is new-religious, worldly, as much larger than the mental range of savages, of the ancients, as Paris under a humming of aeroplanes is larger-minded than a kraal or Jericho. And those who have deepest in their consciousness such facts as that stars are suns, what a spectacle of donation! The martyrs of old died to obtain "Heaven", "Nirvana"; not so Catter all, who inoculated himself with yellow fever — not for his "neighbour", but for a planet in space — not so Lola, who inoculated himself with tetanus, nor Lewis who lately gave himself neuritis, nor Chervin, who poisoned himself with black-vomit, Bosso with tubercle bacillus, Garré with glanders — hundreds of them — holier far than other martyrs, gallanter far than other vanguards of other armies. Not "destitute of religion", these, though "pagan" enough, despising priests as inferior types, and indignant at that irreligion of priests which keeps them villagers, keeps them really pagan, for "pagan" means villager, keeps them blind and deaf to God's Gospel, to the revelation of God's greatness, and of the greatness of God's goodness.

XII. ON TOLERANCE

IT HAPPENS NOWADAYS that when one has occasion to mention God, one has an impulse to stop to explain oneself, lest he be supposed to be insisting upon an existence which it pleases his caprice to conceive, in contradiction to others who see that there is no such existence: so much has a word of definite sense lost definiteness, and, like old lira-notes in Italy, become a shred all hoggish, because of the inveterate rote of clergymen's hurdy-gurdy, who ever take that Name in vain.

So, then, is this syllable to be abolished now from the lips of articulate speakers? English would be pitifully impoverished by such a loss! One would never be able to compose a poem, or say anything. And there is no need, since "God" is the English name of something as to whose being every living thing is not merely certain, but, strictly speaking, is certain of that alone, perfectly certain of nothing else.

But hear one of our most voluble bishops: "So-and-so points to the existence of God" — this "God" being a proper name for him, as it were John God, having the stale familiarity of a character in fiction, of Mr. Pickwick, whose unreality is taken for granted, who is a slogan, a name, and no more; such speakers coming as near to being atheist as a living thing may, so that, religion being bliss, wretched is the name of them. Or hear a canon: John God "is banished from the world by deism (godism), which puts Nature in His place". Our bits of bishops and canons, now! How admirably God remains tolerant of that blattering of their stalenesses, and does not gobble them up suddenly in the gulf of Him! But, then, that is the prerogative of God, to be tolerant: it is not always ours. Excellent, indeed, is tolerance in men, all men are so easily wrong. But if we see vast harm being done by a caste numbering thousands, and are tolerant, is that pretty citizenship? We aren't tolerant of burglars, murderers, who do no vast harm: is it possible that we should be tolerant of them, if they were a caste as numerous as parsons? Or is that a fancy, not an actual fact among us, that the caste of parsons do vast harm? They do, if it is true that they depress a nation's intelligence: for from intelligence we get all our superhets, all, all, our goods. Is it true, as many say, that they depress intelligence? dim it, hypnotise, sopify, cajole, jink, hum, it? that they are a caste of charlatans? They earn their living by quoting and extolling in the twentieth century the notions of the first century: is there not in such a thing something impudently mummer, essentially charlatan? Is there, then, no God, no Power causing motion, no Change, Evolution, Progress, to have our Europe urged a peg, or two, or twenty, above the mentation of the first century? "If Christ came to Chicago" — or imperial Cæsar — is much historical imagination required to divine that they would be astounded at seeing a street length of cars darting, with no donkeys to cart them, and would not the heart in them faint at the angel strangeness of an aeroplane wayfaring with muttering and meditation up among the vapours of heaven? And if the business of a clique consists in insisting for money that motion does not exist, that God is not a Reality, but just a fancy of Darwin, Newton, that the highest type on earth remains eternally at the level above the ape of Abraham, Jesus, Peter, Plato, that the ever-moving never moves, nor ever will move in millions of years, consists in presenting the ancient Asiatic to the respect of the air-mechanic, is not this charlatan? And if what charlatans say is accepted as intelligent by even a tenth of the people, must not this be depressing to the average of the national intelligence? They do, then, do vast harm, making tolerance of them a wrong: for to be paid to teach, and not to teach, is an evil, but to be paid to teach, and to dsteach (so to say), is even a deep evil. Does not education consist in a strengthening of intelligence? and since intelligence consists in a relation to truth — in a readiness to refuse untruth (scepticism), and in a readiness to seize truth (inventiveness) — is not education a training in disrespect, an eradication of that respect and gape which is ingrained in Hodge and children, and so is the contrary of what Chinese scholars imagine education to be? — for to invent is as much to disrespect as to be sceptical is to disrespect, since to invent one must have seen some defect in the past, and must esteem past men less than himself: so that in priests we see a clique who deliberately diseducate, weaken intelligence, preaching “be not unbelieving, but believing”, preaching, not disrespect, but even respect, not even respect of the educated, of the sceptic and inventor, but, like Asiatics and the ancients and savages, respect of the ancients.

And let no good citizen, believing that they now mow and mouth without influence, be tolerant for this reason: for they wear washed shirts, and, if like the first of men they go in aprons, these are not aprons of fig leaves; they bear themselves with assurance, produce an effect: England is still called “a Christian country”, nor could be called so, if it was not somewhat so. No one calls France so — only twenty miles away eastward, though ever fifty years away westward with the sun of Time.

So I, for my part, drop being tolerant here. Someone writes of me the libel that I am “anticlerical” and “impolite” to clerics, but I should not like to catch myself being anti-anything by predilection and bias, or pro-anything — except pro-England, pro-world, pro-God; nor is it true that I am “impolite” in respect of my lord bishop if by “politeness” be means what politeness really means — good citizen-ship, fine citizenship (from “polites”, a citizen). Now, fine citizenship is never so truly polite as when, to its own distress, it chooses to be ruthlessly rude, as when it shoots a lunatic going with a gun, or tugs a lady by her hair from before a motor-bus coming. And so as to our whiffs of bishops: politeness, or fine citizenship, is no longer tolerant and nice. For with what grub do our bishops feed their so hungry sheep? With this: that “So and so points to the existence of God.” But, then, all things point to this, for all things are in motion, both as wholes and in each bit of them: so that this, if it was not babble, would be blasphemy; but it is babble, it falls short of being articulate talk at all. Nor is it merely bishops who preach this species of gibberish: for in an admirable treatise by the “rationalist”, Mr. P. Vivian, which I have been reading, one meets with this tidings: that the Chinese hardly believe in the existence of — God. However, there never yet was man, nor mastodon, nor dog, nor mouse, nor louse, nor flower, that has had a doubt of the existence of God, “God” having the meaning which each bishop, each Bushman, each philosopher, each dictionary-writer, each living thing, is bound to agree to give to it: “God is the Power that causes phenomena” — causes that of which Life is conscious; and since in our consciousness of anything we are always conscious that it is caused, and since God causes it, we can say, instead, that “God is that Power of which Life is constantly conscious”, or, still shorter, “God is Power”.

Now, the brow and bowels of that Power are no doubt boundlessly profound, boundlessly, then, you say, beyond the defining or divining of Life; still, Life can never doubt Power’s existence, of which it is constantly conscious. There should be nothing; but somehow Something is; and it moves, changes: this we know; this alone we utterly know. But to Power our bishop sees it still serviceable to attribute this or that suburban principle: gives it as pedagogic, Miltonic, Semitic; and when I, with a wink and a dig in the ribs, cry “Ha! ha! excellent! sly dog!”, he, with a gravity whereat one has a right to feel aggrieved, replies, “No, really, I am serious: my wife’s a suburban lady — she really believes that to Power are joined these foibles; you, I see, do not believe in the Power of which Life is constantly conscious, but so-and-so points to the existence of Power.” This does not seem articulate talk; nor where our obsolete canon’s mouth gabbles that God, that Power, is banished from the world by godism; nor where our nodding rationalist announces that Chinese lives are not conscious of the Power of which Life is constantly conscious.

Sayings so idle are due to an essentially savage or childish habit in the use of this syllable “God”, which savage habit again is to be attributed to the essentially savage character of every such expression as “deism”, “pantheism”, “theism”, “atheism”, “theology”, and so on — words which will anon cease to be whirled about the world, seeing that each of them (“atheism”, too) tells of an essentially Zulu attempt to divine and define the essence of the Power of which Life is constantly conscious — an essence which, if it be infinitely profound, must through infinite Time remain infinitely beyond the defining or divining of Life. As to “the agnostic”, who well says “I do not know”, let him not fight with the scientist, who well says “I know” — who knows something about God, knows that God is good to, or for, Life, since He everlastingly captains the host of Life from three-toed to hoofed, from lizard to linnet, from ape to pope to Rutherford: nor is that “He” in reference to God to be resented, for, after all, one must say something— “He”, “She”, “It” — of which grotesque three “It”, surely, is the most grotesque? and in saying “He”, “She”, the philosopher wishes to hint that, whereas he guesses that God is not conscious and intelligent, nor uses any of the clumsy modes of animals on planets, he understands that there must be states of being that as infinitely transcend consciousness and intelligence as these transcend zero.... At all events, that is what one means by “God”; what all Life means, for, as Moslems say, “there is no God but the God”: the Power of which Life is constantly conscious — in sleep, in anaesthesia; the God of the bishop and the Bushman; but quite stripped of those qualities which the ladies of the bishop’s flock at five o’clock tea attribute to Him — but not even the bishop himself, I think, really. If he is ignorant, it is a guilty ignorance; if he is not ignorant, still greater is his guilt so to degrade our English. Really such Englishmen should be ashamed of themselves so to wound the womb that bare them, the breast they rest on: they are a bane and a brake, a trouble and a cross to their country’s odyssey; and, I repeat, it is not merely fine and polite to say so, but it is unrefined and impolite not to say so, and already is being considered impolite. Let my lord, then, eat and drink, making of his apron a serviette, and revel in to-day: tomorrow he is done: for though the gates of Hell shall not prevail against him, the gates of Heaven will, and they are horridly thorough.

XIII. OF VENGEANCE

VENGEANCE IN GENERAL is a good, nor is anything stranger than that the laziness of men in respect of taking vengeance should have led them to accept as plausible a doctrine so wrong, biologically, as the goodness of forgiveness: for to weaken, by hurting, the doer of evil is clearly to work toward rooting out weeds, and to further evolution.

As to public vengeance — courts, prisons — to effect this weeding-out, this is a bright idea which has all that dog's luck of savage bright-ideas. A grown up Government will find other things to occupy it than the storms-in-a-teacup of private wrongs; nor are the sort of "judges" chosen less of a dog's luck than the courts themselves — men with no training save a Mongol training in memorising and respecting — ceremonies, opinions, precedents! men, moreover, who have passed half a lifetime as barristers in an attitude of callousness to truth, in making blue look white for money, atheists in respect of truth, nay, hired assassins of truth, who are imagined, on being "raised to the Bench", to change their second nature, and become chums of truth. But to put revenge into public bands is like calling-in a plough to manicure one, is not less gawky, bungling, and, like other inventions of savages retained in civilisation, must do much ravage, crashing, like shrapnel into a china-shop, into the fine mesh of private lives, especially of women and children, a "judge" making per month as many as ten prostitutes probably. In lands such as Italy where revenge is looked upon as a moral duty, the individual rejects with contempt a mechanism so ataxic. How ataxic! for, since two eye-witnesses usually acquire two impressions, and, with full sincerity, present differing evidence, how deliciously irrelevant must be the impression of the “judge” built up out of the conflicting evidence of witnesses influenced by reasons to be insincere! And, if they are sincere and agreeing, still his impression must needs bear the same relation to the truth of the event, its mood and humour, as a golliwog of Congo-land to the humour of a face. And it is all the more ataxic because the “judge” sits calm: but what is before him is not a problem in algebra, to which a formula is applicable, but a uniqueness out of the complex of Being, suddenly confronting him; the man has no means to deal with it, is all at sea and out of touch, nor can thinking, if he could think, help him here; whereas the private avenger is provided by Nature with heat, and with a thermometer within him by which to measure the unique wrong, and wreak unique justice: if the wrong is great, or is little, just so is his heat, his vengeance; Nature in him is the Judge, the just Avenger; nor without this just heat can the “dispassionate judge” any more do justice: than he can, by algebra, decide just how much each of a thousand men should eat at any moment.

Nor is the “judge” all ataxic as to quantity of punishment only, but as to sort also: to punish every sort of offence Nature does not say “go to prison”; a hand put to a fire She burns; if put nearer, She burns at by just so much more, such is Her justice; but, if one jumps out of a window, She does not burn: and so with the variety of the private avenger’s vengeance: he gives quid pro quo, the “judge” always “quod” pro quo — so pauper, after all, in invention as in scepticism are lawyer-minds.

Moreover, it is not in respect of punishment only, its quantity and its sort, that the avenger is just, but in respect of pardon also: he knows somewhat; and the more he knows the more will pardon, since to understand is to pardon: so that the saying “forgive seventy times” would have been worthy of a biologist if entered on the intellectual plane; but it was uttered on the social or moral plane: and it is morally that it is wrong: for the partialness so far of men's perception that all wrongs are pardonable corresponds with the quantity of wrongs done, and, through vengeance tends to root out wrong. But the avenger, in so far as he understands, pardons: takes into account that his neighbour, the wronger, drinks, as the wronger's grandfather did, is weakish, queerish, in the fix of one of a million shades of one of a million idiosyncrasies or fates, and he pardons just enough, avenges just enough, for his Age and stage of intelligence, Nature in him being his Mentor, for "vengeance is Mine, I will repay", says Nature. But the "judge" is all at sea, knows nothing, understands nothing, would need years of intimacy or actual eye-witnessing to understand; if he pardons, he pardons at random by impulse, but hardly can pardon, being the parrot of a formula; and every time condemns another animal for his own lack of understanding.

Nor is the "judge" impotent to pardon alone, he is impotent to punish, if formal evidence fails, and there is a "brilliant barrister"; whereas the private avenger requires no formal evidence, he knows, nor is blinded by any barrister "in whom the footlights have lost an ornament" — horrid person really, paladin of untruth, odioso a Dio ed ai nemici soui. The whole curiosity will be more or less unintelligible, I imagine, to future Man marshalled under the dynasty and everlasting Kingdom of scientists, like the other curiosities that a society designed by lawyer-minds must exhibit.

XIV. ON ETERNAL AND TEMPORAL

EDUCATION IS A bringing out, so that, literally, a horse brought out of a stable is educated; but we only use the word now to refer to bringing out from a condition of drowsing the powers of the mind to a condition of activity: and since Mind is that which can acquire a consciousness of truth, education, then, is the bringing of the mind to a condition of activity to acquire this consciousness: so the educated mind is not one which is conscious of many truths, as scholars, shop-keepers, are, but is one which has been brought to a certain condition of activity, to a habit of strength in “reflecting” (as we say) on truth, so as to decide rightly “this is true”, “that is not true”.

Now, truths are of two sorts — eternal and temporal, or say cosmic and individual, the eternal or cosmic being called “scientific”; and traffic with this sort naturally has a virtue in bringing out a habit of strength in reflecting, a virtue which certainly the other sort not only has not, but rather has the opposite result, not only not educating, but rather, so to say uneducating, diseducating, and lullabying to a habit of lassitude. My consciousness of the temporary truth that my tobacco-jar is kept on a bookcase is very useful to me, but provokes no reflection, has no tendency to rouse my powers from drowsing, whereas my consciousness of the eternal truth that the nicotine in tobacco is a poison provokes, strengthens, reflection, until finally some mind is educated by this consciousness to the height of hitting upon the invention of spraying roses with nicotine to kill insects. Hence to present to a mind the temporal, the individual — accidents, conventions — like teaching one to read, to spell, to become “literate” — does not educate, but diseducates. A boy once asked me “What does morbid mean?” I told him that it means diseased: was he now more educated, reflected stronger, thought straighter, than if I had told him that morbid means soft? We English of the moment have agreed that morbid shall mean diseased, while the Italians of the moment have the convention that morbid shall mean soft, and are as inclined to smile at our “morbid bone” as we to smile at their “morbid velvet” — conventions as capricious, trivial, temporal, as the conventions of kiss-in-the-ring. Not even very reasonable conventions, in the case of languages — most of them; the ill chosen vocables— “purr”, say; not very clever; krokro might do, ronron; but where does the p come in? or “paw” — or “or”: too much sound: fancy “or” having the same sound as “awe”; and what means or in Italian means water in French, as what means frown in English means women in German, as what means stink in English means shin in Italian, and so on endlessly. And the senselessness of phrase— “I have been”; “I am been” may be better, as Germans, Italians, say— “am, after being”; as there is some sense in “I have taken — a cake”, “have a cake, taken”; but not “have been”, been not being a thing. And the queernesses: the plural of mouse is mice, of œuf is eu — so haphazard, fantastic; yet, if I said to the common man “it is less fantastic to say œufs, not eu, to say mouses, houses, not mice, hice”, he would consent out wardly, but au fond would think me fantastic, so much does just custom make what is natural look fantastic, what is fantastic look natural, nay solemn— “solemn” meaning customary, as does “moral”, “ethical”, eth in Greek meaning much the same as sol, mor, in Latin; and, if I went out now dressed up as Beau Brummell, instead of getting the lids of reverence that he got, I would get giggles — the solemnness all gone. So with language: “How do you do?” and echo answers “I do not do” — antic, Boer quaint, Lapland-outlandish, to make a cat laugh, if the cat is free, to see. And our German way of jerking out h — tickles a Frenchman! who thinks of the sick ejecting the breath for the physician to smell, and he thinks our “educated” as ridiculous for jerking out has our “educated” think our “uneducated” ridiculous for not jerking out h. And the often absurd spelling-convention of the often absurd word convention — there is no clever school boy who could not invent a better set of conventions in the way of a language than any that has yet been gabbled by man: so that that is little rational to entertain any respect for fashions so passing and frothy, or to imagine that a knowledge of them tends to educate any more than a knowledge of the conventions of chuck-penny or shorthand. Useful conventions — very; and the teacher of children, seeing clearly that a knowledge of them will be useful, teaches them, forgetting that he is not a general benefactor, but an educator and nothing else, and that conventions, though useful, are not useful to educate, to educe scepticism and inventiveness, so that he, the bringer-out of scepticism and inventiveness, has nothing to do with conventions, since they tend to deaden scepticism and inventiveness. An educator should be educated; and it is too muddle-headed in one educated to assume that a useful thing must be useful for all ends, that because a saw is useful for sawing, therefore it must be useful as a boot lace or a book-case.

And when “education” is made to consist of this traffic with passing fashions, that is laughable! I think that “purr” is at present spelled with two r’s, fur with one: and this is the stuff that the young are still stuffed with, to bring them to think and see, and lift up their eyes to the hills. And those who know about fur and err form “the educated”, with a middle-class point of non view, while the poor mechanic, Edison, Faraday, who do not know about fur and err, or know with a shrug, are “the uneducated class”. Yet some years hence fur and purr will be as forgotten on the tongues of men as Chaldean is, Middle English, Doric Greek, as Sweet foresees that coster-Cockney will presently be the convention, when the lords and lawyers, if any are left, will be saying “Mrs. Enery Awkins” — which, any way, is distinctly more refined and pretty than Henry Hawkins, hawking up the Hawkins; but meantime an unfortunate child is taught that Hawkins is refined and Awkins vile, with the same solemnity of face with which a child will presently be taught that Awkins is refined, but Hawkins a horrid hawk of quaint barbarians.

Probably girls are at present being better educated than boys, being less meddled with, crammed with grammars: and it is better to be stationary than to be led astray, as Spencer says; girls, moreover, are more taught the piano, drawing, hockey, golf, tennis — all manual work, traffic with things, genuine education, though this they call their “accomplishments”, while what they call their “education” — reading, history, geography, grammar — has no tendency to educate, and ruins the prick of the young intellect. Boys, on their side, have cricket — as Wellington won the battle of Waterloo on the play grounds of Eton, and lost it (or nearly did) in the class-rooms: for the more grammatic a general’s pen, the less dramatic his sword. But all that conventional stuff — reading, spelling, etc. — one should pick up somehow, as one finds it useful or amusing, after being educated — and one picks it up flyingly then — as the Fulham man gets to know the conventional numbers of the Fulham ‘buses without being taught it, the educator’s sole task being to educate, to teach a knack, the knack of seeing truth, of seeing the untruth of untruths, and being sceptical, of seeing the truth of truths, and being inventive: sceptical and inventive — those two which distinguish moderns from ancients, scientists from Chinese like scholars, from children, from savages; and since we have observed that nothing but traffic in eternal truth can educe the brain to these two relations with truth, so nothing but eternal truth, science, is the tool of education.

And even in teaching science the educator's object is not to teach science: that's not his job, to give any sort of knowledge, or goloshes, or jugs, or sugar, or Christmas hampers, or passports, or other useful thing; but only to give two useful things, scepticism and inventiveness, which two things are one thing — WISDOM — like the two faces of the same blazing sabre: having which, one can then get all sorts of knowledge, and goloshes, and jugs, and sugars, and healths, and heavens. No need to teach a child to read: to teach conventions dulls, not brightens, makes foolish, not wise; in his second year of life the child reads and writes spontaneously, if he is then a trained scientist, as Mrs. Montessori has proved.

But we teach them conventions and accidents! bare is naked, but bear is an animal. Italy is like a boot. England is four hundred miles long.

William the Matabele reigned in 1066. Boots are made in Nottingham: ah, but how profoundly dull, how sure to bring to ruin the briskness of any waking brain which just hears a hint of such ditch-water! Accidents! conventions! nothing eternal, universal, to elate and embraze the brain. Suppose that one comes upon a group of boys playing marbles; one asks "What's the game?"; they answer "if blue strikes red, we gain ten": that is their convention; one goes to another group, in France, one asks, and they answer "If white strikes blue, we gain five": that is their convention; but is one any better educated now after knowing that? One's memory is, as any nonsense that one tries to remember — the arguments of Plato, the Book of Ceremonies of the Chou Dynasty, Whang Hou's Admonitions to his Sons, the comic physics of Aristotle — any nonsense educates the memory quite as well as science does; and the memory of Chinese scholars, of people like Macaulay, does often become monstrously educated, bulking to a certain hypertrophy of deformity; but memory is the lowest of the mental functions, being known to exist in beings as low as infusoria, while in bees it seems to be superhuman. But otherwise one is not better educated after knowing the conventions of many groups of marble-players, or of many languages — by which time one is a scholar, a Chinaman, a pundit, one's brain deplorably ruined, stale, softened, deformed, like treadlers who always use one leg, and go crooked and crippled.

But suppose that, instead of asking “What's the game?”, as scholars, lawyers, clerics, do, one sets oneself to discovering just how much heat is developed when one marble hits another — ah, then, we can see what a higher type of being that will bring one out to, educating, bringing out, all one's handicraft and headcraft, one's strength of brain, mental muscle, independence, one's finesse, trickiness, resourcefulness, one's reason, veracity, reverence, disrespect, selflessness — in two words all one's scepticism and inventiveness, in one word all one's Wisdom.

Things, then, not conventions; eternal not temporal...

It is a question of the hands: for, as the racial brain development followed upon development of the hand, so must the individual's brain; before birth his development follows the racial course, and not less after birth it must, the baby from his first year learning to deal with woods, metals — being a physicist, that is, a “natural philosopher”, a philosopher.

XV. OF TIME TRAVELLING

FOR THE TIME machines of science fiction “impossible” is Mr. Edward Lang’s word in his article Time Travelling. But are they only “impossible”? Is not “absurd” the mot juste here? For let us wink at the initial absurdity of such a notion as the motion of steel in Time, yet is it not evident that soon after the Time Traveller starts into the future he arrives at the day of his death, and dies, so that all his later adventures are false? So, too, if he travels into the past: at once he comes to the day before his conception in the womb, whereupon his presence in the pottery of the cosmos is preposterous.

But for H. G. Wells’ Time and Time Machine there was an excuse: somewhere in the nineties of another century a person named Wells thought that “a cube has length, breadth, thickness and Duration!” with a capital D (I hope); but it was not the latest Wells who said that, it was another person who did not know what species of things an atom is: for, of course, a person who knows something is not the same person as a person who does not know it, since knowledge is part of personality. The latest Wells knows, and doubtless smiles at the idea of a cube having duration, or at a person, or anything, having duration — save One, save Force. A cube, a person, anything, is made of atoms — partly, anyway; atoms are moving systems; and, of course, a moving system is at every instant a new thing; “look, new moon”, that is just the truth.

However, Mr. Lang, in rejecting Wells, falls back upon J. W. Dunne: in rejecting Time Machines, falls back upon Dreams, for it appears that in dreams one may travel on a Time Machine not made with steel. Dunne's explanation being that Time is a "dimension" — of something! — to which dimension one is in a special relation in sleep. That it is a dimension was likewise Wells' idea, is likewise Einstein's, for whom the universe is four dimensional, is Space Time, a "Continuum" of length, breadth, depth, and — Time.

This, though, as Spencer used to say, "cannot be imagined". When the good Einstein says to me, "Try to imagine it," my reply is, "You try, then come and let me know how you got on." If it were true, Mind would be a foreigner in the cosmos — which, however, is not to say that it is untrue, but only to say that it can never be science, since we can never know what we are fundamentally powerless to imagine.

"Dimension" indeed is a space term, inapplicable to Time, which is not, like Space, an existence, but is just a ratio — of Force to the product of Space and Mass.

Suppose that once upon a time the force of a dyne was applied an instant to the mass of a gram, then the mass, encountering no resistance, moved, is for ever moving on; not infinitely quickly, not infinitely slowly; how quickly, how slowly, is an inherence in Being, every movement in the universe taking place at the same ratio, the ratio or "rate" at which children grow, frogs hop, sceptics and inventors cogitate, suns rush and shout; that ratio is Time, so $t=C(sm/f)$, where t is the time, s the distance done to date, m the mass, f the force, C a constant; t varying as s and m , varying inversely as f , having no existence except as a ratio between existences: as there may be a ratio between a cheese and a chisel, but no such existence as cheese-chisel.

But in Dunne's fancy not only is Time an existence, a fourth "dimension", but, as though four were not one too many, there are more than four; there is fifth, sixth, and so on, and there is Observer Two (after Death One!) to be aware of Time Two, as there is Observer Three (after Death Two?) to be aware of Time Three, and so on: so in dreams (since sleep is something like death) “we”, being then something like Observer Two, see the future a little, and then “we” die, “we” are Observers Two, and see it clearly.

But the fact that there is some distinction between Observer One and Observer Two certainly means that “we” can’t be both, for, if Observer Two is different, he is another, is not “we”; so when someone named Tom is resurrected by the archangel’s trump, it is someone immortal who is resurrected; but that is not the Tom who was buried: that Tom was mortal: so how can a different Tom be the same Tom, an immortal Tom the same Tom as a mortal Tom? To think this does not seem reasonable.

It appears indeed that people in sleep do (inexactly) see “future” happenings, i.e., see happenings belonging to a farther-on point of the progress of the gram-mass struck by the dyne: for this is the horologe of the universe, the distance, the length, the space-measurement, which a unit of mass once struck in eternity by a unit of force has travelled, or would have travelled, if struck. But such “future” dreams do not need speculations so quaint as “Time One”, “Time Two”, to explain them.

We have a hint for their explanation in the fact that the Time-Travelling in them is never far, never farther than the lifetime of the dreamer; and always the dreamer is in the dream. This merely means that what we call “I” is a series of millions of persons (who occupy spaces continuous with the space occupied by the first of these persons in a mother’s womb). Now, each of these persons, though different by billions of changes from all the others, is still very like some of the others; if, then, one of these persons while asleep happens to be very like another of them who will be turning up to-morrow, next week, next year, then the person asleep will almost be that future person, and will experience (inexactly) the circumstances which will be the environment, will be part and parcel, of that future person.

For, if “I” am eating, “I” am an eater person, eating is part and parcel of “me”: and, if “I” am dancing, “I” am a dancer person; dancing is part and parcel of another “me”. So the sleeper sees (exactly) the circumstances of the person who he almost is; and he had better be asleep to see them, for then he has no circumstances of his own (of which he is conscious) to distract his attention, so that he may now have an inexact, an “almost” exact, vision of the future person who, for a moment, he almost is — for a moment, I say, for even long dreams endure only a moment, and during the millionth of a second while one of his present selves is very like one of the future selves, he has dreamt a landscape and a story.

If the dreamer dreams of circumstances which never occurred, nor will ever occur, he is then a person whom he would have been very like, who he would “almost” have been, if he had not fallen asleep.

If the dreamer’s dream is incoherent, mixed up, unreasonable, the person he then is, is very like two, or more, persons to whom different circumstances corresponded, or will correspond, and he observes the different circumstances belonging to these persons jostling in a hotch-potch.

XVI. ON PANIC

THERE IS A calm of middle-age when, in slippers at the fireside, we imagine that nothing could any more frighten us, and we “thank whatever gods may be for our unconquerable souls”; but, in truth, any little thing, almost, can conquer our unconquerable souls — a little wine, opium, a few flu microbes.

Circumstances make us different persons. I have a habit of thinking of saying, that “death has no terror for me”: but, even in saying it, I know that there is a profound difference between conceiving and experiencing — between those “faint manifestations of the Unknowable” (Hume, Spencer) which consist in imagining an embrace, an air raid, and those “vivid manifestations” when we are actually embracing or being raided, when that Real Presence of Pan, father of panic and of all is in our hearts and in our pantings.

I once felt that real presence when a boy of fourteen, sitting small on a massive stallion that was stepping down a ledge, precipice above, precipice below — sedately stepping, when those same devils that entered the Gadarene hogs got into him, and began to gallop him — down and round the curves; then there was prayer without words.

Nothing, in fact, can be quicker than a boy’s panics, more delicate than his mental poise. I remember being terror-struck by some sudden text of Scripture: “He goeth after her, and knoweth not that the dead are there... and, on jumping into mid-ocean from a schooner becalmed — just to bathe — no danger — panic suddenly took me at my loneliness, at a malignancy and ghostliness in the sea.

And again on a ledge — in climbing Snowdon, more lately — a young lady who stuck and refused to go backward or forward, infected me with terror, till it occurred to me to take off my boots, and instantly I felt safe and sure.

But as to the terror of death, men die every second, some on the gallows, and they stand it very well; a generation is like a string of boards on a river being borne toward Niagara, and, since those going over go in plenty of company, this comforts. What is more dismal to me than death is the funeral: “Magis pompa mortis quam more ipsa.” The tolling of bells — how wild a poet’s soul devised that thing! Those trembling trebles bleating, this makes an aching in the breast.

And, if the dead one was known to me, then for two, three weeks, I am haunted. Ghosts! as the good Ibsen says: “I could no more sleep then alone, without light, than fly. Yet the notion of the persistence of personality after death” is amusing to me, for I know that neither personality nor anything persists one second — after death or before death — and only One persists; but though I smile at “ghosts” with my head, I have them in my heart. I was born in a small island, so, as a boy, had to go to funerals, and press the dead hand in farewell — one old lady who had prominent teeth I still see.

There was a belief that if the funeral moved along the seashore the sea, at some point, would smell the dead, would be drawn, would sweep up once and wet everyone’s feet — which thing I once saw, and, ah! the awe of it, that haunted all the heart’s hollows.

Awesome, too, to a boy’s heart was when the funeral pace quickened a little (as is natural), and one mourner would mutter to another, “Ah, poor thing, ain’t she eager to get home?”

“True, true,” would be the answer; “she’s hurrying home, she’s hurrying home.”

But, in my opinion, the most vivid of the “vivid manifestations of the Unknowable” — the very face and stare of Pan — are manifested in dreams. All my own short stories whose motive is terror have come out of the mood of some dream. Sometimes I see people dead — as I lately saw Napoleon — dead, yet able to move about; and I dread that they may discover me, for they look for me.

And lately I saw someone like a woman, with a veil floating about her waist; and I knew at once that she was no woman — bigger, stouter — but a being of some other sphere; for packed within her was the vitalness of a million women, so that she was like an apparition of Life itself. Her vigour sprang out of the void like a tigress upon my eyeballs’ fright, and I saw her just one instant, for in that instant, everything in me cried out, “Oh, no, I mustn’t see that!” and instantly I was awake....

There may be such beings in Sirius! just the presence of whose rage and heart-beat’s horse-power would be too furiously rough for us to endure.

XVII. OF THE PERSISTENCE OF PERSONALITY AFTER DEATH

ON SUCH A matter opinions are no good — even if bias was not sure to come in; and, in general, what is said should be jealously watched, to see if it is opinion, to be disregarded, or matter of fact, to be laid to heart.

Of the two notions as to how living things are made, seventy-three per cent of Europeans consider that Mind is a trait of Body, as heat is of fire; while others consider that the body is but the garment of a soul, the soul at death sloughing-off the body, and thenceforth for ever carrying-on by itself. This soul-notion came from the Hindus, penetrated Greece, Europe, and is at present entertained by twenty-seven per cent of Europeans, as by all savages — with this difference, that Europeans at present entertain it on the strength of evidence, or of sacred scriptures, and we have psychical Research; whereas savages entertain it as a matter of course, with never a doubt, so that they even kill people, for the souls of the killed to act as attendants to a chief's soul in the soul-world, and they kill dogs, for the dogs' souls to go hunting with him there: for not only do they believe the soul-notion with (1) more depth than Europeans, but they believe it with (2) more breadth, believing that dogs, fleas, have souls that survive death, whereas Europeans usually believe that only human beings have them. Moreover, all Europeans formerly believed the soul-notion as undoubtingly as savages do: so that, apparently, there is some tendency operating, by which, as civilisation evolves types more and more civilised, belief in the soul-notion becomes (1) atrophied, and (2) narrowed. High-class evidence is presented to us that souls survive death, and communicate with the living. Henry James, for instance, relates that he received a message from his mother, dead twenty years, as to a matter about which only they could “possibly” have had any knowledge. Surely that is good evidence? But we have become such sceptics! We are not quite convinced — not convinced as savages are, without evidence; and, indeed, against belief in suchlike evidence is the broad fact that the temptation to pretend to special knowledge is strong in men, nor is anything easier to one so pretending than to bring in a “possibly” or two to emphasise one’s tale; and there is the further broad fact that, if countless hosts of souls crowd the soul-world, and can communicate, they must be extremely stingy of themselves, else we should all be sure of their existence, as sure as savages are.

Nor is it likely that savages are right here, and we wrong: for of late years it has come to be known by those scientifically interested in the mentality of savages that the speculations in general of savages are not only untrue, but have a certain quality of dog’s luck, by which they turn out to be the opposite of true. So we ought to expect that the personality of man or dog does not persist a second — after death, or before death — since savages are sure that it persists for ever.

And indeed it is easily demonstrated that personality is non-persistent — that nothing persists, save One, save Force. “All flows.” This we know now, knowing what species of thing an atom is — a system of parts that are in motion; and (obviously) a system of moving parts is at each instant a new thing. Perhaps in the course of ages the parts of an atom, of a solar system, may get back at some instant to the same relative positions which they occupied at some instant ages before, but that would not be the same atom back again in existence: for the parts themselves (electrons, protons, neutrons, positrons) are new every instant, being waves (see the “wave-mechanics” of Schrodinger, of de Broglie), and a wave (constantly in motion) is constantly being another wave: so that a block of steel is non-persistent, for if each of the atoms of which the block consists is ever being another atom, the block is ever being another block. This was not known formerly, when atoms were thought to be everlasting solids (Clerk Maxwell thought so!); it used then to be said that every seven years people are completely new in every atom — of hair, teeth; but that is now seen to be nonsense — seven years; seven seconds is; within the millionth of a wink the universe is new. So when Tennyson’s brook announced “I go on for ever”, that was amusingly Victorian, since, obviously, a brook is at every moment another brook, having no “I” to go on. And All is a brook that flows, only One Being persisting.

When Mungo Park in Africa asked the natives “Is it the same sun that comes up every morning, or is it another sun?”, he himself probably imagined that it is the same; but between Sunday and Monday a sun has changed in every atom and ion millions of times, is millionfold different; and a different thing is another thing. The Monday sun does not even occupy the same spot in space that the Sunday sun would have occupied, if it had continued to exist, for meantime mass has been radiated at the rate of two hundred and fifty million tons a minute, so that speed has increased; the only connection between the Sunday-Monday different suns is that the spaces occupied by all of them have been continuous. But though all are dwarf G suns, the Monday sun has become more a dwarf M, has become less yellow, more red: an M sun is not the same sun as a G sun; a red thing cannot be the same thing as a yellow thing; a tomato is not a carrot. So, if someone named Mike dies, then someone dead finds himself thinking without a brain, that someone cannot be the same Mike who used to think with a brain: the Mike who died is greatly changed, is different; and a different Mike is another Mike.

If we meet someone again after twenty years, we get the impression that some mass of calamity has befallen to transform him. Talking of one such, who had much altered, Sir Hugh Walpole once made the remark, “But he remains the same person” — a remark which most people doubtless regard as true. But is there any truth in it? No, it can easily be demonstrated that here Sir Hugh was not so cute a blade as he was usually. For consider what it is he said: that a person is a somewhat that never changes, whether the person is still lodged within a mother, or mumbles blind, toothless, a second time; so, then, a person must be a somewhat that has no intelligence, no desire, no eyes, no size, no body, no mind: for, if any of these is part of a person, and any of these changes, then the person changes; and a changed person is different, is another person. Now, eyes, size, do (as we know) change in persons from day to day; persons say “I have changed my mind”, behave in different ways; in sleep opinions veer, nails grow, health is modified, we come nearer to being old folks, we get out of bed someone else. Persons do change — millions of changes every instant, and when somewhat has changed, shall we say “He is the same, he has not changed”? for, if he has changed, how can he be the same? “Changed” means different. A person is a living being that behaves in a certain way, and, if we see two behaviours — hair now golden, hair now gray — a Don Juan now, a St. Anthony now — then, we see two persons, though the spaces they occupy are continuous, though both are called Tom, look alike, and have the illusion that millions are one. But in one day a person is even visibly fifty persons with fifty behaviours, one yearning abed for food, another turning at table from food, now drowsing, now roused to passion, come to humming, seized with sneezing, willing to dress, willing to undress, cross with a former self, bidding future selves “remember”. And, if personality is non-persistent before death, the notion that it persists after such a change is as little reasonable as it is atheist: for it says “there is no God there”; but God, evidently, is everywhere: that is, Agency, Energy, is; that is, Motion is; that is, Change is; and, if something persists somewhere, then no Change, no Motion, no energy is there.

We can see, then, even without peering three inches down into ourselves, that this self of ours, whose existence we are so prone to assume, is an illusion, so that always we hang the wrong man, the hand that killed having instantly ceased to exist; and nothing is, no one is, save One, Who is the same yesterday and to-day, Who moves, and is not moved.

XVIII. ON A MOOD OF THE FUTURE

I

WE ARE “IN a state of war” — What for? Is it that we are really knight errants of “freedom and democracy”? That was generous of us to free, after defeating, South Africa: what other country (except America?) would have made that gesture? But, then, we were in a state of reverence for the Africanders, who had nearly defeated us; we are less eager to give self government to a less martial India; and we were hardly zealots for freedom in respect of Ireland. At this moment our friends, the French, are imprisoning certain persons for claiming to think freely, nor do we, in our zeal for freedom, send messengers to France, saying, “Free these people by 11 a.m. tomorrow, or at 11.15 Britain will be in a state of war with France.” Is it even a fact that we ourselves are free? The most elementary freedom is the freedom to eat, and some — many — of us seem to be rather fettered in that way, not eating what, nor as much as, we wish. No, on the whole, it does not seem probable that it is for freedom that we are in a state of war. Is it, then, for democracy? But are we ourselves democrats, really? Is not our “government by the people” a government by about half the people, who vote down the other half? nor is the triumphant half ever markedly superior in quality to the defeated half, and may have voted wrongly! in which case democracy would be wrong — if that is democracy. But probably democracy is for other centuries, when the voters will be instructed critics, and will all calculate some answer to a problem. Anyway, it is hardly for democracy that we are “in a state of war”.

For what, then, is it? It is for something: something real, radical, and no fancy. Is it not for this, that we are islanders near to a continent? In islands the flora and fauna become variations from type, as Darwin found in each of the Galapagos Islands, so that we Britons less resemble Germans than Frenchmen do, than Germans resemble Russians, Italians, islanders being touched with a kind of foreignness, oddity, “monstrosity”, as the Shetland pony is, the bulldog, the “Japs”, the Cos lettuce, the Fijian fauna; and since one is inclined to dislike what is unlike one, especially when what is foreign is strong and menacing, this makes island always prompt to war with continent: so that the foreign policy of our island has, for centuries, consisted of the simple recipe, “Attack all foreigners that grow strong, to keep the continent a mob of small nations”: hence our “Napoleonic War” upon a “Boney” whose foreignness we mocked, as he mocked ours, calling us a lot of shopkeepers. And the island has managed admirably, by agile diplomacy, coaxing the continent into “balances of power”, dividing it against itself; but when we challengingly shout that Britons never, “never”, shall be slaves, this loudness is to drown an inveterate instinct in our race, which whispers us that some day Sicily has to buckle under to Italy, the Isle of Man to England, England to the Continent — again as before: we English now being the sons of continentals who conquered England. For we fight against the stars in striving to keep nations little, nations being like businesses, that tend to combine into trusts, etc.; and though our right little island may triumph time after time, nothing in the end can overcome a tendency in Nature — except some other tendency; nor can forty million people eventually defeat eighty million — if they are about equal, man to man: for not only are the eighty double, but their rate of growth is double.

Suppose, though, that the forty became superior, making up in quality what they lack in quantity? Here, indeed, is the island's way out! its only way. Let it produce Martians, superiors, equipped with the tools of a high evolution; so one would be safe in betting on ten islanders against one hundred million continentals, if the ten are over-men, as when a few of us with Bren-guns subdue a host of Zulus.

But how become over-men? is that practical politics to suggest this? Well, the difference between an educated intellect and an uneducated, or a mis-educated, is undoubtedly profound, the power of education to raise humans to a higher stratum of evolution being mighty—“education” here meaning a bringing-out of the energy of the intellect, a training in thinking, not a training in remembering, which dopes instead of rousing. If a child sees fit to read and spell, he will teach himself, with flying speed, in a day or two, if he is already educated, having an intellect quickened by the habit of tackling hard facts; but reading, spelling, useful as they are, are no business of the educator, whose job is to educate, not to give useful things in general, only to give two useful things — scepticism and inventiveness: which two things, I repeat, are one thing — WISDOM. A two-fold relation with truth — a shrewdness in detecting untruth, an agility in catching truth — scepticism and inventiveness — these are the fruits of education, fruits of Paradise, for all joy is in truth.

II

The trait of Mind is consciousness; and since consciousness is a perception of facts, it is only real facts, eternal truth, that educates consciousness, not temporary customs among men, as when we are informed that a, b spells ab, while an Arab boy is informed that a, b is ba. These, not real facts, do not give one to think. Which, now, is the more educated — an English boy on learning ab? or an Arab boy on learning ba?

To both the law is laid down that so the matter stands; but there is no matter about it, nor any law; the boys are merely being lulled to believe what they are told, to submit sleepily to the habitual, to revere what is not in the least reverend. This diseducates — except the memory, which any remembered emptiness educates: as I still remember how in the “dictation lesson” I wrote, “Along the beach ran a row of beech trees” — dull trash to present to a poor boy, who hasn’t the sense to protest that the prick of his intellect is being “let down” (as when we soften steel), and that all his lifetime he will be dulled and damped by this trumpery proffered to his young mentality: for what the teacher tells him is this, “The universe is dull trash, not a rush and a rapture clamorous with interests; what is interesting in it are the caprices of some people in spelling”: and this dull universe becomes the boy’s. This diseducates, educates backward, actually suggesting a lazy habit to the brain, saying “remember! don’t earn the bread of your soul in the sweat of your brow, remember about ‘beach’”: so that we, so hypnotised, when we think that we are thinking are in fact remembering something that hosts like ourselves, dead and living, have thought that they thought. Edison, Marconi, Faraday, had the luck not to know about beach, or knew with a shrug: to them, to an educated boy who cannot read, the point of interest is, not whether coals come at the moment from Newcastle, or whether Elizabeth was queen in 1558, but whether suns are millions of times bigger than earths, and whether or not it is eternal truth that rows of beeches do run along beaches.

But so to educate us islanders that, anyway, ten of us, by the law of chance, shall be definitely over-men, we shall need highly-paid scientists, teaching in costly laboratories: and where is the money to come from? Well, might we not scrap our navy, saving that money for education? Most of us would not like that: but are they not rather bizarre objects, battleships? and such a weak tin-kettles! They are made by experts, gentlemen who in general have a remembering habit of mentation, are not sceptics and inventors energetic with freshness of intelligence. The march of invention is from the complex to the simple; simplicity is strength; but naval construction has not followed the law, the most complex of things now being a war ship, which accordingly is weaker than a watch— “weak” meaning liable to likely dangers. One lucky blow ends her! In the case of the Maine, sunk at Havana, one might fancy that the task of constructors was to turn out a thing to sink with a minimum of trouble, as when the Camperdown, playing about with the Victoria, chanced to touch her, and down she plunged. These ships are a compromise between two motifs — speed and thickness — and thickness is so antagonistic to speed, that the result is almost a nonentity or No Thing. Nothing indeed could be a queerer outcome, like crinolines; and the future will doubtless look back upon them with derision. Someone may say, “Weak, yes, in defence, but potent in attack”; that, though is not so. Potent their guns indeed; but the guns do not hit! — except by chance: for after the shot has started, and before it leaves the gun, the ship has moved, and the gun has moved, and the shot’s voyage is too high, or too low, or awry: hence the saying, “Ships cannot fight forts”, forts being stable, as the seaports which I have suggested in my The Lord of the Sea would be. And with our ships we might scrap our R.A.F.: for, as a stone thrown at one lamp-post will probably not hit another, so it is improbable that a thing invented with one object will prove to be just suited to another object. The aeroplane is not a war-tool — is more dreaded than dreadful.

However, until the continentals invent with a fresh energy of intelligence, as when the French invented submarines, our inefficient ships and planes do manage to defend us, more or less; and, if we scrap them, we can look out to see Germans with pitched chins goose-stepping down Cheapside. For “Life is conative” (as the psycho-analysts say): “conative”, aggressive; and though there is no Maginot Line at present on the Canada-America frontier, is not this because they have enormous territories not yet thronged? Seeing us defenceless Hans, for example, an amiable bonhomme enough, but a bully by nature, will hardly resist the temptation to be meddling with us, crowing over us, making us pay, ordering us about in his sharp official fashion, snapping “ March!” But will that be unbearable? They will be doing it in any case, those eight millions, in the same year that we cease to succeed in wheedling the continent into war with itself. But they will not kill us, if we do not kill them. It may be bearable.

This, indeed, is mere “pacifism”, the “doctrine of non resistance”; yes, but non resistance with a difference: for while we are turning the other cheek we will be winking the other eye, thinking, “We bend, yes, but beware, you: our boys are at New School, becoming overboys, being taught not to read and spell, like you, but taught to mock and invent: beware!”; and when twenty of these islander overboys are nigh to manhood, they will be sending ambassadors to the continent, saying, “Please leave off being warriors, that not being a high type, and unsuited to the mood of our time. Understand that we have plans for the well being of humanity, and do not mean to let you hamper them. We have been doubting and inventing, our inventings, owing to our doubting, being no more amateur, immature, but now adult; we can easily destroy you: please do quickly what we want.”

This way out, indeed, will not be taken — now; perhaps, though, our right little island will have the tightness to try it some time before the opportunity passes.
